What then, it may be asked, is our opinion of the probability of the success of this Revised Version? The revisers have aimed, we doubt not, at presenting a version of the New Testament which should, in the future, take the place which the Authorized Version has held for the last two hundred and seventy years. We do not think they will succeed. We hoped in this version to find for something as nearly approaching perfection as it was possible for man to attain to. Looking at the representative character of the revisers, their true scholarship, and their undoubted honesty of purpose, we expected from their hands a version, not of course wholly free from blemishes, but on the whole, perfect and complete. The actual meets not our ideal. We cannot enter into particulars, but this is our impression. We have occasionally found no alteration where it seemed to be required; we have found some changes which, to us, seemed erroneous; we have found frequently changes made for mere change sake, and which are by no means improvements; we have in the general character of the alterations, found a departure from that simplicity and beauty and felicity of expression which have endeared the Authorized Version to the ear, as its truths have endeared it to the heart. We regard the Revised Version as a most valuable addition to Christian literature; as a most important help to a perfect version; but not as the version which, in its present state, is to take the place which the Authorized Version occupies, as the standard reference for the Protestant churches throughout the world.

As an example of the infelicitous manner of the revisers as compared with the style of the Authorized Version, I point to the opening verses of Hebrews:—

REVISED VERSION.

Heb. i. 1, 2.

"God, having of old time spoken unto the fathers in the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son."

AUTHORIZED VERSION.

Heb. i. 1, 2.

"God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son."

Apart altogether from the alterations here made in sense, there is a great departure from the beauty and simplicity of the Authorized Version. I subjoin a version which alters the translation where it requires alteration, while it preserves the well-known and justly admired form of our Authorized Version:—

Heb. i. 1, 2.—"God, who in divers portions, and in divers manners, spoke in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son."

Here we have made little change. The alteration from "times" to "portions" is imperatively called for by the original Greek. But with this exception, we have adhered exactly to the Authorized Version. Our revisers have, however, done much more than this. The form of the passage is altered, and also many of the words, without any necessity, and certainly with serious falling off in felicity of expression. And what we note here applies to many other places. Our revisers have presented to us a most valuable aid towards a perfect translation of the New Testament, but they have not given us a perfect version.

THE LOGOS—THE WORD.

J. B. COOK.

"In the beginning was the logos (word) and the word was with God, and the word was God. ..... All things were made by him. In him was life and the life was the light of men. And the word was made flesh (born of woman, Gal. iv. 4; Luke i. 31–35,) and dwelt among us; the glory of the only begotten of the Father; full of grace and truth." John i. 1–14.

Thus the word is the chief head or source of things. It takes precedence of all existing realities. It was and is above and before both earth and man. It makes man secondary, subordinate and subject.

So we are told that the head of the woman is the man; the head of the man is Christ, and the head of Christ is God, of whom came the word. 1 Cor. xi. 3: and all things. Romans xi. 36.

St. Peter says of him: "Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world; but was manifest in these last times for you who believe—that your faith and hope might be in God. 1 Pet. i. 20.

All these and like Scriptures conform to the history of our race and the still developing plan of redemption, by the word of the Lord.

This word is quick and powerful (living and almighty), neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight, for all things are naked and open to the eyes of him with whom we have to do. Thus it is invested with Divine attributes, as in our text and in Heb. i.

To crown the whole, the earth and creation, by this word of God, was by water, destroyed. Nay more; the earth and heaven is by this word reserved to the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men; the sin of the world. 2 Peter iii.; John i. 29.

Thus the ages are still unfolding into history. The Eden age gave place to the antediluvian, that to the Noahic, and was followed by the Abrahamic, the Mosaic, and the Christian—six ages.

Of course the times of the Gentiles have run their corresponding course. The beginning of Babel—the kingdom of men—was Babylon, then the Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman; so that the next age, the kingdom to come, is demonstrably now about due, near, at the doors. Mat. xxiv. Dan. vii. Gen. x.

To my feeble apprehension the wisdom and power, the cause of all things, all the ages, all the grand materials of history, center in this almighty word. As far then as we grasp this word by faith, so far we know what shall surely come to pass.

The entire wave of cause and effect, still centers in this word, embodying the wisdom and will of God—the great first cause, and the cause of all good causes.

In view of this all flesh is (frail) as grass; and the glory of man as the flower of grass; and this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you.

Note—There is no fatalism in this view. Because the logos is reason, wisdom and purpose expressed; and man, made capable of hearing, understanding, and moral government, has been so governed. He has reason and speech. He is susceptible of influence from motive as to good and evil. He proceeds through life on this principle, to govern in his family, city and nation.

Jesus said: "Lo, I come; in the rolume of the book it is written of me, (1000 years before) to do thy will, O God." Heb. x. So the church of the first-born—his many brethren (having been buried by baptism, into his death, wherein they had risen with him) they delight to enter on the loftier plane, take the crown and reign with him, over earth restored, in life everlasting.

All was once good, Gen. i., so all must be again restored (according to his word) or else God in his dishonored works, would himself endure dishonor and be wronged without redress.

This retribution will be but the consummation of all things spoken embraced in the logos.

GOD'S RECOGNIZED ORDER ESSENTIAL.

J. C. COOK.

"Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman watcheth but in vain. It is vain to rise up early, to sit up late; to eat the bread of sorrows; for this he giveth his beloved (Israel) sleeping; (the last clause, old German) Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord." Psalms cxxvii.

Here we see the ancient temple, God's house, the royal city Jerusalem, that God chose to put his name there; the chosen nation, Israel, encamped and sleeping or reposing as their Lord let down their daily food—manna—to them.

The house was to be builded, the city was to be guarded, their food provided, and the royal, ancestral line extended on to their long promised Messiah and his kingdom.

But in every relation no human endeavor would avail to secure success, except as the Lord should sustain, direct and crown it.

Thus the gospel gives us the vine and its branches; and our Lord says: "Except ye abide in me (as the branch in the vine—ye, the apostles and their successors, are fruitless, for) without me ye can do nothing." John xv. 1–7.

So it was said of man, "It is not good that man should be alone; I will make an help-meet for him." Gen. ii. 18.

The prophet proclaims God's purpose in making one woman only for one man that he might seek a godly seed. Mal. ii. 15.

Note—As the ancestral line, the ancient worthies, and the Messiah, were all secured by that arrangement, so now the Lord will have the church of the first-born, the many brethren body of Christ, from among the Gentiles, it is not God's way of blessing to young men that they set themselves above his arrangements. "We are workers together with him," and his grace to us is in vain except we work in his way. 2 Cor. vi. 1.

It is presumption in man to attempt to go alone, for Adam, Israel, and the Christian world, so far as they set out on that line, have gone to bad; into the snare of the devil, and way of death. 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26; Gen. ii. 17; Rom. v. 12.

We should set the Lord always before us. He teaches to profit. His blessing maketh rich and addeth no sorrow; and his promise is an hundred fold in this life, and in the world to come life everlasting.

The solar system is one of mutual dependence, relation of parts, and so is all fatherhood, for the whole family in heaven and earth is named on this primal order of mutual dependence, helpfulness and loving co-operation. Eph. iii. 15.

Thus the head of the woman is the man, of which wrong alone deprives her, except in St. Paul's distress, which confirms the order, and the head of man is Christ, and the head of Christ is God.

Hence if we build or stone guard, provide or co-operate in any way, we should proceed on the order of God. Amen.

REPLY TO INGERSOLL.

J. B. COOK.

Brother Magruder's work, Reply to Ingersoll, is worthy of high commendation. It is, so far as I have read, clear, concise, comprehensive and conclusive. My admiration increases as I advance through it. All may do their best to aid its circulation.

The "Colonel" exhibits egregious ignorance of himself, his theme and his end.

This is grandly shown in this rebuke. In fact he has announced this in his own spontaneous utterance, as reported from Zanesville, Ohio, after his lecture, and as if in apology for it, "Gentlemen, (to leading men of the city) I make more money by my damned nonsense than all my more serious and useful labors.

(Signed) PRIVATE DALZEL."

Note three points:

1. Money—the motive.
2. Its quality—nonsense.
3. Its outcome—damned.

In other words, his course by his own confession, was sordid, shallow and accursed.

Like others in profanity, he swears orthodox. Nay more, he indirectly and unwittingly sustains the doctrine of the Lord, which he presumes to condemn! In the net he hides for others his own foot is taken. Psalms ix. 16.

Atheism thus pronounces its groveling object, its opposition to all wisdom, and its revolting doom—damnation.

In contrast, Christianity crowns its converts in glory and immortality. And this is its profered salvation. Amen!

OBITUARY.

DIED—At Hammond, Mich., July 8, Sister Caroline, wife of brother Benjamin Woodward.

Sister W. was taken sick at our Annual Conference at Watson. She was brought home the next week. Her sickness continued nearly five weeks in spite of medical skill, and after much suffering, she bade her family farewell, exhorting them to be prepared for the future coming of Christ and the saints, expressing the hope of meeting them again in the kingdom of God.

Her death is mourned as a great loss by her husband, children, and aged, feeble mother, as well as by the little band of Christians with whom she has long been connected. But "we sorrow not as those who have no hope."

A large concourse attended the funeral and listened to the teachings of Christ and the apostles, that show when and where and by what means all Christians will "be forever with the Lord."

E. HOYT.

Mother now is taken from us,
We shall never hear her voice again,
Till she wakes in glorious triumph
From the fetters of the grave.

Home that once was bright and cheerful,
Can no longer hold its charms,
For that home is draped in mourning,
By the loss of one that's gone.

Yet I hear the glorious promises,
Of that mother's dying words,
Keep the faith, and live worthy
Of a reunion in the glorious age to come.

LOOKING BEYOND.

ADRIAN T. GORMAN.

I stood amid the wreck of years—the scowl of stormy skies,
And look beyond the coasts of time where Aiden's summits rise;
I rode the sheen of pearly gates, the glint of golden spires,
And flash of wondrous domes adorn with God's celestial fires.
I mark the blue of cloud-capped hills, the bloom of valleys fair,
Where deathless summer smiling flings her banner on the air;
O starry goal! O Beulah land! O rest forever-more!
Come loss, come cross, so I but gain that bright, eternal shore!

On Life's dark sea my wayward bark a devious track hath made;
Athwart her path dense clouds have rolled, and hurtful lightnings played;
Rocked in the lap of warring waves—tossed on the hill-me high,
The wild moan of the swift-wing'd gale her sounding lullaby.
But hark! the cheering voice of hope—"Trim, trim thy sails anew!"
God's love hath pierced the cloud-shades, and heaven is smiling through!
O starry goal! O Beulah land! O rest forever-more!
Come loss, come cross, so I but gain that bright, eternal shore!

Once more the shifting helm I grasp with courage firm and high;
On Truth's unerring beacon light once more I fix my eye;
Yeam, surges, foam! roll, billows, roll! His hand shall guide me through
To home, sweet home beyond the tide beneath a cloudless blue.
There I shall furl my tattered sails, safe anchored in the bay,
No more to dare the vengeful gale, nor maddened billows' play:—
O starry goal! O Beulah land! O rest forever-more!
Come loss, come cross, so I but gain that bright, eternal shore!

And then, companion bark, that time hath drifted to my side—
Frail, weak, yet fearless wayfarer upon the waters wide,
Blest be the sure and steadfast counsel a joy hath poured to me
The glimmer of thy pilot sails upon the surging sea.
I follow in thy snowy wake, and trust thy heedful eye,
That shapes our course where angel-hands shall crown us by and by.
O starry goal! O Beulah land! O rest forever-more!
Come loss, come cross, so we but gain that bright, eternal shore!

THE UNREAD BOOK.

"Of the making of many books," said the wise man, "there is no end;" and this endless toil has been going on for centuries. Egypt had her books in the gray dawn of civilization; Nineveh had her books, often copied and compiled from even more ancient record, and written upon earthen tablets, some of which, though buried for ages, have yet defied the tooth of time, and are just discovered and brought forth to light; Persia, Babylon, Phœnicia, Greece, and Rome had their books, and their great libraries were stored with the literary treasures of antiquity; the dark ages were not without literature, and the dawn of the reformation, in connection with the discovery of the art of printing, resulted in a vast increase of literary production.

But of all the books which have been produced through the ages past, how few have been preserved; and how few that now exist in libraries and book stores, have any vital force, or exercise any appreciable influence upon the minds and lives of men! To-day the press teems with books, and no flood of water cast out by the dragon's mouth, can compare in volume with the deluge of literature which pours from the swift, revolving printing-press. The learned, the wise, the conceited and the foolish, are stirred with the fever of authorship, and must give forth their thoughts and ideas to the world. Much of the matter which is produced is idle and empty; and some of it is vile as well as vain; yet still the tide rolls on. But how few of the books produced have in them the elements of vitality. "It is estimated that out of 1,000 published books, 800 never pay the cost of printing; 200 just pay expenses; 100 return a slight profit; and fewer still show a substantial gain. Of these 1,000 books, 950 are forgotten by the end of the year, and 150 more at the end of three years; only 50 survive seven years' publicity. Men have been writing books these three thousand years, and there are scarcely 500 that have survived the forgetfulness of man; and not 50 of the 500 are known to the mass of ordinary, intelligent readers in any one country of the globe."

Thus through these ages, man have toiled and travailed to bring forth books which are dead and buried and forgotten. But there is one undying Book, a library indeed, comprising between sixty and seventy treatises, written by thirty or forty different persons of varying rank, state, condition, character, and occupation; written at different times, during a stretch of fifteen hundred years; written in obscurity, in captivity, in prosperity, in exile, and in times of triumph;—this Book, thus produced, has lived when other books have died; it not only exists in the literature and libraries of all the world, but it exists as a vital force among the inhabitants of the earth. More copies of it have been published than of any other book written since the world was made; it has been translated into more languages, published in more editions, and has been, and is to-day, more treasured, read, and prized, than any other book man has ever seen. And yet no book has had such a struggle for existence. Emperors, popes, and princes have tried to overthrow it. Its translators and publishers have been persecuted, exiled, and slain. Its very possession has been punished as a crime. It has been concealed, and read in secret by those to whom its words were spirit and life. Thousands on thousands have died that they might read and retain this precious heritage; and thousands more would still cling to this Book at the risk of life itself.

Surely such a Book is no more human production. It must have in it a mightier than human energy. It contains not merely the words of dying men, but it contains the word of the everlasting God. It has not the word of a mortal, which falls to the ground: it is the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever. Hundreds of books have been written to refute and assail it. They are mostly dead and forgotten, and while they wither like grass, this Word grows like the palms of Paradise, verdant with perpetual beauty, and hardened with unfailing fruitfulness; its comforts refresh the fainting; its leaves "are for the healing of the nations."

New York Evangelist.

AT BETHLEHEM.

A Visit to the Scene of the Savior's Birth.

THEODORE CUYLER.

We set our faces for the pools of Solomon—halting for a few moments at the tomb of Rachel by the roadside. The small structure was crowded with Jews, some of whom wore phylacteries and all were wailing as they wail before the remnant of the temple walls. A woman was weeping and pressing her withered cheek against the tomb with as much distress as if the fair young wife who breathed out her life there forty centuries ago had been her own daughter. We found the enormous pools of Solomon (the longest of which measures 580 feet in length) were about half filled with pure water. We rode beside the aqueduct that leads from them all the way to Bethlehem. Down among the black and barren hills we saw the deep, fertile vale of Urtas, filled with gardens and fruit-trees. It is cultivated by the European colony planted by Mr. Meshullam. For a half hour we feasted our eyes with a view of beautiful Bethlehem perched on its lofty hill, and surrounded by olive orchards. So many new edifices have been erected for convents and other religious purposes that Bethlehem has almost a modern look. As we rode through its narrow streets we saw no Ruths, but an ancient Jew in turban, long robe and flowing beard, quite answered to my idea of Boaz. We rode on to the convent adjoining the Church of the Nativity, where a rather jolly-looking monk furnished us an excellent lunch. He then took us into the venerable church that covers the subterranean chamber in which tradition has always held that our blessed Lord was born. The chamber is probably the remnant of an ancient khan once belonging to the family of Jesse and of King David. I expected to be shocked by a sham mockery when I entered the church, but a feeling of genuine faith in the locality came over me as I descended into the rocky chamber and read, around the silver star, the famous inscription in Latin, "Here Jesus Christ was born of the Virgin Mary." The three-fold argument for the authenticity of this site is drawn from unbroken tradition, from the fact that Bethlehem has never been overthrown in sieges, and from the other fact that the learned St. Jerome, in the fourth century, was so sure of the site that he came and spent his long, laborious life in the cavern close by the birth-spot of our Lord. I entered with deep interest the cave in which this devout scholar meditated and prayed and wrought the Vulgate translation of God's word. My visit to the Church of the Nativity was ten-fold more satisfactory than to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in this city.

Monitory.

Brethren and Friend.

A Warning to Parents.

A young man died recently in a poor-house in Massachusetts, whose early life and social position afforded every advantage for a successful career. His father, General Reseau, was for many years a member of the Indiana Legislature. The General was a man of splendid physique and noble bearing, and enjoyed the reputation of being the most magnificent-looking officer in the service. The son deserted from the regular army, became a poor, miserable tramp, and at last, as stated below, ended his life in a poor-house. Concerning this sad case, the Indianapolis Journal says:—

"The case is not peculiar. It is one of thousands, and an awful lesson to fathers. A time comes when money, friends, education, avail nothing to counteract the mistake of the parent in the boyhood of the child. It is said that among the tramps and outcasts of the country more owe their condition to over-indulgence in youth than to poverty and hardships. Statistics on this point, accurately made up, would tell an awful tale. No sermon or lecture could equal it. The father, made sturdy and strong by a youth of poverty, in his ignorance and fondness proceeds deliberately to ruin his children. The labor that made him a man is regarded as disgraceful to his children. The lessons that poverty taught him are never taught his children, and prodigality and dissipation follow. One can but think of General Reseau a few years since the flower of manhood, a man among a million, glorious to look upon, and his poor boy to-day dies a wretched tramp in a poor-house. Who shall say where the blame rests?

Smoking Ministers.

In some places congregations are unwilling to receive ministers who indulge in tobacco. Many families almost dread the visits of such ministers, lest their growing sons will be led to adopt a practice which they so earnestly discountenance and oppose. The least that can be said is, it is a costly mode of needless self-indulgence, and as such stands in the way of a minister's usefulness. He pleads the missionary cause, and urges his congregation to economize; but his words fall powerless when they see that he does not love the cause of missions so much as to restrain his own self indulgence. To many, the odor of the cigar or tobacco is unpleasant, and especially in the sick-room. For persons of nervous organizations, as ministers usually are, it is an unmixed evil. It gives temporary tension, to produce ultimate relaxation. Not a few cases have I known of the most talented and promising young men who have been by it hastened to an untimely grave. I suppose there is sometimes a relish and enjoyment connected with it. I have seen men sit up for an hour smoking, with their feet upon a table, and professing to be studying. I have no doubt that they had visions of greatness and glory; but a somewhat extensive and prolonged observation shows that their lives usually end with their cigars—in smoke.—Bishop Simpson's Yale Lectures.

A Tale of Horrors.

A young lawyer won and married a bride that was the object of her parents' refined and devoted love, and the favorite of all the circle of her numerous friends. A beautiful cottage, elegantly located, and beautifully furnished by her parents, was the happy home of this favored pair. Several years glided by, and the husband began to ply the sparkling glass. Warnings from the Bible, entreaties from his devoted partner, and the solemn pleadings of his friends, could not arrest his downward course.

One fierce wintry night he came home reeling through the snow, and found his wife in a miserable, cold room, an invalid, trying to keep two babes warm. The drunken madman swore he would soon have it warm enough. Midnight came; the tempest had increased; the elements were in fierce conflict, and the raging fiend in human form was within. How he fired his home will never be known. Madness came for nothing. The flames, fanned by the winds, drove out the wife, bearing her darlings, to face that awful tempest. A quarter of a mile off stands the nearest house. Sleep exhausted, she sank down in the deep snow, with her helpless babes clinging to their mother. But a few minutes sufficed to reduce their home to ashes.

In the morning the sobered author of this ruin, with the parents and friends were searching under snow-drifts for the lost ones. At length, wrapped in a spotless winding sheet, they were found. White as marble, the lovely features of the mother disclosed frozen, silent tears on her cheeks, and cherub forms clasped in her arms.

Who are Rich!

Canon Farrar tells of 400 miners who were killed by an explosion of fire-damp, caused by a smoker, who opened his safety lamp to light his pipe. To that pipe, he says, were sacrificed these precious lives.

All England, he adds, is full of the fire-damp of intemperence, perilous and pestilential. The only safety is in total abstinence.

On the night of September 19, 1866, in the hospital ward of a London workhouse, might have been seen the helpless, speechless form of a man who had been picked up in the street. As this dying man was unknown, an advertisement was inserted in the morning paper, stating that he was a tall gentleman, about forty-five years old, in blue coat and dark pants with a gold watch in his pocket, a note-book written chiefly in Greek and Latin, and an algebraic calculation.

He was soon identified as Prof. Porson, regarded by the universities as the finest classical scholar of the age. He was taken to his home and died in the prime of life, another victim of intoxicating drink.

"Yea, many strong men have been slain by her!" Yet the witty poet, Dr. Holmes, has said it is "the drunkard's shallow skull" rather than the silver cup which is to be feared. But the men of largest brain and noblest culture have sunk to the lowest level by first looking at the wine when red, touching and tasting till self-control is lost.

A single county in Texas in one year spends $3,000 for the support of the gospel, $100,000 for tobacco, and $300,000 for whisky.

Voice Restitution:

We who have learned that excellent way that leads to life, must necessarily exchange the greater part of the present for the future.

How well it is arranged. We walk by faith and not by sight; looking forward to those things eternal which are not seen. Should we ever have a desire to linger in this presence we have only to look at the graves around us; monuments attesting the truth of the Divine Record—We all do fade as a leaf."

There is no perfection separated from the blessed Master. May he soon come. His alone can portray our characters aright. The world does not understand us; it never will until the Lord comes.

Why do you not join with us? Why do you throw away your time combatting the "learned" the "theologians?" These are questions I have met time and again from kinsmen and friends. One may answer according to Scripture, but they cannot understand. They stand without the Temple of Truth, how can they judge of the glory that floods its altars?

Oh brethren, ours is a noble calling. We are made participators through and with Christ of an eternal inheritance. Shall we care what the world thinks? Shall we who are to be kings on the earth abase our "high calling" for the paltry approbation of the world? God forbid!

I am alone among men, yet I trust God is with me. I am doing what I can, but among all the buildings "dedicated to the worship of God" there are few that open save to the "Sesame" of Rev. or D. D. As I lay claim to no such high sounding prefix or affix I of course cannot expect to be heard in the words of the humble Jesus and the poor fishermen of Galilee.

With Christian salutations, I am, dear brother, yours in the One Hope,

W. L. CROCKETT.

The Cyclopaedia War.

The month of July, 1871, witnesses the completion of the largest and most important literary work this country and the century have seen. It is the Library of Universal Knowledge, large type edition, in 15 large octavo volumes, containing 10 per cent more matter than Appleton's Cyclopædia, at less than one-fifth its cost, and 20 per cent more than Johnson's Cyclopædia, at a little more than one-fourth its cost.

Chambers's Encyclopædia, which forms the basis of the Library of Universal Knowledge (the last London edition of 1880 being reprinted verbatim as a portion of its contents), is the laborious product of the ripest British and European scholarship. It has developed through a century of Cyclopædia making; its various editions having been many times revised, in successive years, till it has come to be universally recognized, by those competent to judge, as standing at the very front of great aggregations of knowledge, and better adapted than any other Cyclopædia for popular use. It contains such full and important information as the ordinary reader, or the careful student, is likely to seek, upon about 25,000 subjects in every department of human knowledge. Chambers's Encyclopædia, however, is a foreign production, edited and published for a foreign market, and could not be expected to give as much prominence to American topics as American readers might desire. To supply these and other deficiencies a large corps of American editors and writers have added important articles upon about 15,000 topics, covering the entire field of human knowledge, bringing the whole number of titles under one alphabetical arrangement to about 40,000. Thus the work is thoroughly Americanized, and the Library of Universal Knowledge becomes at once the latest and most complete Encyclopædia in the field, at a mere fraction of the cost of any similar work which has preceded it.

The superlative value and importance of this great Encyclopædia lies especially in the fact that it is brought within the reach of every one who aspires after knowledge and culture. It is really a library of universal knowledge. It brings a liberal education easily within the reach even of every plow-boy of the country and apprentice boy of the city. Every farmer and every mechanic in the land owes it to himself and to his children that such a Cyclopædia shall henceforward form a part of the outfit of his home. To the professional man, and every person of intelligence in every walk of life, a Cyclopædia is a necessity.

Revolution

Of course the old and wealthy publishers who have grown rich (it is said, that the Appletons have made a profit of nearly two million dollars on their Cyclopædia) from the sale of their high-priced publications are not pleased that their monopolies are broken and their power overthrown. Of course the book agents and booksellers who have been used to getting from 40 to 60 per cent commission for selling these high-priced books are not so well pleased to sell the Library of Universal Knowledge on 25 per cent. commission, though those who are not short-sighted discover that their own interests, after all, are identical with the interests of the people, and their real profits, in the end, are improved, by the immense sales which result from meeting the people's wants. The majority of booksellers, however, are pleased to slumber than to sell this and our numerous higher standard and incomparably low-priced publications. But the Literary Revolution has always looked to the people, in whose interests it is, for its patronage, and it has never looked in vain, as our more than one million volumes printed last year (this year being increased to probably more than two millions) abundantly prove. You can order the Cyclopædia directly from us and by uniting with your neighbors and friends you can secure club rates as follows:

$10,000 Reward

To Club Agents.

A discount of 10 per cent will be allowed to any one ordering at one time three or more sets of the Cyclopædia; and a discount of 15 per cent will be allowed to any one ordering five or more sets at one time.

As a special inducement to our friends and patrons to go to work promptly and effectively, each doing what he can for the dissemination of universal knowledge, we propose to distribute $10,000 in special premiums as follows, in addition to the regular discount to clubs:

$5,000 Reward to be distributed equally among the first fifty persons who send us clubs of not less than twenty in number, the amount to be distributed proportionately to the number of names which each of the fifty clubs sent may contain.

$5,000 Reward in addition to the first $5,000 to be distributed among the 50 clubs sending next less than twenty in number, the amount to be distributed proportionately to the number of names which each of the fifty clubs sent may contain.

The names of the subscribers must in every case be reported to us. The first award will be distributed as specified as quickly as orders can be received, filled, and the names reported. The second award will be distributed as quickly as the names of the persons forming these rewards will be obtained, with the necessary reports of such, and the last award to all the clubs sent in entitled to compensation for same. Subscriptions received for such clubs will be forwarded to us as fast as received, and the rewards handed to the agents and booksellers or agents who may so well agree.

Persons desiring to raise clubs may send to us at once for sample volumes, if they desire, in the various styles of binding, and for 75 cents for the 15 volumes in cloth, $1.25 for the volumes in half Russia, sprinkled edges, and $1.50 for the volumes in library sheep. Orders for the full sets will be filled by us with the utmost promptness, every volume being carefully packed and boxed before leaving us, and delivered in the hands of the express company in good condition. Remit by bank draft, money order, registered letter, or by express.

Specimen pages of the Library of Universal Knowledge will be sent free upon request. Descriptive circulars of any kind will be mailed to persons writing for them, and illustrated prospectuses describing how to work and form clubs, by agents, will be sent upon application. Remit by bank draft, money order, registered letter, or by express. Terms cash. Discounts of 15 per cent to clubs.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Gospel "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Fair of Abyla.—The fall of Damascus has another interesting episode. Those savage conquerors undertook another secret expedition. The rich products of Syria were, at that time exhibited in the form of a fair, at Abyla. Among the objects of special attraction, at this fair, were the veil of a noted and devout hermit; and the nuptials of the daughter of the governor of Tripoli. Abdallah, with five hundred horse, undertook the expedition.

He was surprised to hear of the masses there congregated;—Christians, Jews, Greeks, Armenians, natives of Syria, as well as strangers from Egypt; in all about ten thousand, besides a guard of five thousand horse. The contest resulted in the triumph of the Saracens, the slaughter of many Christians, and the transportation, by the robbers, of immense plunder to Damascus. This attack was made upon an assembly of harmless people, and without any provocation. It was an act of public robbery, of which some but Arabs would have been guilty.

Caliphate of Omar.—Omar reigned twelve years. He was the conqueror of Persia and Syria, though he simply completed the work commenced by Abubeker. His work, as the ruler of the new, and growing empire of Arabia, was worthy of special note.

The first, after the fall of Damascus, was the—

Siege of Jerusalem.—Before the commencement of this attack, the Roman emperor, Heraclius, alarmed at the critical state of his Eastern possessions, sent against the Saracens, an army of 80,000 men. The armies met, on the Yermuk, a small stream having its fountain head in Mount Hermon, and flowing through Decapolis, into the Sea of Tiberias. The Greeks and Syrians were defeated, and many thousands slain. After the battle of Yermuk, no other Roman army was sent into Syria. This conflict being decided, the Saracens began the siege of Jerusalem, (Ælia).

Abu Obeidah sent to the commanders and people of Ælia the following summons:—

"Health and happiness to every one that follows the right way! We require of you to testify that there is but one God, and that Mahomet is his apostle. If you refuse this, consent to pay tribute, and be under us forthwith. Otherwise I shall bring men against you who love death better than you do the drinking of wine or eating hog's flesh. Nor will I ever stir from you, if it please God, till I have destroyed those that fight for you, and made slaves of your children."

The city being strongly fortified, held out against the daily assaults of the enemy, four months. Their defensive resources being about exhausted, "The patriarch (Christian) Sophronius appeared on the walls; and by the voice of an interpreter demanded a conference. After a vain attempt to dissuade the lieutenant of the caliph from his impious enterprise, he proposed, in the name of the people, a fair capitulation, with this extraordinary clause, that the articles of security should be ratified by the authority and presence of Omar himself."

The question was debated in the council of Medina; the sanctity of the place, (Jerusalem), and the advice of Ali, persuaded the caliph to gratify the wishes of his soldiers and enemies; and the simplicity of his journey is more illustrious than the royal pageants of vanity and oppression. The conqueror of Persia and Syria was mounted on a red camel which carried, besides his person, a bag of corn, a bag of dates, a wooden dish, and a leathern bottle of water. Wherever he halted, the company, without distinction, was invited to partake of homely fare, and the repast was consecrated by the prayer and exhortation of the commander of the faithful.

But in this expedition, or pilgrimage, his power was exercised in the administration of justice; he reformed the licentious polygamy of the Arabs, relieved the tributaries from the extortion and cruelty, and chastised the luxury of the Saracens, by despoiling them of their rich silks, and dressing them in their own coarse hair. When he came in sight of Jerusalem, the caliph cried, with a loud voice, God is victorious. O Lord, give us an easy conquest!" and, pitching, as a tent of course hair, calmly seated himself on the ground. After signing the capitulation, he entered the city without fear or precaution; and courteously discoursed with the patriarch concerning its religious antiquities. Sophronius bowed before his new master, and secretly muttered, in the words of Daniel, "The abomination of desolation is in the holy place."—Gibbon.

We have made this extended quotation, (1.) that the contrast between the Romanist Christians and Saracens might appear; (2.) and, also, that the characters of the three caliphs that reigned at Medina, at the beginning of the Divine commission to torment, might be contrasted with the character of those caliphs who reigned at Bagdad, Damascus and Cordova a century and a half later; who, after one hundred and fifty years of conquest, robbery, and torture, had settled down in luxurious ease. The simplicity of the lives of the former, and the splendor of the latter, have, perhaps, no equal in the world's history. God, having called them to a great work, adapted the agents to their agency. When the work was accomplished, they were removed by their own corrupt manners to make room for the second dynasty of the Mahometan empire. In a similar way, God used the Canaanites, as a rod of correction for his people. For similar offences, have two tribes suffered two captivities; and the ten a very protracted banishment.

After the fall of Jerusalem, the caliph, having given orders for the building of a splendid mosch on the site of the temple, formed two armies for the speedy conquest of the remainder of Syria; the one under Amru and Yezid, remained in Palestine, while the other, the larger, under the command of Abu Obeidah and Caled moved northward against Antioch and Aleppo; Omar then returned and remained at Medina, the seat of the empire.

The northern army met with no serious obstacle to their onward progress till they came to the castle of Aleppo. This fortress stood a bloody siege of about five months. Abu Obeidah informed the caliph "That their hope and patience were consumed at the foot of this impregnable fortress."

"I am variously affected," replied Omar, "by the difference of your success; but I charge you by no means to raise the siege of the castle. Your retreat would diminish the reputation of our arms, and encourage the infidels (Christians) to fall upon you on all sides. Remain before Aleppo till God shall determine the event, and forage with your horses around the adjacent country."

A supply of forces was sent from all the tribes of Arabia. In about forty-seven days after the arrival of all the castle was taken by the stratagem of thirty brave soldiers.

After the fall of Aleppo, Antioch purchased her safety, by the payment of 300,000 pieces of gold; yet she was degraded to the secondary rank of a provincial town. Cæsarea surrendered; then Tripoli and Tyre, with their fleets.

"The remainder of the province, Ramlah, Sidon, Gabala, Laodicea, Apamea, Hierapolis, no longer presumed to dispute the will of the conqueror; and Syria bowed under the sceptre of the caliphs seven hundred years after Pompey had despoiled the last of the Macedonian kings."—Gibbon.

With the conquest of Syria, ended the battles and sieges of six campaigns. Their uniform success was attended with a great sacrifice of Arabian life. They feared the frowns of God if they should retreat, though, at times their ranks were more than decimated. Under the Caliphate of Omar, which lasted twelve years, the empire of the Saracens grew with amazing rapidity. It included Arabia, Persia, Syria, Egypt, and a large portion of Asia Minor.

His conquest of Egypt was accomplished by his lieutenant Amron, one of the bravest of the Arabian chiefs. Such was the magnitude of the undertaking that the following dispatch was forwarded from Omar, at Medina, to Amron, on his march from Syria to Egypt:—

"If you are in Syria, retreat without delay: but if, at the receipt of this epistle, you have already reached the frontiers of Egypt, advance with confidence, and depend on the succor of God and of your brethren."

The siege of Memphis, a city about nineteen miles in circuit, occupied seven months, and was attended with many severe hardships. The Coptic Christians aided the Saracens in the conquest of Egypt, who were in servitude. Their chief, Mokawkas, an Egyptian, appearing before Amron, said:—

"The Greeks are determined to try the determination of the sword; but with the Greeks (Romanists) I desire no communion, either in this world or in the next, and I abjure forever the Byzantine tyrant, his synod of Chalcedon, and his Melchite slaves. For myself and my brethren, we resolved to live and die in the profession of the gospel and unity of Christ. It is impossible for us to embrace the revelations of your prophet; but we are desirous of peace, and cheerfully submit to pay tribute and obedience to his temporal successors."

The choice had been offered him, of the "Koran, the tribute, or the sword."

From Memphis to Alexandria, it required twenty-two days of conflict. This siege of that city, the first trading city of the world, was continued for fourteen months, with a loss of 23,000 men. Amron sends to Omar the following:—

"I have taken the great city of the West. It is impossible for me to enumerate the variety of its riches and beauty; and I shall content myself with observing that it contains four thousand palaces, four thousand baths, four hundred theatres or places of amusement, twelve thousand shops for the sale of vegetable food, and forty thousand tributary Jews."

In this fall of Alexandria, its immense library was consumed. Whether the world sustained any material damage by that act, may be questioned.

Egypt was, for a time, lost to Rome, and became a rich supply of provisions for Arabia.

"A string of camels, laden with corn and provisions, covered almost without an interval the long road from Memphis to Medina."—Gibbon.

In the conquest of Egypt, the Arabian empire had gained a most valuable member. Its tribute was immense, both in gold and provisions. The subjugation was no special damage to Egypt. They exchanged masters. It became the granary of Arabia in place of that of the Roman empire.

With the fall of Egypt and the country of the Amalekites, closed the career of conquest under the caliphate of Omar. The life of Omar clearly demonstrates him to have been a man of destiny. He was true to his mission. No one can read the history of the Arabians under Omar, without discovering the presence of a higher agency. The conquests of Syria and Egypt are full of illustrations. The work, and the visible agents will not compare. This is true of every battle, and every protracted siege. Omar, as well as Abubeker, was raised up for a special work; till that work was accomplished they were invincible. Their conquests were (excepting Persia) Roman provinces, where Christianity was the national religion. The Christian faith and practice had become so corrupted that God determined to chastise them with a scorpion sting. As with the Jews, so now with corrupt Christians, he sends upon them his Arabian (locust) armies.

He that follows the Lord fully will find goodness and mercy following him continually.

ISRAEL AND THE CHURCH.

NUMBER EIGHT.

J. CAMERON.

ALLEGED INSTANCES OF FIGURATIVE SENSE OF THE TERMS ISRAEL AND JEW EXAMINED.

Let us now look at those passages where the term "Israel" is supposed to mean something else than the descendants of Jacob.

First, Gal. vi. 16: "And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God."

Here Paul is speaking of such as walked by a certain rule, namely, of being a new creature in Christ irrespective of circumcision or uncircumcision. On such he wishes peace, obviously because they were subjected to the persecution or at least annoyance of those who insisted on the Gentiles observing the law of Moses if they would be saved.

But he adds, and mercy even upon the Israel of God—that is on the descendants of Jacob as a whole including even the believing portion who for the most part were zealous for the law; but certainly not excluding the unbelieving Jews, for by them mercy was most needed. Paul here simply expresses the same wish for the unbelieving brethren as he does in Rom. x. 1; and also for those who troubled them mentioned in Gal. v. 12. There might be some Jews among the first class—those who walked by the rule referred to—there could be no Gentiles among the Israel of God. This seems a fair reading of the passage in its connection, which is the only clue in many cases to the true sense of the writer. Besides, on the supposition that "the Israel of God" is the church generally, why should Paul wish mercy on them as a distinct class, when they were no more in need of mercy than the class described in the first part of the verse. For it is plain that he wishes peace to one class and mercy to another, seeing that he separates, in expression, the peace from the mercy, as well as the one class from the other. Thus if Paul had intended both peace and mercy for one class of persons described under the forms of expression he would doubtless have conjoined the two blessings somewhat thus:—

Peace and mercy be on all who walk by this rule, even upon the Israel of God.

The term "Israel" here then simply denotes the descendants of Jacob, believing and unbelieving.

James i. 1: "James a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, greeting."

It is supposed that James here styles Christians the twelve tribes scattered abroad. Well, be it so. It is evident, however, from many allusions in the epistle, that the Christians James wrote to were not Gentile but Jewish believers. Witness the allusion to synagogues in chap. i. 2 (see margin); also the mention of the law, chap. i. 11; the holding up of the prophets, and particularly Job, as examples of suffering, affliction, and of patience, chap. v. 10, 11; and Elias as an example of effectual prayer, verse 16, 17.

Of course it is assumed that the apostles in preaching the gospel had access only to two or three of the tribes of Israel. But it is not presumable that James and other of the apostles of whose travels we have no account, may have found access to the other tribes supposed to be lost? Did not Paul even travel into Arabia, and does not Peter make mention of a church at Babylon, just as it were incidentally, thus throwing light on a statement such as that of James about the twelve tribes? And Paul in his defence before Agrippa refers to the twelve tribes as instantly serving God day and night, in hope of the promise made to the fathers.

Would it be quite safe then, taking all the circumstances into consideration, to conclude that "the twelve tribes scattered abroad" was intended by the apostle to designate Christians generally, much less Gentile disciples who had never been scattered abroad? Is it not far safer to understand the apostle as referring to those disciples gathered out from among the scattered tribes of Israel by the preaching of the apostles, just as Paul in writing to the same class of disciples styles them "Hebrews" which no one ever thinks were Gentile believers, or even believers in general.

Rom. ix. 6: "For they are not all Israel which are of Israel."

It is supposed that the apostle's meaning here is—they are not all the true Israel, that is, Christians, (whether Jews or Gentile origin) who are descended from Israel the grandson of Abraham. But if this was all that Paul meant it is difficult to see any reason he could have for giving utterance to such a self-evident proposition, amounting simply to All Israel are not Christians. The apostle in the preceding verse but one uses the term "Israelites" to designate his kinsmen according to the flesh in a way which precludes the possibility of understanding it in any other sense than that meaning which it has in all other passages. The apostle says:—

"I have great heaviness and continued sorrow in my heart (for I used to wish that myself were accursed from Christ) for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh, WHO ARE ISRAELITES; to whom pertaineth the adoption," etc.

Here is an explicit assertion that the unbelieving mass of the apostle's kinsmen according to the flesh had not at the time he was writing forfeited the name of Israelites. Nay, more; the name "Israelites" is here applied to the apostle's unbelieving kinsmen as a distinguishing honor, and stands alongside of several other privileges possessed at that time by the nation. But the apostle appears to make an opposite statement in the verse under consideration—

"For they are not all Israel who are of Israel."

But this appears to be a simple declaration that all Israel were not "Israelites indeed"—that great as were the privileges by which Paul's kinsmen according to the flesh were distinguished, they were not such as to render the word of God of none effect which threatened their dispersion among the nations on account of their rejection of the Messiah. By rejecting Jesus they proved themselves recreant to the high position they were privileged to occupy as God's peculiar nation, and instead of displaying the Nathanael disposition in accepting Jesus as "the Son of God and the King of Israel," they showed the rebellious spirit of that generation of their fathers whose carcasses fell in the wilderness. It is worthy of note here that the infliction of the threatened punishment on the generation of Israel who left Egypt, did not interfere with the ultimate fulfillment of the Divine purpose to plant the nation in the promised land; so neither should it be said that the greater punishment at present being inflicted on Israel shall interfere with the ultimate accomplishment of the promises of final restoration, so plainly revealed in the Scriptures. It is inconceivable that Israel in this passage can mean Gentile believers, while a more natural meaning is found in the uniform use of the term.

Of similar import is the statement in Rom. ii. 28, 29:—

"He is not a Jew who is one outwardly .... but he is a Jew who is one inwardly."

That is, he hardly deserves to be called a Jew who is merely one in externals; such a one is not true to his birthright as a member of God's nation. But he who, by strict observance of the Divine law in its weightier matters of justice and mercy, shows his devotion to the God of his fathers, is a Jew of the right stamp, one of the class represented by Zacharias and Elizabeth who "were both righteous before God walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless." No one surely would suppose that a believing Gentile was a Jew inwardly, for even Gentile proselytes who kept the law were carefully distinguished from Jews of the stock of Abraham. See Acts ii. 10.

The foregoing examination of the usage of the Scripture in regard to the terms Israel, Jew, etc., is submitted to the reader as conclusively showing that there is no good ground for supposing that these terms are ever used to denote Christian disciples in general, either in their individual capacity, or collectively as the church. They simply and invariably apply to the descendents of Jacob, and that irrespective of their being believers or unbelievers. Believing Gentiles are nowhere termed Israel.

But while maintaining this position, I most cheerfully acknowledge that they who by faith "are Christ's, whether Jews or Gentiles," are "Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." This is an important distinction, inasmuch as the seed of Abraham by faith are "heirs" of a certain inheritance, while the Israelites are the mere tenants of the land, and "subjects" of the kingdom.

This distinction is clearly maintained throughout the Scriptures, as may be seen in the many promises to the faithful of reigning WITH Christ, and to Christ of reigning over Israel. It is also a prominent feature in the promises which God made to Abraham, and it is important to our inquiry to ascertain what relation these two classes sustain to Abraham in connection with the promises.

PRE-MILLENNIAL ADVENT.

Eighteen hundred years ago there lived a man upon the soil of Palestine, whose whole career was an inexplicable enigma to the generation in which he appeared.

Himself the centre of all prophetic oracles, he yet seemed to reverse every expectation prophecy had created. Probably no man ever excited such intense and universal expectations. Certainly no man ever so completely changed expectation into bitter disappointment. The nation and the world expected a conqueror and a king. They received only an executed convict, an expiatory sacrifice.

Yet the results of that first appearing, humble as it was, and utterly subversive of the wishes of a world, have developed themselves for ages, and are yet shaking all nations.

If, then, a second advent of that same singular personage be nigh, how much greater disappointment of a nation's, yea, a world's anticipation, may it not involve! How much more tremendous consequences may it not produce!

That "same Jesus shall so come in like manner as they saw him go up into heaven," we distinctly believe. And if that coming should prove to be the beginning and the cause of millennial prosperity, while the universal church are thinking it only the consummation and the close, would not their astonishment exceed that of the church, before his first appearing?

And if that first appearing, without splendor, without judicial authority, without the manifest assertion of regal power among the nations, has wrought results of wonder, what results might ensue, should millennial hours be ushered in, not only by the mighty movings of the Holy Ghost, but by earthquake shock, and trumpet note,—by the flaming apocalypse of him whose face is as the lightning, conveyed by angels of his might, descending with the clouds of heaven to stand upon the Mount of Olives.

And if, to the previous expectations of the Jewish mind, the after developments of the gospel dispensation were a mystery, inscrutable, into which scarce the prophetic gaze of an Apostle might penetrate, how much more may the developments of the regal era, the millennial reign be expected to be a mystery to the professing church, and to the world, until the very splendors of the day itself flash upon their startled eyes.

But is that second coming of the Son of Man so nigh at hand? Is it, in other words, the commencement and the cause, or the climax and the product of the millennium? This is the simple question now in the providence of God, first claiming the solemn attention of the churches. That he shall return in majesty to judge the earth, we all believe: "for God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained." The simple question where we differ is,

WHEN?

To the answer of this question, I believe the church is solemnly called. Do you say that it is in vain to pry into unfulfilled prophecy? There is a mode of interrogating prophecy, I am aware, in regard to days and hours, and minute details, which savors of presumption. But such is not the nature of this grand inquiry. It is a subject, on the contrary, upon which the popular strain of modern preaching has uttered ocular decision. And it is no longer a question whether it be a legitimate subject of opinion, but which of two opinions already formed, and boldly expressed, is legitimate?

An Abundant Entrance.

"For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ." 2 Peter i. 11.

This language seems to be borrowed from the case of a ship bringing her passengers to port on a pleasant afternoon, her sails all white and whole, and her flags majestically waving in the breeze; while the relatives of those on board ascend the high places, to see their brothers and their sisters returning home in safety from the stormy main. How pleasant to a man who is about to emigrate to the new world, when he meets with some one that has been there, and who is well acquainted with the coast, knows the best landing-place, and will accompany him on his passage.

"Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

He who passed through death, and is Lord of the sea, is our High Priest; and, with his priestly vestments on, he will stand in Jordan's current till the feeblest in all the tribes shall be safely landed on Canaan's shore. How delightful must be the feelings of the dying Christian, the testimony of whose conscience unites with the witness of the Spirit, to assure him that Jesus has paid his fare; and who knows he carries in his hand the white stone with the new name, to be exhibited on the pier-head, on the other side, hard by his Father's house. This is an abundant entrance, on a fair day, over a fine sea, with a pleasant breeze swelling every sail.

"Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation."

O, how different the entrance ministered to the careless professor—the fruitless and idle—who keeps his hand in his bosom, or leaning upon his implements! Though he may reach the shore with his life, it will be at midnight, surrounded by roaring tempests, full of bitter remembrances and most tormenting fears. Yet, with tattered sails and broken ropes, peradventure he may gain the port; "for the Lord is good, for his mercy endureth forever." But who shall describe the condition of the ungodly, driven out to sea in all their wickedness; not even allowed a quarantine within sight of the heavenly Jerusalem, but obliged to drift about, dismantled and disabled, amid the darkness of eternal storms! Oh! to be forced from their moorings at midnight, when they cannot see a handbreadth before them; the thunders rolling; the lightnings flashing; strange voices of wrath mingling with every blast; and the great bell of eternity tolling a funeral knell for the lost soul, through all its dismal, and solitary, and everlasting voyage! Let us flee for refuge, to lay hold on the hope set before us, which hope is an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast, grasping the Rock of Ages within the vail!

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, July 27, 1881.

We cannot give Br. Pennimore's communication till next week.

We did the best we could in trying to represent the manuscript characters contained in Br. Myers' article by type impressions.

We submit a lengthy article on the End of the Age and approaching time of trouble to our readers without comment. May offer some suggestions on the periods hereafter. The Lord's coming and the end of this dispensation are, no doubt, events proximately near.

THE AMERICAN BOOK EXCHANGE.

The most important undertaking of the American Book Exchange is the reprint of the famous Chambers' Encyclopædia with the addition of 15,000 titles upon American topics. This work, in 15 octavo volumes well bound in cloth for the small price of $15, is now ready for all who desire a comprehensive cyclopædia that is in itself a library at a price that places it within the reach of every person of literary aspirations of however limited means. One has only to consult the work on any topic to learn with what fidelity and thoroughness these vols. have been prepared. We have looked into these volumes to ascertain how full and precise the information on the Great Prophetic Empires would be exhibited, and have found them replete with instruction so far as the volumes already received are concerned. See full advertisement elsewhere in our paper.

RUSSIA.—AGAIN PERSECUTING THE JEWS.

VIENNA, July 26.—Telegrams report fresh persecutions and pillaging of the Jews in the Government of Poltava. Seventeen villages have been entirely deserted.

RAVAGES OF THE SIBERIAN PLAGUE.

ST. PETERSBURG, July 26.—The epidemic among the cattle has extended to Livonia. The ravages have caused such alarm that medical aid has been sent in all haste from Dorpat. It is believed to be the Siberian plague, as in one case a peasant took the disease and died.

EARTHQUAKE.

SEVERE SHOCKS IN SWITZERLAND AND FRANCE.

LONDON, July 29.—An earthquake occurred at half-past two o'clock Friday morning in Switzerland and the eastern part of France. At Geneva bells were rung and houses shaken. At Marges furniture in houses was upset, and there was great consternation, but no casualties. It was also quite severe at Berne, Switzerland, and at Lyons and Grenoble, France.

France is evidently bent on an extensive and vigorous war of conquest in Northern Africa—not only to hold her own in Algeria and Tunis—but to extend her operations into Tripoli. Many thousands of French troops are being embarked from Marseilles for Africa.

President Garfield's condition was serious, if not critical, during Saturday night and Sunday. Drs. Hamilton, of New York, and Agnew, of Philadelphia, the consulting surgeons, reached the White House Saturday evening, and as a result of the conference of the resident and consulting surgeons, it was determined to make a new incision in the back to tap the channel of the wound and relieve it of the confined accumulation of pus which had obviously caused the sudden and alarming change in the patient's condition. The operation was successfully made, and the effect was as had been anticipated. The President again began to improve, and to-day's bulletins represent his condition as very encouraging.

Further details of the terrible storm in Wisconsin Thursday night partially reveal the extent of the damage that was done to crops, buildings, railroads, live-stock and to human life. It is the universal testimony of all reports that no such storm has ever visited that State before, and the destruction of property is without a parallel. The rain fell in torrents for hours, beating fields of grain into the ground that were nearly ready for harvest, and the lightning did more fatal execution to life and buildings, than ever was known in one storm since the State was settled. The aggregate loss has not yet been estimated, but it must be immense.

Impassioned for its beauty, and salt of truth—
'Tis then we get the right good from a book.

Of all expression, that which cannot be expressed.

Each act contains the life, each work of art the world,
And all the planet laws are in each dewdrop pearled.
—W. W. Story.

All knowledge is cumulative. The sum of our knowledge in any department of science represents the accretions made by the investigations of the past. If our time is remarkable for its discoveries and for rapid advance in all branches of science, both formal and applied, it must be remembered that other men labored, and we have entered into their labors. What we now see, and by which we are sometimes amazed, is the result of what men have been inquiring into, thinking about, experimenting on, and seeking to realize for generations, and in some things, for many centuries. There is no reason for believing there has been any addition to the natural mental endowments of men. The mental ability of man is now no more than it was thousands of years since; but the circle of knowledge has been expanding; and, as the intellect has entered that ever widening circle of exact knowledge on each subject of investigation, its natural powers, under the normal laws of their development, have become manifest.—Rev. W. H. H. Marsh.

HOME.

Make home a hive, where all beautiful heritage
Cluster like bees, and their honey-dew bring;
Make it a temple of holy recollings,
And love its bright angel with rhadowing wings.
Then shall it be, when afar on life's billows,
Wherever your tempest-tossed children are flung,
They will long for the shades of the home weeping willows,
And sing the sweet songs which their mother had sung.

Exegetical.

Mystery.

The word mystery means, literally, something into which one must be initiated before it is fully known (from muo, to initiate, to instruct), and then anything that is concealed or hidden. We commonly use the word to denote that which is above our comprehension or unintelligible, but that is never the meaning of the word in the New Testament. It means there some doctrine or fact that has been concealed, or has not before been fully revealed, or has been set forth only by figures and symbols. When the doctrine is made known, it may be as clear as any other. —Barnes.

Brevities.

The popular outbreaks reported from Rome against the Romish church are significant of a great change in public sentiment. It is remarkable that the first notable display of this feeling should have been made on the occasion of the removal of the remains of the reverend Pope Pius IX. to their last resting place in the church of St. Lorenzo. Few popes during their lives have had a warmer hold upon the affections of the people than the late Pius IX., and yet a Roman paper applauds the mob and expresses the regret that "the carcass of Pius IX. was not flung into the Tiber." This exhibition is to be deplored, not only as showing a decline in religious belief, but also as showing the growth of the mob and communistic element. Unless it can be speedily suppressed it bodes no good for Italy.

ISLE OF PATMOS.

It is an island of the group called the Sporades in the Grecian archipelego, about twenty miles south of the southwest extremity of Samos, and about thirty miles west of the coast of Asia Minor, with a population of 5,000. It is an irregular mass of barren rocks, twenty eight miles in circumference, and in the time of the Roman Emperors was used as a place of punishment. To this island St. John the apostle was exiled by Domitian, A. D. 95; and here, according to tradition, he wrote the Apocalypse, and perhaps his Gospel also. On the side of a hill a cavern is pointed out by the Greek monks, who have a monastery in the vicinity, as the exact spot where the evangelist received the revelation. The monastery, built by the Byzantine Emperors in the twelfth century, is inhabited by about fifty monks, subject to the patriarch of Constantinople. On the east side of the island there is a small village and a good port. The island is subject to the Turks, but the inhabitants are all Greeks. They subsist by fishing and commerce, and by agricultural labor on the mainland or the more fertile islands, migrating for the purpose every summer.

MORE ASTRONOMY.

This week there will be a busy time among the planets. The astronomers say that on or about the 17th or 18th of July most of the planets will be in the zodiacal sign of Taurus and in conjunction, with the earth in the sign Aquarius. The planet Uranus will be the only one excepting the earth which will not at that period be in Taurus. Strange phenomena are predicted in some quarters from this unusual relationship, as the attraction of all the planets excepting Uranus, will be on one side of the solar orb while that of the earth only will be on the other. To complicate things still further we have the comet wheeling and blazing on the north. Another astronomical phenomenon of the present year has direct connection with the great pyramid of Egypt. This year there will be seen the star a Draconis in a line with the Great Gallery or entrance passage of the ancient structure. Such an event has not transpired since the completion of the great pyramid, which is computed to have occurred in 2170 B. C. When that particular star reaches the position mentioned, it is further maintained that the celestial dial will have completed a cycle of over 25,000 years, or, in other words, the heavenly bodies will have resumed the position they were in at that remote period. Accompanying the chronicling of this particular phenomenon are various visionary predictions in which Piazzi Smyth and others indulge, such as important physical terrestrial changes, unusual atmospherical phenomena, and new phases in religious beliefs. But this fact is certain, neither the present nor many generations to come will witness as many wonderful astronomical phenomena as are crowded into the present year.

The hot wave from the 10th to the 19th had the effect of a terrible pestilence at Cincinnati, the number of deaths attributed to it during that time being 500, making this the most fatal period in the history of the city. The heat came unheralded and did its fatal work so rapidly that it was hardly possible to give warning. Men fell on the streets and died before they could be carried home. Others died at their places of business and some even perished in bed. It was, perhaps, well that the extent of the scourge was not realized at the time, the daily papers reporting less than half the actual mortality. Had the truth been known the city would probably have been panic stricken. Many who escaped death were seriously affected and will hereafter be sensitive to extreme heat and particularly liable to brain fever.

Where the Children are Just Now.

Out in the field where the daisies are growing,
Far from the city away;
Out in the meadow where the breezes are blowing
All through the glad summer day;
Where the bees hover over
The red and white clover,
And yellow-winged butterflies soar
From flower to flower,
Through many an hour,
Till the bright day of sunshine is o'er.

Out where the sunbeams are flickering and fallen
Down through the old forest trees,
Where sweet birds are ever their truest mates calling,
And leaves rustle low in the breeze;
Where the brook sings in song,
Running gaily along,
Past the grasses and ferns bending low
O'er the ripples so bright,
Sparkling in the sunlight,
As it scatters its rays to and fro.

Out in the wealth of the summertide glory,
Under the tender blue skies,
While nature is telling its own wondrous story
To mind human hearts, rare, and . . . :
Growing strong day by day,
At their wild, merry play,
Are the dear little children we seek;
Romping here, romping there,
Finding joy everywhere,
Gathering dimples in chin and in cheek.

Juvenile Sayings.

In 1857, during the pioneer days of a small village, now a flourishing commercial Western city, a teacher, wearied with the duties of the day, returned to her boarding-house at twilight to find Lillie, a child of three summers—the pet of the household—in bed.

The question was asked, "Lillie, have you said your prayers?"

"Yes."

"Who did you say them to, Lillie?"

"There wasn't nobody here to say 'em to, so I said 'em to God."

A grandfather coming to read his paper, found that he had mislaid his spectacles, and thereupon declared: "I have lost my glasses somewhere and can't read the paper."

A little three year old girl, desiring to assist him, answered, "O'an'pa, you go outside and look froo ze window, and I'll hold ze paper up, so you can read."

The Weeping-Willow.

BENSON J. LOSSING.

You have seen and admired the weeping-willow tree—Salix babylonica—upon which the captive Hebrews hung their harps when they sat down "by the rivers of Babylon," and wept when they remembered Zion." It is a native of the garden of Eden, and not of America, and I will tell you how it emigrated to this country.

More than a hundred and fifty years ago a London merchant lost his fortune. He went to Smyrna, a seaside city in Asia Minor, to recover it.

Alexander Pope, one of the great poets of England, was the merchant's warm friend, and sympathized in his misfortunes.

Soon after the merchant arrived in Smyrna, he sent to Pope, as a present, a box of dried figs. At that time the poet had built a beautiful villa at Twickenham, on the bank of the river Thames, and was adorning it with trees, shrubbery, and some flowering plants.

On opening the box of figs Pope discovered in it a small twig of a tree. It was a stranger to him. As it came from the East, he planted the twig in the ground near the river, close by the villa.

The spot accidentally chosen for the planting was favorable to the growth, for the twig was from the weeping-willow tree—possibly from the bank of one the "rivers of Babylon"—which flourishes best along the borders of watercourses.

This little twig grew vigorously, and in a few years it became a large tree, spreading wide its branches and drooping, graceful sprays, and winning the admiration of the poet's friends as well as of strangers. It became the ancestor of all the weeping-willows in England.

There was rebellion in the English-American colonies in 1775. British troops were sent to Boston to put down the insurrection. The leaders expected to end it in a few weeks after their arrival. Some young officers brought fishing-tackle with them to enable them to enjoy sport after the brief war. Others came to settle on the confiscated lands to be taken from the "rebels."

Among the latter was a young officer, on the staff of General Howe. He brought with him, wrapped in oiled silk, a twig from Pope's tree, which he intended to plant on some stream watering his American estate.

Washington commanded an army before Boston which kept the British imprisoned in that city for a long time against their will. In his staff was his step-son, John Parke Curtis, who frequently went to the British headquarters, under the protection of a flag, with dispatches for General Howe. He became acquainted with the officer with the willow twig, and they became friends.

Instead of crushing the rebellion in six weeks, the British army at Boston, at the end of an imprisonment of nine months, were glad to fly, by sea, for life and liberty, at Halifax.

Long before that flight, the British subaltern, satisfied he would never have an estate in America to adorn, gave his carefully preserved willow twig to young Curtis, who planted it at Abingdon, his estate in Virginia, where it grew and flourished and became in time the parent of all the weeping-willow trees in the United States.

Some time after the war, General Horatio Gates, of the Revolution, settled on the "Rose Hill Farm," on New York Island, and at the entrance to a lane which led from a country road to his house he planted a twig from the vigorous willow at Abingdon, which he had brought with him. That country road is now Third Avenue, and the lane is Twenty-Second street, and Second Avenue, where I saw it consumed by fire in 1845.

The tree which grew from the twig planted at the entrance to Gates' lane remained until comparatively a few years ago. It stood on the northeast corner of Third Avenue and Twenty-second street. It was a direct descendant, in the third generation, of Pope's willow, planted at Twickenham about 1722.

Design of the Miracles Before Pharaoh.

Notice, the design and adaptedness of the miracles, not only to distinguish the power of the true God, but to destroy the confidence placed in the protection and power of the idols. The while it authenticated the mission of Moses, destroyed the serpents, which among the Egyptians were objects of worship. Thus evincing, in the outset, that their gods could neither help the people, nor save themselves. The

FIRST MIRACLE,

SECOND MIRACLE

was directed against the river Nile, another object which they regarded with religious reverence. This river they held sacred, as the Hindoos do the Ganges; and, even the fish in the waters they revered as objects of worship. They drank the water with reverence and delight; and supposed that a divine efficacy dwelt in its waves to heal diseases of the body. The water of this their cherished object of idolatrous homage was transmuted to blood; and its finny idols became a mass of putridity. The

THIRD MIRACLE

was directed to the accomplishment of the same end—the destruction of faith in the river as the object of worship. The waters of the Nile were caused to send forth legions of frogs, which infested the whole land, and became a nuisance and a torment to the people. Thus their idol, by the power of the true God was polluted, and turned into a source of pollution to its worshippers. By the

FOURTH MIRACLE

of a series constantly increasing in power and severity, lice came upon man and beast throughout the land. "Now if it be remembered," says Gliog, "that no one could approach the altars of Egypt upon whom so impure an insect harbored; and that the priests, to guard against the slightest risk of contamination, wore only linen garments, and shaved their heads and bodies every day, the severity of the miracle, as a judgment upon Egyptian idolatry may be imagined. Whilst it lasted, no act of worship could be performed, and so keenly was this felt that the very magicians exclaimed—"this is the finger of God." The

FIFTH MIRACLE

was designed to destroy the trust of the people in Beelzebub, or the Fly-god, who was reverenced as their protector from visitations of swarms of ravenous flies, which infested the land, generally about the time of the dog-days and removed only, as they supposed, at the will of this idol. The miracle now wrought by Moses, evinced the impotence of Beelzebub, and caused the people to look elsewhere for relief from the fearful visitation under which they were suffering. The

SIXTH MIRACLE

which destroyed the cattle, excepting those of the Israelites, was aimed at the destruction of the entire system of brute worship. This system, degrading and bestial as it was, had become a monster of many heads in Egypt. They had their sacred bull, and ram, and heifer, and goat, and many others, all of which were destroyed by the agency of the God of Moses. Thus by one act of power, Jehovah manifested his own supremacy and destroyed the very existence of their brute idols. The

SEVENTH MIRACLE.

Of the peculiar fitness of the sixth plague says the writer before quoted, the reader will receive a better impression, when he is reminded that in Egypt that there were several altars upon which human sacrifices were occasionally offered, when they desired to propitiate Typhon, or the Evil Principle. These victims being burned alive, their ashes were gathered together by the officiating priests, and thrown up into the air, in order that evil might be averted from every place to which an atom of the ashes was wafted. By the direction of Jehovah, Moses took a handful of ashes from the furnace (which very probably, the Egyptians at this time had frequently used to turn aside the plagues with which they were smitten), and he cast it into the air, as they were accustomed to do; and instead of averting evil, boils and blains fell upon all the people of the land. Thus the bloody rites of Typhon became a curse to the idolaters—the supremacy of Jehovah was affirmed; and the deliverance of the Israelites insisted upon. The

EIGHTH MIRACLE

was directed against the worship of Serapis, whose peculiar office was supposed to be to protect the country from locusts. At periods these destructive insects came in clouds upon the land, and like an overshadowing curse they blighted the fruits of the field and the verdure of the forest. At the command of Moses these terrible insects came—and they retired only at his bidding. Thus was the impotence of Serapis made manifest, and the idolaters taught the folly of trusting in any other protection, than that of Jehovah, the God of Israel. The were directed against the worship of Isis and Osiris, to whom and the river Nile, they awarded the first place in the long catalogue of their idolatry. These idols were originally the representatives of the sun and moon; they were believed to control the light and the elements; and their worship prevailed in some form among all the early nations. The miracles directed against the worship of Isis and Osiris must have made a deep impression on the minds both of the Israelites and the Egyptians. In a country where rain seldom falls—where the atmosphere is always calm, and the light of the heavenly bodies always continued, what was the horror pervading all minds during the elemental war described in the Hebrew records!—during the long period of three days and three nights, while the gloom of thick darkness settled, like the out-spread pall of death over the whole land! Jehovah of Hosts summoned Nature to proclaim him the true God—the God of Israel asserted his supremacy, and exerted his power to degrade the idols—destroy idolatry, and liberate the descendants of Abraham from the land of their bondage.

The Almighty having thus revealed himself as the true God, by miraculous agency, and pursued those measures, in the exercise of his power, which were directly adapted to destroy the various forms of idolatry which existed in Egypt, the was a judgment, in order to manifest to all minds, that Jehovah was the God who executed judgment in the earth.

The Egyptians had, for a long time, cruelly oppressed the Israelites, and to put the finishing horror to their atrocities, they had finally slain at their birth, the offspring of their victims: and now God in the exercise of infinite justice, visited them with righteous retribution. In the mid-watches of the night, the "Angel of the Pestilence" was sent to the dwellings of Egypt, and he "breathed in the face" of all the first-born in the land. In the morning, the hope of every family, from the palace to the cottage, was a corpse. What mind can imagine the awful consternation of, that scene, when an agonizing wail rose from the stricken hearts of all the parents in the nation! The cruel task-masters were taught, by sacque which entered their souls, that the true God, was a God not only of power but of judgment, and as such, to be feared by evil-doers, and reverenced by those that do well. —Walker's "Plan of Salvation."

Princess Maria, only daughter of King Menelek, of South Abyssinia, is to be married to the only son of Johannes, Negus of Abyssinia. The dynasty of King Menelek is the oldest in the world. He pretends to descend in a direct line from the Queen of Sheba, and is in possession of several relics that are said to have belonged to her. The Princess Maria, who has been educated by a Catholic missionary, has just completed her fourteenth year.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Lord willing, I will be at Bro. Moore's, in Illinois, on Friday night before the fifth Sunday in July, and hold meeting over Sunday. August 8, I am to have a discussion with a Baptist minister at the same place, at Wells school house, south of Paris, Edgar Co., Ill. Following are the propositions:

Resolved, That the Bible teaches men and women (or sinners) are born of God in this life, and must possess everlasting life before they can believe in the Lord Jesus Christ.

G. W. Pain affirms, J. S. Hatch denies.

Resolved, That the Bible teaches Christ will come and set up his kingdom on this earth.

J. S. Hatch affirms, G. W. Pain denies.

I expect to spend the rest of August in Illinois as the brethren may appoint.

J. S. HATCH.

The Church of God of Montague and Wise Counties, Texas, will hold their annual Conference at Valentine Springs in Montague County, commencing Friday, August 12, 1881, at four o'clock, P. M. The place of meeting is four miles south of Forestburg, sixteen miles south of St. Joe, sixteen miles southeast of Montaguetown, thirty miles west of Gainsville, and twenty miles north of Decatur. We invite every body that feels an interest in the word of God to come over. Brethren coming from a distance will go to brethren Hodges, Grimes, or Sowers, who live near the meeting place. We want all the preaching brethren we can get. Any preaching brother who can come will please address me at Sunset, Wise Co., Tex., and we will help him come.

T. T. DOYAL.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God will commence on Friday, Aug. 5, at the house of the brethren in Winchester, Va., and continue over Sunday, which will be the first Sunday. All of the Abrahamic faith, and the people in general are respectfully invited to attend. All from a distance will please notify the writer in due time, and we will meet them at the R. R. depot, and take care of them during the meeting, and longer if they will stay, as we love the communion of the brethren in Christ.

N. J. MORGAN.

The Piedmont Association of C. C. will meet with the church at Tabernacle, Caldwell county, N. C., Aug. 4, and continue three days. Tabernacle is 18 miles from the R. R., Hickory being the nearest depot. Persons coming on the cars will go from Hickory to the conference by means of private conveyance.

JACOB J. HARSHAW, Sec.

I will meet with the brethren in their general Conference at Winchester, Va., Aug. 6 and 7, and remain till the 12th, and then will meet with the brethren at Baltimore as they may arrange the following Sunday, or Aug. 14th.

THE END OF THE AGE (AION) OF GENTILE SUPREMACY, AND COMMENCEMENT OF THE "TIME OF TROUBLE" IN A. D. 1891-92.

BY H. B.

In presenting to the Christian public the following predictions, allow me to state that I claim to be no prophet, but only a meek and lowly student of the word of God, knowing that whatsoever he has said that he will as certainly accomplish in his own good time.

God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent. Hath he said, and will he not do it?

Therefore, as one of the watchmen, who, seeing the danger approaching, I feel it a duty I owe to my God, to sound the alarm, and warn my fellowmen of the fact that we are living in the very last "times of the Gentiles." The Divine judgments predicted to close this dispensation will commence in a very short time. It is therefore the duty of all men—more especially professing Christians—to bethink themselves of what Jehovah has foretold in his word, and by the mouth of all his prophets since the world began.

The year A. D. 1882 will mark the most important epoch since the commencement of the Christian era, as it will witness the termination of the "seven times" of Gentile supremacy, Dan. iv. 16, and the commencement of "time of trouble." Dan. xii. 1.

These seven times are the same our Lord referred to in Luke xxi. 24, and which he distinctly characterized as the times of the Gentiles, form one grand span, commencing at the captivity era, and embracing the Babylonian, Medo-Persian, Grecian, Roman, Saracenic, and finally the Ottoman empire with whose collapse in 1882 they terminate.

The last half of seven times is subdivided into several shorter periods; the commencement of each one marking a crisis, or an important event in history; two of these I call especial attention to, viz:

"The time of the end," or last one of the seven times. Dan. xi. 40–45; xii. 9.

"The last days"—of seven times. 2 Tim. iii. 1–9; 2 Pet. iii. 3–10.

The first of these, Dan. xi. 40–45, refers, not as many writers very erroneously do, alone to Russia, but to Turkey; and embraces the whole period of the "last" or "seventh time." Its commencement was also to mark the time for "the breaking of the seal." Dan. xii. 9. The seal being broken about the year A. D. 1517, when that Augustin monk, Luther, the founder of the Reformation, having no sooner commenced the investigation of God's word, than the daring usurpations, the rank idolatry, and the blasphemous pretensions of the papacy, were at once detected and exposed, and Rome branded with the name of Babylon. The time of the end therefore represents the Turkish power in 1517, with Selim I. who as "king of the north" defeated and killed the Sultan of Egypt or "king of the south," Al-Ashrof-Quansoo (or Khanson) Al-Ghori, of the Borgite Mameluke dynasty, at Aleppo, in 1517, and his successor Al-Ashrof-Tourman Bay, near Cairo, the same year; whereupon he annexed Egypt to the Ottoman empire.

He also annexed several districts, among others the important ones of Kurdistan (Assyria) and Al-Jazirah (the "island" or "peninsular") that is Mesopotamia. The sheriff of Mecca made his submission to the conqueror at Cairo, presenting to him the keys of the religious capital of Islam. Many cities of Asia, previously subject to Egypt or Persia submitted, and he was saluted "Shahis-Shahi-alom," or "King of the kings of the world;" and "Shahol-Kerami-beni-Adam," or "Sole Master of the sons of Adam."—O'Connor's Hist. of Turkey.

The prophet says, "Yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him." It is therefore reasonable to suppose, that the power represented was not to come to its end immediately; the prophet saying no such thing, but implying that at the termination of the "time of the end" (the prophecy commencing with Selim I. and inaugurating the last of the seven times should then end) this power would be isolated and friendless amidst the nations of the earth.

My readers can easily remember how in 1877, Russia punished Turkey, while not one of the European nations raised a finger on her behalf; also how the Berlin Congress stripped her of most of her remaining European territory. Yet the Turkish power will not be finally broken until 1892, and accounts for the reason why the Porte has been able to procrastinate, and thus far elude the wishes of combined Europe; and it is also worth while to observe that the nearer we approach 1892 the greater the pressure brought to bear upon Turkey by the collective Powers, etc.

The last days of seven times, 2 Tim. iii. 1–9; 2 Pet. iii. 3–10, dates from that new era for the nations of Europe—the French Revolution—which at once put an end to absolute monarchy in France, and communicated to the neighboring nations of Europe the shocks of revolution, and the fierce fires of democracy.

They (last days) also mark the time for the out-pourings of the vials of the wrath of God. Rev. xvi. It is also worthy of notice that in connection with the out-pouring of the sixth, Rev. xvi. 15, our Lord gives the solemn warning: "Behold, I come as a thief."

This warning was to be given during the drying up of the great river Euphrates, i. e., the wasting away of the Ottoman empire, which commenced in 1820. Now, it is a well known fact that within a few years following the one specified, men began to proclaim and teach the nearness of Christ's second advent.

When therefore "he (the Ottoman empire) shall come to his end and none shall help him," or the Euphrates has evaporated—figuratively— the events mentioned in Dan. xii. 1; Rev. xvi. 17–21, will immediately commence, both being prophecies of that same "time of trouble."

Daniel says, "And at that time shall Michael stand up, (in all probability the same who appeared to Joshua in ch. v. 13–15,) the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people, and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time, and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life," etc.

In Rev. xvi. 17–21, St. John says: "And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air, (i. e. universally) and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, IT IS DONE!"

I commend to my readers patient, careful, and prayerful consideration of the foregoing words; implying, as they do, far deeper significance than is actually expressed.

Our Lord on his former divine mission of love for man's redemption, came to close the Mosaic dispensation, and to inaugurate the Christian, or dispensation of grace.

St. John says, ch. xix. 28–30, "Jesus, knowing that all things were then accomplished, (he having completed all things in connection with the mission for which he was sent) said, IT IS FINISHED!"

Ste. Matthew and Mark both state, "Jesus when he had cried with a loud voice, yielded up the ghost, and, behold, the vail of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom." Mat. xxvii. 50, 51.

What did that symbolize? That the last day of the Mosaic age having expired, there would no longer be any use for the high-priesthood. The age of grace having then commenced with the great sacrifice of the Son of God, who, as mediatorial priest, was about to ascend into heaven, there to sit on the right hand of God; men could henceforth, themselves bear their own petitions direct to God in prayer, and Jesus would intercede for them. When therefore, "there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done," it was the voice of Jesus Christ, who alone has a seat on God's throne, and part of whose mission it will be to close the Christian dispensation, or age of grace, by giving the command, which will immediately "send forth his angels to gather the elect from the four winds."

It is owing to the great events which will commence to take place in 1882, that all the European nations are making such extraordinary preparations, although in total ignorance themselves form reason why; or concerning the time itself for which they are preparing.

The London Times of a recent date, dwells upon what it terms the terrible condition of armed truce, in which all Europe exists from day to day, while at the same time it declares that "enormous thunderclouds hang over the whole horizon, and some apparently accidental flash may suddenly discharge them, there exists a vague apprehension that when the war-cloud bursts, it will embroil all Europe."

The Geneva correspondent of the Manchester Examiner says: "It is an actual fact that the great military powers have at their disposal over 12,000,000 men, who have learned, or are now learning the soldier's art, and are bound to re-enter the ranks when required. The standing armies alone number 7,000,000. But it must not be understood that all the latter are now under arms; at least half of them are on furlough. They form the first line, and all would, of course, be called out in the event of a general war."

As already stated, immediately following the closing of seven times, the time of trouble or judgment will begin, and will be the signal for the great war, for which the nations of Europe have been so long preparing. This war will be the worst in history, and will eventually involve every nation in the world, see Jer. xxv. 26, and will be precipitated by the sudden collapse of the Ottoman empire; and the subsequent game played by each of the European nations, for the purpose of gaining supreme control over the best portions of the Sick Man's possessions, etc.

Immediately this war has got fairly started, the Communists, Nihilists, Socialists, and Internationalists, who are now being prepared by the "frog power," Rev. xvi. 13, 14, for this fearful struggle; will at once recognize their opportunity, and united in a common league, will rise and strike at their respective governments, and inaugurate a revolution without a parallel in previous history, and out-rivalling in scenes of horror even those enacted in the French revolution.

St. John, referring to this period, says, Rev. xvi. 19, "And the cities of the nations fell," not from any foreign invasion, but what is far worse, by means similar to those made use of by the Communists when they held possession of the city of Paris in 1870, also in Pittsburgh during two days the mob held the city in July of 1879.

The reason why so much ungodliness and infidelity is tolerated by God for a single moment, is because he will never punish the righteous with the wicked. Gen. xviii. 23–33; Mat. xiii. 30, but will wait until the set time has arrived for closing the Christian dispensation; and the "salt of the earth" has been removed to a place of safety, corresponding to the delivery of Lot, Gen. xix. Then "his wrath will break forth as the lightning; and his displeasure like a devouring fire."

Isaiah in prophecying of that time says, ch. xxiv. 20–23, "The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard, and shall be removed like a cottage; and the transgression thereof shall be heavy upon it; and it (the transgressors) shall fall, and not rise again. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the Lord shall punish the hosts of the high ones that are upon the earth. And they shall be gathered together, as prisoners are gathered in the pit, and shall be shut up in the prison, and after many days they shall be visited. Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously."

And is it to be wondered at that the day is not far distant, when the long-suffering of God, scorned, ridiculed, and rejected, will turn to fierce wrath and displeasure? Has not the greater part of mankind already lost all fear of him? I say it is a fact to be deplored, that wherever and whenever lectures are delivered by certain modern infidels, they are eagerly and attentively listened to by crowds of enthusiastic hearers, whose appreciation and applause is governed by the amount of blasphemy hurled at the Almighty, and the amount of slander leveled at his word.

All right-thinking men are aware, that when they indorse and patronize lectures, delivered by men for the express purpose of teaching the non-existence of God, and therefore the non-responsibility of man, and as a natural consequence the corruption of virture, and the encouragement of every known vice and crime in existence, they are helping with their own hands to undermine the foundations upon which their own individual safety rests, and preparing for the country, scenes similar to those enacted during the French revolution; for it is an absolute certainty that had the French not previously lost all fear of God, owing to the teachings of Voltaire and his ilk, the worst scenes enacted during that horrid period, would never have transpired.

Chronological prophecy was given by God, for the express purpose that it should be understood by his servants in the latter days, that thereby they should be enabled to locate certain events, in connection with their Lord's advent; although at the same time leaving them in the dark concerning the exact period of time that momentous event should itself take place. It is in reference to chronological prophecy, that in Dan. xii. 10, it is said, "The wise shall understand."

Jesus also said, "So likewise ye, when ye see these things come to pass, (certain events taking place) know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand."

The wise mentioned in Daniel are the same referred to by our Lord in Mat. xxv. 6, who will raise the midnight, or night of seven times, cry, and are doing it now. "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out (or prepare, or make ready) to meet him."

The times and seasons I have had occasion to refer to in the foregoing, are those with which the closing scenes of the Christian dispensation are inseparably connected, and must not be confounded with the 2300 of Dan. viii. 14, nor with the 1290 of Dan. xii. 11, as these refer to events specially appertaining to Jerusalem; the former giving the time for the cleansing of the sanctuary, the latter the destruction of Gog's army, and both terminating together in 1896.

The year 1896 is most wonderfully marked in the Great Pyramid, that pillar of witness in the land of Egypt, where the inclined floor, or record of chronology in gallery is not intercepted by great step, neither by base of south wall (which indicates commencement of trouble, etc.) but continues uninterruptedly until it reaches the horizontal floor a few inches within the narrow passage leading to the King's antechamber; the inclined floor line being 1896 inches in length. This is a conclusive proof that the designer was none other than Daniel's God, as the numbers in the Great Pyramid are simply duplicates of those to be found in the book of Daniel.

Take for example the 1290, Dan. xii. 11, which gives the duration of the "abomination" or ecclesiastical power of Mahometanism, which may be dated from A. D. 605, the year Mahomet retired to the cave of Heira, to consult the spirit of fraud and enthusiasm and to fabricate the false religion which soon after darkened the whole Oriental world; the year also the Roman Bishop Boniface III. procured from the tyrannical usurper Phocas the title of Universal Bishop, or Supreme Head of the Church.

The temporal power of Mahomet commenced in 622, when he was made Prince of Medina, and although it will terminate in 1882, yet the spiritual—like the Papal—will continue until 1896—the time of the destruction of Gog's army, and this accounts for the odd 30 made use of by Daniel, chapter xii. 11.

The destruction of Gog's army must not be confounded with the battle of Armageddon; the former taking place during the Lord's descent upon the Mount of Olives, and comprising a certain number of northern nations, who will go up to the land of unwalled villages, to take a spoil and to take a prey, etc., whereas in the latter, every nation, ecclesiastical as well as temporal powers, will gather together to make war—not against unwalled villages—but against him that sitteth on the horse, and against his army (saints) while every one who takes part in this last battle against the Lord will be destroyed. Compare Rev. xxxviii. xxxix. with Rev. xiv. 1; xix. 19–21.

The odd 45 years of Dan. xii. 12, gives the number of years it will take to unite the whole world, and form it into the Universal Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, corresponding to the number of years from the time Moses sent forth the spies to spy out the land of Canaan, to the time, when having conquered the land, it had rest from war. See Josh. xiv. 10–15. The blessing, Dan. xii. 12; Rev. xx. 6, being pronounced on those who being united to Christ, will live and reign with him and on whom the second death has no power.

I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have not set any exact date for the first manifestation of the Lord Jesus—that one when he will send forth the angels to gather the elect—but I do warn my fellowmen that we are living in the days when "he is near even at the doors."

I wish, now, to say a few words concerning those of my readers, who professing to be Christ's stewards, (ministers) preach and teach doctrines directly antagonistic to what was taught and preached by the prophets, apostles, and Christ himself; some even saying that in hell, sinners, who turn and seek the Lord Jesus, will even there be saved. Why, my friends, if this is indeed the case, hell itself will be vacated in less than twenty-four hours, following the final judgment: the vilest libertine, the blaspheming infidel, the atrocious murderer; none being such fools, who, finding hell uncomfortably warm, also the society of devils not exactly to their taste, etc., and with the golden opportunity still open to them of being saved through the atoning blood of Jesus Christ—I ask, would one of these wretches remain there a single moment, with such an opportunity to escape?

"Reason answers, No."

Common sense answers, No.

Even those adherents to the doctrine of evolution, I say, even those, who, glorifying in being the literal descendants of apes, rather than of him who was created, and made in the image and likeness of God, even those have sufficiently developed from the monkey state, to be able to comprehend, that every sinner in hell, without one moment's delay, would call on the name of the Lord, and jumping the gulf which separates the righteous from the wicked—which Jesus says can never be passed, Matt. xvi. 19–31—would crowd into Abraham's bosom, and hell would be deserted; while the final judgment day itself would amount to nothing more than a farce.

No, my friends, be not deceived by that crafty and cunning of all the cunning devices yet put forward by Satan, to lull men's fears. God has placed man here on earth, given him his Word (Bible), wherein a full account is given concerning the punishment of ungodliness, and sin; and the reward of godliness and virtue; given man sufficient time to to make his choice whom he will serve, himself, (God) or the Devil; winking at man's sins, even through a long lifetime, so as to give him every opportunity to repent, and be saved. If, therefore, men scorn the chance God has provided for them, and hurling defiance at him, they are banished forever from his presence to that place called hades or hell,—whether of fire, darkness, or annihilation; which ever it may be—they alone will be to blame for having trampled underfoot his offers of love and mercy, and scorned the atoning blood of Jesus. The Almighty will still be the same God of love, whom his children will address as "Our Father," etc., even the wicked acknowledging the justice of their sentences;—

"Even so, Lord God Almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments."

When assertions like the foregoing are made by men, professing to be Christ's ministers, truly, if he were on the earth to-day, he would say to them as to the proud Pharisees of old:—

St. Mark vi. 2–13. "Howbeit, in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. And he said unto them, Full well ye reject the commandments of God, that ye may keep your own traditions, making the word of God of none effect through your traditions, which ye have delivered, and many such like things do ye."

If instead of so much twaddle about a "progressive Christianity," ministers by their daily life and teachings, reflected more the image of him—who being a stranger in his own land, and having neither home nor friend, slept on the cold ground of the Mount of Olives, with nothing but a stone for a pillow, and for a covering, the dark blue garnished with God's celestial diamonds, infidels, instead of ridiculing, would set at their feet, drinking in the words of eternal life.

Again, they teach and preach, that God's kingdom was established and inaugurated by Jesus Christ at his first coming. If it were, where, in Holy Scripture, are the proofs to back such bold assertions? If our Lord did indeed establish his kingdom, as they aver, why did he when teaching his disciples how to pray—include in the prayer that clause, "Thy kingdom come?" thus teaching his disciples to pray for a kingdom, already, or about immediately to be, established by himself, and of which they, themselves, were then subjects.

Again; why do ministers, each, in their respective churches every Sunday, continue to repeat the aforesaid prayer, "Thy kingdom come," when, according to their own teachings, it has already come? and has been in existence over eighteen centuries. Would it not be much more consistent to say:—

"We thank thee God, that thy kingdom has already been established?"

Now, I will with God's assistance raise the veil which has so long been placed between his light and the people, owing to the universal process of spiritualising whereby his Word has been wrested and twisted from the true interpretation—as events in the world already prove.

Every assertion I make shall be based upon the testimony of those divine witnesses of God's truth, the prophets, apostles, and Jesus Christ himself; the testimony of each one substantiating and corroborating the evidence given by the others, and who in many cases sealed their testimony with their life's blood.

Our Lord Jesus Christ came the first time to inaugurate the age, or dispensation of grace. Himself and his gospel having been rejected by the Jews, the apostles carry it (the gospel) to the Gentiles (Acts xiii. 46, 47); while the Jews for having rejected the Lord and his gospel, are themselves rejected. [illegible] concerning the [illegible] blindness [illegible] kingship of [illegible] Israel until the full[illegible] come in—corresponding times" of Daniel—Rom. xi. 25, the fullness of the Gentiles be come in. he (Jesus) will return, and will build the tabernacle of David which is fallen down; and will build again the ruins thereof, and will set it up. Acts xv. 14–16.

This is what the apostle says, and corroborates in every particular the predictions of Daniel previously alluded to, concerning the time and place in the chronological record of human history, for the going forth of Jesus in connection with his saints to claim the kingdom. It will, therefore, be seen, that Jesus, having accomplished the mission for which he came, i. e. to inaugurate the age of grace, at once returned to the bosom of the Father, there to await the closing of the "seven times."

During his absence, a "people are being taken out (prepared) from amongst the Gentiles for God's name." Acts xv. 14.

"A peculiar people, zealous of good works." Titus ii. 14.

"A chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people." 1 Peter ii. 9.

"Kings and priests, who shall reign on the earth." Rev. v. 10.

These people are the "wise" ones "who shall understand." Dan. xii. 10.

"The elect." Matt. xxiv. 31; St. Mark xiii. 27.

"The Wife, or Bride." Rev. xix. 7.

Immediately, therefore, "the great voice out of the throne," (Rev. xv. 17,) gives the command to close the age of grace—or "mystery of God"—Rev. x. 7,—the angels will at once be sent forth to gather the "elect" and carry them into the immediate presence of their Redeemer, to whom they will then be united, never more to separate from him forever; this is what is termed the "marriage of the Lamb of God," Rev. xix. 7, 8; Matt. xxii. 1–14; they will then enter into the "marriage supper" and the door of grace be closed (St. Matt. xxv. 10), where they will remain during some portion of the time of trouble. Psa. xxviii. 5.

The doors of grace having been closed, many people will awaken from their folly, and realising that God's Word is indeed true, will seek admittance, but they having thrown away the golden opportunity, and rejecting his Word, they in turn will then be rejected. St. Luke xiv. 24.

"For I say unto you, that none of those men which were bidden, shall taste of my supper." St. Luke xiii. 25.

When once the Master of the house is risen up, and hath shut the door, and ye begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us; and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are. See also St. Matt. xxv. 12.

When that period has arrived—during the time of trouble—for the destruction of Gog's army, (Ezek. xxxix. 18) the doors of heaven will be opened and he (Jesus) who is called "faithful and true," will come forth, attended by his "elect" saints or army; (Rev. xix. 11–14; Jude 14, 15); and descending upon the Mount of Olives which shall cleave in the midst thereof. (Acts xi. 11, 12; Zech. xiv. 4, 5) will destroy Gog's army with a great overthrow. See Ezek. xxxix.

Having overthrown Gog's army, he will at once command all nations, tongues, and peoples, to worship, serve, honor and obey him; and this command will be universally accepted by the nations, owing to their having been so long taught to believe by professing ministers of Christ, in direct opposition to what he himself taught, as also Daniel, and the apostles, i. e. that God's kingdom is not to be on earth, but somewhere in space, they do not exactly know where.

Rev. v. 10. "And hath made us unto our God, kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth."

Every nation including the "Beast" (Roman Catholicism) and the "False Prophet (Mahometism) will combine to overthrow whom they consider nothing more than an impostor; and preparing their armies, will march for the valley of Jehosaphat, or Megiddo. Joel iii. 2, 12. "For there will the Lord sit to judge the heathen round about."

Thus will be fought the great battle of Armageddon, (Isa. xxxiv. 2–8; Joel iii. 12–17; Ezek. xiv. 1–7; Hab. iii. 3–16) every man taking part in that battle against the Lord being destroyed. Rev. xix. 21, corroborating what Jesus said in St. Matt. xxv. 27.

Immediately following the battle, the Lord will be recognized by the house of Judah first as their long-promised Messiah (Zech. xii. 7), and, who, identifying him with the meek and lowly Jesus, whom their forefathers crucified,—owing to the wounds in his hands—(see Zech. xiii. 6) will mourn for him with a very great lamentation. (Zech. xii. 10, 14.

The inhabitants of Tarshish—known at the present day as Great Britain, being the main representatives of the lost ten tribes of Israel—will next recognise him, and placing their ships at his disposal, will hasten with their re[illegible] daughters; their silver and their gold with [illegible] them unto the Lord stone and to [illegible] Holy One of Israel their God, and to the [illegible] ded them. Isa. lx. 8–12; lxvi. 19, 20.

The Lord Jesus will then ascend the throne of David at Jerusalem, and make that city the metropolis of the world; where the wealth of all nations will be gathered. Isa. lx. 13, 17; lxii. 10–12; lxvi. 10–24.

The twelve apostles will also sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve re-gathered tribes of Israel. Matt. xix. 28.

The "elect" will also be rewarded in proportion to the amount of work done for Jesus, during his absence from the world, or during the age of grace; those who believing and being saved "will shine as the brightness of the firmament" and those who have not only believed and been saved, but have also been instrumental in winning other souls to Jesus "will shine with the brightness of stars (kings or princes) forever" and will be made "rulers" over the nations during the millenium, (see Dan. xii. 3; St. Luke xix. 11–27; Rev. v. 10,) and be endowed with everlasting life.

The world being then ruled over by our Lord Jesus Christ in connection with his saints, will insure universal righteousness, peace, and happiness; hence will commence the millennium, or thousand years of peace.

Hail! glorious vision of the coming day, with joyous hearts we welcome, and await thy dawn, beholding even now in yonder eastern skies, the mists of night and darkness, preparing to take flight before the rising of the Sun of Righteousness.

Monitory.

Slander.

Anybody can soil the reputation of an individual, however chaste, by uttering a suspicion that his enemies will believe and friends never hear of. A puff of wind can take a million of the seeds of a thistle, and do the work of mischief which the husbandman must labor long to undo, the particles being too fine to be seen, and too light to be stopped. Such are the seeds of slander, so easily sown, so difficult to be gathered up, and yet so pernicious in their fruits. The slanderer knows that many a mind will catch up the plague, and become poisoned by its insinuations, without ever seeking an antidote. No reputation can refute a sneer, nor any human skill prevent it. And yet we often hear sneers cast upon the reputation of the most chaste in the country, and have known the life of many a pure woman blasted by the sneer from the indiscreet person who bore no malice, but indulged in a thoughtless conversation. We cannot be too careful how we speak our thoughts. If they are not kind, they should remain buried in our bosoms. Let no indiscreet word injure the good name of our neighbor.

Life Is What We Make It.

Life is in a great degree what we make it. We are not to sit passively to the end of life. That will come in God's own time; but we are to strive with a mighty strength of purpose to make ourselves examples of goodness, wisdom, integrity, and high moral courage, so that when the end shall come we shall feel that we have not lived in vain. And how shall we succeed, if we pass by, heedlessly, life's precious opportunities? We would not enforce upon our readers the necessity of great opportunities alone; far from it; for do not the little drops of water make the broad, restless ocean? And where would be the desert, but for the little grains of sand? So it is that little opportunities of doing good, little lessons that may at present seem unimportant, help materially to lay the foundation for a great and useful life. Our facilities for exercising an influence over others are so many and so great that it is difficult to conceive how two persons may sit and converse together without exerting a mutual influence; and every man who critically examines his intellectual and moral state will observe that however short his interview with another person may be, it has had an effect upon him. And this influence is usually exerted when we think little about it; but we have probably left impressions on some minds which will never be erased. And this influence and constancy has often great power; a single instance of advice, reproof, caution or encouragement, may decide the question of a man's respectability, usefulness and happiness for a lifetime. How important, then, that we improve every opportunity to make our life a blessing to others.

MY WORK.

I could not do the work the reapers did,
Or bind the golden sheaves that thickly fell:
But I could follow by my Master's side,
And watch the hatred face I loved so well.
Right in my path he flung a ripened ear,
Which I could stoop and gather joyfully;
I did not know the Master placed them there—
"Needfuls on purpose" that he left for me.

I could not cast the heavy fisher net;
I had not strength or wisdom for the task;
So on the sun-lit sands, with spray-drops wet,
I sat, and earnest prayers came thick and fast.
I pleaded for the Master's blessing where
My brethren toiled upon the wide world sea;
Or ever that I knew his smile so fair
Came shedding, all its radiancy on me.

I could not join the glorious soldier band,
I never heard the ringing battle-cry;
The work allotted by the Master's hand
Kept me at home, while others went to die.
And yet, when victory crowned the struggle long,
And spoils were homeward brought both rich and rare,
He let me help to chant the triumph song,
And bade me tie the gold and jewels there.

Oh, Master dear, the tiniest work for thee
Finds recompense beyond our highest thought;
And feeble hands that work but tremblingly,
The richest colors in the fabric wrought.
We are content to take what thou shalt give.
To work or suffer as thy choice shall be;
Forsaking what thy wisdom bids us leave,
Glad in the thought that we are pleasing thee.

FEATURES OF THE NEW REVISION.

NUMBER FIVE.

G. M. MYERS.

Since writing my last article upon the features of the new version, I see that the subject is receiving at the hands of the contributors of THE RESTITUTION considerable notice—possibly as much as the subject demands.

I had intended writing a few more short articles, but one or two more will be sufficient.

The next Scripture I shall call attention to is 1 Tim. iii. 16. For some time past I have thought of writing on the language of this verse, and submitting some criticisms which I have on hand; and now that the text is brought to our notice by the change made by the new version I will avail myself of this opportunity.

The verse is made to read:

"And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. He who was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, believed on in the world, received up in glory."

The reader will here doubtless note a marked change; one that from this text entirely retires the idea of trinity—or that it was the Creator himself in person that was manifest in flesh.

The margin of the new version says:

"The word God, instead of He who, rests on no sufficient ancient evidence. Some ancient authorities read which."

I will here transcribe from a few authors on the text:

Murdock—renders the Syriac: "And truly great, is this mystery of righteousness, which was revealed in the flesh, and justified in the spirit," etc.

In a foot note on the text he remarks:

"The structure of these sentences is the same in the Syriac and in the Greek; and by following the punctuation of Griesbach, Knapp, and other modern editors of the Greek Testament, the Syriac is accurately transcribed as above. The reading of ‹ or ‹ instead of ‹‹‹, in verse 16 is supported by the Syriac version.

Rotherham renders the verse a little different:

"And confessedly great is the mystery of godliness. He who was made manifest in flesh, was declared righteous in spirit, appeared to messengers" etc.

Rheims Version (Catholic) reads:

"And evidently great is the mystery of piety, which was manifested in the flesh." etc.

Noyes renders the Tischondorf text, "And confessedly great is the mystery of godliness, in him who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the spirit," etc.

Bowyer gives it:

"And confessedly great is the mystery of piety; (Christ) who was manifested in the flesh, was justified in the spirit," etc.

The Improved Version, Diaglott, A. Campbell, Lochman, Alfred, Tischendorf, Tregelles and Ellicott give "He who" instead of "God."

Bolsham has a good rendering and a note here which we might now cite, but we prefer leaving till further along in our article.

The importance of the change in the text, and the importance of its doctrinal import will plead our apology for the introduction of the following citations.

Alexander Roberts, Professor of Humanity, St. Andrews, a member of the English committee on revision has written a companion to the new revision, giving the reasons for the changes made. On this text he says:

"The English reader will probably be startled to find that the familiar text, 'And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness; God was manifest in the flesh,' has been exchanged in the revised version for the following: 'And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness; He who was manifested in the flesh.'

A note on the margin states that 'the word God, in place of He who, rests on no sufficient ancient authority,' and it may be well that, in a passage of so great importance, the reader should be convinced that such is the case. What, then, let us inquire, is the amount of evidence which can be produced in support of the reading 'God?' This is soon stated. Not one of the early fathers can be certainly quoted for it. None of the very ancient versions support it. No Uncial witnesses to it with the doubtful exception of A. (Alexandrian manuscript of the fifth century.) The most diverse opinions have been expressed by critics as to the true text of this manuscript.

To let the reader understand how this should be, it must be stated that the difference between two such similar forms as OC (hos—the relative who) and ΘC (theos—Theos—God) decides whether the reading shall be 'who' or 'God.'

Now, it cannot be wondered at that in a manuscript not less than fourteen hundred years old, it is difficult to say whether the decisive lines exist or not. But this difficulty has been greatly increased by an unfortunate attempt to escape from it altogether. Some very orthodox but presumptuous hand has drawn a very dark line in the middle of the O (omicron) so as to render it certain that theta—Theos—God, is the reading of the manuscript. But the effort must now be made to overlook that modern touch entirely, and decide whether or not there is any trace of an original line in the heart of O. Hence the diversity of opinion among critics.

Bishop Ellicott declares for OC—hos—who, indisputably, after minute inspection.—Commentary on 1 Tim., p. 51.

Dr. Scrivener, on the other hand, says: "I have always felt convinced with Berriman and the earlier collators, that Cod. A. (Alexandrian manuscript) read ΘC" (Theos—God).—Introduction p. 563.

The truth probably is, that in the now worn condition of the leaf containing the passage, it is impossible for any one by personal inspection at the present day to determine the original manuscript. Much weight, however, is due to the opinion of those who had an opportunity of examining the Codex soon after it was brought to England, (A. D. 1628), and when it must have been far easier to decide the question at issue.

Now, these appear to be almost unanimous that the reading was ΘC (Theos—God.)

But even granting that the weighty suffrage of the Alexandrian manuscript is in favor of "God," far more evidence can be produced in support of "who."

Aleph. (Syriatic manuscript—A. D. 350) and probably C. (Ephraem, A. D. 450) witness to this reading, and it has also powerful testimony from the versions and fathers. Moreover, the relative who, is a far more difficult reading than God, and could hardly have been substituted for the latter.

On every ground, therefore, we conclude that this interesting and important passage must stand as it has been given in the revised version."

The parenthetical clauses in the above citation are mine.

Bowyer, in his valuable work on the criticisms of the Greek of the New Testament prepared in A. D. 1762, says: "For These ephemeraothe, perhaps Christos ethanatothe and for ophthe aggelois read ophthe apostolois.—R. Bently, approved by Wetstein. The word "mystery" is masculine in the Eastern Versions, and the relative used instead of the word God is so too, at least as probably masculine as neuter, especially in the Coptic, Ethiopic, and the Armenian. The Alexandrian has OC, (hos, relative who), which was the reading these versions followed. All the Greek versions are consistent in reading with a relative. So that the translators plainly took it to be OC (the relative who).

And why not OC refer to mysterion, just as sperma—autos, Gen. iii. 15, and too pneumatii as estin arrabon, Eph. i. 13, 14. Dr. Mawer's Lat. I. p. 6, 7, and Lat. III. p. 19, in answer to some queries, etc., York, 1758.

To this it may be replied, that by synthesis a Person is understood in the instances alleged; as in sperma, the male offspring; to pneumatii—Theos. Can we say the like of mysterion? But that O ephanerothe was the reading of all the MSS. before the fifth century, Sir Isaac Newton hath shown, Letter to LeClerc. And though Berriman has produced above fifty MSS. besides those commonly noted, which read Theos, yet none of them are older than the tenth century.

Many interpreters at first referred O to mysterion, which precedes; but observing that a mystery could not be said to be received into glory, they made O refer to be the subject of what follows; that which was manifested in the flesh was justified by the spirit. O, (which) as 1 John i. 3; John i. 4, 46; iii. 26, 34; Matt. xix. 29; Rom. ii. 2. OC (who) and oΥ (Theos) are supposed to be interpretations of O (which), which cannot be said of O (which) for OC, or ΘΥ—Wetstin.

The different attestations of eye-witnesses concerning OC in the Alexandrian MS.—some affirming the former letter to be O (theta), some O (omicron) was thought to be accounted for at last by Professor Wetstin, who discovered that the cross stroke in it, which was discerned by some, was no other than the middle stroke of the E in EYCEBEIAN, 1 Tim. vi. 3, written on the back page, which appeared through the vellum as written on the O. (omicron) when held up separately to the light but was not visible when laid flat on the next leaf. But this observation proves to be not altogether true, as a learned friend informs me in the following words:

APPEARANCE OF THE ALEXANDRIAN MANUSCRIPT AT 1 TIM. III. 16, IN 1771.

Dear Sir: I examined that celebrated passage, 1 Tim. iii. 16, in the Alx. MS. with all the attention and accuracy I could, and have this to observe upon it, viz., that Mer. Prof. Wetstin's account is true in general, though not exact in some few particulars, and those perhaps of no little moment.

It is true, as he says, that the theta in this MS. is a perfect circle,—but thicker at the sides than at the top and bottom—and that the transverse line, which always runs through the center, is very thin, fine, and slender.

It is also true, that the new stroke or line drawn in the circle by some modern hand lies above the centre of it, and does not reach from one side to the other; so that the old transverse line might formerly have been seen—if there really was such a line—after the correction was made. I say FORMERLY, for NOW the MS. is so thumbed that one can form no judgment of it. Besides it seems to me as if the word in question had been scraped with a knife.

As to the Representation which Wetstin has made of the appearance of the letters, when the leaf is raised up, and exposed to the light, it appears to me to be true only in part.

The ε (inverted epsilon) on the back page does indeed cut the O (omicron) in the front, but not in the straight direction he would insinuate. It is inclined a little; so that the top of one, viz. the ε, comes below the top of the other; and the same is to be observed of their bottoms.

Hence the middle stroke of the ε falls obliquely on the O, and not directly through the center, as he says it does; neither does the arc of the ε reach so far.

Therefore this line, supposing it to be visible through the parchment, which it is not, when the leaf is drawn down, would not mark the evanescent line he speaks of.

I would remark to you that all the part of the O included in the arc of the inverted epsilon, seems to have been scraped with a pen-knife, except a little point just at the place where the stroke of the ε cuts the circle. There is a recent stroke drawn above the OC and supposed to cover the old one. But to me it appears to cover no such thing. It is higher above the word than the strokes are elsewhere placed. It is very thin on the right hand, and such strokes are elsewhere very think, especially at that end.

Upon the whole, there is no affirming at present how this MS. read; that is, whether OC or ΘC. But upon comparing ΘC in the same page with the word here written, I am firmly of opinion that they were never the same.

There are two signs to discover ΘC by. The line through the theta, and the line above. If they were both here originally, why should they be inked over again? Or if one of them, why should that be meddled with? If neither of them, the reason of the correction is plain.

There is no instance, I believe, to be found in the whole book besides, of two such omissions relative to this word, and very few of one omission. This deserves to be attended to.

Such is the result of my own inspection. Others, of better eyes, I confess, than mine, still insist that the old strokes are discernable through the new ones. But if the old strokes were so plain at first, as to continue visible to this time through the gross medium of the imposed coverings, I cannot possibly conceive what could induce any modern corrector to retouch them, or meddle with them.'

Yours etc.

H. OWEN.

'I have repeatedly examined the place in question in the Alexandrian MS. with great attention, and can fully confirm the report of Dr. Owen. The recent stroke above the OC is of very modern date, and remains quite black. The O in the middle of it, which appears to have had a dot in it rather than a stroke, is almost vanished, and the middle of three lines, immediately under the doubtful passage, is almost obliterated by the fingers of inattentive examiners.'

J. NICHOLS.

Sept. 5, 1781.

Belsham translates the text, "And without dispute, great is the mystery of religion. He who was manifested in the flesh, was justified by the spirit, appeared to his messengers, was proclaimed to the nations, was believed on in the world, was taken up into glory."

He remarks, "The mystery of religion.—Other religions have their mysteries, but the Christian religion contains a greater mystery than all; viz., that the gospel should be preached to, and received by, the heathen world; for this is what the apostle commonly means by the word mystery. See Eph. i. 9; iii. 3; of which he never speaks but with admiration."

"He who.—There are three readings of this passage: OΣ (Theos, God); OΣ (hos, he who), and O (ho, that which). The Ephraem manuscript reads OΣ, he who; and probably the Alexandrian. This is adopted by Griesbach, who observes that OΣ and O are much more likely to be corrupted from OΣ than vice versa.

'All the old versions, says Dr. Clark, —Doctrine of the Trinity. No. 88, 89—have who or which. Also all the ancient fathers, though the copies of many of them have it now in the printed text ΘΣ, God; yet from the tenor of their comments upon it, and from their never citing it in the Arian controversy, it appears that they always read ὅ who; or ὃ which.'

He adds as a note, "It must not be judged from the present copies of the text in Nyssan and others, but from the manner of their commenting upon the place, how the text was read in their days."

The editors of the Greek fathers, misled by their prejudices, altered the text of their authors to agree with the received text. So Greisbach observes, it is certain that Cyril of Alexandria did not read ΘΣ, though that reading is frequently found in the printed text of that writer. Nor is it cited by any Greek father before the fifth or sixth century.

Macidonius, bishop of Constantinople in the sixth century, is charged with corrupting the text.

Archbishop Newcome says, that "if we read ὅ he who, we have a similar construction Mark iv. 25; Luke viii. 18; Rom. viii. 32."

"Appeared to his messengers.—Ophthe angelois,—seen by messengers." Wakefield, i. e., "He appeared to his apostles, to those whom he appointed to be the witnesses of his resurrection and the heralds of his gospel."

"BRETHREN PRAY FOR US."

S. ROXANA WIKOFF.

It was Paul's request that his brethren pray for him:—now, although not requested in so many words, to do so by our ministering brethren, is it not right that we should remember them before a throne of grace?

They have trials of which we know nothing. They are pressed on every side. They suffer from weariness, and from want. They meet with coldness and indifference. O ye churches of the living God! pray for those who are ministering to you the word of life. They have gone out to save men. They have given up all for Christ. Keep this always in mind. Be swift to hear and to receive good.

The prayerful listener is a helpful listener.

The word is not preached to please men, but to save them. We go not to hear in the right spirit, when we go only to be pleased.

Let what shall be for our everlasting good be uppermost in our thoughts, when the word is preached.

Let there be united prayer for our preachers, God will hear and bless.

In most situations of life the consciousness of innocence is our best shield and firmest security.

The Cyclopaedia War.

The month of July, 1881, witnesses the completion of the largest and most important literary work this country and the century have seen. It is the Library of Universal Knowledge, large type edition, in 15 large octavo volumes, containing 10 per cent more matter than Appleton's Cyclopædia, at less than one-fifth its cost, and 90 per cent more than Johnson's Cyclopædia, at a little more than one-fourth its cost.

Chambers's Encyclopædia, which forms the basis of the Library of Universal Knowledge (the last London edition of 1880 being reprinted verbatim as a portion of its contents), is the laborious product of the ripest British and European scholarship. It has developed through a century of Cyclopædia making. Its various editions having been many times revised, in successive years, till it has come to be universally recognized by those competent to judge, as standing at the very front of great aggregations of knowledge, and better adapted than any other Cyclopædia for popular use. It contains such full and important information as the ordinary reader, or the careful student, is likely to seek, upon about 25,000 subjects in every department of human knowledge. Chambers's Encyclopædia, however, is a foreign production, edited and published for a foreign market, and could not be expected to give as much prominence to American topics as American readers might desire. To supply these and other deficiencies a large corps of American editors and writers have added important articles upon about 15,000 topics, covering the entire field of human knowledge, bringing the whole number of titles under one alphabetical arrangement to about 40,000. Thus the work is thoroughly Americanized, and the Library of Universal Knowledge becomes at once the latest and most complete Encyclopædia in the field, at a mere fraction of the cost of any similar work which has preceded it.

The superlative value and importance of this great Encyclopædia lies especially in the fact that it is brought within the reach of every one who aspires after knowledge and culture. It is really a library of universal knowledge. It brings a liberal education easily within the reach even of every plowboy of the country and apprentice boy of the city. Every farmer and every mechanic in the land owes it to himself and to his children that such a Cyclopædia shall henceforward form a part of the family of his home. To the professional man, and every person of intelligence in every walk of life, a Cyclopædia is a necessity.

Of course the old and wealthy publishers who have grown rich (it is said that the Appletons have made a profit of nearly two million dollars on their Cyclopædia) from the sale of their high-priced publications are not pleased that their monopolies are broken, and their power overthrown. Of course the book agents and booksellers who have been used to getting from 40 to 60 per cent commission for selling these high-priced books are not so well pleased to sell the Library of Universal Knowledge on 15 per cent commission, though those who are not short-sighted discover that their own interests, after all, are identical with the interests of the people, and their real profits, in the end, are increased by the immense sales which result from meeting the people's wants. The majority of booksellers, however, are better pleased to transfer than to refill shelves and one numerous other standard and incompanion low-priced publications. But the Literary Revolution has always looked to the people, in whose interests it is, for its patronage, and it has never looked in vain, as our more than one million volumes printed last year (this year being increased to probably more than two millions) abundantly prove. You can order the Cyclopædia directly from us, and by uniting with your neighbors and friends you can secure club rates as follows:

A discount of 10 per cent will be allowed to any one ordering at one time three or more sets of the Cyclopædia; and a discount of 20 per cent will be allowed to any one ordering five or more sets of the same.

As a special inducement to our friends and patrons to go to work promptly and vigorously, each doing what he can for the dissemination of universal knowledge, we propose to distribute $10,000 in special premiums as follows, in addition to the regular discount to clubs:

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final Restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE.

His Proximity. Fifth, or First We Trumpet Continued. Othman, the Third Caliph. His Conquest in Africa. Summary of that Conquest. Invasion of Spain. Removal of the Seat of Empire to Damascus.

No. 77.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Othman, the third Caliph.—It must be kept in mind, that in the empire of the Saracens, which is the Arabian dynasty of the Mahometan empire, (the Ottoman or Turkish being the second), Caliph was the name of the highest officer, being at the head of church and state. He was a Royal High Priest, with power almost absolute. His position was at the seat of empire, but he had an oversight of the civil and military departments, as well as the affairs of religion. He was the home and foreign ruler. The army was under the immediate command of the caliph's lieutenant.

An army of 40,000 Saracens passed out of Egypt, toward the more western Roman possessions in North Africa.

They met a large Roman army near Tripoli. The Romans were said to number 120,000 men. So vastly superior, in numbers, to the Saracens, the victory was thought to be sure for the Christians. It was decreed otherwise. They were under the cross, it is true, but God had a controversy with the African church, and fought against them.

For several days the armies fought from early dawn till night. The Saracens at length gained a signal victory. Tripoli and Sufetula being taken, the Roman provincials and the barbarians from all quarters, implored the mercy of Abdallah. After sixteen months the Saracens retired, taking immense wealth.

Internal divisions, and domestic strifes, as to the place of their capital, and as to which should be the ruling family, suspended their African conquest and occupation for twenty years.

The caliph Moawijah, of the house of Ommiyah, by his first commander, took a large city, overthrow a Greek army of 30,000, swept off 80,000 captives. His successor, Akbah, was however, considered the conqueror of Africa. Akbah marched from Damascus with a select army of Arabs. 10,000 in number. He was joined on his march by many thousand barbarians.

The fearless Akbah plunged into the heart of the country (north Africa), traversed the wilderness in which his successors erected the splendid capitals of Fez and Morocco, and at length penetrated to the verge of the Atlantic and the great desert. The river Sus descends from the western sides of Mount Atlas, fertilizes, like the Nile, the adjacent soil, and falls into the sea at a moderate distance from the Canary or Fortunate Islands. Its banks were inhabited by the last of the Moors, a race of savages, without laws, or discipline, or religion; they were astonished by the strong and irresistible terrors of the Oriental army; and as they possessed neither gold nor silver, the richest spoil was the beauty of the female captives, some of whom were afterwards sold for a thousand pieces of gold.

The career, though not the zeal, of Akbah was checked by the prospect of a boundless ocean. He spurred his horse into the waves, and raising his eyes to heaven, exclaimed with a tone of a fanatic: "Great God! if my course were not stopped by this sea, I would still go on, to the unknown kingdoms of the west, preaching the unity of thy name, and putting to the sword the rebellious nations who worship any other God than thee."—Gibbon.

His career, however, soon terminated, in the defection of the Greeks and barbarians; and he closed his life in single combat with a rival chief.

The conquest of Africa was again interrupted for twelve years. Rival families among Arabians produced the civil discord.

Peace being restored, the caliph Abdalmalek resumed the occupation of Africa. Hassan, governor of Egypt, was the commander. An army of 40,000 men was devoted to that work. Hassan took Carthage, the metropolis of Africa, which lay desolate for two centuries.

Hassan was, however, unable to hold Africa. Cahina, a Moorish queen, and prophetess, took in a single day, the conquests of the Saracens for an age.

Hassan retired into Egypt, where he waited five years for succors, promised by the caliph. Under the successor of Hassan, Africa was again recovered. Musa and his two sons. It is said there were 300,000 rebel captives; 80,000 of whom—the caliph's fifth—were sold for the profit of the public treasury.—Gibbon.

Conquest of Spain.—The Goths (who were Christians) and the Saracens first encountered each other, as nationalities, in Spain. Musa, the Arabian lieutenant, was invited into Spain by Count Julian, the Gothic chief, who had been ill-treated by the Gothic king. Musa joined in battle the army of the Goths (numbering 90,000) near Cadiz. The conflict continued three days. Through the influence of Count Julian and other divisions in the Christian army, the Goths were finally defeated, and their king, Roderic, in his flight, perished beneath the waters of the Guadalquivir.

This battle decided the fate of the Gothic kingdom. Spain, that had resisted the Roman arms two centuries, was overrun by the Saracens and subdued in a few months. The Goths were pursued across the Pyrenees into the Gallic province of Languedoc, where a peace was made with Theodemir their king.

The conquest of Spain fired Musa with the ambition of subjugating all Europe.

"With a powerful armament (A. D. 711) by sea and land, he was preparing to repass the Pyrenees, to extinguish in Gaul and Italy the declining kingdoms of the Franks and Lombards, and to preach the unity of God on the altar of the Vatican.

Thence, subduing the German barbarians, he proposed to follow the course of the Danube from its source to the Euxine sea, to overthrow the Greek or Roman empire at Constantinople, and returning from Europe to Asia, to unite this new acquisition with Antioch and the provinces of Syria.

But this vision of conquest soon vanished, and Tarik and Musa, the two conquerors of Spain, were recalled, and disgraced before the caliph at Damascus, and the sons of Musa, in charge of Spain and Africa, were ruined and slain.

Spain, under the dominion of the Saracens became powerful; a mixed blood, composed of Punic, Roman, Gothic and Arabian elements, flowing in their veins, formed a new and active race. Christians paid tribute, were oppressed, and in various ways tormented.

The Saracens had nearly surrounded the Greek empire. They had taken from the Roman empire nearly all of its possessions. They had marched through Asia Minor, and appeared under the walls of Constantinople; conquered Syria, driven the Greek from the land of the Pharaohs, entered and conquered the Roman province of North Africa, crossed over into Europe and subjugated Spain; crossed the Pyrenees and entered the Gallic provinces.

The caliphs of Medina and Damascus were at this time (A. D. 720) the most powerful monarchs on the earth. They were royal high priests with unlimited power. To this time the empire was under one supreme head, and their prosperity was unexampled. The religion of the empire was also a unity, "There is one God, and Mahomet is his prophet," was the vital article of their creed, and the Mahometan armies were composed of zealous missionaries. Persuasion was no part of the Mahometan policy. Their watchword was, "The Koran, tribute, or the sword." In their effort to conquer the world, they never lost sight of its ultimate conversion.

During the first part of the second century of the Hegira (A. D. 740), it would seem that no human arm would be able to save the Greek empire, and with the fall of that empire was involved the fate of the Christian church. Christian practice had become exceedingly corrupt; but would the Father of our Lord Jesus suffer the name of his Son to be dishonored and humiliated before that of the false prophet?

How was the empire of the Saracens impeded, stopped, and finally overthrown?

This we shall now deem it necessary to consider. What impeded the Arabian conquests?

1. We take it for granted that God has a right to chastise the members of his own family when they deviate from the rules of his own household. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." Heb. xii. 6.

2. That he has a right to make his own selection of the nature and duration of the punishment, and of the agent by which it is to be executed. In case of national punishments he makes use of one wicked nation to chastise another.

It is very evident that the Mahometan empire (Arabian and Turkish) must be viewed in that light, and in no other. The "Crescent" and the "Cross" have always been painted upon opposing standards, and will be till the final onset, when the crescent will trail in the dust, before the Christian Conqueror.

Such was the rapid spread of Mahometanism, that had not their course been restrained by the divine hand, the Greek or Christian empire would soon have had its days numbered. God designed another dynasty to accomplish that work. He therefore raised up elements of power to check, and also finally to overthrow the Saracens.

"Forty-six years after the flight of Mahomet from Mecca, his disciples appeared in arms under the walls of Constantinople.—Gibbon.

The caliph Moawiyah made great preparations to attack the Greek empire by land and sea. An immense Arabian fleet soon cast anchor in the waters surrounding the Eastern Capital. The massive walls of that city resisted the attacks of the enemy for seven summers. Spending their winters eighty miles from the city, their attacks were confined to the five warm months. The siege was abandoned, the Moslems having lost about 30,000 men in the seven years.

The failure of the siege was attributed principally to the power of what was called "The Greek Fire," hereafter to be described.

Christians were very much revived in their hopes through all parts of the empire. They learned that the Arabian arms were not invincible.

Under the caliph Soliman another effort was made to subvert the Greek empire. Immense preparations were made. Moslemah, brother of the caliph, advanced at the head of an army of 120,000 Arabs and Persians; soldiers principally mounted on horses and camels.

The Mahometan armies were transported the second time from Asia to Europe. They were soon joined by the immense fleets of Syria and Egypt (1800 ships).

The night of their arrival before the walls of the city, was fixed upon for a general attack by sea and land. As the Arabian and Egyptian vessels were entering the open harbor the Greek fire ships—angels of destruction—attacked with the Greek fire. Five vessels only, returned to the port of Alexandria.

The winter was uncommonly severe; "Above one hundred days the ground was covered with deep snow, and the natives of the sultry climes of Egypt and Arabia lay torpid and almost lifeless in their frozen camp." After a siege of thirteen months it was abandoned.

"In the two sieges the deliverance of Constantinople may be chiefly ascribed to the novelty, the terrors, and the real efficacy of the Greek Fire."—Gibbon. This fire will be described under another head.

Grace is like ointment hid in the hand; it betrayeth itself. If you truly feel the sweetness of the cross of Jesus Christ, you will be determined to confess Christ before men

Youths' Column.

Learning to Walk.

Only beginning the journey,
Many a mile to go,
Little feet, how they patter,
Wandering to and fro.

Trying so hard—bravely,
Laughing at baby glee;
Hoping to face its mother's lap,
Proud as a baby can be.

Talking the oddest language
Ever before was heard;
But mother—you'll surely think so—
Understands every word.

Tottering now, and falling,
Eyes that are going to cry,
Kisses and plenty of love words,
Willing again to try.

Father of all, oh! guide them,
The pattering little feet,
While they are treading the up-hill road,
Bruising the dust and heat.

All them when they grow weary,
Keep them in a pathway blest,
And when the journey's ended,
Savior, oh! give them rest.

CORK.

Cork is the outer bark of a tree called Cork Oak, Quercus suber, and once in every eight years the crop of cork is gathered from those trees. The cork is the outer bark, which, after the tree is four or five years old, makes a rapid growth and becomes very thick. While this outer bark is increasing, a new bark forms on its inner side, and thus the Creator has provided a covering for the tree by the time the old bark shall have become cracked and dry, and useless for further protection. It is just before the outer bark has reached this useless condition, and while there is yet life and pliability left in it, that the workmen go forth and carefully separate it from the trees.

This operation is performed during the summer months, by cutting furrows in the bark, lengthwise, and making cuts crosswise, about forty inches apart; the bark is then beaten, in order to loosen it from the tissues beneath, after which it is pried off in square pieces.

The bark is finally carted to the factory, where men and boys cut and turn it into the different shapes used for corks, bungs and such like.

If the barking, or peeling, is carefully done, without hurting the new bark beneath, it does no injury to the tree, but is beneficial in removing what would eventually become an incumbrance.

ATHENS.

Athens was once the chief city of Greece, and Greece was once at the head of the world. Its influence is still felt among all civilized nations. For more than 2000 years, the highest ambition of sculptors and architects has been to produce something equal to what Athens had produced long before.

In Athens the people were free. There the human mind was stimulated in its upward aspirations, by the applause of an admiring world, bestowed upon its philosophers. But when Socrates, the greatest among them, found out, and taught some of the sublime yet simple truths which young children are now taught by their Christian parents, the judges of the land doomed him to die.

It is true, the people erected a brass statue to his memory, and regarded the misfortunes which afterwards befel the city, as a judgment for their injustice toward him; but his precepts did not make the nation wise. Nor is this to be wondered at. His philosophy was not deep enough. Though he believed in one supreme and eternal being, he was so inconsistent as to recommend obedience to the religious worship of his country, however foolish or idolatrous it might be.

About 450 years after his death, a greater and wiser reformer appeared in Athens. Paul was greater than Socrates, because he derived his wisdom from a higher source. He was the representative of Jesus Christ, who spoke to him from heaven.

Paul, in his fourth missionary journey, crossed over the northern part of the Grecian Archipelago, and entered Europe for the first time. Having been imprisoned at Philippi, mobbed at Thessalonica, and candidly listened to in Berea, he was, even there, pursued by a fierce mob of Thessalonian Jews, from whom he escaped, and traveled to Athens, leaving his fellow-laborers, Silas and Timothy behind him.

Now turn to the 17th chapter of Acts and read from verse 16 to the end.

Let us, if we can, form a picture in our minds, of the great heathen city, and of its humble Christian visitor.

Athens had stood 1600 years, from the time when it was founded by Cecrops, who went forth from the thickly-settled valley of the Nile, with a colony of Egyptian young men, who sought a wider field for their enterprise in the comparative wilderness north of the Mediterranean, about the time that Moses was fifteen years old.

The city was at first named Cecropia, from its founder, who reigned over it fifty years. Its history, for more than 800 years, is so mingled with fables, that we know little about it.

Codrus, its seventeenth king, was killed by the people about the time David was king of Israel. The Greeks found kings to be a burden, and abolished monarchy in the age when Israel foolishly desired a king.

The Athenians, after killing their king, chose thirteen perpetual magistrates, then seven for ten years, and after that, about 684 years before Christ, they established a democracy, and chose single magistrates, called Archons, yearly. Their office was like that of our President.

The high court of Athens, called Areopagus, at first consisted of nine persons, who were judges for life, each of whom must have held the office of Archon, and performed its duties faithfully. Their number was afterwards enlarged. At first they judged only in criminal cases, but at length their power became very extensive. They punished vices of all kinds, including idleness. They rewarded and assisted the virtuous, and were peculiarly attentive to blasphemies against the gods, and everything connected with religious worship.

It was therefore very natural that Paul, who seemed to be "a proclaimer of 'foreign deities,'" (as Doddridge translates the expression "setter forth of strange gods") should be questioned before this high court.

While Athens was a democracy, it produced more great men than any other country in the world. In every branch of science, philosophy, and literature, Athens was renowned. The rich and noble of other lands, especially of Rome, sent their sons to her schools, that they might obtain a higher education than they could gain elsewhere. Her architects and sculptors vied with each other, in adorning the city with magnificent temples and graceful statues.

But though her philosophers uttered wise precepts, and her poets charmed the imagination, and her orators, of whom Demosthenes was chief, roused up the people by their eloquence; yet the Athenians, with all their wisdom, were worshippers of senseless idols. Wise as they were, they stooped so low as to borrow the idols, and copy the superstitions of every nation, so that Petronious jestingly remarked, "It is easier to find a god than a man in that city."

Not even the barbarous Scythians, the wild Indians, or the stupid Hottentots, were ever in greater darkness concerning the true God, than that learned people.

Such was the city which Paul entered, with his heart full of the divine truths which had been taught him by the heavenly vision, to which he had not been disobedient, though persecuted by Jewish bigots, and scourged and imprisoned by Roman magistrates. He was small in stature, and feeble in speech, but the restless energies of his great soul were aroused within him, when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry. But his ardent zeal did not rob him of his discretion. With the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove, he applied the truth to all who would hear him—preaching first to Jews, and afterward to Greeks.

Athens stands in a spacious plain, east and south of the hill on which the city was first built. That hill is called the Acropolis. On it stands the temple called the Parthenon, built in honor of Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, which, though in ruins, is still an object of the world's admiration.

Directly northwest of the Acropolis is Mars' Hill, on which Paul stood when he preached the true God to the idolatrous Greeks.

Stretching far away still farther in the same direction, were two high and strong walls, between which was the way to the harbor, about four miles southwest of the city. One of these walls was so broad, that two chariots could pass each other on its top.

But about the time that Socrates died, the haughty Athenians, who had claimed the mastery over all Greece, and who had carried on a war twenty-seven years, mainly to maintain that authority, were reduced to the humiliating necessity of destroying these walls to make peace with the Spartans and Corinthians, whom they had despised.

But my pen would ramble over Athens and its history, till you would all be tired. I will therefore notice only one more object. It is the temple of Jupiter Olympus, at the south gate of the old city. It surpassed, if possible, every other building that Athens could boast of. Immense sums were expended on it by the Athenians: additions were made by succeeding sovereigns, till at length it was finished by the Roman emperor Adrian, about A. D. 130. You see it was not completed when Paul was there.

The celebrated traveller, Stevens, visited Athens in 1865. Among other interesting things concerning the city he says:

"Passing under the Arch of Adrian, outside the gate on the plain toward the Hyssus, (a little river southeast of Athens) we came to the ruined temple of Jupiter Olympus, perhaps once the most magnificent in the world. It was built of purest white marble, having a front of nearly 200 feet, and nearly 350 feet in length, and contained 120 columns, sixteen of which are all that now remain; and these, fluted and having rich Corinthian capitals, tower more than sixty feet above the plain, perfect as when reared.

I visited these ruins often, especially in the afternoon; they are at all times mournfully beautiful, but I have seldom known anything more touching than, when the sun was setting, to walk over the marble floor and look up at the lonely columns of this ruined temple. I cannot imagine anything more imposing than it must have been when, with its lofty roof supported by all its columns, it stood at the gate of the city, its doors wide open, inviting the Greeks to worship. On the architrave connecting three of the columns, a hermit built his lonely cell, and passed his life in that elevated solitude, accessible only to the crane and eagle. The hermit is long since dead, but his little habitation still resists the whistling of the wind and awakens the curiosity of the traveller."

While we have Stevens' book open, we will copy one paragraph more.

"Winding around the foot of the Acropolis, within the ancient, and outside the modern wall, we came to the Areopagus, or Hill of Mars, where, in the early days of Athens, her judges sat in the open air; and, for many ages, decided with such wisdom and impartiality, that to this day the decisions of the court of Areopagites are regarded as models of judicial purity. We ascended this celebrated hill, and stood on the precise spot where St. Paul, pointing to the temples which rose from every section of the city, and towered proudly on the Acropolis, made his celebrated address: 'Ye men of Athens, I see that in all things ye are too superstitious.' The ruins of the very temples to which he pointed were before our eyes."

How effectingly does a view of Athens illustrate the truth of what Paul wrote to the Christians at Corinth! "The world by wisdom knew not God." They needed light from above, and "it pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe." 1 Cor. i. 21.

HOW WILL THE REVISED VERSION BE RECEIVED.

DR. ALEX. ROBERTS.

What is to be the fate of the Revised Version?

This is a question which can, of course, be definitely answered only after the Version has passed through the ordeal of public opinion. But, judging by analogous cases in the past, there is little reason to be sanguine as to the favorable reception which awaits it, at least in the immediate present. We know how high the Vulgate now stands in the estimation of the Church of Rome. Well, that is substantially the revision of the Old Latin made by St. Jerome in the fifth century.

And how was his work received when it appeared?

Why, it was condemned with the greatest severity, and he himself assailed with the utmost virulence, while the greatly improved version which he had produced did not obtain general acceptance in the church till after a period of two hundred years.

Think again how dear to every one is now our existing Authorised Version, how proud we are of its general faithfulness as well as its noble style, and how attached to its sweet and solemn utterances.

And how was it ushered into the world?

Why, it lay neglected and despised for the first fifty years of its existence, while one of the greatest scholars of the age declared that he "would rather be torn in pieces by wild horses than impose such a version on the poor churches of England."

How then can it be expected that the New Revision will escape the fate of those which have preceded it?

The present writer well remembers that when, as a company of revisers, we took our seats around the long table in the Jerusalem Chamber, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, who has throughout acted as chairman, warned us not to be over-sanguine as to the immediate success likely to attend our work. There can be no doubt that the Revised Version will gradually win its way to public acceptance, if it deserves to do so. Beyond all question it will be subjected to a vast amount of criticism, much of which will doubtless be intelligent, and not a little probably the reverse. Considering the long time which has been taken in its preparation, and how many minds have aided in suggesting the amendments which it embodies, there seems little likelihood that anything new will emerge in the discussions it may excite, anything, that is, which was not considered by the company.

There is a well-known story connected with the Authorised Version, to the effect that a certain scholar sent the translators five reasons in favor of a particular rendering, but was answered that they had already had the suggestion before them, and had found fifteen reasons for rejecting it. Something like this will, doubtless, occur again, and will combine with many other causes to occasion delay in the acceptance of the Revised Version.

Yet who can tell but, in these times of ours when everything is so rapidly accomplished, a favorable reception may be gained for this new edition of the English Testament at an earlier date than its best friends now venture to anticipate?

At any rate, the utmost confidence may be felt that no rash changes have been made; that every effort has been put forth to render the work as faithful a transcript as possible; that neither ecclesiastical nor theological prejudices have been allowed the slightest influence in moulding the translation; and that the one object aimed at has been to cause the light of Divine truth to shine with a brighter lustre on the minds of those who are indebted for an acquaintance with it solely to the English language.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CRAFTON, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, August 3, 1881.

We will try to give some deferred communications room next week—Ones from Brother N. Bond in particular.

We are particularly desirous that all our brethren and friends who read the advertisement of the LIBRARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, as contained in Chambers' Encyclopædia, issued by the American Book Exchange, should avail themselves of this grand opportunity of purchasing a work that is a library indeed in itself at the exceedingly low price at which these famous volumes are now offered. As has been said by a cotemporary of the press—"The most important undertaking of the American Book Exchange which is rapidly making all the best English literature as readily accessible to the poorest as the richest, is the reprint, with large additions, of the famous Chambers' Encyclopædia." There is no reason why any family should be without a work of such standard value containing such a vast amount of information when it can be procured at so small a cost. Read attentively the advertisement and arrange to procure this invaluable work.

THE TWO HORNS.

The Western Horn.

And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings. And he shall speak great things against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time. But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it to the end. —DAN. vii. 24-26.

In A. D. 607 the Headship over all the Churches of Christendom, was conceded by the decree of Phocas to Boniface III. In A. D. 608, the Pantheon at Rome, which was built as a temple for Cybele and all the gods, was dedicated to the Virgin Mary and all the martyrs.

After the lapse of 1260 years, the 18th centenary of the martyrdom of Peter and Paul was celebrated at Rome Dec. 8, 1868, and June 28, 1867, 500 bishops and thousands of priests were present at the Popes allocution. On the 30th of October the French troops repressed an insurrection at Rome. Dec. 8, 1869, the Œcumenical Council was summoned, and on the 18th of July, 1870, Papal Infallibility was decreed. Aug 21 the last French soldier was withdrawn from Rome, and Sept. 20, after a brief resistance, the government troops entered Rome. This event was notified to the European courts by a circular letter of Oct. 18. In the beginning of December the Italian parliament met, and declared Rome the capital of Italy. July 2, 1871, Victor Immanuel entered Rome and took up his residence at the Quirinal.

Here ended the temporal sovereignty of the Popes. The condition of affairs since and at the present time is best seen in the extract below:—

"The body of the late Pope Pius IX. was removed from St. Peter's to the Church of San Lorenzo, at midnight on July 12. The procession traversed the city of Rome, to the Basilica. An immense number of members of Catholic associations followed the procession with torches. Some young men disturbed the procession with cries of 'Long live Italy!' and some rioting ensued, but the military dispersed all who did not belong to the cortege, which then proceeded to its destination.

Six men were arrested and have been fined and imprisoned for disturbing the funeral procession. There was great disorder at the trial of the prisoners, and the court was cleared twice. The sentences were received with a storm of shouts and hisses. A crowd of people numbering between two and three thousand cheered the prisoners on coming out of the court and followed them shouting, 'Down with the clericals!'

The architect of the Vatican, who made the funeral arrangements, promised the authorities of the city, in writing, that the cortege accompanying the body should consist solely of a funeral car and two or three carriages, without any outward show. This promise was not observed; hence the disturbances which attended the removal. The Pope has expressed formally his indignation at the disturbances, and notified the foreign courts that henceforth he must consider himself more than ever a prisoner in the Vatican, and as prevented from attending any religious service in the basilicas of Rome."

THE EASTERN HORN.

The he goat waxed very great: and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones toward the four winds of heaven. And out of three came forth a little horn, which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land.—Dan. viii. 8, 9.

In A. D. 610, Mohammed, at the age of forty years, began to proclaim himself the Prophet of God. On July 16, 622, he fled from Mecca, and hid himself in a cave for three days. Soon afterward he made a public entry into Medina amid the loudest welcome of the citizens, and at once assumed the affairs of king and priest. From the date of the Hegira, 1260 Lunar (Mohammedan) years extend to the Mohammedan Edict of Toleration, dated March 21, 1844, and 1260 Solar years extend to 1882.

The following extracts will show what we may soon expect:—

"A great war of race and faith is threatened which may, should it break out, agitate Europe, Asia, and Africa. Many expositors of prophecy have held the opinion that the decay of the Turkish empire, symbolized by the drying up of the Euphrates, would be marked by the outbreak of Mohammedan fanaticism as one of the three frog-like spirits. Rev. xvi. 12-14.

The following remarks from a recent number of the French journal La Liberte, show that careful observers already see indications of the gathering storm: 'In the Mussulman world at the present moment a vast and profound movement is going on, with Constantinople for its center. All Islam is aroused, and if appearances are to be trusted, a breath of holy war is exciting the Sectaries of the Koran against the sons of the Gospel. The Turks, feeling themselves lost, are the movers of the plot, and all the powers in direct contact with Mohammedan populations are menaced. On the day in which Panislamism shall attempt a supreme revenge against triumphant Christianity, it will not be in Algeria only, to be avenged on France, but also in India against England, and in Europe against Russia and Austria, that it will endeavor to wreak its hate. Turkey indulges in no illusion as to the fate that awaits her. By degrees she sees herself despoiled of all her European provinces. What will soon remain of the great empire she valiantly conquered in Europe and preserved for 500 years? War and diplomacy are combining to lessen and divide her so as to drive the Turks beyond the Bosphorus. They understand that and feel a rage which their traditional fatalism is utterly powerless to subdue."

THE LAST SPASM.—TURKS PREPARING FOR THEIR DEATH STRUGGLE.

"From the East we get rumors of a great movement in Mohammedan countries for the advancement of Islam at the edge of the sword. As the French war in Africa brings the Moslems immediately in conflict with a Western power, it is natural that the French papers should take keener notice of the Eastern revival than the press in other countries. One of them thus declares:

In the Mussulman world at the present moment a vast and profound movement is going on with Constantinople for its center and religious fanaticism for its impelling force. All Islam is aroused, and, if appearances are to be trusted, a breath of holy war is exciting the Sectaries of the Koran against the sons of the Gospel.

The Turks, feeling themselves lost, are the movers of the plot. France is now the special object of it, but all the powers in direct contact with Mohammedan populations are equally menaced.

On the day in which Panislamism shall attempt a supreme revenge against triumphant Christianity, it will not be in Algeria only, to be be avenged on France, but in India against England, and in Europe against Russia and Austria, that it will endeavor to wreak its hate. Turkey indulges in no illusion as to the fate that awaits her. By degrees she sees herself despoiled of all her European provinces. Servia Montenegro, Bosnia Herzegovina, Bulgaria and Roumania have escaped from her authority. She was forced to give up Cyprus to England and Thessaly to Greece. To-morrow Roumelia and Albania will try to recover their freedom. War and diplomacy are combining to lessen and divide her and drive the Turks beyond the Bosphorus. They understand that and feel a rage which their traditional fatalism is powerless to subdue.

Letters from Constantinople reveal the ardor of these sentiments. The Commander of the Believers is called upon by the chiefs to unfold the flag of the Prophet against the Giaour. Under such conditions the smallest symptoms should not go unnoticed, and to neglect them would be a grave fault. Algeria and all the Barbary States, are agitated by preachers of the holy war.

From Tripoli to Morocco the native tribes are quivering with emotion and appear to be waiting for the order of the famous Moul Reah, the leader of the day, who is to drive the French into the sea.

It is impossible not to connect all the events of which Northern Africa has recently been the scene, especially the massacre of the Flatters' Mission, the perpetrators of which boasted of it to the Sultan as an act of faith; the revolt of Bou-Amena and the hostilities of all kinds directed against the French in Tunis. To those symptoms must be added the attitude of Turkey in the Regency of Tripoli, where she is organizing menacing military forces, and whence is being lodged against the French protectorate in Tunis and the French domination at Algiers appeals to insurrection of a nature to light up a fire among the inflammable tribes of the south of the French colony. There are so many proofs of the conspiracy being framed in the Mussulman world and which may disturb European peace.

France is directly menaced, but all the great Christian nations are menaced also. It is the vengeance of Panislamism."

The Great Pyramid indicates some great political event in 1881-2. A great change in human affairs is impending and at the door.

PRINCIPAL CAIRD ON SUPERNATURAL POLICE REGULATIONS.

[We take this from the North British Advertiser and Ladies' Journal, of June 18, 1881,—a paper published at Edinburgh, Scotland, which was forwarded to us by Br. J. F. Gollotly, of Baltimore, Md. From this selection our readers will perceive that the great question of the hereafter, as affecting the human race, is engaging the attention of earnest thinkers. The mere authority of church creeds will no longer avail to render dogmas unsupported by divine revelation unquestioned. Men of both high and low estate are demanding reasons why as a ground of belief.—ED.]

The Very Rev. Principal Caird, of Glasgow, preached on Sunday forenoon in St. Mary's Church, Bellevue, to a crowded congregation.

His text was Matt. vi. 10—"Thy kingdom come," etc. There were, he said, two distinct views of the glorious future in store for humanity which had at different periods dominated the mind of the church.

There was the corporate view prevalent in apostolic times, and there was that by which that view had been gradually superceded—viz: the individualistic view of the notion of an immediate heaven for individual believers beyond the grave, which had become the accepted view of modern times. According to the former view, heaven was to come to them, and the religious imagination of that early time gathered around the anticipated consummation a thousand marvelous notions. The new Jerusalem was to descend from above, Christ was to appear surrounded by angelic hosts, the blast of the archangel's trump was to be heard, a great throne of judgment was to be set up, with all the machinery of a magnified assize, and a final separation was to take place between the evil and the good.

But the essential element in all this Oriental symbolism was the idea that this world was destined to become purified from evil, and that an empire of truth and righteousness be established on the earth.

According to the other view, believers were to go to heaven. They were to have individual immortality, and a pass to an immediate heaven of perfect blessedness in some unknown region of space they knew not and could not conceive, where instead of a longing and laboring for the coming of the kingdom on earth, there was thus substituted as a supreme end, as they said, the preparing for another world; and instead of the delivery of this world from sin and sorrow, the first and great concern of man, as they said, was the salvation of his own soul.

Each of these views, he held, were imperfect and misleading when taken separately; a satisfactory conception must embrace elements that were common to both.

In whatever form they might realise it, a spiritual perfection and blessedness in which the individual could share only as a member of a perfected society—in other words, a heaven to each, possible and attainable only through a heaven to all, that was the true Christian idea of the future life.

Going on to speak of the individualistic view, he remarked that in regard to much of the popular teaching and thinking as to another world and the duty of preparing for it, there was no little force in some of those objections which had frequently been set forth by unfriendly critics.

It had been asked whether as a motive of action which was the more potent—the hope of heaven and the fear of hell, or the hope of a sinless future for the world.

One argument urged in defence of the doctrine of an immediate eternal heaven or hell was that they could not afford to lose it as a restraint from vice, while on ordinary minds the idea of a perfection and blessedness for them would have practically no influence whatever. But even if it were right to keep up a belief in heaven and hell for economic purposes as a sort of supernatural police regulation, had it had on the average mind constituted a motive to virtue so potent as was here taken for granted?

That belief had been before the popular mind for centuries, and he feared its practical results—he feared they must acknowledge that they had been of the slenderest. To the criminal class the dread of the policeman and the jail was an immeasurably more potent restraint than the dread of future retribution; and as regards the class to which most of them belonged, did not experience show that the sweets of present indulgence proved irresistibly more attractive than the most glowing pictures of heavenly happiness; and was not the dread of poverty, loss of worldly position, and respectability more powerful than the most alarming representations of the future woes of the lost?

But even if by hope or fear of individual salvation or damnation a man's conduct was influenced, was there not this serious objection, that such a motive could not be regarded as either moral or religious. Religion did not mean to get men to act in a particular way, but to get them to act from spiritual and religious motives. The promises of happiness or threats of future retribution, if they had any influence at all, tended, by stimulating motives of cowardly fear and selfish desire, to deteriorate and degrade.

If love, and adoration, and reverance to the Being called God sprang not up spontaneously, then no effort of will, though men told them that it would save their souls from perdition, would force it to come.

The notion of a heaven of perfect happiness to be attained by each individual Christian soul at death was self-contradictory. What sort of a heaven of perfection would that be which was consistent with the knowledge of the continued misery and guilt of others? To leave those to their fate, and be content to be wafted away to some region of unbroken felicity, where the sorrows and sins, it might be, of the bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh should no longer be obtruded upon them—was that a picture of happiness possible for perfect souls? Did it find its nearest parallel on earth in noble natures; or must they not search for its earthly type rather among those whose affections had become ossified by self-indulgence, among the basest, meanest, and most odious of mankind? And could that which they condemned and despised here constitute the essence of future happiness of perfect souls?

No! Christian love know no individual heaven.

For good or ill, their spiritual fate was bound up with that of all others.

The learned Principal went on to maintain that it was no mere humanitarian theory or fantastic dream to hold that this world was not forever to be the home of evil; and that working for the realisation of the great divine purpose of the emancipation of the world from evil was a far more exalted and worthy endeavor than to be perpetually thinking of and preparing for going to heaven to escape forever from this world with its sins and sorrows.

Further, the preacher replied to the objections of those who urged that while individual immortality was a practical motive, the other was not: and pointed out, also, how in the glorious result each would participate. It was those who had spent their lives in efforts for the highest good of humanity, that were now raised to the highest pinacle of moral elevation.

Even Christ's blessedness consisted in his self-sacrificing death for the sanctification of mankind. They would find their salvation, therefore, not in seeking the welfare and safety here or hereafter of their own petty individual selves, but in living and acting in the spirit of the aspiration, "Thy will be done on earth."

Animated by such a spirit, a man could never be unprepared or be very far away from heaven. Let death come when it might or carry them whither it would, in that awful hour he, and he alone, could stand calm and fearless before the dread mystery of the future who had centered the hope and aspirations of his life on the fulfilment of the glorious prayer, "Thy kingdom come; thy will, O God, be done on earth."

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT IN RELATION TO PROPHECY.

REV. WILLIAM MAUDE.

It may safely be asserted that no event in connection with English literature has, for many years past, excited so deep and widespread an interest as the publication, on the 16th of May, 1881, of the Revised Version of the New Testament, upon which a number of the most eminent scholars, not only in Great Britain, but also in America, have spent no less than ten years' patient labor. The publication of Lord Beaconsfield's "Endymion," of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," of the novels of Charles Dickens, of John Henry Newman's "Tract XC.," of Lord Macaulay's "History of England;" or, to go a little further back, the appearance in brilliant succession of the works of Sir Walter Scott and the poems of Lord Byron—all these were the occasions of no small sensation in the literary world; but the curiosity which they excited in the general public, the universality of the interest which they awakened, and the extent of the circulation to which they at once attained, were insignificant indeed as compared with that which has resulted from the appearance of this, the most momentous issue during the present century of that most powerful of modern instrumentalities—the Press.

The year 1881 may present, hereafter, many claims to be considered memorable, but none, we think, will stand out more distinctly, none will assert that claim with less challenge than this—that in that year the Revised Edition of the Authorised Version of the New Testament was given to all English-speaking peoples.

And this fact—for that it is a fact will hardly be called in question—is surely a grand and reassuring testimony to the unique position which the Inspired Word, as translated for our use into our English tongue, still occupies, and the Divine authority which the Christian revelation still commands, in this our highly favored land. For, let us remember, it is not any fresh revelation, a fifth Gospel, or a new Apocalypse, or even an additional Epistle of Paul, or Peter, or John, the appearance of which has been so impatiently anticipated, and is now so eagerly received and so anxiously perused and scrutinized.

It is, after all the old book essentially which has been in our hands and in the hands of our fathers for more than two centuries and a half; and all this eagerness and anxiety arises from a desire to ascertain how certain paragraphs and sentences have been modified, how some small inaccuracies have been removed; how, in a word, while still listening with reverent ear to the Divine Voice with which we have been familiar from our very childhood, we may perchance no longer miss here and there a word of the sacred utterance, or fail to catch its very tone and emphasis. In other words, all that the revisers have, in the good providence of God, been called upon to do for us is, not to set forth as newly-furnished the table at which millions of God's children have so long eaten and been satisfied, but simply to gather up the crumbs of heavenly truth and consolation which may have fallen from it, that nothing be lost.

And the universality of the interest which has been called forth by this revision is strikingly brought home to our minds, when we observe from how many special standpoints the book is criticised, and with what diverse objects the work accomplished is tested, and either approved or condemned. By the Jew, from an antagonistic position, it is regarded with interest, because it is assumed "the New Revison will bring home to Christians the many imperfections of the book they have almost worshipped. Christians will find that sayings hallowed by the dearest associations of youth and age, joy and suffering; phrases which have imbedded themselves in their literature; supposed utterances of Jesus himself, are not even found in authoritative copies of the original. In brief, that the book, hitherto surrounded by a halo of divinity, is reduced, by the mere fact that it admits of criticism, to the level of an ordinary work that can be compared and revised and amended."—Jewish World.

By the Romanist the Revised Version is regarded with interest and approval, because it exhibits a "decided approximation, in a multitude of instances, to the rendering of the Catholic Vulgate. Which tends to show—as the revisors have not taken the Vulgate as a guide, but have nevertheless in so many instances reverted to its renderings and forms of expression—how great is the value of St. Jerome's version, and of the translations based upon it."—Tablet.

By the man of letters, again, the chief interest felt is many instances is, it is to be feared, to judge of the literary skill with which the work has been accomplished, and how far the pleasant rouds of the old version has been retained or sacrificed to the demands of faithfulness. And so we might go on to specify the special interests excited in the Biblical critic, the systematic theologian, and the maintainers of various peculiar doctrines and theories, to discover how far it may serve to support their adopted opinions.

That this should be the case is no just cause for either surprise or animadversion; nor will it, we trust, be deemed out of place if, in these pages, we briefly direct attention to the new Revised Version in relation to the great subject of unfulfilled prophecy, and endeavor to show how, in many instances, it places the unlearned English student in a better position to apprehend the mind of the Spirit, in his gracious office of showing to God's people "things to come."

One of the first passages to which I instinctively turned, when the idea of making this investigation dawned upon my mind, was Matt. xiii., the well-known cycle of parables in which the history of the "kingdom of heaven" in mystery is so comprehensively set forth. Here in verse 40, and again in verse 49, we have in the Authorized Version the misleading phrase, "the end of this world," instead of "the end of the age," which is unquestionably the more correct translation of the Greek, besides being supported by the internal evidence. This error, we regret to find, is retained in the text of the Revised Version; still it is something gained that the correct rendering, "the consummation of the age," is, in both places, given in the margin. Why it was not adopted in the text it is difficult to understand, except on the ground that the revisors, though accomplished scholars, were not students of prophecy; here, therefore, we seem to have an instructive instance of the unconscious bias from which even the most competent and conscientious translators are never wholly free.

In another of our Lord's prophetic parables, that of the ten virgins (Matt. xxv. 1-13), several not unimportant alterations have been made, and we will therefore quote the Authorized and Revised Versions in order that they may be more readily compared:—

AUTHORIZED VERSION.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps. And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out. But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you, but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage: and the door was shut. Afterwards came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh."

REVISED VERSION.

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps (margin 'torches'), and went forth to meet the bridegroom. And five of them were foolish, and five were wise. For the foolish, when they took their lamps (margin 'torches'), took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps (margin 'torches'). Now while the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. But at midnight there is a cry, Behold, the bridegroom! Come ye forth to meet him. Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps (margin 'torches'). And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil: for our lamps (margin 'torches') are going out. But the wise answered, saying, Peradventure there will not be enough for us and you: go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves. And while they went away to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage feast: and the door was shut. Afterwards came also the other virgins, saying, Lord, Lord, open to us. But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. Watch therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour."

1. Here we observe, in the first place, an alteration in the terms of the midnight cry, which, instead of "Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him," now reads, 'Behold, the bridegroom! Come ye forth to meet him." A change which in its sharp sententious brevity not only conforms to the reading of the most ancient manuscripts, but emphasizes the imminence of the bridegroom's appearance.

2. Again—an apparently small but really very important change is the introduction, from the margin, into the text, of the rendering, "our lamps are going out," in place of "our lamps are gone out;" indicating as it clearly does the fact, essential to the correct interpretation of the parable, that the lamps of all the virgins were originally alight, and that even at the midnight hour those of the foolish were only "going out"—not actually extinguished.

3. Lastly, the omission, on the authority of the three most ancient manuscripts, the Sinaitic, the Alexandrian, and the Vatican, of the concluding words, "Wherein the Son of Man cometh," is not without significance and advantage, inasmuch as the parable refers chronologically, not to Christ's glorious epiphany, but to his previous coming into the air to receive his waiting saints. It is of this event that we know not the day nor the hour.

In Matt. xxiv. 3 we find the first instance of the use of that important Greek word parousia, which occurs no less than twenty times in the New Testament, and is, in the Authorized Version the misleading phrase, "the end of this world," instead of "the end of the age," which is unquestionably the more correct translation of the Greek, besides being supported by the internal evidence. This error, we regret to find, is retained in the text of the Revised Version; still it is something gained that the correct rendering, "the consummation of the age," is, in both places, given in the margin. Why it was not adopted in the text it is difficult to understand, except on the ground that the revisors, though accomplished scholars, were not students of prophecy; here, therefore, we seem to have an instructive instance of the unconscious bias from which even the most competent and conscientious translators are never wholly free.

The peculiarity of the Greek word is that it almost invariably expresses not only the arrival of a person, but his subsequent presence after having arrived. Hence we have no English word which fully expresses its meaning. "Coming" or "arrival" expresses the first half, so to speak, but omits the second half, while "presence," though it brings out the second, passes somewhat too lightly over the first; yet, inasmuch as "presence" assumes the antecedent "coming," it is by far the preferable word.

IOWA CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Christian Association, of Iowa, convened at Irving, according to previous notice, on July 7, 1881, under very unfavorable circumstances. Allan Chown, aged eight years, nephew of Bro. G. R. Chown, fell into Salt Creek and was drowned, about six o'clock on Thursday evening. That evening and most of the next day were spent in recovering his body from the swollen stream, so the first service of the conference was a funeral—discourse by Bro. H. V. Reed, who with Bro. J. M. Stephenson and Bro. Whitesett, presented the gospel in its simplicity and beauty throughout the meetings.

Brethren Wm. Brayton, J. B. Corbaley, M. A. Newcomb, and J. B. Adams, were also present, and though they did not preach, did much to enliven and instruct during our social meetings.

A call of the Association for business showed that representatives were present from the following points, viz.: Marysville, Trace, Dresden, Gifford, Nowel, Crescent City, and Irving. No business of importance was done except granting letters of ordination to Brethren John B. Corbaley and J. B. Adams.

The meeting was continued over the second Sunday, and although the terrible rain storms and floods prevented many from coming, that otherwise would, it kept nearly all who came at first from getting away until the meeting closed.

I heard but one opinion, and that is we had a good meeting. Will brethren throughout the state make an effort to be at our annual meeting. Only good can result from these meetings, if engaged in in the spirit of our Master.

JOHN FITZ,
Sec'y pro tem.

Under the influence of the mighty friendship of Jesus, every form of sin has been conquered; suffering and anguish have been met with martyr-like patience; poverty has been borne with courage and hope, insult with meekness, bereavement with a smile, care and toil with a song, and sacrifice with open arms. It has armed weakness with strength, despair with hope, and indolence with energy. By it, noble-souled men and delicately-fibered women have joyfully suffered the loss of all things, that they might lay claim to this Friend of friends. Ah, blessed friendship! Blessed Lord Jesus!

O IF CALM!

S. ROXANA WINCE.

O of calm hearts of Jesus,
We might rest our weary souls,
Of what brightness it would cause us!
How base passion's waves control!

In that refuge, safely hidden,
All are covered from the storm;
Fly ye sinners! Love hath bidden!
Seek the fleet, where none can harm.

THE GREAT TRAGEDY AT WASHINGTON—CAUSE AND EFFECT.

Editor Post:

Allow one of your constant readers space enough to suggest that the Post has scarcely displayed its usual accuracy of statement in saying editorially in its issue of the 5th inst. that "we have no class of people who tolerate assassination—no class of teachers whose disciples are conspirators."

In writing thus were you not oblivious of the well-known meeting of American citizens convened in the Bowery, New York, March 15, 1881?

The declared object of that meeting was openly proclaimed. It was "to exult over the Czar's assassination" and to clamor "for bloodshed as the political panacea." I quote from its proceedings, resolutions, etc., briefly as cited in the new work just issued from the press of E. J. Hale & Son, 17 Murray street, New York, entitled "Magruder's Reply to Ingersoll's Lectures," etc., which you have favorably reviewed in your columns. On pp. 90-96 the author cites from one of his lectures Mr. Ingersoll's avowal of sympathy with the Nihilists, saying:—

"My sympathies cluster around the point of the dagger."

The preamble and resolutions are recited, to show that assassination and bloodshed are the necessary means, to support all existing governments among men to reduce them to nothing and to substitute, in their place, the savagery, crime and ruin of universal destruction. They solemnly resolved as the results of what they call "the Gospel of Faith of the Nihilists"—"In the name of Humanity" and as "The philosophy of Nihilism" as follows:—

"This gospel admits of no half-way measures and hesitations. The old world must be destroyed and replaced by a new one." * * * * *

"Now the beginning of all these lies which have ground down this poor world in slavery is God. Tear out of your hearts the belief in the existence of God." * * * * * The first lie is God—the second lie is Right. You must destroy everything which exists in the shape of state or social organization. Our first work must be destruction and annihilation of everything as it now exists. You must accustom yourselves to destroy everything. The good with the bad. * * * * Take heed that no ark be allowed to rescue any atom of this old world which we consecrate to destruction."

Among the resolutions unanimously adopted was the following, addressed to their colleagues in Russia:—

"Brothers we approve your actions—we approve your methods. Between you and your oppressors there can be no truce—kill, destroy, assassinate, annihilate even to the very germ your aristocracy. Have for them no feeling of love for they are incapable of that noble emotion."

Such is the official record of Nihilism, European and American. Can we then truly say:—

"We have no class of people who tolerate assassination," etc.

It already appears that the assassin Gitoau has been an Oneida socialist and a European communist and although it is said that he has declared against Ingersoll it is very probable that statement is incorrect as one with such antecedents and associations is not likely to have played the role of adversary to Col. Ingersoll, with whose course and career he would on the contrary be naturally "in sympathy." Mr. Ingersoll does not say otherwise—as he would be almost sure to do, if the man was really by profession "an orthodox Christian," for whom we know Mr. Ingersoll cherishes the strongest antipathy.

Ex. Editor.

Is it not surprising to see with what persistence the scribes and editors and even preachers of this day deny the charge that the world is daily growing worse instead of better and is hastening rapidly to its predicted doom? They do this in spite of the express testimony of Scripture—that "in the latter days men shall wax worse and worse, deceivers and being deceived" and of the lessons of daily experience and observation around us. All such are ready to join in the peace and safety cry and to utter derisively the question, "Where is the promise of his coming?"

In proof of this I send you the enclosed article, offered for publication to the Washington Post—and declined by it. It was, I suppose, too "strong meat" for his readers. If you can make room for it in THE RESTITUTION, it may serve as an indication of the present ominous signs of them in which we live.

JOHN MARK.

"THE END OF THE WORLD," OR "LAST DAYS."

F. HOYT.

The religious and secular papers are constantly speaking with contempt of those who they say believe the end of the world is near. They suppose that all who believe the second advent nigh at hand must necessarily hold that the end of the globe by fire, with the destruction of its inhabitants is just as near.

The ministers of the various sects who understand the original should have instructed the people that wherever the phrase "end of the world" occurs in the Bible it means the end of the age (aion)—the end of the ge (earth) or kosmos (world) is never spoken of in that book. The New Revision in the margin, renders this phrase in every place "consummation of the age"—this Christian age.

Then there will be gathered out of the field, world or kingdom, the tares—all things that offend and them that do iniquity, so that the righteous can shine with immortal bodies, "like the sun in the kingdom of God."

The "last days" appear to me to mean the same as this age or Christian dispensation. Paul writes to Timothy (iii. 1), "In the last days perilous times shall come," and then enumerates the crimes of that season when men who have the form of godliness deny its power.

Again he writes, 1 Tim. iv. 1, "The Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons."

Are not all agreed that we are living in these times? and that these teachings of demons and seducing spirits and great departures from the faith have occurred before us?

Peter's testimony is very similar. He says: "Knowing this first that there shall come (not has come) scoffers, walking after their own lusts," and this shall be "in the last days."

These scoffers are the same class that Paul writes to Timothy about.

They say, "Where is the promise of his coming," etc. Was this scoffing all fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem? or has it not been signally fulfilled in our day as the second coming has been proclaimed as approaching?

"Last days" covers the whole of the Christian dispensation, and yet the personal coming of Christ has only been scoffed at when the subject has been agitated as it has been during the last fifty years. It was in the beginning of the last days that God "has spoken to the world by his Son," while we are living near the end of the age. Then if the last days are now, and the scoffing at the near personal coming is going on now, as we know it is, then the "heavens and earth that are kept in store and reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men," are the literal heavens and earth, and they are reserved unto literal fire in the great day of the Lord's coming and reign.

To what extent the fire will prevail on the earth's surface we are not informed. We are told it will be "the perdition of ungodly men."

A lake of fire is spoken of in Rev. xix., where the beast and false prophet are cast after the last great battle of Christ and the saints with them; also a lake of fire at the end of the thousand years, where the second death, or perdition of ungodly men, will take place.

The intelligent infidel might reasonably object that it would be a flagrant violation of the laws or interpretation of language, to speak of the original creation of the world "by the word of God and the overflow of the same world and its people by the waters of a literal flood, and then spiritualize the same earth that is reserved unto fire, and say it means the destruction of Jerusalem.

The passage should be wholly spiritualized or wholly literalized. Either it was a spiritual heavens and earth that was created in the beginning and a spiritual deluge that happened in the days of Noah, and the heavens and earth which are now reserved unto fire, are spiritual heavens and earth reserved unto spiritual fire, and the coming of the Lord spoken of in the same connection, and the perdition of ungodly men are a spiritual coming and perdition; or they are all literal.

If the new heavens and earth and the second coming of the same Jesus who ascended visibly into the heavens are spiritual in this very prosaic passage of Peter, then the new earth of Isaiah and John may be turned into a figure of speech, and the true coming of the Lord be spiritualized, as it so often is, out of all the inspired writings.

It is true the earth shall abide forever, but equally true and consistent that God, as Paul quotes from Psalm xci, "laid the foundation of the earth and the heavens, and the work of his hand," and they shall be changed into new heavens and earth. "Behold I make all things new." The groaning creation shall be delivered from its bondage of corruption, etc.

Although "the elements shall melt with fervent heat," the earth also, and the works be burned, yet "according to promise we should look for new heavens and earth wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Editor Restitution:

Let me say through THE RESTITUTION that I am now living at Bethany, Harrison Co., Mo., where my old acquaintances can address me.

I will gladly answer all letters sent me, to the best of my ability, both in answering Scriptural questions, or in relation to this part of the country. I moved here because it is a county-seat, and business is not so overdone as in the place I moved from,—the second county seat of here.

A few more moves and the last move comes—the grave. After that is the great unknown. No one has returned yet, but I expect one to return to make it known. Let us so live that we may be called to assist that One in making all known to "all the families of the earth" according the gospel preached to Abraham, by the oath of the everliving God, which is sure and steadfast.

May we all prevail and assist in the blessing and thus ourselves be blessed.

J. S. LAWYER.

BOULDER CITY, Col.

Editor Restitution:

Being a long way from home and friends (my native state being Pennsylvania) I feel the need of THE RESTITUTION, there being no believers here that I know of. I think there is more spiritualism, skepticism and infidelity here than any other place I have been in, and yet if a host of synagogues is any criterion Boulder is of all places I have not most righteous. I am satisfied that the people are as they were in the days of Noah; they know not that the Lord is coming and the kingdom is at hand.

Let us who are of the day watch and be sober, and hope unto the end, for the favor that shall be brought unto us at the revelation of Jesus Christ. I want to do something for THE RESTITUTION soon.

F. M. DOLPH.

DALLAS, Oregon.

Editor Restitution:

Your most welcome paper is all the preaching we have here. We are cast away in far-off Oregon, where the people are all of the world, and when we read of your good meetings it makes us feel as though we were forsaken, but I trust when the Lord comes we will be gathered the same as those that have had a better chance.

I am young in the precious cause, but am doing all I can to learn. I have to learn all I know from your paper and the Bible as there is no church within thirty miles of where we are.

ST. PETERSBURG, July 29.—Thirty houses belonging to Jews, in the villages of Borispol and Birkan, in the Government of Poltava, Russia, have been destroyed. The troops fired upon the rioters, killing four.

BERLIN, July 29.—There are great demonstrations every night against the Jews at Hammerstein, West Prussia, and further excesses are feared. The gen d'armes are powerless. There were similar riots at Baerwald, Pomerania, Tuesday, when a quantity of Jewish property was destroyed.

People who are ready to part with their hearts while keeping their money, are not the sort Jesus wants. The rich ruler wanted to become a disciple on such terms, but our Lord would not accept the offer.

Brevities.

Lieutenant Condor has advocated that the site of the crucifixion is a knoll north of Jerusalem, near Jeremiah's grotto, called the "Place of the Stoning." He has sent to London a plan of a Jewish tomb of the Herodian period near this knoll, and he asks, "Can this be the new sepulchre in the garden?"

The Goddess of Reason, which was placed upon the church altars by the revolutionists of '89 in France, and paraded through the streets of Paris to receive the cheers and obeisance of the mob, was an effigy modelled upon the face and figure of a woman of great beauty. A report now comes that the model has just died in France at the age of ninety nine years, and that her late years were devoted to rag picking.

Those persons who are fond of tracing great events to small causes may find a strong instance in the death of the late ex-Prince Imperial of France. He was very agile, and would unquestionably have vaulted into his saddle, with an excellent chance of escaping from the Zulus, but the leather of the saddle flap (probably supplied by a fraudulent contractor, whose nefariousness was overlooked by a careless store inspector) tore in his hand, and a piece of rotten leather perhaps changed the fate of empires.

Alphonso XII. of Spain has known how to profit by his stay in Paris. The Jews applied to the Ambassador of his Catholic Majesty at Constantinople, asking whether it would be possible for them to return to the Peninsula, not individually, which they already have the right to do, but perhaps to the number of thirty, which would bring back into the Peninsula some of the families who abandoned it at the end of the fifteenth century, plundered and persecuted. On the arrival of the telegram from Constantinople the young king cried that the gates of Spain were wide open to those whom she still considers her children. "Scarcely anything happier than this could happen to us," said the king to his ministers. "What a glory for me if I can thus efface the disgrace bequeathed to me by my ancestors!"

An escaped criminal struck dead by lightning is the remarkable burden of a dispatch sent by the authorities at Knoxville, Tenn., on July 16th, to Chief Brooks of the Secret Service Division at Washington. It states that Mabe M. Morrill, the counterfeiter, who escaped from the officers on July 12th, at Morristown, Tenn., was struck dead by lightning on Wednesday last while lying out in the woods to escape being rearrested, and was buried the next day. It is the rule in society to scoff at the idea that such events are judgments of God; but it is certain that while the divine long-suffering permits some men to live long who are very wicked, yet others fall suddenly as by a stroke, and that without remedy. Prov. xxix. 1.

A MYSTERY OF SAN JACINTO MOUNTAINS.

The San Jacinto Mountains are located in the northeastern portion of San Diego county, and form the southern boundary of the San Gorgonio Pass. The region is a very wild and rough one, and extremely difficult to explore. There exists in one portion of these mountains a natural or supernatural curiosity, the source of which has never yet been explained, although many attempts have been made to solve the mystery. At irregular intervals a heavy report resounds through the region, which can be likened only to that of the largest cannon intensified tenfold. The concussion produced is such as to wake a person from the soundest sleep, shaking and rattling everything in the house more than is done by any ordinary earthquake. Sometimes days elapse between these reports, and on other occasions as many as three or four are heard in one night—that being the favorite time for their occurrence. This irregularity has operated to defeat all efforts made to discover the exact locality of the phenomenon. By the Indians of the regions this is called "Tah-quish," or the devil. They have many traditions concerning it, and manifest the utmost reluctance to make any search for the exact spot. One old Indian, supposed to be upward of a century in age, claims to have accidentally discovered the spot one day while hunting in his younger days. He described it as simply a dark tunnel running into the mountain, and having the appearance at the entrance of having been exposed to much heat. Many efforts have been made and large rewards offered to this Indian to conduct some white man to the place, but without success.

THE RUINS OF NINEVEH.

The Biblical statement, "Now Nineveh was an exceeding great city of three days' journey" (Jonah iii. 3), receives some illustration at the hand of Mr. Hormuzd Rassam: "There were four sites of the royal Assyrian residence discovered on the left side of the Tigris, in what was considered Assyria proper, and which were in the time of the preaching of the prophet Jonah, within the metropolis of Nineveh. These are Kuyunjik, Nebi Yunis, Nimrud, and Khorsabad. There are other important ruins within what I consider to be the radius of that 'great city,' such as Yarimja, Balawat, Karamlais, Bah-shika, and Shaikhan. Taking the oblong distance of these different ruins together with Kuyunjik and Nebi Yunis on the western limit, Nimrud on its southern border, and Khorsabad on its northern side, makes the size of the old city around about sixty miles, or three days' journey, as it is mentioned in Holy Writ; because twenty miles are reckoned in that country, according to the traveling of a pedestrian, about a day's journey. In all these mounds there have been discovered Assyrian remains; and at Balawat especially the famous bronze gates and temple dedicated to the god of war by Assur-nazir-pal. There are, besides these mounds, several others, scattered all over the above-mentioned space, which must have been formerly temples, or watch towers to guard the several quarters of the great town, with gardens and orchards enclosed."

THE REPLY TO INGERSOLL.

There remain on hand unsold as yet about 400 copies of my Reply to Ingersoll. These will probably be sold eventually in small quantities. Meantime it appears by bills rendered that postage, express and advertising charges, show an excess on our part of about $50 in these expenses over actual receipts to date. This sum it is desirable to pay while awaiting further receipts from sales, and as several brethren have requested me by letter to keep them and others informed in this contingency, with a view to prevent our being brought into debt by the work, I think it best to do so by this medium. Those who may contribute to this object will be reimbursed to the extent of proceeds of sales yet to be made, which I hope will be in full. It has been very gratifying to know that the reply has proved quite satisfactory to the brotherhood, as many have declared.

Fraternally submitted.

A. B. MAGRUDER.

If we begin to idolize the things that are seen, we shall soon degenerate and turn aside from God. How easily we may spoil a blessing! Two friends gathered each a rose; the one was continually smelling at it, touching its leaves and handling it as if he could not hold it too fast; you do not wonder it was soon withered. The other took his rose, enjoyed its perfume moderately, carried it in his hand for awhile, and then placed it on the table in water, and hours after it was almost as fresh as when it was plucked from the bough. We may doto on our worldly gear until God becomes jealous of it, and sends a blight upon it; and, on the other hand, we may with holy moderateness use these things as not abusing them, and get from them the utmost good which they are capable of conveying to us.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NORTHERN INDIANA CONFERENCE.

The Annual Conference of the Churches of God in Northern Indiana will be held at Argos, Marshall Co., Ind., and will commence on Thursday, September 8, 1881, at 7:30 p. m., and continue Friday, Saturday, and Sunday the three days following. Public services will commence at 10:30 a. m., on Friday and other appointments will be made as shall be thought most advisable. A general attendance is requested, as the desire of our brethren, as has been expressed, is to have one more good meeting, at least, before the close of this dispensation. Argos is on the Michigan City, Peru, and Indianapolis railroad, eight miles south of Plymouth, the County-seat of Marshall County. Let it be our prayer that we may meet in the fulness of the gospel of Christ.

BY ORDER OF COMMITTEE.

I will preach as follows: At brother Guffin's the 3d Sunday in September, at Gospel Grove the next Sunday, at Dundee, Blackford Co., Ind., the next Sunday, in brethren Elton's neighborhood, south of Delia, O., the next Sunday, at Raisin, Mich., as brother L. C. Chase may appoint the next Sunday, at Buchanan, Mich., the following Sunday.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

The Lord willing, I will be at Bro. Moore's, in Illinois, on Friday nights before the fifth Sunday in July, and hold meeting over Sunday. August 8, I am to have a discussion with a Baptist minister at the same place, at Walls school house, south of Paris, Edgar Co., Ill. Following are the propositions:

Resolved, That the Bible teaches men and women (or sinners) are born of God in this life, and must possess everlasting life before they can believe in the Lord Jesus Christ.

G. W. Pain affirms, J. S. Hatch denies.

Resolved, That the Bible teaches Christ will come and set up His kingdom on this earth.

J. S. Hatch affirms, G. W. Pain denies.

I expect to spend the rest of August in Illinois as the brethren may appoint.

J. S. HATCH.

The Church of God of Montague and Wise Counties, TEXAS, will hold their annual Conference at Valentine Springs in Montague County, commencing Friday, August 12, 1881, at four o'clock, P. M. The place of meeting is four miles south of Forestburg, sixteen miles south of St. Joe, sixteen miles southeast of Montaguetown, thirty miles west of Gainsville, and twenty miles north of Decatur. We invite every body that feels an interest in the word of God to come over. Brethren coming from a distance will go to brethren Hodges, Grimes, or Sowers, who live near the meeting place. We want all the preaching brethren we can get. Any preaching brother who can come will please address me at Sunset, Wise Co., Tex., and we will help him come.

T. T. DOYAL.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God will commence on Friday, Aug. 5, at the house of the brethren in Winchester, Va., and continue over Sunday, which will be the first Sunday. All of the Abrahamic faith, and the people in general are respectfully invited to attend. All from a distance will please notify the writer in due time, and we will meet them at the R. R. depot, and take care of them during the meeting, and longer if they will stay, as we love the communion of the brethren in Christ.

N. J. MORMAN.

The Piedmont Advent C. C. will meet with the church at Tabernacle, Caldwell county, N. C., Aug. 4, and continue three days. Tabernacle is 18 miles from the R. R., Hickory being the nearest depot. Persons coming on the cars will go from Hickory to the conference by means of private conveyance.

JACOB J. HARSHAW, Sec.

I will meet with the brethren in their general Conference at Winchester, Va., Aug. 6 and 7, and remain till the 12th, and then will meet with the brethren at Baltimore as they may arrange the following Sunday, or Aug. 14th.

Poetry.

THOU HAST SUFFERED FOR ME.

W. L. CROCKETT.

Thou hast suffered for me;
Even thou who dost heal,
In temptings, in sorrow,
Thou hast felt as I feel.

Thou hast suffered for me;
Thy poor weary head,
Found never a resting place
Till thou wert dead.

Thou hast suffered for me;
When mockers did bow
To thee with the cruel thorns
Circling thy brow.

Thou hast suffered for me;
I never may know
In my dark bitter hours,
The depth of thy woe.

O Savior, O Christ,
Strengthen thou me;
And e'en unto life itself
I'll suffer for thee.

ISRAEL AND THE CHURCH.

NUMBER NINE.

J. CAMERON.

THE PROMISES MADE TO ABRAHAM.

The principal of these are the following:—

1. "To thee and to thy seed will I give this land."

2. "In thee shall all the nations of the earth be blessed."

3. "Thy seed shall be as the stars of the heaven for multitude. Gen. xii.; xiii.; xv.; Gal. iii.

Notice that in the first promise Abraham is to have personal possession of the land. It was thus that Abraham understood; for when God said to him on one occasion, "I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it"—he asked, "Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?" And so Stephen understood it, for he said that God had "promised that he would give it to him for a possession." And the apostle writing to the Hebrews, says:—

"By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which HE SHOULD AFTER RECEIVE FOR AN INHERITANCE, obeyed."

But during Abraham's lifetime he never received possession of the land thus promised. He had to purchase a burying place in it for his wife; and it is further testified that "God gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on;" and also that "by faith Abraham sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise." "These ALL died in faith, not having received the promises." Abraham's possession of the land is therefore reserved for a future time.

But this promise of the land is also made to Abraham's seed. In reference to this promise of the inheritance Paul, in writing to the Galatians, says:—

"To Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ."

That the promise here referred to is the land may be seen from the fact that Paul was speaking of a promise which God had confirmed by a covenant—And this I say that the covenant which was confirmed before of God in (or unto) Christ, the law which was 430 years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the PROMISE of none effect. This has clearly a reference to Gen. xv. 7-18, where the promise of personal possession of the land is confirmed by a covenant.

Again, speaking of the same thing, Paul says:—

"If the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise."

The Christ and Abraham are thus seen to be the future lords paramount of the land promised, which will then constitute the groundwork of that Kosmos or Divine ORDER of things to be established on the earth and otherwise designated "the kingdom of God." This naturally introduces the promise concerning the blessedness of nations which we now look into.

"In thee (Abraham) shall all the nations be blessed."

This is an explicit promise concerning NATIONS. The Bible contains promises to individuals simply as individuals, but such promises are not to be confounded with the promise made to Abraham concerning "all the NATIONS of the earth." When God says nations it is the only safe course to conclude that he means nations. The nations of the earth, then, are to be blessed in, or through, Abraham. No nation has as yet realized this promise. The most enlightened and best governed nation in Christendom cannot with anything like truth be characterized as blessed, and it is only when the promise of personal possession of the territory shall be fulfilled to Abraham himself that the true blessedness of the nations shall be enjoyed, because then only will a righteous government be established in the earth when the Son of Man shall have come in the clouds of heaven and when all PEOPLE and NATIONS and LANGUAGES shall serve and obey him—that is when not merely all people considered as individuals, but when all NATIONS properly so called shall be subjected to the Divine sway of the Messiah and his saints.

The next promise to be noticed is—

"Thy seed shall be as the stars of the heaven."

In reference to this numerous seed of Abraham God said:—

"Thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs."

This was Israel in Egypt, the natural seed of Abraham, whose history from that time to the present is unparalleled in interest, by anything in universal history, and only to be transcended by the glorious future in store for them in the purpose of God.

Reverting to Gal. iii. it is evident that the only inheritance promised to Abraham and his seed the Christ, is the land of Canaan from the Euphrates to the Nile. They who are Christ's are Abraham's seed and heirs of this inheritance and all that it implies. What it implies will be seen in the sequel. In the meantime let it be noted that the inheritance of the saints is that promised to Abraham, and that Abraham had no promises of any inheritance but the territory above named. On the other hand the natural seed of Abraham were to become the peculiar nation of Jehovah whom he should deliver from Egyptian bondage with judgments on their oppressors.

There is thus, in these promises to Abraham, a clear distinction between the two classes,—the descendants of Jacob in their national capacity, and the individuals of that nation who had the faith of Abraham, either under the Old or New Testament order of things. In other words the Divine nation of the past and future; and the One Seed, the Christ, with those who are his, the heirs with him, of the promised inheritance.

THE APOSTLE AND HIGH PRIEST OF OUR PROFESSION.

W. L. CROCKETT.

Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession. Heb. iii. 1.

The Hebrews could not consider a more sublime and God-like character, than that of Jesus as Apostle. They must have realized that his message was indispensable to the gracious plan of the salvation of our race. They must have seen vividly the scenes of his Apostleship, clustering around the agonizing scene on Calvary, and they must have been imbued with the essentiality of keeping inviolate the teaching of their Apostle, as it was embodied in the "things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Anointed," from the corrupting influence of the traditions of men.

Christ is the exemplar of all his followers. They are exhorted to be perfect, even as he is perfect. They must believe, practice, and preach his Divine message of a kingdom to be restored to Israel; blessing the faithful of all ages. They must be meek, as he was meek, in order that they may inherit the promised blessing in the earth. Consider him? Yea we do all well to consider him who is the Sun of Righteousness. Whose words are replete with the radiance and warmth of love. Whose life is the purest incense from the altar of God. Whose truth presents the only tangible, glorious, and complete system of life and immortality.

Who is worthy to be compared with him among the apostles of the various creeds which men have invented? Seek the annals of history and but one perfect character is found, and that is the lowly Nazarene, the man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief, yet withal the Savior of the world, the Son of the living God.

Having such an Apostle for our profession—which is by far the noblest of all professions; how much it behooves us to guard carefully his precepts; to set our whole affection on the beautiful things of the kingdom of God, his glorious message, heralding peace on earth, and good will to men.

Were we to lose through ignorance, unbelief, or willful perversion, what Christ came into the world to proclaim; we have lost all, and our lives, though the embodiment of worldly greatness, are miserable failures.

"In Adam all die, but in Christ shall all be made alive."

This is God's decree. None may escape it. If we neglect the "great salvation" of Christ Jesus our adorable and sublime Apostle, how shall we escape? Devise many ways, follow many teachings, steer the bark of life by the star of vain philosophy instead of the star of Bethlehem; what course is pursued, let all men realise fully, that there is but one straight and narrow way, and opening into that way but one door of life, whose lintels are stained with the blood of Christ; and beyond there is but one kingdom in which men may realize glory, honor, immortality, at the coming of him "whom the heavens must receive until the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

And while we are considering in this brief, and therefore necessarily imperfect manner, Christ Jesus our Apostle, let us not forget the praise and adoration due his blessed name, as a faithful and just High Priest. How the heart swells with gratitude when we read those indescribable words of love—

"For in that he, himself, hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted."

Taking on him the seed of Abraham, made in all points like his brethren; he came bearing our infirmities, partaker of our griefs, weeping o'er our sorrows, enduring the agonies of death, that he might be its conqueror, and become a faithful intercessor at the Father's throne for frail humanity, whose cries of weakness awaken in his loving heart the chords that once did vibrate beneath the hand of sorrow, and that snapped asunder at the rude touch of Death, but thanks be to God, not broken forever.

Such an High Priest became us, holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners; perfected through suffering.

In all things he was faithful to the Father who appointed him. Not shrinking through all the terrible ordeal. Having not where to lay his head, yet uttering the most touching and beautiful assurances of rest. Oft thirsty, oft hungry, oft weary, despised, rejected by his own, scourged, dying on the cross, and while there surrounded by enemies saying gently:—

"Father forgive them, for they know not what they do."

What a beginning for the office of Priesthood! Torn by wounds, with his own blood far above in preciousness all the blood ever shed on earth, streaming down his pierced side, what a picture of love boundless and Divine.

Such an High Priest is ours. He is not ashamed to call us brethren. We are the brethren of Christ unworthy as we are. We are joint heirs with him, we are partakers of Christ says the Apostle, if, if, we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast unto the end.

Brethren, ours is no idle calling. We are not to be mere ciphers in the problem of human destiny. We have a work to do, that none other may do. Then for the sake of the great Apostle and High Priest of our profession, Christ Jesus our Lord, who so lived that men were constrained to glorify God, so let us live.

So let us work, (for the night cometh when no man can work) until the coming of him who is our life, our Savior, our all in all, the same yesterday, today, and forever—in character unimpeachable, in light unapproachable, in life eternal.

Editor Restitution:

Having received an article from a brother in Missouri, taken from a German Baptist paper, called The Brethren at Work, said article written by T. W. Drennen, with whom I discussed the question of trine immersion at Argos last April, which contains such glaring misrepresentations that I ask room to correct them.

Mr. Drennen says that I admitted that he could prove trine immersion back to the days of the apostles, and that I said the apostles themselves were in error.

Now in reply to the foregoing, I want to ask if any man thinks the statement is true? I never made any such admission, and Mr. Drenner knows I did not. On the other hand I maintained that he could not find trine immersion mentioned before the days of Tertullian, who wrote about the beginning of the third century, nor did he find a single author earlier than that period, and this author condemns the practice.

We called Elder Drennen's attention to the exact words of Tertullian in regard to trine immersion, and he never attempted to disprove of them. This is the language in De Corona Militis, Sec. 3:

"Thence are we thrice immersed (ter mergitamur) fulfilling somewhat more (amplius aliquid respondentes) than the Lord has decreed in his gospel."

We said this, and we say it again, that if the history of trine immersion could be traced by the histories of the fathers to the very days of the apostles (which it cannot) it could be no proof, unless it could be shown that all the apostles practiced it, for there are other gross innovations that can be found to exist much earlier than it. I will further state that I can prove by the most reliable man who attended the discussion that no such admission was made on my part, that it could be traced to the apostles.

He further says: "I asked the gentleman to prove that sprinkling or pouring was ever practiced by the apostles, but he could not do it."

Now I flatly deny that he ever asked me to prove such a fact. He says "I could not do it." Certainly not, for the reason they never did it.

But has Mr. Drennen forgotten that I am not a Pedo-Baptist? He knows I am an immersionist, and therefore he never asked me to prove that which he knew I did not believe. I really wonder if that man Drennen ever has any lucid intervals.

In regard to the second proposition: "Resolved, That in death all things pertaining to man becomes unconscious," he says, "Elder Fenimore admitted the very point at issue. He admitted that there were angels in hell alive, but he attempted to prove that these angels were created beings, but never were possessed of mortality."

In reply to the above will say that I never assumed that there were angels in hell, either dead or alive, nor can he or any other man prove the same, and he knows that he is guilty of deceiving when he says that I maintained that view.

Now I will show how this same man contradicts his own words, not twelve lines below the above statement.

He says, "I told the Elder that they (meaning myself and brethren) were advocating the doctrine of the Sadducees, because they denied the existence of angels and spirits." Oh, Elder, how could you charge me with being a Sadducee when just a few lines above you say that I admitted there were angels in hell? I did not wonder that in the heat of debate you would contradict yourself, but I had supposed you would be able to write at least a dozen lines without such contradictions.

Consistency! thou art a jewel.

History of Twenty Rumsellers.

A writer in the American Messenger says:—

"During a period of twenty-five years, from 1830 to 1855, the writer remembers twenty individuals who were at one time or another engaged in the business of selling liquor at or near a little village in South California. Of that number fifteen failed in business, either while selling or afterwards. Five have died from the excessive use of ardent spirits, and six others were addicted to occasional excesses and have also passed away. Ten of their sons fell early victims to the appetite and fill drunkards' graves, while nine others have at different times been addicted to drunken sprees and are in the utmost danger of falling before the same dreadful habit. Ten of their daughters have been married to drunkards. Three of their sons are idiots or imbeciles, and there are other indications which to a close observer call to mind the denunciation of Holy Writ, 'Woe to him that giveth his neighbor drink, and maketh him drunken also.'"

Honesty In Living; or, Precept and Practice.

BY A CHRISTIAN MERCHANT.

The lack of genuine honesty on the part of many Christian professors in relation to the contracting and paying of their debts, is probably the greatest stumbling-block in the path of Christian progress at the present time. The time was when a debtor could be put in prison for debt the same as a thief is now incarcerated for stealing. We have outgrown that, but have we not gone too far in the other direction? Unless I am mistaken in my interpretation of Bible teaching it is as heinous in the sight of God for me to "beat" a Christian friend or worldly neighbor out of his property, as it is to deprive him of it by force or parliament.

The fact of Christian professors living beyond their means and so making others pay for their extravagance, is furnishing skeptics and infidels with more capital against Christianity than any other one evil.

I know of a widow who has a family of grown-up children and relatives, who also is a church member, and who supports herself and dependents mainly by her plausible address and Christian profession, which she uses as a means of getting in debt for house-rent, groceries, etc. She will live in a neighborhood until the rent has accumulated all she can make, and until every storekeeper in the neighborhood has refused to credit her longer, and then remove to another part of the city or into an adjoining one. She has lived in Brooklyn in different sections, in New York, Jersey City and Hoboken, and always leaves behind her all the debts she could possibly contract. She was never known to pay an honest debt if she could help it, and yet she supported grown-up children and relatives in idleness and comfort in that way. None of the churches to which she belonged ever even called her attention to her extremely sinful course of life, and as the reproach she brought upon the cause of Christ by her dishonest mode of living. She could give good religious testimony in social meetings, and always asked a blessing at the table.

There has got to be a great change on the part of those who are in authority in the administration of church government and polity, or the Church of Christ will lose more and more of the respect of moralists, as well as the better portion of those who are looking to the lives of Christians for an example, and as a help to the salvation of their souls. Most of our churches are none the less to blame because of the fact that their financial condition seems to them a good excuse for overlooking glaring faults on the part of those who give freely of their money into its treasury.

I regret to have to admit that many clergymen show the most attention to those who give money, rather than to those whose lives manifest the purest Christian graces. There is very much more homage paid to wealthy Christians in our churches nowadays than is consistent with the teachings of the Apostle James in his Epistle. This spirit is causing a degree of worldliness to become general among Christians that I fear will continue to work great evil, unless speedily checked and corrected.

Christ said, "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon;" but I must admit that many Christians seem much more interested in the service of "Mammon" than the service of God.

In the early days of Christianity in our land there was a disposition on the part of all denominations to look to the lives and conduct of their members, and if any were guilty of sinful practices or were in any way leading inconsistent lives they were punished or expelled from the church; but it is now very rare for churches to take any notice of violation of commandment or rule unless it violates the law of the land, in which case the publicity given the offence seems often more of a reason for noticing it than the fact of its being a sin against God and a dishonor, in his sight, of the church his Son founded.

No Christian professor has a right to mortgage his future earnings unless for the bare necessaries of life; and the disposition to run in debt in order to keep up appearances or dress according to the requirements of ever-changing fashion is contrary to the spirit and teachings of Christianity.

No Christian is honest who runs in debt when he knows that if his real circumstances were known to his creditor he would not be trusted.

We must live more for the glory of God and less to make a show to the "world" if we ever expect our system of religion to be universally respected, if not universally prevalent.

Refuse Not Jesus.

S. ROXANA WINCH.

"See that ye refuse not him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven."

To those who have not accepted Christ, how solemn those words! God's Son is speaking from heaven, as Moses once spake from earth; speaking to you as Moses spake to the children of Israel. To every one of you does the warning come,—"that you are not to refuse him, not to turn away." He offers himself to you, as a propitiation for your sins. He came to call you. He died on your behalf. You need him. There is help in no other, you can hide in no other name.

"For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish but have everlasting life."

You know your own sinfulness, as none but God know it. You can look down into the depths of your own hearts, and weigh yourselves. You can tear aside the veil from all your past years and see what of good there has been in you. It will be a picture you will not care to contemplate. Though you may have felt secure in living what the world would call a moral and upright life, you will find that something is wanting—looking at yourself in the light of God's word—before you can come into God's presence and feel at peace. Some one must stand for you, some one must be your surety. God has ordained this. You cannot become surety for yourselves. Only through Christ, can you become reconciled to God.

If you turn away from him, you cannot escape. Take the Days-man that is offered. Flee into his name and be safe. My heart goes out for you. I pray that you may be saved.

The Cyclopaedia War.

The month of July, 1881, witnesses the completion of the largest and most important literary work this country and the century have seen. It is the Library of Universal Knowledge, large type edition, in 15 large octavo volumes, containing 10 per cent more matter than Appleton's Cyclopædia, at less than one-fifth its cost, and 80 per cent more than Johnson's Cyclopædia, at a little more than one-fourth its cost.

Chambers's Encyclopædia, which forms the basis of the Library of Universal Knowledge (the last London edition of 1880 being reprinted verbatim as a portion of its contents), is the laborious product of the ripest British and European scholarship. It has developed through a century of Cyclopædia making; its various editions having been many times revised, in successive years, till it has come to be universally recognized, by those competent to judge, as standing at the very front of great aggregations of knowledge, and better adapted than any other Cyclopædia for popular use. It containing such full and important information as the ordinary reader, or the careful student, is likely to seek, upon about 25,000 subjects in every department of human knowledge. Chambers's Encyclopædia, however, is a foreign production, edited and published for a foreign market, and could not be expected to give as much prominence to American topics as American readers might desire. To supply these and other deficiencies a large corps of American editors and writers have added important articles upon about 15,000 topics, covering the entire field of human knowledge, bringing the whole number of titles under one alphabetical arrangement to about 40,000. Thus the work is thoroughly Americanized, and the Library of Universal Knowledge becomes at once the latest and most complete Encyclopædia in the field, at a mere fraction of the cost of any similar work which has preceded it.

Revolution

The price of the 15 volumes, complete, in extra cloth binding, $15.00. In half Russia, sprinkled edges, $20.00. In half Russia, gilt top, $22.50. In full library sheep, marbled edges, $25.00.

The superlative value and importance of this great Encyclopædia lies especially in the fact that it is brought within the reach of every one who aspires after knowledge and culture. It is really a liberal education easily within the reach even of every ry of universal knowledge. It brings a liberal plowboy of the country and appreciative boy of the city. Every farmer and every mechanic in the land owes it to himself and to his children that such a Cyclopædia shall henceforward form a part of the outfit of his home. To the professional man, and every person of intelligence in every walk of life, a Cyclopædia is a necessity.

Of course the old and wealthy publishers who have grown rich (it is said that the Appletons have made a profit of nearly two million dollars on their Cyclopædia) from the sale of their high-priced publications are not pleased that their monopolies are broken and their power overthrown. Of course the book agents and booksellers who have been used to getting from 40 to 60 per cent commission for selling these high-priced books are not so well pleased to sell the Library of Universal Knowledge on 15 per cent commission, though those who are not short-sighted discover that their own interests, after all, are identical with the interests of the people, and their real profits, I am sure, are increased by the immense sales which result from meeting the people's wants. The majority of booksellers, however, are better pleased to handle than to fill this and our numerous other standard and incomparably low-priced publications. But the Literary Revolution has always looked to the people, in whose interests it is, for its patronage, and it has never looked in vain, as our more than one million volumes printed last year (this year being increased to probably more than two millions) abundantly prove. You can order the Cyclopædia directly from us, and by uniting with your neighbors and friends you can secure club rates as follows:

$10,000 Reward

To Club Agents.

A discount of 25 per cent will be allowed to any one ordering at one time three or more sets of the Cyclopædia; and a discount of 33⅓ per cent will be allowed to any one ordering five or more sets at one time.

As a special inducement to our friends and patrons to go to work promptly and effectually, each doing what he can for the dissemination of universal knowledge, we propose to distribute $10,000 in special premiums as follows, in addition to the regular discount as above:

$5,000 Reward

$5,000 Reward

In addition to the first premium to be given, and among the 10 prize agents next from them (exactly in number, the amount to be distributed proportionately to the total number of subscribers reported) each of the 10 shall receive a like cash premium.

The names of subscribers must be received and reported to us. The first premium agent will be credited as reported to us, the order and premium blank will be distributed proportionately as reported by the others, and the premiums will be distributed accordingly. Reports must be made to us by the 15th of each month, and the premiums will be awarded for each month's business on the 20th of the month following. Orders for the full sets will be filled by us with the discount as above, and the full cash value of the premiums awarded will be paid to the successful agents. Agents may keep their premiums, or turn them back to us and receive the cash value, and thus keep their agency open for business. In case of a tie, the full premium will be awarded to each of the agents who may be tied.

Specimen pages of the "Library of Universal Knowledge" will be sent free upon request. By sending us a list of not less than 10 names of probable subscribers, we will send a specimen volume, postage paid, for examination. Specimen pages, circulars, terms to agents, etc., will be sent free upon application. Remit by bank draft, money order or registered letter, or by express. TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the full "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the empire and all the national, the restoration of Israel, the literal resurrection of the dead, the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked, eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and Holy Life as essential for final salvation.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Invasion of Gaul.—The Arabian caliphs were fully resolved to humble the cross before the crescent. To secure this end it was necessary to remove the Roman empire in the East, or the Greek division, since the Latin empire had already been subjugated.

The two sieges of Constantinople, continuing nearly nine years, had signally failed through the potency of the Greek Fire.

They next put in execution an invasion of the empire from the west. They had robbed the empire of its African provinces, conquered Spain, and had cross the Pyrenees into Gaul, which for many years had constituted a strong member of the empire. All the nations of Europe were Christian. If they succeeded in subjugating the German family, which extended to the walls of Constantinople, that city would then be readily taken, and then the empire of the Saracens would become universal—a fifth monarchy. But God had decreed quite otherwise. The fifth monarchy belongs to the God of heaven, and is to be set up by his beloved Son. His divine agency soon appeared.

The veteran Abdalrahman, appointed by the caliph Hasbem, undertook the subjugation of the remainder of Europe to the faith of Mahomet.

With a formidable army he marched to the Rhone and undertook the siege of Arles. A Christian army was overthrown, the city taken, success followed the Arabian forces.

Another Christian army was met, and its slaughter was so great, that it was said, "God alone could reckon the number of the dead."

The Saracens overran all the southern provinces of France, and appeared in every attack invincible. Their victories over the Christian provinces of the Roman empire had extended from Gibraltar to the Loire, one thousand miles.

"The repetition of an equal space would have carried the Saracens to the confines of Poland and the Highlands of Scotland; the Rhine is not more impassable than the Nile or Euphrates, and the Arabian fleet might have sailed without a naval combat into the mouth of the Thames.

Perhaps the interpretation of the Koran would now be taught in the schools of Oxford, and her pulpits might demonstrate to a circumcised people the sanctity and the truth of the revelation of Mahomet."—Gibbon.

But the God that mapped the future to the exile of Patmos, had decreed it otherwise. It had been decided, near that locality, whether the world should be German (Israel) or Mongolian; the contest was now to be decided whether the world should be Ishmael (son of the "bond woman") or German. By divine interposition the German race were made the conquerors. Europe was delivered by the ability of a single man, Charles Martel (the hammer.)

The enemy was encountered in the center of France. "The nations of Asia, Africa and Europe, advanced with equal ardor to an encounter that would change the history of the world.

In the first six days of desultory combat, the horsemen and archers of the East maintained their advantage; but in the closer onset of the seventh day, the Orientals were oppressed by the strength and stature of the Germans, who, with stout hearts and iron hands, asserted the civil and religious freedom of their posterity."—Gibbon.

On the field the Arabian commander was slain, and the Saracens retired to their camps at night. During the night the army disputed among themselves, dissolved and in broken fragments took to flight.

The victory was complete, and the Arabians were soon driven beyond the Pyrenees never again to return.

From the battle (A. D. 732) we date the termination of Arabian unity, and consequently, the decline of their power. They were divided into three factions:

1. The Green, consecrated to the Patriarchs.

2. The White, devoted to the house of the Ommiades.

3. The Black, adopted by the Abbassides.

"Their turbans and garments were stained with that gloomy color (black); two black standards, on pike staves nine cubits long were borne aloft in the van of Abu Moslem, and their allegorical names of the Night and the Shadow obscurely represented the indissoluble union and perpetual succession of the line of Hashem. From the Indus to the Euphrates the East was convulsed by the quarrel of the white and black factions."—Gibbon.

By these factions, especially the white and black, the kingdom was torn in fragments and drenched in the blood of her own citizens.

The house of Ommiades perished (white faction) except one, Abdalrahman, who, by his enemies was hunted from the Euphrates to Mount Atlas. Passing over into Spain, he established his royal high priesthood on a throne at Cordova.

The family of Hashem inherited Heaven as their patrimony, yet the Abbassides never resided in that sacred city.

Damascus being polluted with blood of the Ommiades, the caliph Almansor resolved to erect a new capital. The site was chosen. It was on the eastern bank of the Tigris. Bagdat (City of Peace) was founded and arose into populousness and splendor, A. D. 762.

It contained 2,000,000 inhabitants. At the funeral of a distinguished Mohammedan 600,000 men and 30,000 women might attend.

The contrast of the lives of Abubeker, Omar and Othman, with those of Almansor and his son, Mahadi, of Bagdad, and Abdalrahman the 3d, of Cordova, is so striking that a sketch of their splendor and frugality should be considered. It has, also, an important bearing upon our subject. The lives of the caliphs produced their impression upon the nation. Let us, for a few moments, walk around the city of Bagdad, and pass through the palace of the caliph, the royal high priest.

It is the day of the reception of the Greek ambassador.

"The caliph's whole army was under arms, a body of 160,000 men. His state officers, the favorite slaves, stood near him in splendid apparel, their belts glittering with gold and gems. Near them were seven thousand eunuchs, four thousand of them white, the remainder black. The porters or doorkeepers were in number seven hundred. Barges and boats, with the most superb decorations, were seen swimming upon the Tigris. Nor was the palace itself less splendid, in which were hung up 38,000 pieces of tapestry, 12,500 of which were of silk embroidered with gold. The carpets on the floor were 22,000. A hundred lions were brought out, with a keeper to each lion. Among other spectacles of rare and stupendous luxury was a tree of gold and silver spreading into eighteen large branches, on which, and on the lesser boughs, sat a variety of birds made of the same precious metals, as well as the leaves of the tree, while the machinery affected spontaneous motions, the several birds warbled their natural harmony. Through this scene of magnificence, the Greek ambassador was led by the vizier to the foot of the caliph's throne."—Gibbon.

"In the West, the Ommiades of Spain supported, with equal pomp, the title of Commander of the Faithful.

Three miles from Cordova, in honor of his favorite sultana, the third and greatest of the Abdalrahmans, constructed the city palace, and gardens of Zerah. Twenty-five years, and above 3,000,000 sterling were employed by the founder; his liberal taste invited the artists of Constantinople, the most skillful sculptors and architects of the age; and the buildings were sustained or adorned by 12,000 columns of Spanish and African, of Greek and Latin marble.

The hall of Audience was incrusted with gold and pearls, and a great basin in the center was surrounded with the curious and costly figures of birds and quadrupeds. In a lofty pavilion of the gardens, one of these basins and fountains—so delightful in a hot and sultry climate—was replenished, not with water, but with the purest quicksilver.

The seraglio of Abdalrachman, his wives, concubines, and black eunuchs, amounted to 6,300 persons, and he was attended to the field by a guard of 12,000 horse, whose belts and shooters were studded with gold."—Gibbon.

Such was the splendor of the court of Abdalrahman, yet he has left a lesson for us to study. In his closet was found the following:

"I have now reigned above fifty years in victory or peace; beloved by my subjects, dreaded by my enemies, and respected by my allies. Riches and honors, power and pleasure, have waited on my call, nor does any earthly blessing appear to have been wanting to my felicity. In this situation, I have diligently numbered the days of pure and genuine happiness which have fallen to my lot; they amount to Fourteen. O man! place not thy confidence in this present world."

The same features belonged to the people. They ceased to be a nation of warriors. What had been given them was withdrawn, and their luxury and divisions proved their overthrow.

They made other attempts to subjugate the Roman empire in the East and in the West, but they most signally failed.

Instigated by an insult offered by a Roman emperor, Harun al Rashid gathered an army of 135,000 regulars, and 300,000 of all ranks, and swept Asia Minor, and again threatened Constantinople. But their internal divisions saved, for the third time, the Eastern capital.

Another fearful attack was made on the city of Rome. A Saracen fleet entered the mouth of the Tiber, and appeared before the metropolis of the Christian world. They despoiled the churches of their sacred images, and gathered a large amount of plunder. Their divisions saved Rome from the power of Mahomet.

The city of Rome and the Christian church were delivered by Pope Leo the Fourth. He first began church reform, then restored the fortifications of the city.

The first fleet of the Saracens was destroyed by a storm. A second fleet of Arabs and Moors, from the coast of Africa landed at the mouth of the Tiber sixteen miles from Rome. The fleet of the Eastern empire came to the rescue. In the midst of the sea fight a storm arose, and gave victory to the Christians.

Quite providential that two Arabian fleets should have thus been overthrown. The attacks were vital to Christianity; it was necessary, therefore, for divine interposition.

It is quite unnecessary to trace further the history of the Arabian dynasty. That dynasty continued about three centuries, but its first one hundred and fifty years (five prophetic months) fill the symbols under consideration. The second five months are out of our investigations.

From the building of Bagdad, to the overthrow of the Arabian empire by the Turks, the empire of the Saracens was an empire of peace, (compared with its former history) learning and of great wealth.

During the first period of five months, they were a unit; they had "one king over them." During the second period they were divided; they had three kings over them. The first period was devoted to conquest and conversion to the Koran. During the second period they strove to enjoy the fruits of their conquests.

We, therefore, shall notice their history no further than the founding of Bagdad, the City of Peace. Their commission to torment, reaches down to this event only. From this period we begin to see the elements of another dynasty, rising in the northeast.

We now propose to apply the history already given.

ISRAEL AND THE CHURCH.

NUMBER TEN.

J. CAMERON.

THE PROMISES MADE TO DAVID.

These promises to Abraham assumed more distinct shape in the promises made to David, King of Israel. God promised to David that he should have a descendant who should sit on his throne forever.

"And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build an house for my name, and I will stablish the the throne of his kingdom forever. I will be his father, and he shall be my son. If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men: but my mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before thee. And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established for ever before thee: thy throne shall be established for ever. According to all these words and according to all this vision, so did Nathan speak unto David." 2 Sam. vii. 12–17.

This was applied to our Lord by the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews—

"For to which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee? And again. I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son." Heb. i. 5.

David was a King over the natural seed of Abraham and the promise is that his Son, the Messiah, should sit on his throne, that is, to rule over the same people that David ruled. There is no hint given that Messiah's subjects should be a different class from those of David; hence, though there were no direct testimony to determine who were to be Messiah's subjects, it would be justly inferred from the nature of the promise that they should be the same as David's.

Notice here a prediction uttered when Zedekiah, the last king of David's house who occupied the throne of Judah, was deposed:—

"And thou, profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, Thus saith the Lord God; Remove the diadem, and take off the crown: this shall be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn, it: and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him." Ezek. xxi. 25–27.

The revival of this overturned, but only suspended kingdom, was shown to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, by means of a dream, which was interpreted by one of the captive prophets of Israel.—

"And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever." Dan. ii. 44.

And that this revival should take place under the Messiah is clearly indicated in a vision seen by Daniel himself (Dan. vii.) where the Son of Man is represented as coming with the clouds, and being invested with the dominion of all nations, including, of course, Israel.

Thus the inheritance promised to Abraham and to his seed the Christ, to the blessedness of the nations in a national sense through that seed, became bound up with the KINGDOM which God has established over the natural descendants of Abraham. This kingdom was the kingdom of God, and the throne was Jehovah's throne. 1 Chron. xxix. 23; xvii.

Hence its restoration under the Messiah would naturally be hailed by the nation as good news or gospel, and so we find that when the Messiah appeared he proclaimed the good news concerning the kingdom of God. "The common people heard him gladly," and would have taken him to make him King, but they knew not that the Messiah should suffer before he should enter into his glory—that the Son of Man should go into the far country and return with the clouds of heaven before he should exercise dominion as predicted by the prophets. Thus the national blessedness is seen to be dependent on the establishment of Messiah's rule in the earth at his second appearing when all men shall be blessed in him and all NATIONS call him blessed.

THE REIGN OF CHRIST AND HIS SAINTS OVER ISRAEL AND THE NATIONS.

These promises to Abraham and David clearly show that to the Christ is given the lordship of the territory of the kingdom of Israel, with the right to exercise dominion over the subjects of that kingdom, the natural seed of Abraham; and that Abraham, with Isaac and Jacob and the faithful among Israel who walked in the steps of Abraham's faith, and those among the Gentiles who by faith and obedience became Christ's—should be co-inheritors with Christ as Lord of the inheritance, and in virtue of his lordship, as ruler of the nation.

A few direct testimonies to the reign of Christ and his saints may here be fittingly introduced:—

"The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God. And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together." Rom. viii. 16, 17.

"It is a faithful saying, For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him. If we suffer we shall also reign with him." 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12.

"And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: (and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers) even as I received of my Father." Rev. ii. 26, 27.

"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Rev. iii. 21.

"Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years." Rev. xx. 6.

These are plain declarations of Scripture that Christ and his saints are to reign. It is distinctly stated in one of the passages quoted that they are to rule the nations, having received power over them. It would be easy to multiply passages to the same effect, but one or two as specimens must here suffice:—

"I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him. * * * These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth. But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even forever and ever. * * * And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High." Dan. vii. 13, 14, 17, 18, 27.

"I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle. * * * Then shall the Lord go forth and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle. And his feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives which is before Jerusalem on the east. * * * And the Lord my God shall come and all the saints with thee. * * * And the Lord shall be King over all the earth. * * * And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem shall even go up from year to year to worship the King and to keep the feast of tabernacles." Zech. xiv. 2, 3, 4, 6, 9, 16.

It is surely abundantly evident from what has been advanced that Israel's existence as a nation and the preservation of the nations of the earth, together with the personal presence of the Messiah and his saints as the alone rulers,—must be realized as contemporaneous facts at some future time according to the declared purpose of Jehovah.

It may be well to notice from another point of view this distinction between Israel and the saints in the age to come when the kingdom of God shall be established.

Israel, with the other nations, shall occupy the position of subjects, while Christ and the saints shall be the rulers, reigning over the house of Jacob, with all people and nations and languages rendering willing obedience. But "flesh and blood cannot INHERIT the kingdom of God," because the kingdom of God is to be inherited and ruled by those who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world (or age) and the resurrection from among the dead, who shall DIE NO MORE for they shall be EQUAL TO THE ANGELS.

Hence the natural seed of Abraham as such, being out of Christ, are in this respect on the same footing as the unbelieving Gentiles—they have no title to the land promised as inheritors in the Abrahamic sense. But God has been pleased to provide that when Christ, Abraham, and the faithful seed of Abraham, Jews and Gentiles, shall have become its lords and inheritors, the natural seed shall dwell in it as of old when God himself was their King. And this cannot detract from the honor, glory, and immortality of the saints, any more than the privileges which Israel enjoyed as God's "peculiar treasure" when formerly resident in the land, could be deemed derogatory to the glory of the God of Israel. Thus the modern Jews have no title to Britain or France in the sense of lords paramount, but their residence in great numbers in those countries, does not lessen the honor of their respective governments.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE OBELISK.

Professor T. A. M. Ward, of Philadelphia, at Work on a Translation.

The interesting and important task of translating a portion of the curious inscriptions on the Egyptian obelisk in Central Park has called to this city a Philadelphia gentleman named Thomas A. M. Ward. Although very reticent as to his own individuality and the causes that have led him to undertake so difficult a work, Mr. Ward claims the title of Professor of Sanskrit and Hebraical Literature, and insists that the translation upon which he is engaged will be the only correct one given to the English-speaking people.

In conversation with a Times reporter at his hotel last evening, the Professor, who is an elderly gentleman of intelligent appearance and energetic manner, explained that he proposed at present to translate only the central column (Letter A) of the side facing Fifth avenue. It would take more than a year of steady work, he said, to make an accurate translation of the entire twelve columns, and the subject-matter, with explanatory notes, would fill an octavo volume of over 150 closely printed pages.

With regard to the translations hitherto made public, Mr. Ward maintained that they were incomplete and incorrect. The so-called translations published in a New York morning paper last February were especially alluded to as being inaccurate.

"I do not believe," said the Philadelphia Professor, "that Bey Brugsch—or Colonel Brooks, as it is in English—sanctioned the translation that was ascribed to him, for the errors in it are very glaring. The work of deciphering the hieroglyphics on the obelisk is very tedious and puzzling; but when it is correctly done it will give the people a vast amount of important knowledge concerning the ancients. There is no telling the exact age of the shaft in Central Park, but we can arrive at a pretty reliable estimate of the age of the various inscriptions on its surface. Of the twelve columns of glyphs no two were put on at the same time. In the succeeding ages different rulers were wont to cause inscriptions to be made on the obelisks pertaining to the events or inspirations of their respective reigns. The glyphs, I believe, were understood in those remote ages only by the priests—the kings even could not read them. The authors who pretend to derive the word obelisk from the Latin word obeliscus are certainly in error, for the obelisks existed centuries before the Latin language was arranged in accordance with the rules of philology."

"How old is the column of inscriptions that you propose to translate?" asked the reporter.

"That was put on in 1322 B. C.," replied the Professor, "and it is probably the oldest column of glyphs on the obelisk. It is a revelation of the intelligence and sacred rites of the ancient Egyptians. The original and proper name for these venerable Egyptian monuments is 'OB-El-Asp,' and not obelisk. The latter would mean nothing to the people of Egypt, while the other characters stand for God of the Spirits in the regions of Amenti. Osiris was the god who controlled the blessed in the realms of Pone, mediator between the god of Naph and mankind. 'OB' was the god consulted by the reputed 'Witch of Endor,' in the affairs of Samuel and Saul, of Scriptural history. The king whose name and titles are cut into the stone of the obelisk adored this god, and when accorded divine honors, (Thothmiss, which means purified, lifted up,) during the third passage (in the third degree) the pontiffs and prophets, after the deification of the king, decreed that the proceedings should be cut into the stone in sacred characters or hieroglyphics, and like stone endure ever after. Thothmiss is not the name of a king. There never was a king by that name. The word has a reference to the third passage, or degree, in the Egyptian mysteries. The hieroglyphics representing this matter are the trinal M. and double s, reading thus—'Mss.' The name of the king is in the cartouche at the top of the obelisk; the glyphs at the top and over the cartouche are the king's titles, which makes him king. (Pharaoh.) 'P' being the definite article, 'the,' and attached to the phrase 'araa,' reads 'the king.' The eagle on the column means Pharaoh, and the bars on which it stands represents the thunderbolts of Jove, which is the great god—the sun—the source of heat, light and life. This part of the inscription reads:—

"Pharaoh, son of the sun, ever-living, beloved by Amun, ruler of a people of purity, Lord (or King) of the Lords of the Nomes of Kami and Nod. (Egypt and Nubia). The name of the king cut on the stone inside of the cartouche, resembling in shape a beetle, is Rhamun-etho—that is, manetho. Rha is the sun-god. The two glyphs, all joined as they are on the stone, read the same as they do in the eagle and the thunderbolts. This inscription was cut into the stone on the second day of the month Thoth, and in the seventh year of the reign of the king Pharaoh."

This last point is as far as Mr. Ward has progressed in his task. He claims that some very interesting matter is to follow—information which seems to relate to what is modernly called Masonry, but of a higher order than has been known for 1,600 years. The professor thinks that he shall remain in this city for a week or ten days longer. He says that he is acting as the representative of the Historical and Antiquarian Society of Illinois, in the work of which he is now engaged, and avers that the result of his labors will be duly published, together with an intelligible key to the Egyptian glyphs. He thinks that the people will be greatly surprised when they come to know the real significance of the odd-looking figures on the obelisk. In answer to a question as to whether he had ever been in Egypt, Mr. Ward promptly answered:—

"Oh, yes, I spent a long time there with George R. Gliddon, the American Egyptologist."

Mr. Gliddon is the author of "An Appeal to the Antiquaries of Europe on the Destruction of the Monuments of Europe," "Ancient Egypt" and other works. Mr. Ward has in his possession a purse of Babylonian money, certain coins of which were contemporaneous with the mystic writing on the obelisks. Holding one of the rude silver pieces up for the reporter's inspection, he said:—

"That little coin was in circulation more than 600 years before the birth of Christ."

Others that he displayed were anywhere from two to five centuries older than the Christian era, and yet not one of them would buy a 2-cent watermelon at the huckster's stall on the corner.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CRAVEN, Editor.

Plymouth, Indiana, August 10, 1881.

We have many manuscript articles on hand. It will require weeks to dispose even of a part of the longer ones. We can only select for early publication those best adapted to the general design of THE RESTITUTION. We postpone writing on some topics, upon which we have commenced, to give room to our contributors. There is a gain to our readers in this, as we are happy to acknowledge that no effusions from our own pen would have been so instructive to inquirers after truth or so edifying to our brethren who have yielded the obedience of faith as some that talented brethren have contributed for the columns of our paper.

THANKS to those of our friends who have lately contributed extra financial aid to assist in the publication of our paper. For a while some assistance in the way of free-will offerings will be needed. Slowly our list increases and we hope to yet see our loved RESTITUTION self-sustaining. We are all however called upon to make sacrifices in some direction, and perhaps it is designed by our Heavenly Father that his obedient children shall do some missionary service for his cause in helping to send abroad a paper devoted to the exposition of prophecy, and to the unfolding the glad tidings of the soon coming kingdom. Let us all perform our part in the specific work that belongs to the heralds of the Coming One.

THE current year is phenomenal in a most remarkable manner. Fire-tempests are raging with a fury in the sun that the wildest hyperbolizings of the most loose-reined imagination would fail adequately to depict. No such wonderful conjunction of the planets has taken place for thousands of years in the past, or will take place for thousands of years to come, as has marked the passing year. In the number of comets that have tracked across the skies it stands unique in history. The earthquake rends the foundations of cities with chasms and the living by hundreds go down alive into one wide-yawning sepulchre. The volcano pours out molten rivers of liquid fire. The cyclone sweeps the fair fields of cultivation with the besom of destruction. The maddened sea hurls the vessel from the white top of her angry crests to the fathomless gulphs where the coral insect slowly builds the tombs over the dead who have gone down beyond the soundings of the mariner's longest lines; and the end is not yet. These are the forerunners of coming doom. Watch and pray.

Communications.

OSAWKEE, Kan., July 3, 1881.

Brother Messimore:

I was real glad to see your report of the debate at Argos, which is very good; but I wish to know the reason the third proposition was not debated, as they are blowing loud about it. They say the Adventists thought it no use to try the little man on the third proposition, as he had proved too much for them. That the Adventists only wanted to debate the second proposition one day, but Brenneu held them to it. See their paper The Brethren at Work, of May 24 and June 21. I wish you would get those two papers, and read what they say and reply, for they manifest a lack of candor, and give us the reason the last proposition was not debated.

In hope of eternal life soon.

T. E. ADAMS.

MILLWOOD, Ind., July 18, 1881.

Brother Adams:

Your card is before me, and I now enclose it, together with a brief answer to the same, t. the office of THE RESTITUTION.

As to the reason why the third proposition was not discussed at the Argos debate, I would simply say that if my apology to the readers of THE RESTITUTION, accompanying my report had been published in connection with my report, there would have been no need for any one to inquire as to the reason why the debate ended when it did, and as it did. It contained full particulars with regard to that matter, and also a brief exposition of the third on the cross, which doubtless many of the patrons would have read with interest. I still hope that our dear editor will yet insert it, in connection with this, for the satisfaction of many of his readers.

If I can get the papers you refer to, in your card, I will write out a reply to that.

As regards the blowing and boasting of a great victory for Mr. Brennen in the Argos debate, I will simply relate a little circumstance which occurred here a short time after the debate. I accosted a Dunker preacher, a neighbor of mine, thus:

"You didn't get out to the debate?"

He answered: "Well, no; I didn't hear much about it, and when Charge came home and told how it went, I was glad dat I wasn't dere."

Charge is his son, also a preacher.

He added: "Some men will shoot away all their big balls before de battle commences; den when dey come into de fight dey have no ammunition."

Intimating that Mr. Brennen did his biggist firing before meeting his antagonist. Pretty well put in.

So far as Brother Penimore's backing out is concerned, I will just say for him, that whenever they (the German Baptists) will furnish a man to meet him, he stands ready to affirm and defend that third proposition against any man that they can produce.

Yours for the truth's sake.

JAS. MESSIMORE.

[We have mislaid the paper to which Brother Messimore refers and cannot find it. One main reason for not continuing the debate was that everybody was so engaged by pressing business at that time of year, that it was concluded best to discontinue the discussion, as people could not well attend.—ED.]

Editor Restitution:

Since my last account of labor, I have spent one Sunday with the church in Thorold, and as it had been announced in some of the Canada papers that the world was coming to an end, the earth to be burned up, on that day, therefore I took for my subject, The purpose of God in the creation and formation of the earth.

At the close we ate the memorial supper.

The last Sunday in June we held our annual grove meeting, about two miles east of the village of Norwich, which was the twenty-third I have held in that vicinity. And I think it was the best.

The editor of the Norwich Gazette has given the following account in his paper:

"The meeting advertised to be held by Rev. R. V. Lyon, in Mr. Davis' Grove, on Sunday last, was largely attended, notwithstanding the attractions at Norwich. Taking for his subject 'The truth of the Bible, and the Great Day of God's Wrath,' he entered upon a scathing review of Ingersoll and infidelity with all his old-time energy. Fortunately the weather was all that could be desired."

I left an appointment there for the first Sunday in June, 1882.

The first Sunday in July I held my fourteenth annual grove meeting on the old grounds in Svenburg. The congregation was the largest we ever had at that place.

The Friends had their annual meeting, which embraced a large gathering from the States and Canada.

A writer in one of the Woodstock papers thus speaks of the meeting:

"On Sabbath last the yearly grove meeting of the Second Adventists was held in Carr's Grove south of the village, as usual, by Brother Lyon, of the Niagara district. The congregation was very large—hundreds were present morning and afternoon. People were there from Norwich, Tarra, Ingersoll and Woodstock, as well as from the two townships adjoining."

At the close of our services the brethren retired to the house of——— where we ate the memorial supper. The day will long be remembered for good.

I left an appointment for the first Sunday in July, 1882.

By urgent request, I held a grove meeting at Lake Hunger, new field, which was well attended.

BROUGHT BACK TO PALESTINE BY PERSECUTION.

The Jewish Chronicle says: "The prosperous Jews form but a small portion of our brethren. Those who are comfortable and content are comparatively few. These, perhaps, would be loath to leave their assured and luxurious homes to find a new country and a new civilization. But those who are oppressed and unhappy long for the advantages which reconsolidated nationality would give them. Oppression and persecution have kept our people, as a body, alive and homogeneous. The more the Jew is downtrodden the more he clings to the faith of his fathers and its observances. Illiterated, and anxious to compete, socially, with his fellow-countrymen, he throws over the restrictions which are deeply respected by those whom he would conciliate by their abandonment, with the simple result of making himself appear contemptible and sycophantic. It is oppression, and not prosperity, which will lead us back to our proper place in the Holy Land."

ONE LESS.

One cross the less remains for me to bear;
Already borne is that of yesterdays;
That of to-day shall be to-morrow share:
To-morrow's with it self, shall pass away.
The storm that yesterday plowed up the sea,
Is hushed now beneath its level blue:
One storm the fewer remains for me.
Ere sky and earth are made forever new.

When people are in suffering, God knows it. He does not forget us. Those who are ill-treated have a Friend whose eye is not shut. He will reward it.

If we could only read the secret history of our enemies, we should find in each man's life sorrow and suffering enough to completely disarm hostility.

God walks with the simple; he reveals himself to the lowly; he gives understanding to the little ones; he discloses his meaning to pure minds, and hides his grace from the curious and proud.

When God would educate a man, he compells him the learn bitter lessons. He sends him to school to the necessities rather than the graces, that, by knowing all sufferings, he may know the eternal consolation.

There's a hush before the tempest,
But that hush is the hush of fear,
And the heart of the world is trembling,
For the day of the Lord is near.
I hear the beat of the tide of time,
And restless its throbbings be,
And its wavelets dash with a rythm sublime
On the shores of eternity.

Revelation is not designed to satisfy our intellectual doubts as to spiritual processes. Our understanding is too contracted to receive full satisfaction. Space and time place limits upon the mind. This present is a probationary state. Sufficient knowledge is given to make duty binding.—Jas. Foster.

THE MOTHER.

Sweet is the image of the brooding dove—
Holy as heaven a mother's tender love!
The love of many prayers, and many tears,
Which changes not with declining years—
The only love, which on this teeming earth,
Asks no return for passion's wayward birth!

Love him that first loved you, and while you sink into his arms, and surrender all to him, with a joyful, absolute self-renunciation, let this confiding love swell and abound, till every figment of distrust shall be swept away. For against every challenge, in time or eternity, this may be your rejoinder: "He that spareth not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all; how shall he not, with him, also freely give us all things?"—J. W. Alexander.

The Lord will reward the toil of to-day.
Each earnest thought, and each heart-felt prayer,
Eternity's wealth shall thy efforts repay,
A crown of rejoicing awaits thee there.
The seed has been sown; but more can fall
What good from its sowing may spring;
Whether by wayside unheeded it fell,
Or a bountiful fruitage shall bring:
Not till the Lord of the harvest shall come
To gather his sheaves of grain;
Not till he taketh his own once home,
Never to sorrow and toil again.

PERSECUTIONS OF THE JEWS.

PRUSSIA.—A fresh movement has broken out against the Jews in West Prussia. A mob led by a schoolteacher has wrecked the houses of some Jews, and maltreated their inmates.

ST. PETERSBURG.—Serious disturbances, originating in the superstition of the peasantry regarding the Jewish Passover rites, have occurred at Elizabethgard, in the government of Kherson. A mob destroyed the synagogue. Many rioters were killed by the troops, which were summoned to repress the riot.

VIENNA.—The Presse says a merchant of Lemberg received a telegram from Kieff, to-day, stating that the whole Jewish quarter, known as Podol, has been burned. The damage is estimated at 80,000,000 roubles. Crowds of refugee Jews are crossing the Austrian frontier at Podwolczyska.

Monitory.

Give Them Now.

If you have gentle words and looks, my friends,
To spare for me, if you have tears to shed
That I have suffered, keep them not, I pray,
Until I hear not, see not, being dead.

If you have flowers to give—fair lily buds,
White roses, daisies, meadow-stars, that be Mine own dear namesakes—let them smile, and make
The air, while yet I breathe it, sweet for me.

For loving looks, though fraught with tenderness,
And kindly tears, though they fall thick and fast,
And words of praise, alas! can naught avail
To lift the shadow from a life that's past.

And sweet blossoms, what can they suffice
Offered to one who can no longer gaze
Upon their beauty? Flowers in coffins laid
Impart no sweetness to departed days.

Golden Rule.

Source of Personal Beauty.

A beautiful person is the natural form of a beautiful soul. The mind builds its own house. The soul takes precedence of the body, and shapes the body to its own likeness. A vacant mind takes all the meaning out of the fairest face. A sensual disposition deforms the handsomest features. A cold, selfish heart shrivels and distorts the best looks. A mean, grovelling spirit takes all the dignity out of the figure and all the character out of the countenance. A cherished hatred transforms the most beautiful lineaments into an image of ugliness. It is as impossible to preserve good looks with a brood of bad passions feeding on the blood, a set of low loves tramping through the heart, and a selfish, disdainful spirit enthroned in the will, as to preserve the beauty of an elegant mansion, with a litter of swine in the basement; a tribe of gypsies in the parlor and vultures in the upper part.

"The Lord Knoweth Them that are His."

Who knows them? The Lord, the omnipotent Creator and Governor of all things. Whom does he know? His—his people, his chosen people, his adopted children. He knows their wants, dangers, trials, and sufferings. He pities, loves, and defends them. Though mingling with thousands, though languishing in solitude, though oppressed with poverty, scorned by the world, and sinking in death, he knows them. Precious truth! How full of meaning! Who can tell how much it involves? Come what will upon us, it comes not unbidden. It goes not, till it has accomplished its object, refined our spirits, and prepared us for rich tokens of grace.

Does the Lord know us? Then what do we care about being known by the world? Let others sigh for this distinction. It is enough for us that we know God, or rather are known of God. Here is honor and glory. Who can tell of a nobler ancestry, of rarer associates, or a richer inheritance? Titles must perish, kingdoms must vanish, and crowns must lose their lustre, but God knows us. What then? Why, then we shall know even as we are known.

Beauty of Forgiveness.

"How beautiful falls
From human lips that blessed word, forgive."

If there is anything which has power to bind the heart of man with a firm, enduring affection, it is forgiveness, called forth by meek, sincere, unconditional repentance. Every one of us, however short our lives and slight our experience, can perhaps remember when, having done injustice to some one near and dear, pardon has been implored, and forgiveness readily and affectionately granted—can remember, I say, the magic with which it swept away any lingering trace of alienated feeling, and bound with renewed strength every sentiment of regard and esteem. The faculty of forgiving and receiving forgiveness, is one of the finest in human nature. It is the main point in every noble, every refined and elevated character. Dark, sinister men, can never forgive, and the consciousness of being forgiven is sufficient to rouse their darkest passions.

If a man wishes to live a peaceful, rational life, he must call forgiveness often into action; and he will find it has the magic of a charm to allay bitterness, reconcile all differences, dispel all those petty quarrels which so often embitter the intercourse of even good men. It is the glorious element in God's government over man, as well as an essential, life-giving principle of the plan of redemption. It is the leading feature of Holy Writ, and finds an ardent, sincere response of every high-minded man. It is the strongest link in the chain that binds the heart of every Christian to his Lord and Master. It is the consciousness of being forgiven, that awakens all the noblest emotions of his soul, and rouses his dormant energies to active service in the cause of his Redeemer.

Forgiveness from God or man, lays an individual under obligations that, to a sensitive, delicate mind, are anything but unpleasant or humiliating. A certain degree of pride of character is far from being reprehensible—it gives force and dignity; but the pride that cannot ask forgiveness, is obstinacy, is stubbornness, and the mind that will not melt and subdue, must be dead to all that is noble, destitute of all that is noble, destitute of all that assimilates to divinity, and fiendish enough for pandemonium itself. Could the world be induced to enter upon the practice of forgiveness, its use would soon be obviated, and the millennium dawn upon us in all its splendor and glory.

Let us, then, remember, that as in the ocean the greatest commotion is produced by the action of small particles one upon another, so we, although insignificant members of an extensive community, are constantly coming in contact one with another, and transmitting our thoughts, feelings, and opinions. And however our feelings may be injured, our characters assailed, our tempers vexed and tried, let us remember, it is God-like to forgive.—Fletcher.

An epidemic disease of a peculiarly deadly nature, which carries off cattle and horses by the thousands, and claims also its human victims yearly among the population of the capital, has made its appearance in more than one district of the province of St. Petersburg and Novgorod, and is spreading with alarming rapidity. The local authorities are helpless, owing partly to the want of efficient doctors and veterinary surgeons; and partly to the fatalistic tendencies of the peasants, who, trusting all to Providence, refuse precaution, and sell in the neighboring villages the skins of the beasts that have died of the disease.

DETROIT, Mich., August 8.—Elder James White, the founder of the Seventh-Day Adventists, died Saturday at Battle Creek, aged 60 years. He was a direct descendant of Peregrine White, the first white child born of the Pilgrim fathers.

During the last two nights the President's condition has not been as favorable as his surgeons could wish, and the conclusion was that there was an obstruction in the channel of the wound. This morning, August 8, they made another incision, giving the wound a new channel for drainage. The operation was performed in the presence of all the six attending and consulting surgeons, and was entirely successful, the President bearing it well, and at last accounts was in good condition.

Life takes its hues in a great degree from the color of our mind. We reap as we sow; if we are loving, we reap love; if cold and cautious, we harvest the same crop; but if frank and generous, the world treats us kindly. We must do as we'd be done by, or a lonely unloved life will be ours. There is no place like home and among one's immediate associates to sow the good seed.

God makes the earth bloom with roses that we may not be discontented with our sojourn here. He also makes it bear thorns that we may learn to look for something better beyond.

Brevities.

The English Committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund has asked Lieutenant Conder to get a cast of the Siloam inscription in plaster of Paris made and sent to England as quickly as possible.

Some additional antiquities have arrived at the British Museum. Among the most interesting are sundry contract tablets found at Babylon, dated in the fifth year of Antigonus, and the eighth year of Alexander IV., or Ægus, to whom the canon of Ptolemy attributes twelve years, while historians have only credited him with a reign of six.

The work of raising a fund for the printing of books in raised letters for the blind is steadily progressing in Boston, says the Literary World, and about $25,000 has already been secured, which is one-third of the amount needed. With $75,000 a dozen books can be added to the list yearly. The price of a Bible printed in this way is $20. About 100 volumes in raised letters are now accessible to the blind.

Dr. Schliemann, the foreign explorer, now in Berlin superintending his collections, has received the very unusual title of "Honorary Citizenship," Prince Bismarck and General von Moltke being the only other living personages on whom it has been conferred. Dr. Schliemann has recently returned from a journey through the Troad, and especially the Ida Mountains, where he claims to have discovered the altar of Zeus.

We read that letters were sent from Mecca in 1880 to all Mohammedan countries, appealing to the sentiment of the brotherhood uniting all Mussulmans; declaring that Islam was threatened with complete destruction; that England was mistress of India, France of Algeria, and Russia of Turkistan; and it therefore behooved Mohammedans to awake and everywhere throw off the Christian dominion.

The leader who is now stirring up the Moslems to make a final fight for Islam, is called Bou-Amena. He is a splendid orator, and a skillful leader of Arab bands. He is a master of the peculiar Arab tactics. When he arrives suddenly upon a tribe he presents himself at first as a friend, and tells them that Allah has sent him to them for their earthly and heavenly salvation. The hour long appointed by Allah has struck, and if the tribe joins him in his war upon the infidel it will see the triumph of the Crescent. Every one who falls in battle will go straight to Paradise, where he will receive a seraglio with seventy thousand houris! The Arab tribes are both credulous and suspicious. If they accept the gospel of "The Nameless One," their wives, children and goods are packed upon the camels, and their flocks follow the insurgent leader. If they decline, a razzia is ordered, and the cattle of the tribe are carried off in the name of Allah.

THE CHILCAT METEOR.

The State Mining Bureau of California has lately come into possession of the meteorite found among the Alaska Indians by Mr. John Muir. The meteor was seen to fall, it is said, by the father of one of the oldest Indians in Chilcat, over a hundred years ago, and was afterwards sought out and carried to his hut in triumph. Through the co-operation of the Northwest Trading Company, the Mining Bureau succeeded in conducting negotiations for its purchase; and for a consideration which seems meager as Esau's mess of pottage in the eyes of scientists, the State of California acquired clear title to the meteor, and it arrived in the city, June 24. This aerolite is exceedingly irregular in shape, and the projecting points are as bright as if they had been burnished. A succession of nut-shaped hollows, which cover the entire surface, give it an exceedingly curious aspect, and its fantastic contour looks almost as if it had been moulded by some unknown power into the shape of the head of a strange beast. It weighs a hundred pounds or upward, and has been christened, in honor of the locality from which it was procured, "Chilcat Meteor."

A prediction of the comet which has lately appeared in June, and which is now vanishing, was published two hundred years ago in a small book, the work of Demetrio L'Ardotifai, the celebrated astronomer of Northern Italy, published in Cremona in 1683. In that portion of it devoted to the description of comets he says (in the 5th chapter): "Wherefore, whence these erratic luminaries come and whither they go none can tell, and least of all can I, who am but a poor mortal, seeking to learn what I may of the wonders of creation. The comet we lately saw in the heavens for the space of twelve nights has gone, never to return in our lifetime. I gather from the writings of great men, long since dead, that this same fiery messenger was seen in 1481, during the reign of John of Mantua, and was accompanied by floods, tempests, and earthquakes, and a universal war of the elements. It will not again revisit the earth till 1881, but whether it be thus followed by floods and calamities or not I cannot tell." It will be seen, therefore, that the forecasts of this illustrious man have been verified to the letter. Mr. Adalbert Mostyn, F. S. A., of Winterton, Lurgon, has the book referred to.

OBITUARY.

DIED—At Liberty, N. C., Sister Mary Freeman.

She was among the first to believe and obey the truth when it was first preached in the rugged mountains of North Carolina. She hesitated not but like an honest, noble-hearted woman, put on Christ in baptism, lived a consistent Christian four years, fell asleep in Jesus in full assurance of a speedy resurrection to life and immortality.

Her hope was expressed in these words: I shall arise in the morning of the resurrection and put on immortality.

She leaves six little children, their condition is motherless and poor. Who will care for these helpless little ones? The father, poor man, God bless him, sends a request for us to come and preach a funeral discourse, but we are old and infirm, and a long distance from them. It would be our pleasure to do so, but the journey is too great. God bless the father and the little ones, and the church of God at Liberty.

Death, with all his cruel works will soon be destroyed; then there will be no more calls for funeral sermons, no more weeping and mourning for loved ones. Our work is with the living, we say to one and all, get ready, and keep ready.

A word to the churches we have been instrumental in planting in the mountains: Be strong, quit yourselves like men. The conflict rages fiercely, work while it is day; it will soon be over, a day of rest awaits the faithful servants of God.

We would be glad to visit you once more and talk of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God and the name of the Anointed One, but this can not be expected at our advanced age. We say again, God bless you, and bless you abundantly, is the prayer of your old pilgrim brother.

NEWELL BUND.

DIED—April 25, 1881, at her home in the township of Barton, Newaygo Co., Mich., Emeline Davis, aged 40 years.

She suffered one week with typhoid fever. Leaves a husband and three children, and a large circle of friends to mourn. She was a daughter of Mrs. E. J. Richardson, one of the subscribers to THE RESTITUTION. Sister Davis was baptized about 1858, and has been a believer in the Abrahamic faith all these years, and although residing much of the time where she has not had church society of believers, was a consistent Christian, looking for the coming of Jesus.

BOOK NOTICES.

CHAMBERS'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA.—This great work, advertised from week to week in our paper, and in many others, is certainly worthy of the unstinted expressions of praise that it receives on every hand. Its rank in this species of literature was enviable as first issued to the public for acceptance, but its full and satisfactory treatment of American subjects in the late form now published by the American Book Exchange, enhances the value of the work to a degree that renders it indispensable to the student and general reader. Let all those who want a library of universal knowledge purchase this work which is now, by its cheapness, brought within the reach of all.

The first number of a new paper entitled Wilford's Literary Microcosm, comes to hand just as this number of THE RESTITUTION is about in type. One leading feature of this journal "will be the discussion of religio-scientific and philosophical topics which may tend to throw light upon man's origin, nature, and destiny." Published by Hall & Co., 132 E. Eighth street, N. Y., Monthly at 50c. a year. Specimen free.

From Brother Burbank we have received a tract of about thirty pages—Testimony of Moses concerning the First Man, Adam. This tract merits perusal as it contributes some important particulars of information to inquirers after knowledge on the origin and destiny of man. A copy may be obtained for 5c. by addressing Y. H. Burbank, 110 Ainsley street, Brooklyn (E. D.) N. Y.

Poetry.

OUT LOST.

The look of sympathy, the gentle word,
Spoken so low that only angels heard;
The secret act of pure self-sacrifice,
Unseen by men, but marked my angels' eyes—
These are not lost.

The sacred music of a tender strain,
Wrung from a poet's heart by grief and pain,
And chanted fluidly, with doubt and fear,
To busy crowds who scarcely pause to hear—
These are not lost.

The silent tears that fell at dead of night
Over soiled robes, that once were pure and white;
The prayers that rise like incense from the soul,
Longing for Christ to make it clean and whole—
These are not lost.

The happy dreams that gladdened all our youth,
When dreams had less of self and more of truth;
The childhood's faith so it — Jew sweet,
Which sat like Mary at the feet—
These are not lost.

The kindly plans devised for others' good
So seldom guessed, so little understood;
The quiet, steadfast love that strives to win
Some wanderer from the ways of sin—
These are not lost.

Not lost, O Lord, in thy city bright
Our eyes shall see the past by clearer light.
And things long hidden from our gaze below
Then will reveal, and we shall surely know
These are not lost.

WATCH.

NEWELL BOND.

Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh.—Matt. xxiv. 44.

"Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," so says Daniel Webster.

Constant, faithful, and untiring watchfulness is the price of the kingdom of God; couldest thou not watch one hour?

Watchfulness means much. The result of watchfulness secures an eternal inheritance in the kingdom of God. The Master would not have uttered the words of our text, and repeated them so often, had they not been of infinite importance to his people.

A clear illustration of the importance of watching is given in the case of Elijah and Elisha in 2 Kings ii. It will pay to study the narrative carefully, under the consideration of type and antitype.

It is a conceded point that Elijah is a type, or representative of the living saints that will be upon the earth when Christ shall come for his people. There are several things contained in this narrative of deep interest to us who have believed and obeyed the gospel, and are expecting the coming of Christ to gather his elect, and to reward every one according as his work shall be.

The first point in the narrative is that Elijah was made sensible of or understood what was about to take place, and the manner in which it was to be done; and that Elisha understood it, and the sons of the prophets that were at Jericho understood it also; from the fact that Elijah knew, and Elisha knew, and the sons of the prophets knew, we argue the point that the dear watching waiting saints of God will know a short time previous to their rapture what is about to take place.

It is not stated how, or by what means they will obtain their knowledge, nor does it seem necessary—to us. It seems very reasonable that the poor, way-worn pilgrims, that have been struggling hard with adversity, faint and worn and weary, should have a premonition that their toils are at an end, and that they are to be eternally free; the saying of the Savior—"of that day and hour"—we think does not apply to, or militate against the view we have advanced. We do not advance this as an excuse for the foolish virgins to procrastinate. By no manner of means; but, for the opposite, as we think is clearly shown in the case under consideration.

The blessing Elisha was so intent upon obtaining, depended upon his seeing his Master as he went up. No consideration could induce him for a moment to give up his object. When told by the sons of the prophets "know ye not that your master is to be taken away from your head to-day?" he answered very sharply, "I know it; hold ye your peace."

What a noble example for the dear saints to emulate! When the world, the flesh, and the devil combine to draw us aside from the consummation of our blessed hope.

God gave Noah seven days' notice of the coming deluge, Noah, moved with fear, had prepared the ark for the saving of himself and his household, so says St. Paul. What kind of fear? Not slavish or servile fear; but filial, holy, affectionate fear, such as a dutiful, obedient child has for a loving parent, who has no feelings or motives for his children but of the purest kind.

God's care and God's love for his children, purchased by the blood of his dear Son, cannot be estimated or damned; like as a Father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth those that fear him. Anything that God can do for the comfort and benefit of his children, consistent with his justice, we have the fullest assurance will be done.

Everything depends upon our watchfulness, and obedience in getting ready and keeping in a prepared condition; as in the type so in the antitype, as an illustration: A man cannot be ready to take the cars unless he is on the platform with satchel in hand. Query, Would the chariots of fire and the horsemen of fire have waited for Elijah if he had not been ready? I trow not.

Many Christians act just as though God was under obligation to wait for them, yea and to coax them. Yea more, that he will use some secret irresistable force or power that they cannot resist. He not deceived. What a man sows that shall he also reap. We greatly fear that upon this point, many will make a fatal mistake—many are drawing and will endeavor to draw consolation from the half-loaf, or fair-chance theory. If they cannot have a through ticket on a palace car, they will accept a second. Take off the figure, if they cannot go to the kingdom as joint rulers with Christ, and take along their worldly wealth, they will take or accept the position as subjects. This may do for Universalists, but it is precarious ground to stand upon. How many will be found in that day to have deceived themselves, and like the king of Israel, have played the fool!

Much has been said and done about navigating the air, but all has been a failure. We have not a particle of faith in the inventions of men to accomplish it. Poor mortal man is a creature of earth. He was made of earth, he belongs to earth, it is his native element; he will never soar above it, unless quickened by immortality, and made like unto the angels. The first man is of the earth—was made a living soul by breathing or inhaling the breath of life; the second man, the Lord from heaven, was made a quickening spirit, by the spirit of holiness through a resurrection from the dead. When men are made immortal through the same process that Christ, our living head, was, we will be able to traverse the air with ease, and with the velocity of electricity.

Could the children of men see and realize what (God, through the Lord Jesus Christ, proposes to do with and for them, there would be no necessity for the servants of God to be urging and entreating them to watchfulness, and to make the necessary preparation to step on board Elijah's chariots of fire at a moment's notice.

The subject under consideration is one of infinite moment, and we are greatly exercised in mind how we shall best present it to our fellowmen.

Procrastination is the thief of time; no occasion for alarm, a little more sleep, a little more slumber; we see no special signs that indicate any immediate change; truly we are having very prosperous times, the crisis is passed, hard times are over, crops are abundant, business is good, money is plenty, we have the best currency in the known world, we are at peace with the whole world; surely that man must be a hair-brain fanatic who would predict any evil under such a prosperous state of condition of things as we the American people are enjoying.

Since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the foundation of the world. But hark! for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh.

The poet touches this point very graphically:

"At midnight it is proclaimed 'this pomp will be!'
From solid darkness—emblem as the spark
From million steel—from nitrous grain the blaze—
Man starting from his couch shall sleep no more!"

From all we can learn of the coming of Christ for his people it will be sudden, silent, and, to the outer world, unexpected, and from certain utterances of the Spirit, it will be in the stillness of the night; two in one bed, the one taken, the other left.

Dear unconverted friend, do you ever reflect what frantic fears will seize your trembling heart when you awake in the morning and find your dear Godly companion gone? and where are such and such dear neighbors? they were good people; we esteemed them highly. They were the salt of the earth, what has become of them? Pray what has happened?

As in the type they will propose, as did the fifty prophets, a thorough search, but it will be fruitless; they will be taken away from the evil to come, and are safe with Jesus in the secret chamber. Isa. xxvi. 20. It will be a nine days' wonder. It will soon wear off; the judgments to be executed upon the wicked will increase rapidly and fearfully, men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth, and to stand before the Son of Man.

Dear reader this is no fancied picture or visionary sketch. Every point we have made can be fully sustained, and abundantly proven, by the plain, and positive declarations of the Bible. These are the sayings of Moses and the prophets, of Christ and the apostles; if they will not believe them neither would they believe though one arose from the dead.

The reader's careful attention is requested to the firmness of Elisha. He was three times requested by Elijah to tarry behind while he went forward, he would not listen for a moment, the blessing depended upon seeing his master as he went up. The sons of the prophets at Bethel and at Jericho, interrogate him, seemingly to draw his mind from his fixed purpose, but he is as firm as a rock. They pass on together, and come to Jordan. Elijah took his mantle and wrapped it together, and smote the waters, and they were divided hither and thither, so they went over dry-shod.

This is not the first time the waters of Jordan obey the voice of God's prophets. There is a power in that mantle of the old prophet; Elisha uses it effectually after his master is taken from him.

The last test is put to the young prophet. He complies, and proves himself equal to the task, and secures the prize.

Oh! that we may be as successful and thus secure the gift of eternal life. But in order to be ready for such an important event, we must first get ready, and this can only be done by hearing the gospel—good news—of the kingdom, believe and obey it by being baptized into the name of the Holy Ones for the remission of sins, and arise to walk in newness of life, by adding all the Christian graces, and keeping all God's commandments. This cannot be done without a sacrifice, there will be cutting off right hands and plucking out eyes; if he becomes a new man in Christ Jesus, and is intelligent in the faith, he will do and act as did Christ and his apostles, and the early Christians; it will not do to pattern after modern professors, for the masses are only hearers and not doers of the word.

What a sad picture does modern Christianity present, when placed beside the lives and teaching of Christ, the apostles and the early church! What sacrifices, what labors, what holy, Godly living; what perils, what afflictions, what self-denials, how fearful of offending their Lord, and the members of the body of Christ; how careful in their manner of living—each found in each a brother, dearly beloved in the Lord. Their meetings or coming together for worship was first to break bread. One had a hymn, one a doctrine, etc., the elders instructed and edified the church; certain selected or chosen ones were sent out to evangelize, they were responsible to the body that sent them out. But how changed the whole arrangement—and do you think, dear reader, it is for the better or for the worse? One thing is an admitted fact, that there is less piety in the church now than there was seventy-five years ago; it will be well to compare notes.

First the doctrines, the great motive power held out by the apostles to induce men to become Christians, was the kingdom and coming of Christ to raise the dead, change the living saints to immortality and to reign on the earth.

What is the motive preached now? Eternal sin and suffering in fire and brimstone; that men have immortal souls; that is the man proper, it goes to heaven or hell at death, and enters upon its reward even before it is judged or sentenced. Beautiful consistency. Take any doctrine held by the sects, and you will find it at variance with the reading of the Bible. Take the customs and the practices of the members, their manner of life, their business habits, compare with the early church. You will find that the whole head is sick, the whole heart is faint, nothing but wounds, bruises and putrifying sores.

This is a sad picture, but is it not a true one? Lamentably so indeed. What proportion of the church members, think you, would hail with joy and delight the coming of Christ with power and great glory to take away his dear, watching, waiting children?

Watch, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh.

Dearly beloved, I know not what more to say to you, or our unconverted neighbors and friends. I have written plainly and tried to make it as clear as possible, and must leave the result with him whom I am, and whom I try to serve and honor, praying that both the writer and those that read may be wise unto salvation, through faith in Christ.

Washington, D. C.

Editor Restitution:

Since my sight has so failed that I am unable to distinguish one letter, I seldom attempt to write, but if you will bear with me I would like to say a few words upon a subject that has for years possessed a constantly abiding and ever increasing interest: The high and holy nature of our calling here in this world, the necessity of our living more in the present and less in the future, of being Christlike in all our ways. That by simple childlike obedience to the word of truth in all things, Christ is formed in us, "the hope of glory."

It is not enough that we have learned and understand quite clearly much of the mechanism of God's beautiful plan of salvation, and that we have put on the Lord Jesus, by being baptized into his name, but we must abide in him, must walk in him constantly, must be dead to the world and alive unto God, confidently placing our hand in the hand of the Almighty Father, glad to be permitted to follow the teaching of his word in every act of our lives. You and me, I think all of us, have felt the need of a higher and holier plane upon which we should constantly live.

If we are his witnesses, the world judges of our dear Lord by our actions, and if we have entered into a "fellowship" or partnership with the all-loving Father and the dear Savior, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness. We must perfect ourselves by obeying the entire truth of God's word.

What a comfort and secure resting-place it is to earth's sorrow stricken child to know he has a share in that co-partnership.

Although as valiant soldiers we are required to perform each duty faithfully, the Helper is ready to assist in every time of need, and when the waves of affliction roll heavily upon us, how often have we been lovingly carried across their foaming depths, and I know of a truth that the Lord is my Helper.

When I look into the mirror of truth and see my shortcomings, I do not wonder that the man that had not on the wedding garment was speechless. We know the high privilege which is for us. Are we living up to them? Have we on the wedding garment? Are we truly "waiting for the Bridegroom? The five virgins with lamps trimmed and burning went forth together. Are we as a body and as individuals ready to meet earth's coming King?

REPORT OF LABORS.

J. S. HATCH.

I left home June 23, for Michigan. Stopped at Three Oaks, and met Samuel Andrews, went to his house, near which the brethren had erected a grove for meeting. Commenced Friday evening, and on Sunday afternoon they organized, having twelve members. Made the acquaintance of some new brethren at that point. Closed the meeting on Monday night.

Went from there to brother Merwin's near the St. Joseph river. Held meeting two nights in the town hall, and Sunday in a grove on the river bank. Good turnout, and a good meeting.

From there returned to our state. Came to Bremen, and thence to the Roose neighborhood. Held meetings two nights in the school house, and on Sunday went to a house three miles away. Returned and had meeting at a private house in the evening. One addition. Held meeting three nights at the school house, with good interest, notwithstanding the warm weather and busy season.

From there went to Macy, and began meeting on Friday night. Had a grove meeting Sunday. A good turnout and good attention. This is the home of brethren Fenimore, Cordill and others.

From there home. Found all well. There is much to do and few to do the work. All who can work in the field should be at it. The harvest is great and laborers few.

God calls his servants to no duty for which he does not equip them. If he does not now give the power to work miracles, it is because there are no exigencies for which they are required.

One bad example spoils many good precepts.

The Child in the Woods.

TO FLORA CLOVER.

S. ROXANA WIXON.

Happy child! hast been to-day,
Where the breezy Aspens play,
Winding through the woodland bowers,
Wearing wreaths of rosy flowers?
Cheered, by hum of noisy bees,
Flitting o'er the forest trees,
Seeking marshy lands below,
Where the oakland willows grow?

How thy soul with music stirred,
At the song of mocking-bird!
As thy playmate deftly wound,
Cowslip's gold, thy tresses round?
And the startled echoes rang,
At the minute song she sang,
Where Heaven's light racetrace,
Through the feathery foliage gleams?

What sweet lessons, merry child,
Did'st thou learn it, forest wild?
What did flower, and bird, and bee,
Or their secrets, tell to thee?
What did whisper, blades of grass,
As thy quick steps by them passed?
Kneeling on the grassy sod,
Were thine eyes upturned to God?

Did the Aspen's trembling leaf
Breathe a Savior's dying grief?
Or did lowly Arum bud,
Show the faint blots of His blood?
Saw'st thou lessons that He taught
In the bright-hued lilies wrought?
Or violeted in the dewy rose,
Did Sharon's lovely sights repose?

In the singing forest lands,
Did'st thou see creative hands?
Heard'st how God, who feeds the birds
Listens to thy prayerful words?
If He cloth the sparrow feed,
Will he not supply thy need?
If He clothe the flowerets wild
Can He e'er forget the child?

Trust Him, heart like, gentle girl,
As the swift years onward whirl!
Let his love a light be made,
All thy fall'ring steps to aid;
Comfort, in thy grief to yield,
Be His word thy strength and shield,
Binding, in the bloom of youth,
Fast thy soul to God and truth.

And these lessons, learned to-day,
Will never vanish quite away;
The mossy banks and shaded bowers,
And dainty wreaths of laughing flowers,
Will wave a wand, in coming years,
Athwart the thorny path of tears;
Till thy fainting footsteps come,
To the fadeless light of Home!

Edward Irving and the Children.

When Edward Irving was at the height of his power as an orator in London, some ladies, who had established an infant-school in the district of Billingsgate, and were unsuccessful in persuading the people to send their children to it, applied to him to help them. He immediately consented, and went with them through the district. In the first house he allowed the ladies to explain their errand, and they did it very offensively to the poor, so full of condescension and patronage was their manner. In the second house, Irving took the place of spokesmen upon himself.

"When the door was opened, he spoke in the kindest tone to the woman who opened it, and asked permission to go in. He then explained the intention of the ladies, asked how many children she had, and whether she would send them. A ready consent was the result; and the mother's heart was completely won when the visitor took one of her little ones on his knee, and blessed her."

The ladies who were engaged in this work were horrified.

"Why, Mr. Irving," exclaimed one of the ladies when they got to the street, "you spoke to that woman as if she was doing you a favor, and not you conferring one on her! How could you speak so? and how could you take up that child on your knee?"

"The woman," he replied, "does not as yet know the advantages which her children will derive from your school; and by and by she will know them, and own her obligations to you; and in so speaking and in blessing her child I do but follow the example of our Lord, who blessed the little ones, the lambs of his flock."

Edward Irving's conception of a child is given in these words—"a glorious bud of being."

He had a high appreciation of a child. He saw grand possibilities hidden away in its undeveloped capacities. He saw the promise of a new world in its being devoted to God, and blessed by Christ. But we must not forget this:—

Irving, like Tyrtæus, was a seer.

And might not all be seers if they would only do as he did, accept Christ's estimate of children?

There must be something like an adequate conception of the value of the child to awaken in us the sense of importance there is in every act done for it.

A Few Words of Exhortation.

To the young sisters I desire to say a few words concerning our apparel. Let us see what Paul says to Timothy (II. 9):—

"In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with braided hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array."

I think that some of us have gone a little astray. The eyes of the Lord are in every place.

What if he should come and find us making silk dresses or buying costly hats or bashes? would we feel as if we were doing right?

Let us humble ourselves in the sight of our Lord. Let us watch and pray lest we enter into temptation. Let us see what Peter says about women—how they ought to be attired. I Peter iii. 3, 4:—

"Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price."

The spirit is willing but the flesh is weak. Some of us may wear a little gold and think 'tis no harm; but be ye not deceived.

Is it not the lust of the eyes?

I think that we ought not to spend our money for such things. Some of us may be situated in circumstances that will not permit us to quit right away. We may be poor and have pretty nice clothes, and have to wear them out, it might be better to overcome little by little, but let us never more get costly clothing to put on our poor mortal bodies, that fade and soon die. Let us examine our hearts, and try to root out pride, and let there be a difference between Christians and worldly people. Let us show by our behavior that we are not of the world. If ye were of the world, the world would love its own, says our Master. Let us try hard to stand against the wiles of the devil, as it is a great day of trial, and let us confess our sins to our Master, as he will forgive us if we but confess our many sins and imperfections. Let us beware lest we fall back.

Let us see what John says (I John ii. 15–17):—

"Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of his eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."

And having food and raiment let us be content. O, brethren, let us pray for each other, that we may be able to stand fast, not falling from our steadfastness.

"Flee also youthful lusts: but follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace, with them that call on the Lord out of a pure heart." 2 Tim. ii. 22.

Let us not be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; from such we must turn away. And let us try hard to win the crown of life. Let us love one another with tender love—not lovers of money as some—and may we be accounted worthy to be accepted. May we fight the good fight and keep the faith, and a crown of life will be given us in that great day.

I have an afflicted mother and many things to bear. She has had a life of suffering and sore trials. But I reckon that the suffering of this life is nothing to be compared with the glory that is to be given to the saints if they prove faithful.

Let us cleave to that which is good.

Palmos, O.

[Our young sister writes that she is but fourteen years of age, and that this is her first effort in writing anything for publication.—ED. RESTITUTION.]

An Old Story.

Many years ago a celebrated Italian artist was walking along the streets of his native city, perplexed and despondING in consequence of some irritating circumstances of misfortune, when he beheld a little boy of such surpassing beauty that he forgot his own trouble and gloom in looking upon the almost angel face before him.

"That face I must have," said the artist, "for my studio. Will you come to my room and sit for a picture, my little man?"

The little boy was glad to go and see the pictures and pencils and curiosities in the artist's room; and he was much more pleased when he saw what seemed to be another boy looking just like him smiling from the artist's canvas.

The artist took great pleasure in looking at that sweet face. When he was troubled, or irritated, or perplexed, he lifted his eyes to that lovely image on the wall, and its beautiful features and expression calmed his heart and made him happy again. Many a visitor to his studio wished to purchase that lovely face; but, though poor, and often wanting money to buy food and clothes, he would not sell his good angel, as he called his portrait.

So the years went on, oftentimes as he looked upon the glowing canvas he wondered what had become of the boy.

"How I should like to see how he looks now! I wonder if I should know him? Is he a good man, true or wicked and abandoned? Or has he died and gone to a better land?"

One day the artist was strolling down one of the fine walks of the city, when he beheld a man whose face and mien were so vicious, so depraved, so almost fiend-like, that he involuntarily stopped and gazed at him.

"What a spectacle! I should like to paint that figure, and hang it in my studio opposite the angel-boy," said the artist to himself.

The young man asked the painter for money, for he was a beggar as well as a thief.

"Come to my room, and let me paint your portrait, and I will give you all you ask," said the artist.

The young man followed the painter and sat for a sketch. When it was finished, and he had received a few coins for his trouble, he turned to go; but his eye rested on the picture of the boy; he looked at it, turned pale, and then burst into tears.

"What troubles you, man?" said the painter. It was long before the young man could speak, he sobbed aloud, and seemed pierced with agony.

At last he pointed up to the picture on the wall, and in broken tones which seemed to come from a broken heart, he said:—

"Twenty years ago you asked me to come up here and sit for a picture, and the angel face is that portrait. Behold me now, a ruined man; so bloated, so hideous that women and children turn their faces from me; so fiend-like that you want my picture to show how ugly a man can look. Ah! I see now what vice and crime have done for me."

The artist was amazed. He could not believe his own eyes and ears.

"How did this happen?" he asked.

The young man told his sad and dreadful story; how, being an only son, and very beautiful, his parents petted and spoiled him; how he went with bad boys and learned all their bad habits and vices and came to love them; how, having plenty of money, he was enticed to wicked places till all was lost, and then, unable to work and ashamed to beg, he began to steal, was caught, and imprisoned with the worst criminals; came out more depraved to commit still worse crimes than before; how every bad deed he performed seemed to drive him to commit a worse one, till it seemed to him he could not stop till brought to the gallows.

It was a fearful tale, and brought tears into the artist's eyes. He besought the young man to stop, offered to help him, and tried his best to save him. But alas! it was too late. Disease, contracted by dissipation, soon prostrated the young man, and he died before he could reform.

The painter hung his portrait opposite that of the beautiful boy, and when visitors asked him why he allowed such a hideous looking face to be there he told them the story, saying as he closed, "between these angel eyes and demon there is only twenty years of vice."

The lesson of his tale is in the tale itself. You who read it can tell what it is. Think of it often, and heed it always.

There is nothing so high as to be above God's care, and nothing so lowly as to be beneath it. He who keeps alive the unquenchable light of the star visible to a hemisphere, kindles the small taper of the glowworm that gleams in the twilight on the mossy bank. He who piles up and loosens the Alpine avalanche, shapes the crystals of each falling snowflake. He who guides and bridles the storm wave that breaks in thunder upon the reef, preserves each invisible coral animal that builds its lime cell beneath the booming surf. He who sees from his glorious high throne the seraph veiling his face with his wings, takes note of the sparrow falling to the ground.

We cannot play at criticism, and be harmless; we cannot be censorious, and then retire on our respectability. Every bitter word you have spoken about man, woman, or child, has gone out to come back again, and will smite you some day. "With what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged; and in what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." This is a great law, and all human history is its exposition and justification.—Dr. Joseph Parker.

DEAD EGYPT.

Isaiah xix. 23.

HORATIUS BONAR.

Are thy pyramids still smiling
To the everlasting sun,
Mighty Mizraim of the sand-waste,
As they smiled in ages gone?

Is thy Sphinx still grandly gazing
With those melancholy eyes,
Drinking in delicious moonlight
From those silver-showering skies?

Does thy grey Mokattam cliff-range
Yet protect thy level shores?
Is that highway to the desert
Still as lonely as of yore?

Is the bronze on thy brown ripples
Still as brilliant as when she,
Stately queen of spells and splendor,
Gilded o'er her river-sea?

Does that river-sea so royal,
With its soft, slow-swelling tide,
Still its battle-dirge handed
With the wastes on either side?

Are thy Pharaohs resting yonder,
Filling each his funeral chamber,
With their calm stars above them,
As of old, without a cloud?

Do they still claim awful homage,
Oldest peerage of the dead,
In their chiselled shrines unconscious
Of the ages that have sped?

Does the breath of ancient odors
Sweeten still their cheerless tomb?
Do the robes of princely Pathos
Still adorn them in the gloom?

Is thy Memphis still the Memphis
Of young Mizraim when he came
From his cradle-plain of Shinar,
Here to build a boundless name?

Mystic realm of tragic story,
Never-changing clime and stream,
Shadowy fatherland of science,
Home of fable and of dream.

From thy temples marched the ages
Of our earth's unwritten prime;
There majestic Nahian portals
Are the unobliterated gates of time.

Buried dark beneath the relics
Of dead kingdoms thou hast lain;
But thy day of honor dawneth,
Thou shalt rise to youth again.

In his hour of infant exile,
Once the Son of God in thee
Found a refuge from the tyrant,
Under with thy sheltering tree.

And for this thou art remembered!
This great debt shall be repaid.
In earth's age of promised glory
Israel's God shall lift thy head.

The voice of seers hath spoken
Words of glorious light and rest:
It has blest thee, lonely Egypt!
And thou shalt—thou shalt be blest.

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT IN RELATION TO PROPHECY.

REV. WILLIAM MAUDE.

One great prophetic passage in which the English reader will derive much advantage from the uniform rendering of the Greek word ktisis, is Rom. viii. 18–23, which reads as follows:—

AUTHORIZED VERSION.

"For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us. For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God. For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope, because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And not only they, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to-wit, the redemption of our body."

REVISED VERSION.

"For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed to us-ward. For the earnest expectation of the creation waiteth for the revealing of the sons of God. For the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by reason of him who subjected it in hope that the creation (marg. 'in hope, because the creation') itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the kingdom of God. For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together (marg. 'with us') until now. And not only so, but ourselves also, which have the firstfruits of the Spirit, even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to-wit, the redemption of our body."

What reader of the Authorized Version could have apprehended the fact, that "the creature" which in "earnest expectation is waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God," is the self-same "creation" which has been "subjected to vanity in hope," and shall yet be "delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the sons of God?"

Of course the recognition of the fact that it is the same "creation" which is spoken of throughout, does not solve for us the exegetical difficulty as to what is precisely included in the word in this connection; whether it means mankind in general exclusive of the church, or mankind and the lower animals, or the whole animate and inanimate world in contradistinction to mankind. Be this as it may, however, the new reading gives both clearness and unity of meaning to the passage.

But besides this principal one, the reader will not fail to note several minor but not unimportant corrections in the passage as given in the Revised Version. In the first place, instead of "the glory which shall be revealed in us," we now read, "the glory which shall be revealed to us-ward." This brings the clause into harmony with the whole scope of the passage, which refers not to any subjective or spiritual glory within the church, but to an objective glory to be manifested in the world in connection with the glorification of the church in resurrection. All that follows being, in point of fact, only the development of the previous statement.

Again: the translation of the 20th verse: "For the creation was subjected to vanity, not of its own will, but by him who subjected it in hope that the creation (marg. 'in hope, because the creation') itself also shall be delivered," etc., not only gives us a clue to the true meaning of the ktisis, but at the same time indicates, if we adopt the marginal rendering, the ground and nature of the hope expressed.

Another important passage of a prophetic character in which the corrections made in the Revised Version should be gratefully accepted, is 2 Thess. ii. 1–10—a passage, by the way, which has recently been the subject of our special consideration in these pages. It reads as follows:—

AUTHORIZED VERSION.

"Now we beseech thee, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means: for that day shall not come, except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition: who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God. Remember ye not, that, when I was yet with you, I told you these things? And now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time. For the mystery of iniquity doth already work; only he that now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming. Even him, whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish."

REVISED VERSION.

"Now we beseech you, brethren, touching the coming (marg. 'presence') of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together unto him; to the end that ye be not quickly shaken from your mind, nor yet be troubled, either by spirit, or by word, or by epistle as from us, as that the day of the Lord is now present; let no man beguile you in any wise; for it will not be, except the falling away come first, and the man of sin (marg. 'lawlessness') be revealed, the son of perdition, he that opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped (marg. 'that is an object of worship'); so that he sitteth in the temple (marg. 'sanctuary') of God, setting himself forth as God. Remember ye not, that when I was yet with you, I told you these things? And now ye know what restraineth to the end that he may be revealed in his own season. For the mystery of lawlessness doth already work; only there is one that restraineth now, until he be taken out of the way. And then shall be revealed the lawless one, whom the Lord Jesus shall slay with the breath of his mouth, and bring to nought by the manifestation of his coming (marg. 'presence'); even he whose coming (marg. 'presence') is according to the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders (marg. 'power and signs and wonders of falsehood'), and with all deceit of unrighteousness for them that are perishing."

In this one passage, it will be seen, we have no less than twenty-five alterations, very few of which can fairly be said to be unsilled for, while several are of great importance as elucidating the true meaning of the text. Indeed we think we could point out one or two additional alterations which, though the revisers have not made them, were much to be desired. Be that as it may, however, we would observe in the first place, that the substitution of the word "touching" for the unmeaning "by" of the Authorized Version, at the very commencement of the passage, clearly indicates the subject on which the apostle is about to write; that subject being "the coming, or presence, of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together unto him." Hence he says, "We beseech you, brethren, touching (i. e., in regard to) the coming," etc. The Thessalonian believers had, it appears, been led by some false teachers into a serious error in reference to this blessed hope.

And here, secondly, we find a still more important correction in the Revised Version. What the true nature of their error was, the Authorized Version not only fails to teach us, but actually raises a false issue by the words, "as that the day of Christ is at hand." There would have been nothing wrong in the Thessalonians believing that "the day of the Lord was at hand." What they were wrong in was in supposing that that solemnly-glorious day had actually set in, and this the corrected rendering clearly indicates: "As that the day of the Lord is now present."

Again—the insertion of the definite article twice in the third verse, where, instead of "a falling away," and "that man of sin," we now read, "except the falling away come first, and the man of sin be revealed," does much to clear the apostle's meaning, intimating, as it does, that he refers to the great final apostasy of this dispensation and the coming of the last personal Antichrist. In reference to this latter event another decided improvement is the substitution of the reading, "that he may be revealed in his own season," for that of the Authorized Version, "that he may be revealed in his time." Nor must we overlook the correct rendering of the Greek word, anomos, of special significance in connection with the character of the last days, by the expressions, "the mystery of iniquity," and "that wicked," which now read, "the mystery of lawlessness," and "that lawless one."

But though our subject is far from being exhausted, we must, for the present, conclude these remarks, reserving the consideration of the alterations and emendations made in the Apocalypse for another paper. Meanwhile we earnestly commend the careful and prayerful study of the Revised Version of the New Testament to our readers, as a noble, conscientious, and on the whole trustworthy work, for which our deepest gratitude is due to its learned undertakers, reminding them, in the words of Dr. Roberts, that it is only to be expected that "at first not a few of the changes or omissions in the Revised Version should be felt to be disagreeable. The old familiar rhythm is disturbed, and the ear longs for the words to which it has been accustomed. But whether the true readings be deemed improvements or not, they should be welcomed simply on the ground of their genuineness. To find out what is true is the supreme object of Biblical science; and while, no doubt, there may often seem an artificial attractiveness about what is erroneous, there should always be felt a sovereign majesty in truth."

THE GREAT CRIME.

A. D. MAGRUDER.

"Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord hath not done it?"
"Man proposes but God disposes."

Referring to the attempted assassination of President Garfield the press and pulpit hasten to assure the people that they must not suppose that the nefarious act was the result of any Divine purpose—must not think, for a moment, that God had anything to do with it—that such a conclusion would be an impious affront to the Divine Majesty, who is too good and merciful thus to afflict a Christian people in the person of their great and good Chief Magistrate, etc.

Is it wise or safe to make such bold assertions as these in view of the oft-repeated lessons of human history and of God's dealings with mankind in past generations as recorded in the Bible?

We need not suppose that we are shut up to such conclusions because they seem to pass uncontradicted and are endorsed and accredited by the vast majority of our most learned scribes and doctors of divinity, for the Bible plainly declares that "God's ways are not as our ways; nor his thoughts as our thoughts, for as the heavens are high above the earth, so are his ways higher than our ways, and his thoughts higher than our thoughts"—that not a sparrow falleth to the ground without his knowledge—that we are of more value than many sparrows and, comprehensively, that "all things are of God" in whom we live and move and have our being.

To suppose that the Chief Magistrate of 50,000,000 responsible people should fall before the assassin's bullet—that the head of the nation should be smitten unto death, without the Divine cognizance and intervention—is to deny God's overweight of human affairs—and to give the world he has made over to blind chance and to forget his express declaration—that "promotion cometh neither from the east, nor from the west nor from the south. But God is the Judge: he putteth down one and setteth up another." Psa. lxxv.

Let us then await the sequel—and see what is to be the result of the attempt on the President's life, for the end is not yet—and future developments may throw light upon it—and disclose more fully than at present the lesson it inculcates.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NORTHERN INDIANA CONFERENCE.

The Annual Conference of the Churches of God in Northern Indiana will be held at Argos, Marshall Co., Ind., and will commence on Thursday, September 8, 1881, at 7:30 p. m., and continue Friday, Saturday, and Sunday the three days following. Public services will commence at 10:30 a. m., on Friday and other appointments will be made as shall be thought most advisable. A general attendance is requested, as the desire of our brethren, as has been expressed, is to have one more good meeting, at least, before the close of this dispensation. Argos is on the Michigan City, Peru, and Indianapolis railroad, eight miles south of Plymouth, the County-seat of Marshall County. Let it be our prayer that we may meet in the fulness of the gospel of Christ.

BY ORDER OF COMMITTEE.

I will preach as follows: At brother Duffin's the 3d Sunday in September, at Gospel Grove the next Sunday, at Dundee, Blackford Co., Ind., the next Sunday, in brethren Elton's neighborhood, south of Delta. O., the next Sunday, at Raisin, Mich., as brother L. C. Chase may appoint the next Sunday, at Buchanan, Mich., the following Sunday.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

The Church of God of Montague and Wise Counties, Texas, will hold their annual Conference at Valentine Springs in Montague County, commencing Friday, August 12, 1881, at four o'clock, P. M. The place of meeting is four miles south of Forestburg, sixteen miles south of St. Joe, sixteen miles southeast of Montaguetown, thirty miles west of Gainsville, and twenty miles north of Decatur. We invite every body that feels an interest in the word of God to come over. Brethren coming from a distance will go to brethren Hodges, Grimes, or Sowers, who live near the meeting place. We want all the preaching brethren we can get. Any preaching brother who can come will please address me at Sunset, Wise Co., Tex., and we will help him come.

T. T. DOYAL.

A Conference of the Church of God will be held five and one-half miles northwest of Morrill, Brown Co., Kan., and six miles south of Salem, Neb., commencing on Friday, Aug. 19, 1881, to continue over the following Sunday. Brother J. M. Stephenson and other preaching brethren are expected. An earnest invitation is extended to all the faithful ones to attend from the north, south, east, and west.

The Cyclopaedia War.

The month of July, 1881, witnesses the completion of the largest and most important literary work this country and the century have seen. It is the Library of Universal Knowledge, large type edition, in 15 large octavo volumes, containing 10 per cent more matter than Appleton's Cyclopædia, at less than one-fifth its cost, and 20 per cent more than Johnson's Cyclopædia, at a little more than one-fourth its cost.

Chambers's Encyclopædia, which forms the basis of the Library of Universal Knowledge (the last London edition of 1880 being reprinted verbatim as a portion of its contents), is the laborious product of the ripest British and European scholarship. It has developed through a century of Cyclopædia making; its various editions having been many times revised, in successive years, till it has come to be universally recognized, by those competent to judge, as standing at the very front of great aggregations of knowledge, and better adapted than any other Cyclopædia for popular use. It contains such full and important information as the ordinary reader, or the careful student, is likely to seek, upon about 25,000 subjects in every department of human knowledge. Chambers's Encyclopædia, however, is a foreign production, edited and published for a foreign market, and could not be expected to give as much prominence to American topics as American readers might desire. To supply these and other deficiencies a large corps of American editors and writers have added important articles upon about 15,000 topics, covering the entire field of human knowledge, bringing the whole number of titles under one alphabetical arrangement to about 40,000. Thus the work is thoroughly Americanized, and the Library of Universal Knowledge becomes at once the latest and most complete Encyclopædia in the field, at a mere fraction of the cost of any similar work which has preceded it.

Price of the 15 volumes, complete, in extra cloth binding, $15.00. In half Russia, sprinkled edges, $20.00. In half Russia, gilt top, $22.50. In full library sheep, marbled edges, $25.00.

The superlative value and importance of this great Encyclopædia lies especially in the fact that it is brought within the reach of every one who aspires after knowledge and culture. It is really a library of universal knowledge. It brings a liberal education easily within the reach even of every plowboy of the country and apprentice boy of the city. Every farmer and every mechanic in the land owes it to himself and to his children that such a Cyclopædia shall henceforward form a part of the outfit of his home. To the professional man, and every person of intelligence in every walk of life, a Cyclopædia is a necessity.

Of course the old and wealthy publishers who have grown rich (it is said that the Appletons have made a profit of nearly two million dollars on their Cyclopædia) from the sale of their high-priced publications are not pleased that their monopolies are broken and their power overthrown. Of course the book agents and booksellers who have been used to getting from 40 to 60 per cent commission for selling these high-priced books are not so well pleased to sell the Library of Universal Knowledge on 15 per cent commission, though those who are not short-sighted discover that their own interests, after all, are identical with the interests of the people, and their real profits, in the end, are increased, by the immense sales which result from meeting the people's wants. The majority of booksellers, however, are better pleased to slumber than to sell this and our numerous other standard and incomparably low-priced publications. But the Literary Revolution has always looked to the people, in whose interests it is, for its patronage, and it has never looked in vain, as our more than one million volumes printed last year (this year being increased to probably more than two millions) abundantly prove. You can order the Cyclopædia directly from us, and by uniting with your neighbors and friends you can secure club rates, as follows:

A discount of 10 per cent will be allowed to any one ordering at one time three or more sets of the Cyclopædia; and a discount of 15 per cent will be allowed to any one ordering five or more sets at one time.

As a special inducement to our friends and patrons to go to work promptly and vigorously, each doing what he can for the dissemination of universal knowledge, we propose to distribute $10,000 in special premiums as follows, in addition to the regular discount to clubs:

$5,000 Reward to be distributed equally among the first twelve agents who send orders of not less than five sets each, between the 1st and 15th days of July, 1881.

$5,000 Reward in addition to the first $5,000 to be distributed among the 50 clubs making the largest aggregate number of orders received between the 1st and 15th days of July, 1881. Not less than twenty in number for a club to be entitled to premium. Distribution to be made on the basis of the number of orders received from each club, and the list to be published in the issue of the Library of Universal Knowledge of August 15th, 1881. Clubs wishing to enter this competition must so notify us before the 1st of July, and the first 50 clubs reporting will be entered. Clubs may be made up in any locality, and need not be confined to one town or city.

Persons desiring to take clubs may send to us at once for names to whom (if they desire) the prospectus of the Library will be sent. For the volume in which the premium is paid (Library, 15 volumes; Encyclopædia, 9 volumes), $1.00 for the former, $1.50 for the latter, to be added for each additional volume, within one month of receipt of premium volume. Premiums not taken within fifty days, unless being filled for an order of their receipt by us.

Specimen pages of the "Library of Universal Knowledge" will be sent free upon request. Prospectus containing full description of the work, with terms for clubs, and illustrations of peculiar excellence in book-making and type-setting by steam, will be sent upon application. Remit by bank draft, money order, registered letter, or by express. Premiums at $1.50 may be sent in postage stamps.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXX. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, AUGUST 17, 1881. NO. 31.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS--TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in Advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations: the restoration of Israel: the literal resurrection of the dead: the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked: eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE.

Its Proximity. Fifth, or First Woe Trumpet Continued. Application of History. First Point of Analogy--Their Name. The Hebrew of Arab and Locust the Same. All Points of Analogy. Conclusion.

No. 79.

J. P. WESTHEIR.

Application of history.—Our historical extracts on the empire of the Saracens, have been numerous and lengthy. We have had our reasons. No empire has occupied a position more directly involving the interests of the Christian church. It fostered and promulgated the religion of the false prophet: a religion that has rivalled Christianity in many Eastern countries, and is a rival power in the battle of the Great Day. Every student of prophecy should be familiar with its history.

We affirm that the Arabian empire was originated and sustained for a special purpose, and that its mission is clearly set forth in the vision of the first two trumpets. It now remains that we explain the points of analogy as they are developed in their history.

1. Arab and locust have the same Hebrew origin.—Arabia has its name from the people that dwell there—Arabs. Why are the people called Arabs? The word Arab is Hebrew. Let us trace its etymology.

Bishop Mede, Mr. Lowman, and Bishop Newton say: "In the original the word for both is the same."

In a noted Hebrew Lexicon we find the following: "ארב—A-rab or A-rav. (1) A verb, indicative present, third person, singular. He lay in wait, hid, concealed himself. As a noun, masculine, singular. ארב—A-reb, A-den, lurking-place, of enemies, or wild beasts. Job xxxvii. 8. See Psa. x. 8. Hence ארבה—A locust; the most destructive and ravenous insect in the world.

As a proper noun, ארב— A-rab. An Arab; because, like a wild and ravenous beast, he always lies in wait to seize upon the prey."

It appears that the descendants of Ishmael were called Arabs, (locusts) because they were like that insect; and an army of Arabs would be, in name and nature, an army of locusts.

2. Locusts are native insects of Arabia. That country was called the East, from its location; but was named Arabia, from Arab, locust; and is properly called locust-country.

In the plagues of Egypt, the locusts came from Arabia, since they were brought by an East wind, Arabia being east of Egypt. Their mission was then the same as that of the symbolic locusts of the Apocalypse, a scourge upon the enemies of Jehovah and his people, and under a direct commission from the Almighty.

Having identified the name and locality, we are now prepared to compare the history with what John heard, saw and described.

3. Star from heaven fallen unto the earth.—Revised Version.

Our interpretation requires this star to be Mahomet. Other expositors are inclined to call it the Bishop of Rome. Another class of symbols represents that apostate Bishop.

Let it be observed that Mahomet was as truly an apostate from Sabeanism, as the Pope is from primitive Christianity, with this distinction, however, that the bishops fall was into idolatry, and Mahomet's out of it. Mahomet's creed was unitarian: "only one God." He designed to erect the standard of the Divine unity upon the ruins of every species of Polytheism; hence, he called himself the apostle (sent) of God; sent to accomplish that special work.

The drapery of this vision is not Roman, but Arabian, the original home of the ארב (Arab) Arab and of the locust. The Arabian heavens were above him, and Arabia (locust land) beneath, and around him. The star had fallen before the time covered by the prophet's vision; it was fallen to the earth, fallen from the priesthood of sun-worship, to an obscure and private position. He spent much time in a cave near Mecca fitting himself for the work of his mission.

4. And there was given to him (Mahomet) the key of the pit.—Revised Version.

Key is a symbol of power; power to open and shut. Power is here given him (Mahomet) to open the pit of the abyss.

"There was given"—by whom? By God, who now commissions him to accomplish a special work. The key is placed in the hand of Mahomet, by the Deity, as if he had said: "That abyss, with its frowning pit is under my control. No agent can come out of it, except by my permission. The time has arrived when its inmates are wanted to chastise an apostacy; take this key, enter that pit, and bid them in my name to come forth, and enter upon the work that I have assigned to them."

To punish Pharaoh I brought out of that abyss (locust land) by an East wind, the insect locust. I now call for the symbol locust (Arab) to chastise another power that oppresses my servants. Unlock the pit and bid them come forth.

"Pit of the Abyss."—The land of Arabia about Mecca, particularly, as we have explained in a former number.

"And he opened the pit of the abyss."—He used the key as ordered; removed all obstructions to the pit, that whatever objects and agents in that pit God designed to employ, he should set at liberty. Arabia, with its population, had been, from the nature of things, locked out from the Christian or Roman world. Their country had never enticed the Roman cupidity, nor had their Sabeanism any special attraction to a Christian people. No country in the world has an equal claim to the name "Pit of the abyss," as the land of Arabia: its mountains of burning sands, its clouds of moving dust, make the name literally appropriate.

"And there went up a smoke, as the smoke of a great furnace."—R. V. Smoke; the heated dust in Arabia often darkens an otherwise cloudless sun, as it is here stated.

"And the sun and the air were darkened, by reason of the smoke of the pit."—R. V.

Arabia is like a heated furnace sending forth its heated smoke.

Smoke, as a symbol, represents doctrines or religious views, false in their nature, or such as obscure the popular systems of any country. Such were the doctrines of the Koran to Arabian idolaters. False doctrines have the same effect on the moral world that smoke has on physical objects; they obscure. The doctrines of Mahomet were of that nature.

"And out of the smoke came forth locusts upon the earth."—R. V. Out of the smoke came forth. The smoke rose toward to heavens, as a furnace, darkening the Arabian sun and air. It was not progressive like a cloud, but fixed like the smoke of a furnace. Mecca was the fixed seat of the religion of the Koran, as truly as Jerusalem was the fixed seat of Judaism. Pilgrimages of the Mahometans were to Mecca as those of the Jews were to Jerusalem.

Came forth locusts upon the earth.—Came forth. The locusts are not confined to their original home like smoke. They go forth, out of Arabia, their native land, into another land—the Roman earth. God has commissioned them, the theatre of their operations is in the territory of the Roman empire. Those men that were baptized (immersed) into the name of his Son, had fallen into idolatry; they had become image worshippers.

God has commissioned an agent to chastise these Idolaters. This agent (locusts) is of the family of Ishmael, constituted by nature to war against idolatry.

Their commission was "One God." Mahomet joined another article to this commission—"Mahomet is his apostle."

Had he confined that expression to its original import, "The sent of God," without arrogating to himself divine prerogatives, he would not have been called "The false prophet." In carrying out the work of his mission, he transcended all its limits, and founded a new religion, in many particulars worse than the one he was sent to chastise and correct.

"Locusts upon the earth."—As the mission of the Saracens was outside of Arabia they were obliged to go forth beyond its limits, as the locusts move in armies beyond their own native limits.

These locusts, however, are extraordinary, both in shape or attributes, and mission.

EXTRAORDINARY ATTRIBUTES.

a. The power of scorpions. Common locusts attack the vegetable world; these the animal kingdom; especially human beings, more especially apostate Christians. Such was the mission of the Arabian empire. This feature appears in every period of their history. This was their official mission. God evidently sent them forth to do this work. This new attribute we call the scorpion sting, not possessed by natural locusts.

b. Their likenesses or shapes were those of horses prepared for war. War horses, such as the Scripture likeness. Joel ii. 4. No armies bore so close a resemblance as Arabian horsemen; still it is an added attribute. Their armies were principally cavalry.

c. Yellow crowns were another added attribute, yet it suited the headdress of the Saracens.

d. "Their faces were men's faces"—R. V. This is another extraordinary attribute, yet long beards suited the Arabs.

e. They had long hair, like the hair of women. This was a peculiar feature of Arabian horsemen.

f. The teeth of Arabs resemble the teeth of lions. When rushing into battle their horrid grin showed teeth like those of lions, when in the act of seizing their prey.

g. Breastplates like iron in color and outward lustre. This is an attribute added to suit their work. It was God's vital protection till their work should be accomplished.

h. Their tails like unto scorpions—Arabian scimitars, their most fatal weapon.

i. Stings. If we change our expression, it would be the tail was the sheath or scabbard; the sting was the scimitar itself.

John sees a living picture, and describes it as it appeared.

2. Their mission is distinctly given, should torment like scorpions, not kill. This would be a national torment. The Saracens had not the power to overthrow the Greek empire(which we may call the Christian empire) but to harass it by cutting off its provinces.

"Power to hurt men five months." Prophetic months, when it refers to an empire or kingdom. The locusts were confined to five months in their depredations, so these symbol locusts would be confined to five prophetic months—150 years.

One thing may be noted, relative to the Saracens: They continued their campaigns about five months in the year. In their winter campaign and siege of Constantinople, during the cold weather they lay dormant like the locusts.

Their king was a peculiarity. Locusts (natural) have none. These locusts had one king, a caliph, a royal high priest. So soon as their unity was destroyed so soon they began to weaken.

Duration of the 150—5 months—150 years. When did they commence and close?

"During the first 150 years of their existence, dating from A. D. 612, when Mahomet first appeared openly as a prophet, they subdued Syria, Persia, India, and the greatest part of Asia, Egypt, and the greatest part of Africa, Spain, and some other parts of Europe. And it was in 762, the end of this period, that Almanser built Bagdad, for his seat of empire, and called it the City of Peace, (Bagdad), in allusion to Jerusalem."—Bishop Newton.

No nation can fill the conditions of the symbols of the fifth trumpet but Arabia.

Little drops of rain brighten the meadows; and little acts of kindness brighten the world.

An Old Story.

CELIA THAXTER.

A dear little maid came skipping out
In the glad new day with a merry shout!
With dancing feet and with flowing hair
She sang with joy in the morning air.

"Don't sing before breakfast, you'll cry before night"
What a croak, to darken the child's delight
And the stupid old nurse, again and again,
Repeated the ancient dull refrain.

The child paused, trying to understand;
But her eyes saw the great world rainbow-spanned;
Her light little feet hardly touched the earth,
And her soul brimmed over with innocent mirth!

"Never mind—don't listen—O sweet little maid!
Make sure of your morning song," I said;
"And if pain must meet you, why, all the more
Be glad of the rapture that came before.

"O, tears and sorrows are plenty enough.
Storms may be bitter and paths be rough,
But our tears should fall like the dear earth's showers
That help to ripen the fruits and flowers.

"So gladden the day with your blissful song.
Sing on while you may, dear, sweet and strong!
Make sure of your moment of pure delight,
No matter what trials may come before night."

Important Words for Wise Boys.

Professor Parkes, M. D., F. R. S.:—When a boy takes to smoking he frequently becomes pale, and he has an unhealthy skin. Moreover, boys who smoke much are less disposed to bodily exertion. Smoking interferes with appetite, impairs bodily activity, and in some way must damage the circulation or the composition of the blood.

Mr. William Chambers (Chambers' Journal):—The odious practice of tobacco smoking by the young concerns the national welfare, and is worthy of very general consideration. Every one in his sphere is called on as a matter of moral obligation, to do what lies in his power to discountenance and abate a practice so needless and reprehensible.

The Dean of Carlisle:—Evidences arise every day which convince me more and more that the prevalent use of tobacco, especially by the younger portion of the community, is destroying the physical stamina of the country, stripping youth of its bloom and beauty, and manhood of its virility, with a reflex influence on morals which is truly deplorable.

Sir Benjamin Brodie, M. D., F. R. S.:—Boys, even at the best schools, get the habit of smoking, because they think it manly and fashionable to do so; not unfrequently because they have the example set them by their tutors; and partly because there is no friendly voice to warn them as to the special ill consequences to which it may give rise, where the process of growth is not yet completed, and the organs are not yet fully developed.

The Bishop of Manchester:—The habit of tobacco smoking among young boys is an evil, and, it seems to me, a growing one which I have often observed and deplored. Whatever may be the thought of the habit of smoking generally, I believe that medical authorities are universally agreed that it is physically most mischievous to young people under the age of eighteen. The moral effects, consequent on the too frequent association of this habit with others of a pernicious tendency, are not less hurtful to the character. It has often been a matter both of surprise and regret to me that parents seem so indifferent to both these classes of consequences to their sons.

A Strange Visitor.

S. H. S.

When I first became acquainted with the Sunday Schools of New York City, in 1868, the New York Sunday School Union used to appoint "visitors" to go in and out among them. Some of these were excellent men, who knew what to do and how to do it; and some felt it to be their duty to address the schools on all occasions, as many other visitors have felt who were not appointed, yet had no special calling that way; and teachers and scholars regarded such interruption of more important exercises as an intrusion, and such speakers as bores, and some as bears. And speaking of bears suggests a story of a missionary of the American Sunday School Union in Michigan. In a letter to Bethany Mission Sunday School, in New York City, he writes:—

"Your Mission School, Bethany No. 1, is flourishing. [He had just organized for them Bethany No. 2 by their gift of $26.] I was with them one Sunday when they had a strange visitor—a Mr. Bruin, in a full suit of black (a black bear), who came out of the woods within ten rods of their school-house, looked pleasantly at several children who were outside, took a general observation of the school-house and its surroundings, then bowed politely and retired into the woods; but in a half-hour came back, walked around the school-house, climbed over a fence, and continued on his way, stopping occasionally to look back. Perhaps we were impolite in not inviting him in. I have seen many bears, but never a handsome one before this, who had shed his old, long, brown, shabby coat, and put on his new summer suit of black. Perhaps he thought he must dress up in his best to visit a New York Sunday School. He certainly behaved himself very nicely."

The Two Men Inside.

An old Indian once asked a white man to give him some tobacco for his pipe. The man gave him a loose handful from his pocket. The next day he came back and asked for the white man.

"For," said he, "I found a quarter of a dollar among the tobacco."

"Why don't you keep it?" asked a bystander.

"I've got a good man and a bad man here," said the Indian, pointing to his breast; "and the good man say, 'It is not mine, give it back to the owner.' The bad man say, 'Never mind, you got it, and it is your own now.' The good man say, 'No, no! you must not keep it.' So I don't know what to do, and I think to go to sleep, but the good and bad men keep talking all night, and trouble me; and now I bring the money back, I feel good."

Like the old Indian, we have all a good and a bad man within. The bad man is Temptation, the good man is Conscience, and they keep talking for and against many things that we do every day. Who wins? That is the question; and the answer decides a child's character for this life and the life to come. Who wins? Stand up for duty; down with sin. Wrestle with Temptation manfully. Never, never give up the war till you win.

Band of Hope Review.

Heroism.

"Oh, dear!" said Willie Grey, as he sat down on a saw-horse, and looked at the firewood which he ought to have been splitting for his mother, "I do wish I could do something for the world—some great action that every one could admire, and that would make the country and the whole world better and happier. I wish I could be a hero like Washington, or a famous missionary like Judson; but I can't do anything, nor be anything."

"Why do you want to be a hero?" asked his cousin, John Maynard, who, coming up just then, happened to hear his soliloquy.

"Oh," said Willie, coloring, "every one admires a hero, and talks about him, and praises him after he is dead."

"That's the idea, is it?" said John. "You want to be a hero for the sake of being talked about."

Willie did not exactly like this way of putting the matter.

"Not only that, but I want to do good to people—convert the heathen, or—or—save a sinking ship, or save the country, or something like that."

"That sounds better; but believe me, Willie, the greatest heroes have been men who have thought least about themselves, and more about their work; and so far as I can recollect now, the great—I mean according to the Christian standard—have always begun by doing the nearest duty, however small." And here John took up the axe and began to split the firewood.

Willie jumped off the saw-horse, and began to pick up the sticks without saying a word; but though he said nothing, he thought the more.

"I've wasted lots of time thinking what great things I might do, if I only had the chance," he thought; "and I've neglected the things I could and ought to do, and made a deal of trouble for mother. I'd better begin my own heroism by fighting my own laziness."

Will every boy adopt Willie's resolution, and carry it out in his daily life?

School Journal

Accuracy.

Every boy and girl should determine to be accurate. In studying lessons be sure to get the exact meaning; in talking, state the truth of the thing; in working do everything just right. I have lately heard of two boys who worked in the same store. They were named John and James. Their duties were alike, and they were required to be at the store at half-past seven in the morning. John was always there on the minute, or a few minutes before the time; James came the same number of minutes after. When John arranged the goods in the window they were accurately marked and priced; James forgot to put the number on or priced them incorrectly.

These are only two of the things which marked the distinction between the two boys. But every day and week they grew further apart, John doing the work accurately, and therefore well; James slighting all he conveniently could. John was promoted for carefulness in his duties. James was warned to alter his manner and finally discharged. The accurate boy grew to be a wealthy, self-made man. Men liked to deal with him; they were sure of being treated fairly. James tried several positions, but lost them on account of his inaccuracy in little details, and, though he gets through the world somehow, he has not the happiness and success which with the same opportunities John achieved.

There are many things that tend to make a noble character. Place accuracy high in the list.

Will Jesus Come Before Morning?

E. ROXANA WINOR.

A dear little boy of four years had gone to rest for the night. His mother had kissed him and tucked the clothes all snugly around him, then, having left the room, was busying herself about the evening chores. Presently she heard him calling, and hastening to the little cot, he said:—

"Mamma, mamma, will Jesus come before morning?"

He had heard it talked about day after day—that coming of the Lord in the clouds—and his anxiety to see the glorious being who had, when upon earth loved and blessed the little children, had grown and deepened until he hoped he might come ere the morning light.

His gentle mother knelt by his side, and rehearsed the wonderful story, and oh how the little boy's eyes glistened as he drank it all in.

His mother's prayer and her words sank deep into his heart. While he lived, he still looked for Jesus. He sleeps now in a quiet grave-yard far from his kindred. Yet, we all remember the bright boy that longed to see the Savior come ere the morning broke, and wish there were more little ones to love him and long for his coming. I hope there may be. I hope that the dear little readers of THE RESTITUTION will all study the Bible, and think about what Jesus has done for them, until they can give him their hearts as Rowlie did, and then, they too, will all want to see him coming in the clouds, and rejoice to meet him.

The cattle disease known as the Siberian plague, which recently made its appearance in the Russian provinces of St. Petersburg and Novgorod, has broken out in the provinces that extend along the shores of the Baltic Sea. One case has occurred among villagers, and the person attacked died of the disorder. The authorities are doing what they can to stay its progress, but they find the peasants extremely ignorant and superstitious about it. They not only neglect to take all reasonable care to guard against it, but organize religious processions that seriously aid the spread of the infection.

Extract from Illustrated Cosmos.

THE FUTURE OF PALESTINE.

A review of the present condition of Palestine indicates that the little tract of land on the eastern shore of the Great Sea is again to become the centre of powerful political influences, if not of commercial importance. In every age of man Canaan has been either a center in the development of the human race, or track of territory upon which contending civilizations have met in their fiercest struggles, or the point d'appui upon which the most powerful factors of progress have been located.

During the later centuries Palestine has been wasting. The leprosy of sand which covered Edom has been slowly encroaching upon Palestine as well, and the rich valleys and crowned hills of Canaan were slowly becoming a desert. Still, it has been a presence in the minds of Christ's followers that a day should come when "Israel," with Judah and Benjamin, should be restored, and Palestine bloom with verdure as of old. The land of Palestine is recovering its former fertility and beauty. The rain-fall has increased wonderfully; gardens are springing up in the valleys, and the entire area is recovering from its utter desolation. While these physical changes are going on, the commercial relations are improving. The melancholy that had settled upon the wretched province seems to lift and her heart to rejoice. Intellectually, it may surprise many to know that Palestine is become in reality an educational centre of no little importance. In Beirut there are actually as many as fifty educational institutions, many of them of great size and influence. Even India is feeling the influence of these institutions, and Syria is "growing lighter" every year.

It cannot be but that such influences bring an increase of population. Such is the fact, and it is largely Jewish. These people are seeking their ancient home in large numbers. A Jewish paper says: "You may as well attempt to turn the course of the Atlantic as to stem this irresistible tide." Colonies have settled about Beirut, but the greater portion seek Jerusalem. Twenty years ago Jerusalem had a few hundred inhabitants in the Jewish section. To-day, with a population of 40,000 to 44,000, Jerusalem has over 20,000 Jews. Persons of political importance are turning their eyes thither. The Marquis of Bute has purchased a dwelling and plantation on the hills near the Mount of Olives. Several beautiful gardens have passed into the hands of Europeans. Mr. Oliphant has formed a scheme to colonize 1,500,000 acres east and west of the Jordan, with Jewish people. It is said to have received the approval of both the Sultan and the English section at the Porte. The most prominent papers in the world have recognized these changes in Palestine, and the Jewish people are awakening to future possibilities.

Several items of political significance point to the approach of the regeneration of Palestine. The immense influence of the Rothschilds is one of these. They are said to hold a past due mortgage on Palestine from the Porte. This has been disputed and again iterated. At all events, they have a powerful grip upon the Ottoman government. The preponderance of Beaconsfield's influence in the past in Turkish politics, and the fact that he has not yet let go his hold; the weighty influence of Jewish finances upon the court at Austria, which looks with anxious eyes to the dismemberment of the Turkish territory; the recent antagonism to the Jews in the German Capitals—all tend to awaken in their hearts a yearning for a land of their own—the home of their ancestors. Among the changes which this age will produce in the politics and the state lines of the world, not the least likely is the restoration of the Jewish power in their native land—after eighteen hundred years of proscription, banishment and persecution. And not the least remarkable factor in its effect upon the human race will be its fulfillment of a multitude of prophecies, some of them over 3,000 years old, and inscribed upon the very countenance of every descendant of Israel, in every clime and in every age.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, August 17, 1881.

We abound and superabound in long manuscript articles. Please send us some short practical articles for awhile.

An alarming change has taken place in the condition of the President. During Monday his stomach refused to perform its functions, and vomiting and nausea occurred several times during the day. His pulse rose to 130 causing the gravest apprehensions on the part of his attending physicians. During the entire day the most gloomy fears were entertained throughout the country as to the final recovery of the Chief Magistrate. He has passed no day since the dreadful day when he was wounded that has foreboded so strongly a fatal issue. Without a favorable change soon his most sanguine medical attendants say death must soon be the result. For ourself we have not entirely given up all hope. We have felt that there is a God that rules in the affairs of the children of men, and that for his peoples' sake he would restore the President to health and the place he has been chosen to fill.

April 16, P. M.—Our paper is full and we have only room to say that the latest news to-day from the president is most discouraging indeed. The majority are hopeless of his recovery.

Questions that are fast coming to the front for solution make the inquiry important as to the numbers that may be directly or indirectly affected by the final adjustment. As there are some indications of a general uprising of the fanatical Mohammedan people in a general crusade, the following estimate of their number is of importance: "Mr. Wilfred S. Blunt, a well known writer on Oriental affairs, gives in the Fortnightly Review an approximate census of the Mussulmans of the world. He takes the pilgrims to Mecca as representatives of all classes of the faith. Counting these for 1880 he found that they numbered 99,250, and calculated that they represented not less than 175,000,000 people. The division of creeds he makes out as follows: Sunites of Orthodox Mohammedans 145,000,000, Shites 15,000,000, Abadites 7,000,000, Wahabites 8,000,000. Mr. Blunt says that the progress of Islamism in Africa during the last 100 has been immense."

The anti-clerical movement in Italy is said to be waxing fiercer daily, and coupled with this is the news that the Pope intends leaving Rome. It has been rumored that, should he abandon the Eternal City, he would take up his residence in Malta. Whether this rumor be designed to arouse the Catholics abroad, or whether the "Supreme Quack," as he has been significantly termed by Carlyle, is in earnest, must be left for the future to disclose. We append a clipping from the Chicago Tribune. The difference between the true head of the church and the miserable counterfeit usurper is very well stated: "The New York Independent draws a comparison between the position of the Pope in Rome and of that of Christ in Jerusalem. The Pope is in retirement. He does not mix with the people, either because he distrusts them or wishes to punish them. But Christ went freely among a more hostile population. He was seen daily teaching in the Temple—the St. Peter's of Jerusalem. He did this at the risk of His life, and so sacrificed his life. 'Why' asks the Independent, 'should a Pope be denied the same privilege?' Because for one reason, he is not a Christ, and because, for another reason, he lays claim to a temporal dominion which Christ expressly disavowed. The Pope is in retirement for political, not religious reasons."

A REMARKABLE REVOLUTION.

The success of the Literary Revolution in producing a Cyclopedia, the largest ever published in this country, in large type, well printed and bound, at the nominal cost of $16, seemed to the majority of book-buyers so remarkable, that the second Literary Revolution, which reduces the cost of this most excellent work to $10, seems almost incredible. The facts of the case are, however, made so evident and so reasonable, that there can be no questioning them. We have in this office some of the volumes which demonstrate their superior character in every way, and the facts and figures which are published in detail in an article elsewhere in this paper, under the title of "A Second Literary Revolution," show very clearly, though very surprisingly, how it is possible to make such an extremely valuable and costly Cyclopedia accessible to the masses at such trifling cost.

To remove any possible incredulity which might exist in the minds of some that this is only a plausible scheme for getting a large amount of money in small sums from a great many individuals, in return for books which might never be delivered, the publishers do not require any payment whatever in advance. You may, if you please, simply send your order by postal card, and make no payment except upon the delivery of the books them here, and after you have examined them and found them satisfactory. Orders should be sent to the publishers at once, in order to secure the special rates given during the month of August.

THE NEW COVENANT.

J. B. COX.

"This is the covenant that I will make with them, after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them." Heb. x. 16.

How beautiful and how complete are the plans of God: who saw the end from the beginning. He prepared the earth for man, then made man to dwell upon it. He made man to be immortal. He created him in the image of his own eternity. But through envy of the devil came sin into the world. Wisdom of Solomon, II 23-24.

God designed man to do his will, and gave him the government of the earth, but through disobedience man became the subject of God's displeasure. Yet, the allwise God still had mercy on him. But after this, man became so wicked that he (God) destroyed both man and beast from the face of the earth, (except those saved in the ark.)

Then God entered into covenant relationship with Noah. God said: "I will establish my covenant with you, neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood. I will remember my covenant which is between me and you, and every living creature of all flesh. And the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh, and the bow shall be in the cloud, that I may look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth." Gen. IX. 11-17.

This bow still remains in the clouds as a proof that with God there "is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." James 1. 17.

After this, when people began to multiply upon the earth, "The God of glory appeared unto our fa. r Abraham, . . . And said unto him: Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred, and come into the land which I shall show thee . . . And he (God) gave him the covenant of circumcision." Acts VII. 2-8. Read also the history of Abraham as recorded in the book of Genesis.

When the literal descendents of Abraham had become numerous, and were greatly oppressed in Egypt, "God remembered his covenant with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob, and God looked upon the children of Israel, and had respect unto them." Ex. II. 24-25.

Then God delivered them from the land of bondage, by the hand of Moses, who led them into the wilderness, and there they received a code of laws, which are spoken of as the covenant of God, "which my covenant they brake." Jer. XXXI. 32.

They were "a disobedient and gainsaying people." But Paul said: Hath God cast away his people? God forbid, . . . God hath not cast away his people, which he foreknow." Rom. x. 2; XI. 1.

The promises of God toward his people are sure, and I believe the time is near at hand, when this new covenant shall be established with them, "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah, not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt, which my covenant they brake, although I was a husband unto them, saith the Lord, but this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel. After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people." Jer. XXXI. 31-33.

The apostle well understood the designs of God, and appreciated his promises, so in writing to the Hebrews, he reiterates the plans of God toward his chosen people, and impresses upon their minds what God will do for them in days to come.

But how limited is the understanding of this subject, by the religious world, who figure away the purposes of God, and teach that God has established this new covenant, and that it belongs to spiritual Israel. But an examination of this subject will show that it belongs to literal Israel.

"This is the covenant that I will make with them." With whom? The apostle unquestionably understood the language of the prophet, or he would not have used his words. We read in the eighth chapter to the Hebrews, "I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah." There was a time when the name Israel included the whole twelve tribes, but the kingdom became divided, hence, the necessity of the two names, (Israel and Judah.)

But when David reigned king over all Israel, God said to him through the prophet Nathan:

"And when thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom forever. . . . And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee: thy kingdom shall be established forever." 2 Samuel VII. 12-13.

Now by reading the 89th Psalm we can see how David understood this promise. He said, "Also, I will make him my first born, higher than the kings of the earth. My mercy will I keep for him forevermore and my covenant shall stand fast with him, . . . My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that has gone out of my lips. . . . It shall be established forever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven."

This covenant is a renewal of the covenant that God made with Abraham. "The Lord made a covenant with him, saying, unto thy seed have I given this land." Gen. XXII. 18.

Both Abraham and David were representatives of the people of Israel, to whom the first covenant was made, which they broke, and for a time were cut off. So it must be to this people that the new covenant is promised. Now, how is it possible to make any mistake when it is spoken in such plain language, by the holy prophet, "I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah." Jer. XXXI. 31.

Again, this covenant is to be made, "After those days." What days? We are told by the religious world, that this covenant is already established.

But if we turn to the prophets, who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit," 2 Peter, 1. 21; all difficulty can be removed concerning the time referred to in the words, "After those days." "And it shall come to pass, that like as I have watched over them, to pluck up, and to break down, and to destroy, and to afflict, so will I watch over them, to build and to plant, saith the Lord. In those days they shall say no more, the fathers have eaten the sour grape and the children's teeth are set on edge. But every one shall die for his own iniquity, every man that eateth the sour grape his teeth shall be set on edge." Jer. XXXI. 28-30. This is spoken concerning the house of Israel, and the house of Judah, these words precede the promise of the new covenant, which shall not be "according to the covenant that I made with their fathers in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt," verse 32. In the first covenant God made with his people, he said, I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me." Ex. XX. 6. But in the new covenant every one must suffer for their own iniquity.

So this new covenant will not be established until the gathering together of the children of Israel. Then they shall not be governed any more by a law written upon a table of stone, for the Lord said, "I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts." Jer. XXXI. 33. But now we turn to Ezekiel XI. 17-20. "I will even gather you from the people, and assemble you out of the countries where ye have been scattered, and I will give you the land of Israel, . . . And I will put a new spirit within you, and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them a heart of flesh, that they may walk in my statutes, and keep mine ordinances, and do them, and they shall be my people, and I will be their God." In chapter XXXVI. 25-28 we read, "I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries. I will bring you into your own land. Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them. And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers, and ye shall be my people, and I will be your God." In the XXXVII. 12-14 we read, "Thus saith the Lord God, behold, oh, my people I will open your (political) graves, and cause you to come up out of your (political) graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your (political) graves, O, my people, and brought you up out of your (political) graves, and shall put my spirit in you, and ye shall live, (nationally.) and I shall place you in your own land, then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord," ver. 25-27. And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob, my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, even they, and their children, and their children's children forever, and my servant David shall be their prince forever. Moreover I will make a covenant of peace with them, it shall be an everlasting covenant with them, and I will place them, and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them forevermore. My tabernacle also shall be with them, yea, I will be their God and they shall be my people." Paul says, "And so all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, there shall come out of Sion the deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob: For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins." Rom. XI. 27-27.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

Spurgeon.

C. C. MARSTON.

One of the principal things with Americans visiting London is to hear Spurgeon. For a quarter of a century this remarkable man has been preaching to vast assemblies of people in the world's metropolis, and his popularity and power over the people seems rather to deepen than to wane.

It was a bright sunny day, June 20, 1881, when I enjoyed my first privilege of hearing Mr. Spurgeon in the Metropolitan Tabernacle. The place was well filled with people, a great majority of whom were personal admirers of the speaker, who from the very opening of the service were deeply interested in whatever he might say. Here then at the very outset were two important points gained to the speaker—a vast audience, and an audience in sympathy with him and his work.

The manner of worship at the Metropolitan Tabernacle is peculiar. There is no instrumental music. A precentor standing near the speaker's desk leads the tune and the six thousand people present join heartily in the hymn. There is a little dragging in the back part of the house but not nearly so much as we would expect. Think of 6,000 people singing "Old Hundred" with zest. It is very inspiring and exhilarating to say the least. "Let us sing this hymn cheerfully," said Mr. Spurgeon, as he announced the second hymn while sitting in his chair. He "lines" the hymn, reading each verse before it is sung. A long passage of Scripture is read deliberately and thoughtfully interspersed with copious remarks, practical and suggestive. All heads are bowed and the opening prayer is offered. It is a prayer never to be forgotten. The preacher seems to be talking face to face with his Master. It is a long prayer full of such terse sayings as this: "Gracious Savior, if we have thee we have everything though we may have nothing else, but if we have everything else without thee we have nothing."

The sermon was lengthy, lucid, and full of Christ and his work for sinners. It was strictly old-fashioned in method of treatment, having preface, heads and conclusion. There was evidently no display of talents. His language is the simplest Anglo-Saxon. Every person fully understands every sentence he utters. He has a musical, pleasant and orotund voice, which carries every word he utters to the remotest listener in the farthest corner of the top-most gallery. His articulation is most perfect. Every consonant in every word is distinctly heard wherever his voice can be heard at all. He speaks deliberately though with great readiness and freedom. His head is full of ideas, great and yet simple ideas, and ideas that are not visionary but practical, and he has a tongue facile, versatile and fluent to put those ideas into a most pleasing and forcible form.

He is not prepossessing in his appearance. His face is not particularly intellectual. He has not the smooth broad brow which scholars are usually supposed to possess. His neck is very short and large. He is low of stature and quite corpulent. He suffers much from rheumatism, and when he rises in the pulpit he supports himself by leaning on the pulpit or by placing his hand on the back of the chair, or by reclining leisurely and familiarly on the railing in front. So that his pulpit manners are very faulty and far from what the schools would regard as effective. He gesticulates considerably and his gestures are such as a man would naturally make who had an intense conviction of the truth of what he was saying. He does not argue. He considers the truth of God's word already established, and that it is his duty simply to announce it and urge its acceptance.

He Knows.

He knows the bitter, weary way,
The endless striving, day by day,
The souls that weep, the souls that pray.
He knows!

He knows how hard the fight hath been,
The clouds that o'er our lives between,
The wrongs the world hath never seen.
He knows!

He knows when fetid and warm we sink!
How deep the pain, how near the brink
Of dark despair! He knows and thinks
He knows!

He knows! O heart, so full of ills!
For laugh on earth our hope we base,
We still can hear it, feeling this—
He knows!

He knows! O heart, take up the cross,
And know earth's treasures are but dross,
All the will prove as safe as He—
He knows!

Limitation of the Mind.

"Does this reasoning prove there is no God?" Not at all. It simply proves that the finite mind is utterly impotent to apprehend God. It proves that we do not and cannot comprehend primary causations; that our perceptive faculties are so limited by the nature of their constitution that they cannot apprehend the primary nature of the simplest natural law; and if we cannot comprehend the nature of the force called gravity, or heat as a mode of motion, except as physical facts, how can we have any rational conception of any of those qualities of mind that produced these laws? If the rude savage, after examining a complicated piece of machinery, can form no just conception of the forces that impel it, or even of the purpose it serves, how much less can we understand the peculiar qualities of mind that invented and produced it. If by the deepest research we cannot analyze the subtile law that connects the molecular movement of the brain with thought, how can we analyze the thoughts of an infinite mind of which this law was but a thought? Is it not plain that, in attempting this, we attempt the impossible?

One-Talent Men.

There is nothing that would add more to the power and influence of the church of to-day, than the full consecration of the multitude of one-talent men in her fold, to the service of God.

We need this more than we do men of genius and brilliant parts. Our greatest loss of power is here, and here also is the possibility of our greatest gain.

Occasionally we see a man liberally endowed—a five-talent man—foolishly, recklessly, squandering his talents—burying gifts wherewith he might have made his own life glorious, and the world brighter and better—and we greatly regret the loss both to himself and to ourselves. But the great loss the church and the world experience on account of buried talent is not from this quarter. Great indeed is the loss that comes through the five-talent and the two-talent men; but a hundred, a thousand times greater is the loss we suffer from the one-talent men who compose the multitude, and who more readily yield to the temptation to dig and hide.

A Death-Bed Sermon.

A gentleman died last week at his residence in one of our up-town fashionable streets, leaving $11,000,000. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church, in excellent standing, a good husband and father, and a thriving citizen.

On his death-bed, lingering long, he suffered with great agony of mind, and gave occasional expression to his remorse at what his conscience told him had been an ill-spent life.

"Oh," he exclaimed, as his weeping friends and relatives gathered around his bed, "if I could only live my years over again, I would give all the wealth I have amassed in a lifetime. It is a life devoted to money-getting that I regret. It is this which weighs me down, and makes me despair of the life hereafter."

His clergyman endeavored to soothe him, but he turned his face to the wall.

"You have never reproved my avaricious spirit," he said to the minister; "you have called it a wise economy and forethought, but my riches have been only a snare for my soul! I would give all I possessed to have hope for my poor soul."

In this state of mind, refusing to be consoled, this poor rich man bewailed a life devoted to the mere acquisition of riches. Many came away from his bedside impressed with the uselessness of such an existence as the wealthy man had spent, adding house to house and dollar to dollar until he became a millionaire.

All knew him to be a professing Christian and a good man as the world goes; but the terrors and remorse of his death-bed administered a lesson not to be lightly dismissed from memory.

News Items.

THE ERUPTION OF MAUNA LOA.

San Francisco, Aug. 3.—The steamer Zealandia, from Australia and Sandwich Islands, brings news that the flow of lava from the volcano threatens still to cause serious losses at Hilo, having advanced more than a mile in three days from June 26 to June 28, and still moving on July 14 at a rate of twenty-five feet an hour. The water offers no obstruction to the flow of the lava, which at times seem six feet under water, and still maintaining a white heat.

Berlin, Aug. 2.—Anti-Jewish disturbances have occurred at Jastrow, West Prussia, during which a rabbi was wounded, his assailants escaping after a regular fight with the police. Further disturbances of the same character have occurred at Bublitz in Pomerania. So many towns and villages in western Russia, whose populations are principally Jewish, have recently been burned, that it is impossible to resist a suspicion of systematic incendiarism. Up to the end of June sixteen towns and villages were burned. Since then fresh fires have occurred, two of the most terrible of which were at Korez and Minsk. From ten to twenty houses and shops were destroyed at Korez, and thirty-nine persons were killed. The bulk of the survivors were rendered destitute.

HATRED OF THE JEWS IN POMERANIA.

Berlin, Aug. 11.—The government has taken the necessary measures to protect the Jews in Pomerania and west Prussia. It is feared, however, that the troubles will not soon be stopped, as in those districts strong hatred against the Jews seems to pervade the whole population.

ANTI-CLERICAL MOVEMENT IN ITALY.

London, Aug. 13.—A despatch from Rome to the Daily News says: "The anti-clerical movement waxes fiercer daily. The central committee has held a meeting for the purpose of promoting the agitation throughout the country."

The Arab Chief Ali Ben Hilfa head of the insurrection against the French at Sfax, is 50 years old, has six sons with him, is one of a rich family, and enjoys great influence among the tribes collected at Sfax.

The Turkish government recently expressed its intention to abolish the foreign post-offices in Turkey. Germany at once protested strongly against the step, and negotiations are now being carried on among the great powers to prevent this plan of the Porte being carried into effect.

Three weeks ago the Austro-Hungarian government received from its Consuls in Europe reports on continental cereal crops. From these it appears that those of Portugal, the lower part of Bulgaria, Servia, and Roumania, Moldavia, East and West Prussia, Russian Poland, and sections of southern France are expected to be below the average. In Lombardy, Greece, most parts of the Balkan provinces, Switzerland, and Holland, above average. Taking Europe as a whole the harvest promises to be above average, but this will be chiefly due to a larger area under cereals.

INSURRECTION AT MUNNEEPOOR.

Calcutta, Aug. 15.—A serious insurrection has broken out at Munneepoor, but no details have been received. The Maharajah has executed seventeen men and imprisoned 300.

Panama, Aug. 6.—News from Peru announces that the Chilians have been routed in an engagement in the vicinity of Pisco, forty-two leagues south of Lima. Of 400 Chilians who were attacked only twenty-six escaped.

GREECE'S TERRITORIAL ACQUISITION.

Athens, Aug. 15.—The European Commissioners have decided to allow the Turks five days' delay instead of fifteen in which to surrender the second zone of the territory ceded to Greece.

The life of the Christian is to be a spectacle like that witnessed in the Temple when, as morning rose and evening declined, the lamb was laid upon the altar whose fires were never extinguished, and Israel saw it ascend in its smoke a whole burnt-offering to God. Our sacrifice is to cover the entire personality, the frail and perishable elements and meaner uses of the body, as well as the nobler service of the soul. —S. D. F. Salmond.

SCIENTIFIC INFIDELITY.

It appears to be the general verdict in regard to the discussions between R. G. Ingersoll and Judge Black in the North American Review, that Ingersoll, being confined to argument, and not have the privilege of throwing mud, has made an entire failure. He must have an audience of free-thinkers to applaud his blasphemies, or he is taken at a disadvantage. His forte is blasphemy, and ribald ridicule.

"Bad fruit grows on the tree of scientific infidelity. The people are getting impressions of the real value and effect of the new gospel, from what goes by the name of Nihilism and Communism. The doctrines of the new gospel—conscience a changing product of evolution—no judgment after death and no judge to sit on a throne of judgment—no heaven—no immortality of personal existence—are found to be tending rapidly toward the destruction of morality and the extinguishment of civilization. At first these results do not so clearly appear, because the horrible doctrines do not immediately displace the settled Christian faith; but soon the tree will bear a heavy crop of communists, nihilists, assassins and lepers, lustful robbers, and the people will turn in horror to the sublime old Bible morality, whose fruit is always wholesome and good."—C. C. Kimball, D. D.

Professor Max Muller make the following point against Mr. Darwin's "Theory of Evolution." He insists Philology points out the real specific difference between man and the lower animals. It erects a barrier which has never been passed. He says: "I cannot follow Mr. Darwin, because I hold that this question is not to be decided in an anatomical theatre only. There is, to my mind, one difficulty which Mr. Darwin has not sufficiently appreciated, and which I do not feel able to remove. There is, between the whole animal kingdom on the one side, and man, even in his lowest state, on the other, a barrier which no animal has ever crossed, and that barrier is—language. By no effort of understanding, by no stretch of imagination, can I explain to myself how language could have grown out of anything which animals possess, even if we granted them millions of years for that purpose."

FRUITS OF CHRISTIANITY.

The fruits of Christianity are as precious as those of infidelity are vile. Where the precepts of Christ have sway, war is unknown; robbery, dishonesty, intemperance, violence and lust, are forbidden, and under their benign influence property is secure; life is sacred; poverty is provided for; sickness is pitied; infancy is nurtured; old age is revered; womanhood is cherished, and manhood is ennobled. Such are the fruits of true Christianity, and infidel virtues mostly spring from Christian roots. Skepticism cannot blot out a father's godly counsels nor a mother's fervent prayers. And as a result, there are often traces of Christian principle where there is no Christian profession; as there are plenty of people who practice infidelity while they profess Christianity. Do not be deceived by names or professions. Set genuine infidelity and genuine Christianity side by side, watch their fruits and take your choice.

OBITUARY.

Boggs—Fell asleep in Jesus at Argos, Ind., Aug. 2, 1881, Anna Boggs, aged 43 years, 9 months, and 11 days.

Sister Boggs was born Oct. 21, 1837, and was married to Joel Boggs Dec. 27, 1857. During a series of meetings held at Argos, in December, 1877, by Brother H. V. Reed, Sister Boggs embraced the gospel faith and hope, and was baptized by him Dec. 18, 1877. She was remarkable for constant attendance at meetings, whether for public preaching or social gatherings of the church for prayer and mutual edification. When only a few attended, she was one of the few; and when many came together, she was one of the number. She said that when she started in the Christian course she started to go through, and she was enabled, through divine grace, to endure to the end. Funeral discourse by the writer to a large congregation Aug. 3, the day after her death.

WHAT LIFE HATH.

Life hath its barren years,
When blossoms fall untimely down,
When ripened fruitage fails to crown
The Summer's toil, when Nature's frown
Looks only on our tears.

Life hath its faithless days—
The golden promise of the morn,
That seemed for light and gladness born,
Meant only cruel the work and scorn,
Blasted and tainted all for use.

Life hath for a little hour,
Where we must walk with [illegible]
With [illegible] walk with [illegible]
Toward [illegible] that soon must [illegible]
All [illegible] is gliding down.

Life hath its harvest moons
Its russet corn and pure [illegible]
Its gathered sheaves of grain, the bloom and sign
Of cheer in [illegible], bread and [illegible] with wine.
Full hearts for hoped-for [illegible]

Life hath its hopes fulfilled;
Its [illegible] its [illegible] unuttered prayers,
Speaks for [illegible] hope, whose long ache,
Is drawn to silent music, breathes forth its rare
Heart speech by joy distilled.

Life hath it—Tabor heights!
Its lofty mounts of heavenly recognitions,
Whose unveiled glories flash to earth munitions
Of love and truth and clear intuition
Half meant of all delights!

THE DESTINY OF THE WORLD.

A Lecture Delivered Before the "Liberal League" of Pittsburgh, Pa.

BY H. THOMAS, M. D.

Mr. Speaker and Gentlemen:

The subject of this lecture is one which we think ought to interest every man, particularly so, if it may be determined with any degree of certainty what the destiny is, of the world in which we live.

Just here I may say by way of explanation that when I speak of the world, I mean the earth and the inhabitants thereon unless otherwise defined.

We ask then if there are not times when these questions come to every thinking man:—

What is to be the end, or rather, what is in store for the world?

What of the earth?

What of the inhabitants thereon?

Is the earth to continue to bear briers and thorns and thistles and noxious weeds that man may eat bread in the sweat of his brow?

Is it to bear forever upon its bosom multitudes of people subject to decay and death?

Are the inhabitants thereof to continue coming and going as now?

It has been said by members of this Liberal League that, the highest attainment of man is to live in truth and die in peace.

I ask was it for that, and that only, he put in an appearance upon this earth?

If so, he has proved a failure, and nature has aborted in her works; for how many of the thousands that have died were able to say, "I have lived in truth and now die in peace?"

Can we make ourselves believe that death ends all?

Is there no escape from eternal night?

Does the dark wave of oblivion close the scene forever, do, or believe as we may?

Whence cometh this desire to live—this longing for immortality—this going out of every atom of our being for a higher life?

I ask how came this desire in the human heart if there be no beyond?

Where shall we turn for an answer?

If we turn to the book of nature its pages are silent as the grave; there is naught of what is to be. So far as we can read there, the future may be, as the past has been, or it may not.

Will the years come and go; suns rise and set; the earth be locked by winter's cold, and scorched by summer's heat?

Will lightnings flash, and thunders roll?

Will terrific storms forever devastate the earth, and pestilence scourge mankind as in the past?

The book of nature answereth not.

Will pain, and sickness, and sorrow continue forever?

Will the infant of days pass from the fount of life to the chamber of death, and the strength of manhood, and the flush of womanhood meet the grave?

Will bad men rule, and the innocent suffer.

Will nation rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom?

Will blood, and carnage, war and devastation continue?

The book of science answereth not.

If we turn to science, it will number to us the planets, measure them as with a rod, weigh them in a balance; and forecast their power for weal or woe. It will discourse to us of the formation of the earth—of all its progressive stages from "star-dust" to a molten fiery mass—then of its cooling surface, its tremendous upheavals, and unfathomable seas, wonderful flora, prodigious animals that lived and passed away ere man appeared upon its surface, but of its destiny, or the destiny of him that liveth thereon it speaketh not.

If we ask mankind, whether it be the running to pen of matters for incantations over a boiling pot of curious herbs, or the men of letters, skilled in all the wisdom of ancient and modern times they cannot forecast with any degree of certainty what is to be for a day, much less the destiny of the world.

True there have been oracles in the past, and there are oracles now: vain speculations, mere thinkings of the flesh, without foundation, and without support. Some affirming that the earth will continue forever bearing men and women upon its bosom who will die and pass away while others take their place. Others, that the earth will be burned up, and a new earth erected out of the ashes of the old.

The theory generally received however, is, that sometime, but never in our generation, the inhabitants of the earth will be spirited away; some to a "kingdom in the skies," or beyond the bounds of time and space; and some to a supposed subterranean abode forever associated with sprites, hobgoblins, and devils, and the earth be burned up and return again to nothing (!).

A glance at this theory and you will perceive that it is unreasonable, unphilosophical and unsound, hence we may conclude unscriptural. A "kingdom in the skies," is vague and meaningless, as what we call the sky is but an imaginary sheet of blue but which in reality is boundless space, hence a kingdom in boundless space would not be very definitely located. A kingdom "beyond the bounds of time and space" is nowhere. A subterranean abode of demons supposed to be located in the earth or under the earth would certainly be "nowhere" if the earth were burned to ashes.

This then like all other theories finding their origin in the human mind is unsatisfactory and unsatisfying. It is claimed, however, that this theory finds support in a certain old book, called the Bible; a book often sneered at, and much misrepresented by those not intelligent in its teachings. In my early days I read this book, and I found some passages which upon a careless reading seemed to support this theory: but I have read this book again in later years, and I find upon a careful reading that it has no foundation therein. But be that as it may for the present, while I invite you to come with me away from the city of Pittsburgh, far out into the country where gentle zephyrs waft sweet fragrance in the balmy air—the perfume of opening flowers. 'Tis early morn; and we wander by the brookside where crystal waters are rippling over their pebbly bed, chanting as they go. In the distance looms up the mountain, its summit tipped with gold, as the rising sun awakes from the dreams of night. Thitherward we bend our steps; slowly ascending its uneven sides we at last reach the summit, and seating ourselves upon its grassy mound, we contemplate the world around us. Green fields are spread out far beneath, where lowing herds are seeking their morning meal, and the joyous feathered songsters are making melody in the forest that skirts the mountain side; and gentle winds are kissing the dewdrops from every leaf that flutters in the breeze. All nature is chanting forth its morning song of praise; and the scene around us as far as the eye can reach, is one of beauty and loveliness.

Here I ask, can it be possible that it is but a picture to be wiped out by the hand of him who painted it?

Why should he spook into existence a scene so lovely as this brown earth on which we tread but to destroy it forever?

Was it created in vain?

Are the inhabitants thereof to utterly perish?

Or is it to continue forever the battlefield between the good and the evil?

Is there never to be a readjustment of human affairs?

Is there to be always sickness and death, poverty and want, the oppressed and the oppressor—him that doeth well, and him that doeth not well?

I pause for an answer. O how have I cried in the bitterness of my soul in the days that are long passed, for light—a light that would lighten the dark future, and reveal the, what-is-to-be, of the earth and the inhabitants thereof.

And here I ask, is it not consistent and reasonable to suppose that a world peopled with intelligences like ours, should have some knowledge of whence it came and whither it goes?

Does not every atom of our nature call for such a record, no matter from whence we came, or what the end may be?

Is it unreasonable to desire it, yea more, even to expect it?

Think you that if away back among the billions of years that are past if a little protoplasm took it into its little brainless mind (!) to differentiate and become a fish, then a serpent, after that a monkey, and finally members of the Liberal League, that it would not have told us what we would be next? or told us if we were like the crawfish to progress backwards and become again a brainless protoplasm?

Or what is far more reasonable and consistent—Think you that Deity, the self-existent who dwells in light unapproachable whom no man hath seen, nor can see, out of whom are all things, and by whom are all things, would speak into existence a world like ours and make no revelation of himself, or of his purpose concerning it? No record of the past? No history of the future? Can I, can you, can any one of us believe that such would be?

I turn then with reverence to the book we call the Bible, as such a revelation, as such a record, as such a history. More, I ever that there is no book known among men that has a shadow of claim, when compared with this book, to be such a revelation. It is however no more my purpose to-day than when I stood last before this audience to attempt to prove this book to be the voice of God, that is a subject for consideration of itself, but not now. Then I vindicated the book against false charges; to-day, I stand before you to show what it teaches in relation to the earth and the inhabitants thereof, in other words, in relation to the destiny of the world.

While I do not attempt to prove that its teaching is true, yet I believe it true with no shadow of doubt. If it be consistent and reasonable I hold it is your duty to believe it too, at least those who can; for, remember, if you believe it, and it prove to be false—prove not to be the voice of God, the darkness of the death that ends all will be no darker to you, than to those who disbelieve it.

But, on the other hand, if it be true, if it be the voice of God, then the glorious light of unending life will be great indeed to those believing it.

As regards then, the destiny of the earth the book is very clear and definite. Says the Psalmist David: "God laid the foundations of the earth that it shall not be removed forever."

Again David says: "Thy faithfulness is unto all generations; thou hast established the earth and it abideth."

Again Solomon says: "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh, but the earth abideth forever."

According to the teaching of this book then, the earth is not to be destroyed, is not to be burned to ashes, nor return again to its former chaotic state; but on the other hand, it is never to be removed.

I am met here by the infidel with the remark that, "the apostle Peter says the heavens shall pass away and the earth shall be burned up, therefore as the Bible contradicts itself it proves nothing." Wait a moment; do not be rash or hasty in judging. If you examine Peter more carefully you will find there is no contradiction. Peter is writing about the Mosaic heavens and earth, or constitution of things, and not the earth or globe. It is only necessary to examine the Bible carefully to find the phrase "heavens and earth" to mean "constitution of things," and the same of the word "world;" as for instance, the Mosaic "world," or "heavens and earth" was a constitution of things under Moses, based on a temple and temple service, a temporary arrangement for the time, till the perfect constitution of things, which it shadowed forth, should come; then it was to pass away.

The time had nearly arrived when Peter wrote that he might stir up their minds by way of remembrance. That he referred to the Mosaic world or heavens and earth, and not to the earth or globe and starry heavens is very clear from the fact that he refers to the old or antidiluvian world which he says by the word of God was destroyed by water, yet the earth or globe and starry heavens still remained. So he says "by the same word the heavens and earth (or constitution of things) which are now (at the time Peter wrote) are reserved unto fire." What fire? I answer the fire of God's judgment or wrath, for "our God is a consuming fire."

When the full time of judgment had come, the Mosaic heavens and earth passed away with a great noise, but the globe or literal earth and starry heavens still remain.

But in the passages I have quoted it will be readily seen that the globe or literal earth is to be understood, as it is contrasted with the generations of people who pass away, but it abideth. There is therefore no contradiction between the writers. Although the old world or heavens and earth passed away by water and the Mosaic constitution of things based on a temple and temple service passed away with the destruction of that temple, yet the earth abideth, and when the Gentile heavens and earth or constitution of things shall pass away, the earth will still remain, and a kingdom or constitution of things will be established that Paul says "shall never be moved."

Here let me ask, is it not consistent and reasonable that a time should come when the earth shall be brought back from the blight and curse of sin, and blossom into the Paradise of God? Is there ought in the book of nature or in science or in sound philosophy to contradict it? No verily: there is not. Then why not believe it?

But again, not only does the book tell us that the earth is to abide forever, but it tells us that it is to be the abode of mankind. Says David: The heavens, even the heavens are the Lords, but the earth hath he given to the children of men. Psa. cxv. 16. And Isaiah in graphic language declares that, Thus saith the Lord, the Holy One of Israel, Ask me of things concerning the work of my hands, command ye me. I have made the earth and created man upon it; I, even my hands have stretched out the heavens, and all their hosts have I commanded. Thus saith the Lord that created the heavens; God himself, that formed the earth and made it, he formed it to be inhabited. I am the Lord and there is none else.

Who can read the words and not feel that it is the voice of God and not man?

The earth then, is not only to abide forever, but it is to be inhabited by the children of men. The book says it was created for that purpose. I ask, is it not reasonable, is it not what we would naturally expect?

But the question naturally arises here, is the earth to remain forever as now? Will it continue to bring forth briers, and thorns, and thistles, and noxious weeds? Will fruit blight, potatos rot, wheat rust; and will the midge, the weevil, the army worm and the grasshopper devour?

In a word, will the curse remain, and man eat bread in the sweat of his brow, the infant die at the breast, and man live out but half his days?

What saith the book? Listen. "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." Isaiah xi. 9.

Again, "The seed shall be prosperous; the vine shall give her fruit, and the ground shall give her increase; and the heavens shall give their due." Isa. viii. 12.

"Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree, and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree." Isaiah lv. 13.

"I will open rivers in high places and fountains in the midst of the valleys; I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water. I will plant in the wilderness the cedar tree, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree. I will set in the desert the fir tree, the pine, and the box tree together." Isa. xli. 18, 19.

For a further description of what is to be let the reader turn and read Isa. lxv. 18–25.

What a full and comprehensive answer Isaiah has given to all our questionings. What a beautiful state of things is set forth in this book—the Bible—as the future for this world! Does it look as if it were to be destroyed? When this state of things obtains, will it not be most desirable—a Paradise that any man might desire to enjoy? Again I ask, is there ought that appears inconsistent or unreasonable? Is there ought in the book of nature, or in science that forbids it? Then why cannot we believe it?

But this is not all that is in store for the world. This happy state of things is not to be marred by war and strife. Then the earth will not be deluged with blood, nor mankind scourged with pestilence and famine; the oppressor will not be, nor the poor starve that the rich may surfeit. He that doeth not well will cease to exist, and he who stabs in the dark, whether with tongue or steel, shall perish, for the book says: "The wicked shall never inherit the earth, but the righteous shall never be removed." Proverbs x. 30.

Again the book says, "The upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it, but the wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressor shall be rooted out of it; but the righteous shall inherit the land and dwell therein forever." Prov. ii. 21, 22.

Here again let me ask, Is it unreasonable that the good should overcome the evil? That the oppressor and he sheddeth blood, and robbeth the poor, and taketh that which is not his own—doing that which is evil all his days, should cease to exist and perish from the earth? Is it something to be sneered or scoffed at, or even doubted? Is there anything more to be desired? Could the most astute member of the Liberal League beget and bring to the birth a more desirable future for our world? Why then can we not believe it?

It claims to be God's purpose made known to man. It asks of him to believe it and obey it, and so develop that Godlike character which God will honor with unending life in the approaching age, or happy future that awaits the world when the good has triumphed and the evil has ceased to be?

But friends, this is not all that is in store for man. Sickness, pain and death are to pass away, and man be lifted from his present state of corruption and death to a state of incorruptibility and life.

The book says, "God hath declared that he will ransom them (the believing and obedient) from the power of the grave." "He will redeem them from death."

He says, "O Death, I will be thy plagues! O Grave, I will be thy destruction!" "The tabernacle (dwelling place) of God shall be with men, and they shall be his people; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things have passed away." "He that overcometh shall inherit all things, and I will be his God and he shall be my son."

Now I appeal to you as friends, as members of a Liberal League, to answer me truly, Is it not worth the consideration of every honest, liberal minded man who desires the exaltation of the race, and well being of mankind?

Who can show one valid reason for not believing it to be true? Laying aside the fact that it comes to us as the voice of God, who is prepared to show that it is not deserving our attention, nay more, that it does not command our admiration? Why then waste mental labor, and physical energy, and valuable time in trying to devise some scheme for the amelioration of mankind other than that devised by him who created all things, and knoweth best how the wrong shall cease, and the right obtain. Why then not believe the truth, live in peace and abide the time of him whose right it is to rule, and who will according to his own purpose, lift the present groaning creation from the bondage of sin and death into the glorious liberty of the sons of God? Who in his own time and in his own way will save the world from scheming politicians, usurping demagogues, corrupt syndicates, grasping monopolies, and cruel oppressors—lifting it into a happy condition of prosperity and peace under the righteous rule of a theocratic nation—a royal priesthood, a holy people.

In a word then, according to this book, the world is destined in the not far distant future, to be delivered from the bondage of corruption, from all evil and evil-doers, and become the dwelling-place of the Elohim of Deity—the Paradise of God, and the eternal inheritance of all those who turn a listening ear, with an honest heart to the good news which I have this day declared unto you, and which God has caused to be proclaimed and written in a book for the belief and obedience of those who would be sons of God and share in his glory.

In conclusion then, I must assure you that no one may expect to participate in the glories of the approaching age who has not a comprehensive knowledge of the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, soon to be established upon the mountains of Israel, and the things concerning the name of Jesus Christ, and subsequently, in obedience thereto shall have been immersed for the remission of sins and for the name, and shall continue in all the apostles' doctrine and teaching faithful to the end.

Therefore he that would enter into the Paradise of God must believe the glad tidings of the glorious reign of God on earth in the person of his Son, the kingdom of God again established upon the mountains of Israel in fulfillment of the promise made to the fathers, that in Abraham and his seed all nations of the earth should be blessed, and the glory of God fill the whole earth.

He must believe that away yonderin the Eastern World, where once the rising sun tipped with gold the vine-clad hills of Judea as the smoke of the morning sacrifice rose a sweet-smelling savor to the throne of heaven, he who swore with an oath unto David that he should never lack a son to set upon his throne will redeem his promise.

He must believe that the land covenanted to Abraham, once flowing with milk and honey, but now barren and unfruitful, made desolate by the sins of her people, oft deluged with blood, and now polluted by the footprint of the Mussulman and Turk, is to become again the glory of the whole earth—is to be the territory of the kingdom.

He must believe that the babe of Bethlehem born in a stable, cradled in a manger, the man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; who suffered the ignominious death of the cross, was Jesus the Son of God; was the promised seed of Abraham; was the divine son of David, whom God the Father raised from the dead to sit on David's throne; and who now sits at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens is to come again as the King of that kingdom.

He must believe. That all the ancient dead, who like Abraham died in the faith, with all those, who since the resurrection of Jesus by God the Father, to be both the Lord and Christ, have fallen asleep in him, will be raised from the dead, and with those who now believe these glorious truths, will be clothed with immortality, and as his bride will become the assistant rulers in the kingdom—kings and priests with him in the government of the world.

He must believe. That Israel, God's people, who for all these long years have been peeled and scattered, and downtrodden among all nations of the earth are by God remembered for the fathers sakes, and will be by the mighty hand of God brought again to their own borders, and established again in their own land as mortal subjects of the kingdom.

He must believe. That the left of the nations, after the subjugation of the world to the righteous rule of Jesus and the saints, will "beat their swords into plowshares," and their "spears into pruninghooks" and learn war no more, but delight themselves in abundance of peace, and be the mortal subjects of the dominion of the kingdom, which kingdom and dominion will then extend from the rivers, which will flow out of Jerusalem, to the ends of the earth.

He must believe. That when these things come to pass, then will be fulfilled the promise of God to Abraham, saying, "In thee and in thy seed shall all nations of the earth be blessed;" and the oath of God to David, saying, "I will not lie unto David, his seed shall endure forever, and his throne as the sun before me;" and the message from high heaven to Mary, saying, "The Lord God shall give unto thy Son Jesus the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

He must believe, "That then the tabernacle, or dwelling place of God will be with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God; and will wipe all tears from all eyes and there shall be no more death neither sorrow, nor crying, nor any more pain, for the former things are passed away—all things are made new."

These things comprehended, believed and obeyed according to the Scriptures and he shall with all the redeemed of earth walk the golden streets of "the city of the Great King," climb the vine-clad hills of Eden's land, bathe in the pure streams that flow from the throne of God, and bask in the joys of an endless life amid the groves of Paradise made fragrant with the perfume of undying flowers.

Then shall the redeemed of earth from every nation, kindred, people, and tongue, clothed with immortality, and the white robes of righteousness, with palms in their hands, stand upon the glory capped hills of Israel's land, and make heaven and earth resound with the shout, "O death where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?" and every rock, and hill, and dale, takes up the sound, and echoes back the strain, "Where now thy sting O death? where now thy victory O grave?"

Editor Restitution:

Seeing that the German Baptists (or Tunkers) are disposed to get up the impression that the debate between myself and T. W. Drennen, at Argos, last April, was a great success for them, I beg leave to submit to you for publication, in THE RESTITUTION, the following copy of a letter I received from friend Drennen yesterday, which I think will have a tendency to put a quietus to any further efforts of theirs toward obtaining a victory.

COPY OF ELDER DRENNEN'S LETTER TO ELDER PENIMORE.

August, 6. 1881.

Dear Brother:

Since my last combat, I have been investigating the doctrine you advanced, and now must, like an honest man, acknowledge that you are right; and if God spares my life I will preach the same doctrine that you teach. But I want to preach it in the same place where I condemned it.

Now write just as soon as you receive this and let me hear from you, and make an appointment for you and me, at Argos, and let me know at what time you will be there, and I will meet you, if the Lord let me live to get there.

Signed, T. W. DRENNEN.

Now, inasmuch as boasting is "excluded" by the law under which we are, I want to say, that if the German Baptists have any more preachers they want converted to the truth, let them bring them out; but after this I would rather they would just keep a little quiet about the Drennen debate.

Will say in response to Brother Mensmore, that I will meet any man of the Tunkers, or any other body, on the kingdom. I am not particularly starving for a fight, but I believe the doctrine of the kingdom as we teach it, and I am glad to advocate it in any way that it may be advanced and Christ thereby glorified.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NORTHERN INDIANA CONFERENCE.

The Annual Conference of the Churches of God in Northern Indiana will be held at Argos, Marshall Co., Ind., and will commence on Thursday, September 8, 1881, at 7:30 p. m., and continue Friday, Saturday, and Sunday the three days following. Public services will commence at 10:30 a. m., on Friday and other appointments will be made as shall be thought most advisable. A general attendance is requested, as the desire of our brethren, as has been expressed, is to have one more good meeting, at least, before the close of this dispensation. Argos is on the Michigan City, Peru, and Indianapolis railroad, eight miles south of Plymouth, the County-seat of Marshall County. Let it be our prayer that we may meet in the fulness of the gospel of Christ.

BY ORDER OF COMMITTEE.

I will preach as follows: At brother Griffin's the 3d Sunday in September, at Gospel Grove the next Sunday, at Dundee, Blackford Co., Ind., the next Sunday, in brethren Elton's neighborhood, south of Delta, O., the next Sunday, at Raisin, Mich., as brother L. C. Cline may appoint the next Sunday, at Buchanan, Mich., the following Sunday.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

A Conference of the Church of God will be held five and one-half miles northwest of Morrill, Brown Co., Kan., and six miles south of Salem, Neb., commencing on Friday, Aug. 19, 1881, to continue over the following Sunday. Brother J. M. Stephenson and other preaching brethren are expected. An earnest invitation is extended to all the faithful ones to attend from the north, south, east, and west.

C. A. SAYLOR.

Providence permitting, the brethren of the Abrahamic faith will hold a General Conference for the state of Wisconsin, at Greenfield Station, Monroe county, commencing Friday evening, Sept. 9, 1881, and continue over Sunday. H. V. Reed has promised to be with us to expound the Word of Life, and Sister A. C. Sedgwick is expected. Come brethren, one and all, and let this meeting be a general rallying for the Master.

Greenfield is on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R.

WEARY PILGRIM.

WILLIS LOGAN.

Oh weary pilgrim tried in God,
And keep your garments pure;
Faint not beneath the chastening rod,
And make your calling sure.

The sun and moon and stars proclaim
Our Savior's advent nigh;
Man's hearts are failing them for fear,
The waves are rolling high.

Soon that eventful day will come;
Shall we our loved ones see?
Oh shall we meet the Holy One
Upon the crystal sea?

A robe of pure and spotless white
Will deck each wedding guest;
The crown of thorns will be removed;
We soon shall be at rest.

J. CAMERON.

THE PRESENT POSITION OF CHRIST IN HEAVEN, IN RELATION TO HIS COMING TO SIT ON THE THRONE OF DAVID.

In Psa. cx. it is written "Jehovah said to my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool."

And the apostle alludes to this when he says (Heb. x. 13) our Lord is "from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool." Two points here call for explanation.

1. Who are his enemies? and—

2. What are we to understand by their being made his footstool?

The definition of "his enemies" in this Psalm must be held to be the most certain; and that is "kings" and "the heads over many countries." Of course these are Gentile rulers, and the prophecy must be held to include their armies, especially those employed against the authority of the Messiah. There is no mention here of such individuals as reject the claims of the Christ, far less of the great mass of heathenism who are simply ignorant of the true God.

Thus—"The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath." "He shall wound the heads over many countries."

And it is also evident from this Psalm that it is the kings and rulers who oppose the Christ about the time when "the rod of his strength is sent out of Zion" and he "rules in the midst of his enemies."

This is corroborated by other Scriptures which describe the same events. Thus in Rev. xix. 19:—

"I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse and against his army."

At the 15th verse it is said that "out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword that with it he should smite the nations; and he shall rule them with a rod of iron."

So in Dan. ii. 44:—"In the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; it shall BREAK IN PIECES and CONSUME all these kingdoms and it shall stand for ever."

And just as in Rev. xix. 15 the nations are first smitten and AFTERWARDS RULED. So in Daniel they are first broken to pieces and yet become the subjects of the Messiah; for, in the parallel vision in chap. vii. he receives "dominion and glory and a kingdom that all people and nations and languages should serve him."

But how can nations be smitten, and be afterwards ruled? Or kingdoms be broken to pieces and consumed, and yet serve the Son of Man?

Simply by the destruction of their ruling authorities and their military power, while the mass of individuals composing the nation or kingdom is preserved.

The nation as a political entity is destroyed, and the subject people placed under a new government. It is thus that "the KINGDOMS of this world become the KINGDOMS of our Lord and of his Christ." The king-power passes from the hands that formerly held it, and is taken possession of by its rightful owner.

These remarks also explain such passages as Psa. ii. 8, 9; Isaiah and Rev. ii. 27, 28, which refer to the same period.

The nation of Israel has passed through the first portion of this experience—national breaking and consumption; but is destined also to realize the second—restoration of nationality. "O Israel thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thine help," expresses the truth of this in brief but comprehensive language. We have an illustration of this in Isa. vi., where the desolation of the ten tribes is predicted—"Within three-score and five years shall Ephraim be BROKEN THAT IT BE NOT A PEOPLE." But yet the bulk of the people survived. In twenty-one years from this time many were carried away to Assyria; and in sixty-five years Israel ceased to be a people, that is a nation. But it is also predicted that there "shall be no more utter destruction," that is, national destruction, as there was then, and afterwards in A. D. 72 by the Romans. Ezek. xxxvii. represents the national restoration by a resurrection of dry bones; and their national unity by two rods becoming one.

The second point is regarding the making the Christ's enemies his footstool. This is generally understood to mean actual subjugation, but it is possible that it only imports a preliminary stage in the process, such as the gathering of them into a limited locality in readiness for the outpouring of Divine power for their destruction. This alternative construction would suit the time of our Lord's departure from the right hand of his Father whether it should take place before the actual subjugation or immediately after it; for the subjugation can be shown to be God's act as well as the gathering. As to the gathering it is distinctly declared—

"I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle." Zech. xiv. 2. See also Joel iii. 2.

As to the subjugation it, as well as the gathering, is also described as the direct act of Jehovah. See Ezek. xxxviii. where the same scene is described.

It must also be borne in mind that the enemies referred to are exclusively those in existence at the epoch of the advent, and, in the nature of things, enemies that may come into existence after the advent must be excluded. The fact that God makes Messiah's enemies his footstool does not preclude the Messiah himself putting forth his delegated power in order to complete their subjugation. He also is represented as "smiting the nation with the sword of his mouth," which may be fitly viewed as equivalent to placing his feet on his footstool when he takes his seat upon his throne.

A SECOND LITERARY REVOLUTION.

The first literary revolution consisted in the publication of standard books in every department of literature at from one-third to one-tenth of their former cost.

The second literary revolution consists in a still further very great reduction (conditional) even from the revolution prices, while, at the same time, the average quality of the books will continue to be materially improved.

HOW CAN THESE THINGS BE?

To attempt an impossibility could of course result only in failure, and it would be useless, in our own interest, or in that of the many thousand customers who have shown us such earnest favor, and have given us such great patronage, to announce or promise what could not be performed. We have dealt frankly with our customers in giving facts concerning costs and profits in the past, and we do it now, by giving facts and figures illustrating how we can afford to still further reduce prices.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

Please note, at the start, our apology for not having done heretofore what we now propose to do, and consider—

1st—We published our first book only so long ago as January, 1879. Previous to that time we were entirely without experience in book publishing. What knowledge we had of the business was gained in newspaper publishing, and in book-selling.

2d—We were also at that time almost entirely without capital, and until so late as February, 1881, we labored under the difficulty of being without capital even approximately adequate for the magnitude of the enterprise we were undertaking.

3d—Our entire scheme was in opposition to all previous methods of publishing and book-selling. And from the beginning to the present, we have had the combined bitter opposition of almost the entire book-publishing and book-selling classes of the United States.

4th—Starting thus, with a minimum of knowledge, and less capital, and with such immense opposition, we thought it best, in the interest of both the waiting public and ourselves, that we undertake too little, rather than too much; partial success would be better than total failure.

5th—In spite of our want of resources and of experience, and in spite of opposition, and with the necessity of organizing and training our new forces, and necessarily trying many experiments, all of which no one could expect would be uniformly successful, we have from January 1, 1880, to June 30, 1881, manufactured and sold nearly 2,000,000 volumes of standard books, for which we have received the considerable sum of $109,521.92.

6th—In a circular issued in January of the present year we made the following statement: "The public have so long been taught to believe books to be expensive luxuries and low prices impossible, that incredulity has from the first been the greatest obstacle to the progress of the Library Revolution. It was easier to make good books cheap than it was to make people believe it could be done. We could readily have made prices even lower than they have been, but for the terrible tax we have been compelled to pay to this incredulity."

We have during this period, from January 1, 1880, to June 30, 1881, paid for advertising, the large sum of $140,878.03. This immense item necessarily has to come out of the profits we make on the books sold.

7th—Although our scheme originally embodied the principle of selling directly to the consumer, and doing away with the exorbitant cost of middlemen, we have not undertaken to put aside the book-seller and the book agent altogether, because a large portion of the book-buyers of the country have got into the habit of looking to them for their supplies, and if we were to supply the wants of such customers at all, we were compelled to do it through these ordinary channels. But we have endeavored to induce or compel these middlemen to work, as we have been doing, on a more reasonably small percentage of profit (the immensely increased sales at the reduced prices, even with the smaller commissions, really give the book-seller a larger net profit than he formerly had). Accordingly, we have during this period, from January 1, 1880, to June 30, 1881, added to the book-sellers and book-agents commissions averaging about 25 per cent. of our total receipts. In other words, in addition to the $109,521.92 we have received from the public for our books, the public has also paid to the middlemen the large sum of $27,356.41 simply for handling these books, making the total cost of the books to the consumer $86,901.65.

8th—From these statements you can readily see that if

From the total we'll which the public has paid for our books..... $86,901.65

We received (we won't we have paid for advertising these) books..... $140,878.03
And the won't paid to middlemen for handling books.. 17,980 33

We have a total deduction of... $158,858.36

And a remainder of..... $28,042.69

Thus it is evident that if the public had bought these books directly from us, the unnecessary expenses of advertising, and of paying middlemen for handling them, would be saved, the books would have cost them only $58,042.69, being almost 50 per cent. less than the $86,901.65 which they have paid for them, and our net proceeds would have been none the less.

A BETTER ILLUSTRATION.

The above figures show clearly the possibility of a great reduction from our prices heretofore given without diminishing our net income, but they do not necessarily show that it is possible for us to manufacture and sell books at such low prices without loss to us. As we have never made pretense of publishing books from charitable or philanthropic motives, and do not wish our friends to think we are doing business at a loss, we will give a conclusive and interesting illustration of how we can afford these low prices.

LIBRARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE.

After a labor of nearly two years by an able corps of American editors and writers, for whose services we have paid nearly $30,000, we have within the brief period of less than ten months made electrotype plates for the Library of Universal Knowledge at a further cost of nearly $30,000, making a total investment on this work of about $60,000. This labor all being done and paid for, the 15 large octavo volumes, making the largest Encyclopedia ever published in this country, can be manufactured at a cost per set of 15 volumes of—

For paper	$2 52
For printing	98
For binding	2 48
Total	$5 98

These electrotype plates which we have manufactured will readily print 100,000 copies, and then by slight repairing will print from 50,000 to 100,000 additional copies, but to make our estimate absolutely safe we will assume that it will be necessary to manufacture a new set of electrotype plates after 50,000 copies have been printed. Thus we must add to the above cost of the manufacture of one set of the ($5.98), an additional $1 as the proportionate cost of the plates for each set of 15 volumes. A further item must also be added to cover expenses of office, handling, shipping, etc., which experience leads us to estimate below 50 cents per set, but as we must do at least a safe business we will add, instead, for this item another $1, making the total cost of manufacture and handling the 15 octavo volumes of the Library of Universal Knowledge $7.98.

Thus you see that if we sell a copy of this great Encyclopedia even at the net price of $10, we still have a net profit of over $2. As we have already sold about 15,000 sets in advance of completion, we think it very safe to estimate (and we have heard of neither friend nor enemy who makes an estimate lower) that we shall sell, as fast as we can manufacture them, at least 100,000 sets, and allowing our figures above given to be correct, we have the comfortable sum of $200,000 to cover contingencies, and dividends to our stockholders.

As some of our friends may question whether our estimates above given are perfectly safe, and as we have heard of some instances where the accuracy of figures previously given by us has been disputed by our enemies, we will say that the cost of the paper is put at 3 cents per pound, the cost of press work at $1.20 per thousand impressions, and the cost of binding at 16½ cents per volume.

THE PRACTICAL POINT.

We now come to the practical point in which you are interested—how you may get the books you want at the lowest possible cost.

It is evident that it can only be done by your doing away, so far as you are concerned, with our immense expenditure for advertising, and with the commissions which we or you are compelled to pay the middlemen, if you buy through the middlemen.

Another extremely important point in enabling us to afford the lowest possible price is that we receive quick returns for the investments we have made.

You readily see that we have invested about $60,000, cash, before we are able to offer you a complete set of the Library of Universal Knowledge at any price. We must sell a great many thousand sets before we can even get back the money which we have invested, to say nothing of the reward which we must have, in some measure, for our labor and the capital of the stockholders involved.

A large portion of the public still persist in getting their supplies of books through the middlemen (who must be paid for their services) instead of from us direct; and as a large expenditure for advertising will also continue to be necessary, in finding out new customers, we must continue to hold to our present retail prices, in order that we may be able to pay these enormous expenses for advertising and for commissions to middlemen.

But because we are thus compelled to tax book-buyers generally with these heavy expenses, there is no counter why we should continue this heavy tax upon you individually if you choose to assist us in avoiding it.

OUR PROPOSITION TO YOU.

We therefore make you this proposition: If you will send your order for the Library of Universal Knowledge to her for yourself or for any number of friends you may secure at once, so that we can receive the same on or before the first day of September, 1881, we will accept such orders at a discount of one-third from our published list prices, making net prices to you as follows:

LIBRARY OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE.

For the 15 vols., in cloth, net	$40 00
In half Russia, sprinkled edges	45 00
In half Russia, gilt top	45 00
In full library sheep, marbled edges	46 66

Orders sent to us under this offer will be accepted and filled by us under the following terms and conditions:—

CONDITIONS.

1st—We find in this case, as has commonly been our custom, require that remittances shall accompany the orders. Payments may be made at any time that may suit the convenience of the purchaser, on or before the delivery of the books to him, and not later than January 1, 1882.

2d—But in making deliveries of the books we shall give precedence to orders which are accompanied by remittances in full payment, shipping first those for which payment is first received.

3d—After filling all orders which have been fully paid for at time of order, we shall, on shipping, give precedence to orders which are accompanied by a payment of 10 per cent. or more on account of said order, the balance then to be paid on or before delivery of the books.

4th—The earlier shipments will be made to those who have sent no payment with the order, precedence being given to those whose orders are first received by us, payment of course being required on or before delivery of the goods.

5th—We shall not consider orders unaccompanied by any remittance as binding upon the person making it. If from any cause he is unable to take the books, or shall not then desire to do so, but in case payment is not made promptly when such person is notified that his books are ready for delivery, he will first forfeit his position on our delivery list, his name being transferred to the end, and in case payment is not made promptly when the name is again reached and he is notified, he will then forfeit the privilege of purchasing at less than our full list prices, and no order will thereafter be accepted from him under any similar special offer which we may in the future make on other of our publications, unless the same is accompanied by payment.

ABOUT OUR OTHER PUBLICATIONS.

As the present stock of our miscellaneous publications is now comparatively limited, and as our entire manufacturing resources will in all probability be for months to come taxed to the utmost by the manufacture of the Library of Universal Knowledge alone, we cannot undertake to make an offer similar to the above upon the books covered by our miscellaneous list, except to the extent of our stock in hand. Until our supply is exhausted we will accept in connection with an order for the Cyclopedia, under the above offer, orders for any of our miscellaneous books at the same rate of discount (one-third) from our list prices, but in all cases we shall require that orders for miscellaneous books under these terms shall be accompanied by the cash, as these books can be delivered at once, and cash orders will certainly soon exhaust our supply.

Any remittance received for miscellaneous books, the supply of which may have by that time been exhausted, will either be returned promptly, or the amount will be applied toward the payment for the Library of Universal Knowledge as may be directed.

VERY IMPORTANT.

In connection with the special terms given above, please note particularly the following points:

1st—We look to you direct for your order, and we also ask you to assist in spreading the knowledge of the existence, character, and low prices of our publications. The larger our sales, and the more promptly they are made, the more rapidly can we go forward manufacturing other equally good books at equally low prices. We will gladly furnish you any reasonable quantity of catalogues and circulars for distribution.

2d—The terms herewith given are limited strictly to orders which shall be received by us on or before September 1, 1881. Orders received after that date must positively come under our usual list prices or terms to clubs, which latter are limited to 10 per cent., or, as the utmost, 15 per cent. discount from our list prices.

3d—We are well aware of the fact that very many book-buyers have not at a moment's command even $10 which they can invest, however great the inducements. This offer gives you the privilege of making payment when it suits your convenience, at any time before January 1, 1882.

4th—The "Library of Universal Knowledge" was completed on July 15th, 1881, and we are now delivering the same in the various styles of binding advertised. It is a verbatim reprint, in large type, of the last (1880) London edition of Chambers's Encyclopedia, with copious additions (about 15,000 topics) by American editors, the whole combined under one alphabetical arrangement, with such illustrations as are necessary to elucidate the text. It gives an amount of matter about 10 per cent. more than Appleton's Cyclopædia (price, in cloth, $80.00), and 20 per cent. more than Johnson's Cyclopædia (price $54.00, in cloth). For the general reader it is undoubtedly the best Encyclopædia ever published, whatever the price. Specimen pages will be sent free upon application. AMERICAN BOOK EXCHANGE, 764 Broadway, New York. JOHN B. ALDEN, Manager.

Brevities.

Excavations commenced a short distance from the walls of Pompeii with a view of ascertaining the nature of the surroundings of the city, have led to the discovery, within an area of a few square yards, of thirty skeletons, ten of which were huddled together in one room of a small suburban villa. Bracelets, necklaces, earrings and other objects were found upon the bones.

A writer in the Jewish World points out that, contrary to the received idea, the elder rabbis of the Talmud taught that the world was round. This is shown by a passage in which, in discussing idolatry the figures holding in the hand a baton, a bird, or a globe were prohibited, because the baton symbolizes the dominion of the world, the bird that the world lies beneath it and the globe is forbidden because it resembles the form of the world itself.

From Cairo it is learned that in a single catacomb in Upper Egypt thirty-six well-preserved sarcophagi of ancient royal personages have been brought to light. They represent almost all the kings and queens of the earlier Theban dynasty, and besides the mummies, contain parchment rolls, statues of Osiris, ornaments, and other funeral articles. Among the names of Pharaohs on these coffins are Raskenen, Amenophis I., Ahmes, Nofretari, Aahotep, Thotmes II. and III., and Rameses XII.

Kossuth is still living at Buraccon, in Piedmont, not very far from Turin. He leads a most retired life, visits nobody, and cares to see no visitors but Americans, to whom he is always "at home." In spite of his advanced years —he was born in April, 1802, and is consequently well on toward 80—he still retains largely his extraordinary powers of work, and can even read without spectacles upon bright days. He has lately been painfully bereaved in the death of his long-time companion and faithful friend, General Ihasz.

HOURS AND MINUTES.

Why is our hour divided into sixty minutes? Why not divide our time as we do our money, by tens, counting ten, or fifty, or 100 minutes to the hour? This question was asked by an intelligent boy a few days since, and the answer given him may both interest and instruct other young people. The answer is this: We have sixty divisions on the dials of our clocks and watches, because the old Greek astronomer, Hipparchus, who lived in the second century before Christ, accepted the Babylonian system of reckoning time, that system being sexigesimal. The Babylonians were acquainted with the decimal system, but for common and practical purposes they counted by sossi and sari, the sossi representing sixty, and the saros sixty times sixty, 3,600. From Hipparchus, that mode found its way into the works of Ptolemy, about 120 A. D., and thence was carried down the stream of science and civilization, and found its way to the dial-plates of our clocks and watches.

THE EARLY SYSTEM OF ASTRONOMY.

From the examination of a book compiled 2,000 years B. C. it has been ascertained, what has long been supposed, that Chaldea was the parent land of astronomy; for it is found, from this compilation and from other bricks, that the Babylonians catalogued the stars, and distinguished and named the constellations. They observed the seventh day as a day of rest. They invented the sundial to mark the movements of the heavenly bodies, the water-clock to measure time, and they speak in this work of the spots on the sun, a fact they could have known only by the aid of telescopes, which it is supposed the possessed, from observations they have noted down of the rising of Venus, and the fact that Layard found a crystal lens in the ruins of Nineveh. These "bricks" contain an account of the deluge, substantially the same as the narrative in the Bible. They disclose that houses and lands were then sold, leased, and mortgaged; that money was loaned at interest; and that the market gardeners, to use an American phrase, "worked on shares;" that the farmer, when plowing with his oxen, beguiled his labor with homely songs, two of which have been found, and connect this very remote civilization with the usages of our own times.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GREEK AND ENGLISH!

—JUST ISSUED—

THE EMPHATIC DIAGLOTT

—BY BENJAMIN WILSON.—

Contains the Original Greek text of the New Testament, with an interlinear word-for-word English translation, based on the renderings of eminent critics, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscripts, together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references.

The different renderings of various passages in the New Testament are also formulated, on which most of the sects of Christians have been built up; with this work each reader may judge for himself whether the words there literally translated are so arranged in the common version as to express the exact meaning of the New Testament writers.

J. P. WEETHEE.

The Vision.—"And the sixth angel sounded and I heard a voice from the four horns of the golden altar which is before God, saying to the sixth angel, which had the trumpet, Loose the four angels which are bound in the great river Euphrates. And the four angels were loosened, which were prepared for an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year, for to slay the third part of men. And the number of the army of the horsemen (were) two hundred thousand thousand; and I heard the number of them. And thus I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates of fire, and of jacinth, and of brimstone, and the heads of the horses (were) as the heads of lions; and out of their mouths issued fire, and smoke and brimstone. By these three was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths. For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails; for their tails (were) like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt. And the rest of the men which were not killed by these plagues yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold and of silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood; which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk; neither repented they of their murders, nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts." Rev. ix. 13–21.

General View.—In ordinary visions, none of the senses are interested, that of seeing, and of hearing. In like manner John sees and also hears various sounds. He hears the blast of the sixth trumpet. This marks the commencement of the vision. A voice issues from the horns of the golden altar, before God. It is a vision of the High priesthood of Christ. The drapery of the temple still continues. The agents and events that follow are under the control of the Deity. He issues the edict. We speak of accidents. An event that follows a command is no accident: it is ordered by divine authority. We are taught that God orders the events on earth, as well as in heaven. The series of events that follow are ordered and sure.

The sixth angel is celestial, and belongs to the officiating priesthood, and is ordered to loose the four angels (all the angels in that quarter). They have been bound—restricted by some hand. The time has now come for them to act; loose them, take off all restrictions. The nature of their agency requires great freedom. The sounding of the trumpet is a military signal. The quarter of the globe is designated. "At the great river Euphrates."

The four angels are great chiefs; they command armies of cavalry—(horsemen). Their commission is to slay; in one division of the Roman empire, (third part of men).

The armies are vast. The dress of the warriors is seen. Their breastplates were, in color, like gold, hyacinth, and brimstone—"yellow, blue, scarlet"—national colors, peculiar to the Turks. These colors belong equally to the harness of the horses and to the dress of the rider. The heads of the horses, in their war harness, resembled those of lions, and like lions was their voice. "None shall be weary nor stumble among them; none shall slumber nor sleep; neither shall the girdle of their loins be loosened, nor the latchet of their shoes be broken. Whose arrows (are) sharp, and all their bows bent, their horses' hoofs shall be counted like flint, and their wheels like a whirlwind. Their roaring (shall be) like a lion, they shall roar like young lions; yea, they shall roar, and lay hold on the prey, and shall carry (it) away safe; and none shall deliver (it)." Isa. v. 28, 29.

Smoke seemed to issue, fire and smoke and brimstone. They rush into battle and a division (the Greek) of the Great Empire (Roman) is overthrown.

These plagues, however, resulted as other plagues, in hardening the living; they repented not of their idolatry, nor of their murders, sorceries, fornications, nor of their thefts. Through a long series of years, commissioned by the Almighty, this invincible army rides forth to execute its desolating work.

The nature of the agent and of his agency cannot be mistaken: their work is against Christianity (in name) and for a time they succeed.

Terms Explained.—1. Sixth Angel. Keep in mind the dignity of this messenger: he is the Sixth of the Seven Angels that John saw stand before God. (Rev. viii. 2.) and the second of the three that had no trumpets. We call your attention to their consecutive order, 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th. Each trumpet has its place and its mission; they follow in the order named. Their histories, therefore, are consecutive.

He is a celestial messenger, as to location (at the golden altar) and officer; he is an agent, in the work of Christ's royal high priesthood. While the nations of the earth seek only the promotion of their own interests this angel is wholly occupied in the promotion of the issues involved in his eventful mission. His task is great; yet he fears not, since he is sustained by the hierarchy of heaven. At the sound of his trumpet all, interested, assume their various positions.

One Voice—Revised Version (margin). Whose voice is not stated; it is the voice of one that has a right to command.

"The Horns."—There was a horn at each of the four corners. The horn was here a symbol of divine authority. Its source was a pledge of supreme power.

"Golden Altar."—This altar was in the celestial temple, which John had been viewing. The altar was that of incense—where incense, or divine virtue, was added to the prayers of the saints. From this altar went forth the approving voice, the voice of mercy, when the prayers were accepted. It is now the voice of an offended Deity; the prayers had long been idolatrous—a mixture; papal and pagan. To correct this apostacy one 100 of 150 years had spent its fury upon them; yet they had not reformed. Another woe is about commencing, saying to the sixth angel—

"Loose."—Some power has been bound. It has been confined to a certain locality; it must now have greater liberty; the mission demands a wider range; they must go where their work calls them; their mission calls them into the Great Empire.

"The Four Angels."—We have seven angels with trumpets, and four angels without trumpets; they are servants under higher authority; they are subordinate chiefs, to move as the executors of God's wrath. A great work is assigned them—high sheriffs, on a subordinate theatre; one on the earth.

"Bound."—They occupy a restricted territory; they are bound: bound as the great chiefs of a dynasty. They are not allowed to pass this boundary as conquerors, till the time comes for the work of their mission to commence. This binding is an extraordinary feature in national movements, requiring an unusual agency to fulfill it. Where are they bound? to what territory have they been held?

"At the Great River Euphrates."—"At" is the rendering of the Revised Version, and very correctly, for they are land powers. They are to deal with men. These waters are literal. The Euphrates is the literal river of that name. The four angels are not the river; nor is the combined power of these angels the Euphrates. Their location is at the river. The command is not loose the river, but loose the angels bound at the river; the angels and the river are therefore quite distinct; as the seven angels and the temple where they stood. These four angels are God's messengers to do a certain work. The time for their agency to commence has arrived; their commissions are given them, and they go forth as the servants of Jehovah in their special agency: not that God approved their characters, or that he sanctioned all their actions, in their special work only were they under divine control, as in the days of old. The same Being, ordered the four angels to be loosed "that said to the deep (Euphrates), Be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers. That saith of Cyrus, (He is) my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundations shall be laid. Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden to subdue nations before him, and I will loose the loins of kings, to open before him the two-leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut; I will go before thee and make the crooked places straight. I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron." Isa. xliv. 27, 28, xlv. 1, 2. God is the Master of Cyrus, and makes him do his bidding; so with the four angels bound at the Euphrates.

Their Mission.—To kill the third part of men, for the hour and day and month and year. The commission of the locusts was to torment men five months; the four angels had been prepared to kill the third part of men, for three hundred and ninty-one years and fifteen days, prophetic or symbolic time. These angels each had armies of horsemen.

Number of the armies of horsemen. In the Revised Version we have, "And the number of the armies of the horsemen was twice ten thousand times ten thousand; and I heard the number of them." The Greek is δυο μυριαδες μυριαδων (muriades murindon) two ten thousands of ten thousand, or twice ten thousand times ten thousand, or two millions. This represents the entire number employed during the long period of the agency, or nearly four centuries. It was proper for John to see the whole body of the destroying agents so as to be fully impressed with the magnitude of the work to be accomplished.

Horses and their riders described.—Their uniform.—The prophet has a distinct view, of what seemed to be a complex agent, the horse and his rider; they appear to be one and inseparable; actuated by one mind. The colors in their clothing are national, red, blue, and yellow. The trappings of the horses have the same colors.

Heads and mouths of the horses.—The heads are complex; the rider leaning forward with his firearms resting upon the head of the horse, would form, in the vision, one head, composed of his own in the yellow turban, and that of the horse, which would resemble a lion's head. The smoke would appear to issue out of the mouth of the horse. These horsemen were double-headed. Their swords and firearms and spears sometimes used gave them double heads.

Results.—An empire is overthrown. God shows his utter abhorence of Papal idolatry, by his terrible judgments; still they repent not of the works of their own hands.

THE WISDOM OF MOSES IS, "THE MISTAKES OF MOSES."

THOMAS WILSON.

Who has not heard of "the mistakes of Moses?"

Blatant and ignorant infidels have been talking about them as confidently and wisely as if their supposed discoveries had not been answered a hundred times before. Yet there are thousands of men who will sit hour after hour with gaping mouths to drink in the sickening mixture that men like infidel Bob serves them with, and gladly pay a good round sum for the privilege of being thus fed.

But our purpose now is not to recount the supposed mistakes of Moses and answer them, but to show that this ignorant Moses was, after all, wiser than the men who are attacking him, aye, as wise as the most illustrious scientists of the present day.

As has often been said, the Bible is not a text book of science, neither was it written to prove the truth of any science; yet, whenever it incidentally, in a few words, touches science, we find that it is in perfect accord with the most advanced scientific truths of the present day.

Much has been said by infidels about Moses recording the birth of light in the world, before he records the creation of the sun. What a fool he must have been, they say, not to have known that there could be no light until the sun was made. But we reply, if he had not known that light could be created and sustained independent of the sun, he would have exhibited very little sense in recording its existence first, and the creation of its source afterwards. If infidel Bob, his critic, had written the record of creation he would have exhibited his great wisdom by saying that God first created the sun the source of light, and then said, "Let there be light, and there was light." This would have removed all chance for criticism. But thanks to modern science, of which infidel Bob seems to be as ignorant as a Hottentot, it has been demonstrated and is now admitted that light can exist independent of the sun; therefore the Bible account is sustained, and infidelity defeated. But it required modern science to settle the point.

In like manner, all the attempts of infidels to demonstrate from geological sources that man has existed on the earth far more than 6,000 years, have proved futile.

In Leviticus xvii. Moses records the fact that "the life of the flesh is in the blood."

Did the accomplished surgeons of the days of Esculapius know this?

No! It is a recent discovery, hence physicians and surgeons of our day have in a great measure discarded the frequent blood-letting of older times. They have finally learned what Moses knew and recorded over 3300 years ago, that in the blood is a living principle which gives life to every part of the body. It is a man's stock in trade, and therefore must not be wantonly drawn upon.

Another evidence of the wisdom of this despised man Moses is found in Deut. xxxii. 2:—

"My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distill as the dew."

How exact!

Does the rain fall in continuous streams?

No. It drops.

But is dew distilled?

Yes. As spirits are formed from the condensation of vapor which goes off from the boiling liquid, so dew is formed from the condensation of watery vapor floating near the surface of the earth. In this way it is literally distilled. And this was not known a hundred years ago; and it is very questionable whether the wise-in-their-own-eyes critics of Moses know it now. They probably think that the dew drops, or falls. Moses knew better, and put his knowledge on record which it took thirty-two centuries of subsequent wisdom to attain.

David, Solomon and Job have all touched upon science, and like Moses, have proven that their wisdom was so far in advance of those who succeeded them, as to actually require the discoveries of modern science to demonstrate the exact truth of their words. For instance in Eccl. i. 5–7, is a compend of scientific wisdom:—

"The sun also ariseth and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he arose."

Here is a description of the rotation of the earth on its axis, speaking of it however, as is common now, according to the appearance of the sun to those on earth. But in the remainder of the verse the wise man exhibits a knowledge also of the motion of the earth in its orbit. King James' version reads, "the wind goeth toward the south," etc., but we are told this is an error, as the Hebrew reads, "He goeth toward the south," etc., referring to the object previously spoken of—the sun. And the Septuagint version reads, "The sun goeth toward the south." And the word "wind" takes the place of the word "it" immediately following, viz., "the wind whirleth about," etc. With this explanation, let us give the text properly rendered:—

"The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down, and hasteth to his place where he arose. He (the sun) goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; the wind whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits. All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full: unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again."

So that, as already stated, the motion of the earth in its orbit is clearly described where the sun is spoken of as (apparently) marching in its orbit, constituting the varied seasons we so much enjoy. "He goeth toward the south" to the Tropic of Capricorn, from which he "turneth about into the north" until he reaches the Tropic of Cancer, passing in his annual course through the twelve signs of the zodiac. And how many ages have passed since these simple words were penned, yet how comparatively recent are the conclusions of astronomomers agreeing with the description as recorded by Solomon 2800 years since.

And how long is it since science discovered that the wind does not blow in straight lines; that storms are cycloidal in their movements, as described by the wise man so many ages since?

Is it not the common idea even now, that winds blow in straight lines? that a gale starting in the north-east will blow in a direct line toward the south-west?

Recent discoveries however have proven that Solomon was right—that the wind and storms move in circles, and not in direct lines; that the wind whirleth about continually, and returneth again according to his circuits, or his goings round.

And in the remainder of the verse he discloses his knowledge of another recent discovery—that of aqueous circulation. The sun makes a draft upon the ocean, of watery vapor, which is carried by clouds over the hills and valleys of earth, where it is condensed into water, and drops upon the landscape below in the shape of refreshing showers, and is then carried back to the ocean again by means of rivers, all of which was so concisely and truthfully described by the wise man long, long ages ago.

So we might go on with one illustration after another, showing that in every instance where the Bible touches upon science, its descriptions are in accord with the most perfect science of the recent times. Who but the all-wise God could have imparted this information to those men in the far off ages of the past? Surely the mouth of the scoffer is closed; his lips are sealed, so far as his ability to prove the Bible and true science at variance is concerned.

Let us cling to the word of the Lord, brethren. Never let the objections of ignorant men have weight with us one moment, but depend upon it, that even though seeming discrepancies may appear, yet a careful search will cause them to vanish like the mist of the morning before the rising sun.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The Italian Athens.

G. C. MARSTON.

The center of the fine art and civilization of Italy is at Florence. This "city of flowers" was for many years the political capital of the kingdom, and the Patti palace is still the admiration of the world.

Florence is beautifully situated on the Arno river, two hundred and twenty-one miles from Rome, at the base of the Apennine mountains. It is the chief city of Tuscany, and has a population of 180,000.

Here is the house where Michael Angelo lived; here also is pointed out the house in which the immortal Dante was born in 1265. The home and grave of Amerigo Vespucci are objects of special interest to Americans. Here also lived Galileo, the philosopher who in the face of a world's angry maledictions still maintained that the earth revolved.

The Patti palace, an admirable structure, the royal residence of the Medici in the palmy days of the Florentine kingdom was begun more than half a century before America was discovered. The royal apartments occupied by the present king of Italy whenever he visits Florence, which is very infrequent, are very elegant. The tapestry and mosaics are all Florentine, and most exquisite.

The Picture gallery in the Patti palace contains 500 pictures, many of which are the masterpieces of Italy's most famous painters. Here hang the canvass representatives of such masters as Raphael, Michael Angelo, Titian, Cigoli, Rubens, Spagnoletto, Sarto, Tintorretto, and many others. I will not have the audacity to attempt a description of 500 illustrious paintings in a brief paragraph.

I was deeply impressed with Cigoli's "Ecce Homo." I have often read the account of Pilate presenting Jesus to the infuriated multitude with the salutation: "Behold the man," but I never realized the scene until I saw Cigoli's conception of it as he represents it in this sublime painting. I sat for half an hour at the feet of this Italian master and studied that interesting incident in our Lord's trial with overwhelming delight and pleasure. I seemed to be in the very presence of the "suffering Savior," and to hear the words as they fell from the opened lips of the Roman governor.

Of the thousands of famous paintings which I have seen none has left so deep an impression on my mind as this one. When you visit Florence be sure to see the Patti gallery and do not leave the gallery without seeing Cigoli's "Ecce Homo."

In the midst of the Uffizi gallery is an octogonal room which is called "the Tribuno." It "contains the rarest wonders of art" in the known world. Hawthorne says: "It is the richest room in all the world, a heart that draws all hearts to it." The finest pieces of the whitest masters are gathered into this little room.

The magnificent churches of this city beggar description—they must be seen to be appreciated and even after having seen them your appreciation must be very meagre unless you are a critic in such matters as art, architecture, etc. The Cathedral is one of the finest in Europe. It was commenced in the thirteenth century and is still unfinished. The facade was commenced in 1875, and will probably be completed sometime during the 20th century. It is made wholly of marble—white, green, and brown. At a distance it has the appearance of a magnificent pile of mosaic work. Internally it is a dark, dreary, damp, dungeon-like place where people gather in vast multitudes to say mass and count their beads and "work out their salvation" by "bodily exercise," which according to Sacred Writ "profiteth little." The inside is fully as elegant as the outside, and it would be a delight to see it if the pure light of heaven were permitted to shine through its frescoed windows.

The "Baptistery" is an octagonal chapel standing near the cathedral. Be sure to see the east door. Michael Angelo declared it fit to be the gate to Paradise. It is bronze with eight Bible scenes in bas relief. It is the work of Ghiberta which he finished in 1452.

The chapel takes its name from the fact that Catholic children at the tender age of twenty-four hours are here initiated into the mysteries of the Romish church by a rite which they call baptism. I had the good fortune of witnessing this ceremony, Sunday, July 17, 1881.

In the Church of St. Croce are the tombs of Michael Angelo and Galileo. The costliest and most beautiful chapel in Europe is the chapel of the Medici, in this City of Flowers, built from the private funds of the Medici kings. It is a small octagon. There are no paintings or frescoes except in the dome. It is simply and entirely mosaic. It is worth a long journey to see.

Mark Twain in his book entitled "A Tramp Abroad," tells more lies in all probability than he will ever find forgiveness for. In fact the book, from beginning to end is a tissue of falsehoods and caricatures. However, when he speaks in high commendation of his courier, Mr. J. N. Verey, his words are to be relied upon. This same Mr. V. is the conductor of the party with which I am making the tour of Europe, and I can say from personal knowledge that Mr. Verey is eminently qualified for his difficult work. He speaks fluently nearly all the languages of modern Europe, and knows thoroughly all the more interesting cities, not only of Europe, but also of the Orient.

Brevities.

Lieut. Condar, of the Palestine Exploration, recently stated in Edinburgh that their survey had identified 140 Scriptural sites in west Palestine, so that 430 out of 620 mentioned in the Bible were now fixed.

The Jews are making efforts for establishing a colony in the district of Gilead and Moab, and have secured, it is said, a grant from the Sultan of 1,500,000 acres of land for the purpose, for which they are to pay a large amount of money. The colony is to be tributary to the Porte.

The Crysanthemum is the title of a monthly magazine published at Yokohama, partly in Japanese, in Roman type, by native writers, and partly in English. Its avowed purpose is to encourage close relations between Japan and the Western world. The flower from which it takes its name, according to a native tradition, contains in its heart a dewy juice which is the real elixir of life.

The Christian, (London).

The drying up of the Turkish Empire is proceeding. During the last few years it has lost half of Armenia, all Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Cyprus; now it is proposed to take from Turkey and give to Greece, Thessaly and part of Epirus, while the French are manifestly aiming to possess Tunis. With what calm certainty are the great plans of the Lord worked out.

(London) Christian Herald of July 20.

The Church of St. Peter and St. Paul at Gorlitz, in Silesia, one of the most splendid specimens of mediæval architecture in Eastern Germany, is at present undergoing restoration. An extraordinary discovery has been made during the examination of the foundations of the tower. The workmen came upon the skeleton of a nun, who at some time was doomed to undergo a terrible form of punishment—which was much in favor with an extinct school of novelists—the being immured alive into a wall in process of construction. The bones of the victim were in perfect preservation, and the sleeves of the nun's garment, ornamented with splendidly executed embroidery, had kept their original whiteness. As the immurement cannot have taken place later than the fourteenth century, the linen which looked so fresh and clean must have been about five centuries old.

THE SYNAGOGUE OF CAPERNAUM.

The Palestine Exploration Society a few years ago, when they came to Tel Hum, (Capernaum) found what they believed to be the synagogue in which Jesus delivered the discourse contained in John vi., declaring himself to the "Bread that cometh down from heaven." In turning over the stones, it was with peculiarly sacred feelings that they found a large block, with a pot of manna engraved on its face. Every synagogue had its symbol, one a Lamb, another a Candlestick, and this, the Pot of Manna. We can see Jesus in this synagogue, preaching the discourse in John vi., pointing with his finger to that pot of Manna over the main entrance, and saying, "Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat .... Moses gave you not the bread from heaven;" then pointing to himself: "but my Father giveth you the true bread from heaven," etc. Take your Bibles and read the discourse in the light of this discovery, and see what new emphasis is to be laid upon the contrast between himself, the Bread that came down from heaven, and the Manna of Moses, represented by the engraven pot over the doorway.

According to an emigrant from Crete who was questioned by a correspondent of The Dia, Hon Amena is an Aragonese who escaped from the prison of Tarragona many years ago, and who has since lived in the interior of Africa, acquiring by his daring and his cleverness immense power over the Arabs, who regard him as a holy man and obey him blindly. He is supposed to have been about forty years in Africa, and to have been during that time a more ordinary robber and bandit.

He that would reap well must sow well.

THE RESTITUTION.

J. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, August 24, 1881.

We are compelled to defer several articles for want of room.

As this number makes out the fourth for August, and as our means will not warrant more than four numbers each month, our next paper will not be issued till September 7,—or the first week in next month.

To those who desire the Library of Universal Knowledge, which we have been advertising for some weeks past, we would say, read carefully in our last paper the article under the head of—A Second Revolution—and especially the conditions. We have reason to believe that the publishers will do all they promise.

It is with a feeling between hope and despair that all contemplate the condition of the President as we make up this paper. We have just read an article on inflamed parotid glands from the pen of Dr. Virchow, a celebrated German scientist. He regards a suppurative inflammation, in the case of patients, already exhausted by disease, as a very dangerous complication indeed. For ourself we have clung to hope in the darkest hours, knowing that God is able to bring up again from the very jaws of death. Our prayer has been for the President's final restoration to health; not only out of friendly respect to him, but also believing that national tranquility would thus be best promoted.

The following account of a recent discovery made in Egypt is of special interest. Dr. Henry Brugsch Pasha represented Egypt at the Philadelphia Centennial in 1876. His brother Herr Emil Brugsch made the remarkable discoveries alluded to in the paper below. Thothmes III. not only ordered the construction of the obelisk that stands upon the bank of the Thames but also of the one that now stands in Central Park, New York City. From another paper we append first the names of the royal mummies which have been identified by the learned antiquarian. We may also briefly add that the Patriarch Jacob died in the times covered by the reigns of these dead monarchs, and was as carefully embalmed as these royal personages, and therefore there is no doubt but he remains to-day, in as perfect a state of preservation in the cave of Machpelah as any one of these carefully preserved mummies. Joseph was also the subject of a royal embalming, and when carried up out of Egypt by Moses was carried out as a preserved mummy in his burial case of Sycamore wood, having been placed in some chamber of the dead till that time, just as these kings were placed in their gallery tombs. The wonderful discoveries of these last times all go to prove the truth of the Bible, and, in this infidel age, we look for still grander developments from antiquarian sources. This list contains the most important names that have been identified:

Aahmes I. (Amosis), 1st king of 18th dynasty, reigned B. C. 1700, about.

Amenhotep I. (Amehoki), 2d king of 18th dynasty, reigned B. C. 1066, about.

Thothmes I. 3d king of 18th dynasty, reigned B. C. 1663, about.

Thothmes II, 4th king of 18th dynasty, reigned B. C. 1600, about.

Thothmes III. (the Great), 5th king of 18th dynasty, reigned B. C 1600, about.

Rameses I. 1st king of 19th dynasty, reigned B. C. 1405, about.

Seti I. 2d king of 19th dynasty, reigned B. C. 1366, about.

Rameses II. (the Great), 2d king of 19th dynasty, reigned B. C. 1233, about.

Pinotem, 3d king of 21st dynasty, reigned B. C. 1033, about.

Rasheneu, dynasty and date of reign unknown.

MUMMIES OF EGYPTIAN KINGS.—VALUABLE PAPYRI ALSO FOUND.

Besides being memorable for the appearance of the comets, the year 1881 must ever hold a high place in the annals of Egyptological discovery. M. Maspero, the recently appointed Director of the Boulak Museum, is at the present moment in Paris, actively engaged in preparing for publication the texts of the pyramids of the fifth and sixth dynasties, which were opened last spring at Sakkara. The forthcoming number of his "Recueil" will contain the entire text of the pyramid of King Unasel, the last king of the fifth dynasty.

But the saying that "it never rains but it pours," may be now fairly applied to archæological discovery. Long before the savants have had time to peruse, ponder over, or profit by the wonders unearthed at Sakkara they are now suddenly overwhelmed with a fresh supply of material in the form of the largest papyri yet known, and by the apparition of the mummies, with all their mortuary appendages and inscriptions, of no less than thirty royal personages.

This discovery which has just been made calls for special interest in England, for among the thirty royal mummies are those of King Thutmes III. and of King Rameses II. It was the former who ordered the construction of the obelisk which now stands upon the Thames embankment, and it was the latter who, 270 years afterward, caused his own official titles to be inscribed upon its faces beside those of Thutmes II.

These two monarchs now lie side by side in the Boulak museum, and even the flowers and garlands which were placed in their coffins may to-day be seen encircling the masks which cover the faces of the deceased just as they were left by the mourners over 3,000 years ago.

Last June Daoud Pasha, Governor of the Province of Lench, which includes the ancient Theban district, noticed that the bedaween offered for sale an unusual quantity of antiquities at absurdly low prices. The Pasha soon discovered that the source of their hidden treasure was situated in a gorge of the mountain range which separates Deir-el-Bahari from the Bâb-el-Melook. This gorge is situated about four miles from the Nile to the east of Thebes.

Daoud Pasha at once telegraphed to the khedive, who forthwith dispatched to the spot Herr Emil Brugsch, a younger brother of Dr. Henry Brugsch Pasha, who, during M. Maspero's absence in Paris, is in charge of all archæological excavations in Egypt. Herr Brugsch discovered in the cliffs of the Lybian mountains, near the temple of Deir-el-Bahari, or the "Northern Convent," a pit about 35 feet deep, cut in the solid rock; a secret opening from this pit led to a gallery near 200 feet long, also hewn out of the solid rock. This gallery was filled with relics of the Theban dynasties.

Every indication leads to the conviction that these sacred relics had been removed from their appropriate places in the various tombs and temples, and concealed in this subterranean gallery by the Egyptian priests to preserve them from being destroyed by some foreign invader. In all probability they were thus concealed at the time of the invasion of Egypt by Cambyses.

Herr Brugsch at once telegraphed for a steamer, which on Friday last safely deposited her precious cargo at the Boulak Museum.

The full value of this discovery, of course, cannot yet be determined. The papyri have not yet been unrolled, nor have the mummies been unwrapped. Conspicuous by its massive gold ornamentation, in which cartouches are set in precious stones, is the coffin containing the mummy of Maut Nedjem a daughter of King Rameses II. Each of the mummies is accompanied by an alabaster canopic urn, containing the heart and entrails of the deceased.

Four papyri were found in this gallery, each in a perfect state of preservation. The largest of these papyri—that found in the coffin of Queen Rama-ka—is most beautifully illustrated with colored illuminations. It is about 16 inches wide, and when unrolled will probably measure 100 to 140 feet in length.

The other papyri are somewhat narrower, but are more closely written. These papyri will probably prove the most valuable portion of this discovery, as the late Mariette Pasha used to say, "it is certain if ever one of these discoveries that bring about a revolution in science should be made in Egyptology, the world will be indebted for it to a papyrus."

No less than 3,700 mortuary statues have been found which bear royal cartouches and inscriptions. Nearly 2,000 other objects have been discovered. One of the most remarkable relics is an enormous leather tent, which bears the cartouches of King Pinotem. This tent is in a wonderful state of preservation. The workmanship is beautiful. It is covered with hieroglyphs carefully embroidered in red, green and yellow leather. The colors are fresh and quite bright. In each of the corners is represented the royal vulture and stars.

ABOUT THE JEWS.

Their Works and Woes—Home of the Race—Jews in Exile—Their Bravery—Their Position in the World.

The Government of Great Britain, within the past few days, has asked the United States Government to join with the powers of Europe in seeking to obtain some measure of clemency for the persecuted Jews in Russia. Before this note, however, was sent by Earl Granville, the authorities at Washington had already instructed our representative at St. Petersburg to interfere in a conciliatory in behalf of the Jews. Once more the Jewish nation is undergoing its season of persecution. Once more the friends of humanity, England and America, are joining hands in the good work of helping the downtrodden and the homeless. This time it is in behalf of a small but well-known country. Palestine, in olden times the "land of milk and honey," the glory of all lands is by no means a large country, being about the size of the State of Vermont. A trifle larger than Belgium, it is smaller than Holland, covering an area of only 20,000 square miles. But if Palestine cannot boast of a wide domain, she can claim to be the mother of the great race, the most distinguished, perhaps, that has ever been seen or ever will exist on the face of the globe.

A BEAUTIFUL LAND.

Physically speaking, she was once beautiful. She is now in ruins, and her sterility of soil, from want of cultivation, is in as striking contrast with her fertility of the olden time as is the singular glory and as singular disgrace of her scattered children. "The glory of Zion has indeed departed." Rich and fertile plains, with groves of beauteous trees and fragrant balsams, no longer delight the traveler as he passes near the Jordan on his way to Jericho. If he give a thought to an eventful blind man, whose eyes saw the light on his way thither a long time ago, in the midst of the desolation he now views on every side it may occur to him that this Jew would count blindness to-day a blessing rather than a curse. The Lake of Gennesaret, it is true, sleeps among the mountains, mirrored as of yore in its tranquil beauty, but its banks are no longer teeming with a happy people.

Lovely Galilee, with its mulberry groves and forests of oak, is lovely no more. The hills are now gray and bare; the valleys where grew the corn and maize are neglected; Lebanon and Hermon offer shelter no longer under their protecting cedars, for the timber has long since been cut down. Vine and olive terraces strew the ground in reckless profusion—entangled, uprooted and unkept. Smiling villages, merry in the happy crowds that thronged their streets in the busy times gone by, are now dull and voiceless. Poverty and squalor have succeeded to thrift and activity, and solitude, like a ghost, lingers in the former abodes of men.

CAUSES OF DECLINE.

It would be an idle task and a useless one to reason long over the decay of the land of the Savior or the hopeless fortunes of the wandering tribes whose home was the Promised Land, but whose tents are now cast in that great desert known to them as the inhospitable outside world. Time and again the question has been thoroughly mooted and in as many languages as the races of men, and whether we believe in the vengeance of God as pursuing this people, or call it the wickedness of men, ostracizing them from home and fortune; or view their own peculiar religions and customs as warring against them, withholding from them the sympathy and support of mankind; or whether we consider all these causes combined as working decay, practically speaking, it makes no difference, and we cannot reach a satisfactory conclusion. The fact still remains as unchallenged as ever, the Jews are driven from their own land, they have nowhere a home, and the whole world is in arms against them. Their very existence after so many centuries of persecution is a miracle in itself, and as it has been in the past, so will this very existence continue to be in the future, the problem and miracle of the world. For more than 1800 years the Jew has been an exile, and from all we know, and judging from present indications, he is not likely to have a home this side of the grave. Truly has the poet sung:—

Tribes of the wandering feet and weary breast,
How shall ye flee away and be at rest?
The wild dove hath her nest, the fox his cave,
Mankind their country, Israel but the grave.

DRIVEN FROM HOME.

It would be almost impossible to describe when the Jews first took up their system of wandering from country to country. So much has been written about them, so many lands have witnessed their coming and going, their settlements for a time, their expulsion, their return at stated periods, that the Wandering Jew has become proverbial, and the genius of Dore, even if he never limned another sketch, would be immortal by the treasure bequeathed to posterity in the admirable portrayal of this fugitive of the centuries. Every land discovered has been trodden by the Israelite. In Europe he is a monument more enduring than any raised to commemorate the deeds of the greatest captains or the heroes of chivalry and romance. In Egypt he has stood at the foot of the pyramids, and it would be hard to say whether, with all his knowledge and craft, he was not able in his day to decipher the strange lettering and the hieroglyphics that have puzzled the generations since. In Arabia his swift feet bore him into the market-places of the towns and cities, and his genius easily acquired for him place and distinction among the merchants and princes of this land of spices and hidden treasure. History tells of his presence in the Land of the Rising Sun, and while bartering his goods to advantage and making exchanges of gold and precious stuffs, he learned Chinese and knew the doctrines of Confucius as well as the secret of his own Talmud. Dwelling in Syria he drove a sharp trade with those who, to live in favor with him for a short time, lent him all he asked, and in return were repaid by his skill in the art of healing and his knowledge of hidden sciences. The Jews came to England as early as the Saxon times. Many came with William the Conqueror, nor were they less famous at this period than they are to-day, even then being regarded as most learned and as experts in whatever they undertook. In the first and second centuries they were the objects of fearful persecutions. Severus, the Roman Emperor, in the third century, sought to banish them beyond the limits of the empire. A century later, Constantine, although but recently converted to Christianity, inveighed against them with untold cruelty, and, issuing an edict that the ears of all the Jews within his realm should be cut off, expelled them from his kingdom, and with this terrible mark of ignominy to distinguish them, sent them adrift among the nations of the earth. Nowhere was the poor Jew spared, and broad as was the canopy of heaven, nowhere under its protecting shelter could he find peace. Christians, Mohammedans and heathens agreed to disagree among themselves, but united with one accord to persecute the common foe, as they called him, the intruding Jew.

BUOYANCY OF THE RACE.

There is no fact recorded in the history of the world at once so astonishing and so perplexing as the vitality of the Jewish race. Proscribed, banished, driven into exile, the Jews return again and again. Their stubbornness is only surpassed by the efforts devised in the cruelty of men to rid the world of what emperors and kings and churchmen have termed in one voice the enigma of existence. Crushed into the bowels of the earth, like the hated Christians they abhorred, they came out even as did the Christians, with new vigor and fresh courage to renew their traffic in every town and city in the Roman empire. In every place and under all situations they were always the same, retaining their own religion, holding fast to the customs, the manners and recollections of their ancestry. With an unconquerable buoyancy of spirit, with indomitable industry, with unshaken fortitude, they weathered every storm, and when imperial rage had spent itself, when the cunning of the Inquisition had exhausted every device, the Jewish people seemed as unmoved, as full of resolution and as defiant as when they shut themselves up in the walls of Jerusalem, bidding the armed legions come on, heedless of the consequences. Surviving the destruction of the besieged city, it seemed they could outlive all manner of torture every human agency invented for their destruction; and their actual victory over the wicked energies of men proves, besides the extraordinary vitality of the nation, that a more than human power is exerted, for some reason or other, in prolonging a nationality and an existence that otherwise would have perished from the annals of the world.

MERCHANTS.

The Jews at a very early period did an immense business, nor were they confined to any particular line of trade nor to any particular country. The genius of the people showed itself eminent in whatever enterprise they ventured. Thus, at one time the whole export trade of Egypt, especially in grain, was in the hands of the Jews. They imported fish from Spain. From Crete they brought apples. Bithynia furnished cheese. Greece and Egypt were taxed to supply them with guards, beans and other vegetables. The richest plate that Babylon could manufacture was consigned to Jews. Italy supplied them with wine, not that they were immense consumers themselves—for the Jews are notably abstemious—but they purchased and sold of the best the sunny land could grow, and their profits were immense. In shawls and dresses from India they were the largest importers. In return, Palestine furnished her commercial neighbors with oil, balsam, honey, figs, surpassing them all both in the supply and quality of her exchanges.

TRADERS OF THE MUSEUMS.

No one will dispute that the Jews are learned. It has been remarked that the Jewish mind is adapted to acquire and impart science better than any other in Europe. In proportion to population the Jews can boast of more men of genius and profound learning than other people. When Europeans sat in the darkness of superstition, when it was a boast among the great and powerful that they could neither write nor read, Jewish rabbis were teaching philosophy and mathematics in the schools of Toledo and Cordova. In England, under Henry I., Jews taught algebra, logic and geometry in Oxford. They were looked upon as being first in astronomy and medicine in France and Spain at a very early date. Nor is it difficult to understand how they had become proficient in all these branches. Their indefatigable industry had rendered them masters of the commercial world. They traveled more than any other nation. They studied and easily mastered every foreign language, and with commendable zeal for which the world does not thank them, they sought out and deciphered and explained all the Greek and Roman manuscripts which they could lay their hands on. When the Moors took possession of Cordova a new era of civilization was inaugurated. Literature, the arts and sciences took a new flight. The Jews at this time enjoyed equal rights with their fellow-citizens, and in wealth and splendor and in the cultivation of taste and the fine arts they not only equaled but surpassed their old masters.

If Spain was at one time the mistress of the world in medicine, in philosophy and in navigation, she owes it to the Jews. When she offered them a refuge and a home, as she did more than once, the Jews were grateful. In return they opened schools, they taught the Spanish youth, they fired the young with their own ambition of becoming distinguished in the walks of literature, and under the guidance of Jewish rabbis and Jewish professors the Spaniards became the first nation in Europe. In Spain, as in France at one time, the Jews rose to great eminence. Kings and emperors sought their counsel and made use of their influence, and so well did Charlemagne think of the illustrious Isaac, surnamed the Jew, that he sent him as his ambassador to the famous Haroun Al Raschid.

In every department of science the Jews have had remarkable and representative men. It is unnecessary to go back to a remote period to realize the truth of this statement. Facts nearer home furnish abundant testimony to justify the full measure of what is here related. Among scientists the world over, in the department of theology, the names of Nachmanides, David Kunshi, Maimonides, Abram Ben Deor and Joseph Aben Sachal are well known, and as authorities are held in high esteem. To Abraham Aben Ezra the world owes the discovery of the equator of the celestial globe. Isaac Israeli was famous as an astronomer in 1362. Moses Ben Maimon knew almost all the languages of his day, and is called "the father of translators." Moses Gigustilla and Judah Ben Saul were poets of no mean order. In literature Moses Mendelsohn, Hertz Wessl, David Friedlander, Dr. Black, the naturalist, and Pereira, the first teacher of deaf-mutes, will always shine out as worthy names to rank with the best of any nation.

THE JEWS AS FINANCIERS.

To mention the name of Rothschild is to express in one word all that is great in the money world of to-day. But Rothschild is a Jew, and the same family is all-powerful in the great exchange centers of London, Frankfort, Paris, Vienna and Berlin. The operations in money matters of this famous house have more than once interested the persecuting Governments of Russia, Germany, France and Spain. The Christian more than once has struck down the unoffending Lazarus as he was pleased to look upon him, but Lazarus turned Dives is quite a different person. To-day the Christian may be in need, let him learn to treat Lazarus well, for to-morrow Lazarus will be Dives and in the shape of a Rothschild may prove his best friend. The Jews in finance are potent factors the world over, and in our own country, more especially in the West, their influence is very great.

The nineteenth century boasts of its enlightenment, its excellence over the ages that have gone before, in the ways of perfection and progress. It is a strange showing, however, that in this last portion of a great era a race that has so many claims upon the attention and gratitude of the world should be relentlessly persecuted. Lately in Germany, or that portion of United Germany called Prussia, comes the wail of agony from this suffering nation, the homeless Jews. Russia, within the past month, has engaged in a like warfare. To the honor of the young king of Spain, be it said, a royal proclamation has invited a return of the Jews, and once more Spain makes amends for her cruel treatment of a people who helped her in centuries gone by. It is to be hoped that the century in which we are will see the Jews restored to all the rights and privileges they deserve. To banish them from hotels and baths and public places here in America is a violation of all justice, is un-American in principle and act, and a self-respecting community should visit the perpetrators with marked evidences of indignation and avoidance.

In the world of art, within the past few years, the Jews have furnished America with more than one artist of renown. Rachel, the predecessor of Sara Bernhardt, was a Jewess. So is the famous Sara herself. Vieuxtemps, Wieniawski and Wilhelmj, the eminent violinists, are Jews. Goldmark, Strauss and Lucca are members of the hated race. Offenbach was a Jew, Januschek and Modjeska are of the land of Israel.

THE NUMBER IN THE WORLD.

When we consider that there are not quite 7,000,000 of Jews in the world, and pause for a moment to review the achievements of this persecuted people, we know not which to admire most, their genius or their unexplained vigor and seemingly inexhaustive vitality.

That they are destined to play a great role in the future we may be assured from the study of the past exploits and activity of this wonderful people. Egyptians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Mohammedans, the church, all have united to persecute them. They still live and they flourish. They were yesterday, they are to-day, they will be to-morrow. They have lived among all nations, with them, yet not of them, and they have lived alone. Influences of every kind—political, moral and physical—have been employed against them, yet they have remained unchanged and are still a distinct and numerous people. War, persecution, climate, time, have tried them, leaving them valiant and unsubdued. All these they have overcome. What are they waiting for? The Messiah? Perhaps. And then? To return in triumph to "the land of milk and honey," the glory of all lands.

EXPOSITORY.

JOSEPH MESSIMORE.

And I pray God your whole spirit, and soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.—1 Thessalonians v. 23.

Having a few leisure moments, I thought I would drop a few thoughts on the above text, for THE RESTITUTION.

I would lay down the following principles as necessary in order to a correct understanding of the production of any writer:

1. Ascertain who the writer is.

2. The person or persons written to.

3. The subject matter of the discourse or conversation.

4. The circumstances giving rise to the language employed.

First then, as to who the writer of the above language is.

In turning to the first verse of the first chapter of this book, letter, or epistle we find that Paul is the writer, and that the Church of God at Thessalonica is addressed. The chief subject being the coming of the Lord, he speaks of it in every chapter in the epistle.

Having before instructed them that in order to a future life and reward, there must be a resurrection of the dead saints, and a change of the living, from mortality to immortality. To bring this about the Lord must first come. And being well versed in human nature, and knowing their weakness and liability to be overcome by temptations, he strove to stimulate and encourage them by frequently referring them to the coming of the Lord, and the consequent reward; hence this short and very comprehensive prayer:

"And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and (may) your whole spirit, and soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."

The three words "I pray God," being supplied by the translators, I have omitted them here. But to the text.

1. I will endeavor to show what it does not mean.

2. What it does mean.

Paul, in the foregoing language, does not refer to a trinune or triple man, as claimed by advocates of the immortal-soul theory. For if he had referred to single individuals, he would doubtless have used language like the following:

"May all your spirits, and souls, and bodies be preserved," etc., whereas he says, "Your whole spirit, and soul, and body." Equivalent to "Your whole spirit, and your whole soul, and your whole body," etc.

Now I opine that this monstrous mistake arises in considering this beautiful figure of speech to be literal language, whereas the words spirit, soul and body, are all used in a secondary sense.

Thus: Spirit, disposition, inclination, temper, desire.

Soul; life, demeanor, deportment, behavior, conduct, character.

Body; church, assembly, organization, society.

The noun body, being a collective noun in this sentence, implies a plurality of persons in one body, and according to the rules of grammar, requires that other words in close relation to it must agree with it in the plural number. Accordingly the pronouns you and your, correspond with it in the plural number. And being a compound sentence containing three subjects and one predicate, it may be resolved into three simple sentences. Thus:

May your whole spirit be preserved blameless, etc.

May your whole soul be preserved blameless, etc.

May your whole body be preserved blameless, etc.

But some one might ask: Does Paul not here refer to the different constituent parts of the human organism? I answer, No. He had no such idea as spirit, or soul entity in his mind at all.

What then did he have in view? I answer, Not entities, but simple qualities, which may be possessed by single individuals, or by a compact body of individuals. And the text may be paraphrased as follows:

May the God of peace—Himself sanctify you wholly. And may your whole spirit (disposition, inclination, temper, desire), be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. (And not only so, but also may your whole soul (life, demeanor, deportment, behavior, conduct, character), be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. (And furthermore,) may your whole body (as a church, assembly, organization, and society, without an exception, all), be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Having now, as I think, rescued the foregoing text from the mysticism and perversion to which it has long been subjected by the advocates of immortal-soulism, I must submit the same for further investigation.

In conclusion I would say to the dear ones scattered abroad, Let us see to it that we enjoy and cultivate the same spirit that Jesus our Master manifested while sojourning here on the earth, for "if a man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his."

Then let us take heed that we cultivate a spirit of meekness, gentleness, amiableness, sociability, forbearance, affection, benevolence, and charity; in short, that our whole spirit may be blameless.

Let us so order our daily walk and conduct, that our whole soul, life, demeanor, and character, may be blameless; that our whole body, as a band of true disciples of Jesus our Master, may be found blameless before him when he comes to reign on the earth. O, blessed thought! would to God that we might all enjoy such a joyful hope.

Finally, my brethren, pray for me that my faith fail not, and that I may yet be the means, in God's hand, of doing some good in the cause of my Master.

ANARCHY IN TUNIS.

LONDON, Aug. 19.—The Paris correspondent of the Times says: "All the accounts from Tunis agree that the country is in a most dangerous state. Many bands of deserters and Arabs are reported to be collecting. The telegraph wires are cut in all directions."

PARIS, Aug. 19.—A dispatch received here announces the outbreak of fresh troubles at Suez. Four Europeans are reported to have been killed. It is stated that the commander of her Majesty's ship Monarch sent a detachment of marines ashore to protect Europeans.

THREATENING SOCIALISTS.

LONDON, Aug. 22.—Special dispatches from Geneva report that the Socialists have addressed a threatening letter to the Federal Tribunal in regard to their appeal from the decision of the Grand Council of Berlin prohibiting a Social Congress there in September. The letter warns the Judges of the tribunal that they will be the first to be blown up, and states that the socialists have enough dynamite to blow up half of Switzerland, and that it is in Switzerland that a conflagration will begin that will burn up the world.

POWER OF A WORD.

J. G. WHITTIER.

A little word in kindness spoken,
A motion or a tear,
Has often healed the heart that's broken,
And made a friend sincere.

A word, a look, has crushed to earth
Full many a budding flower,
Which, had a smile but owned its birth,
Would bless life's darkest hour.

Then deem it not an idle thing
A pleasant word to speak.
The face you wear, the thoughts you bring,
A heart may heal or break.

Editor Restitution:

Since my last I spent eleven days with brethren in Darlington and Whitby, Ont. Visited them all at their own homes, conversing upon the plan of human redemption and other subjects of interest.

Preached in their chapel at Solina twice on each first-day, the house being well filled with attentive hearers.

Although I have labored with this people a part of the time for twenty-two years, I think this the best meeting I have had with them at their own homes. I also had one of my happy seasons in presenting what I believe to be the truth.

I spent four days with the brethren in Collingswood, visiting them all at their homes with much pleasure to myself and I believe to them.

On Sunday I addressed a large congregation at the Town Hall, upon the subject, "The Bible is True, Ingersoll or Infidelity the Judge." The best of attention was given to my arguments, which took them by surprise.

I spent three evenings at Tenotaugulshene (Rollingsand), with great pleasure to myself and the lovers of truth.

On the last evening, at about nine o'clock, we retired to the bay, and whilst the silvery rays of the moon were beautifully exhibited upon its placid surface, I immersed the son and daughter of brother Squires into the saving name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. We then retired to their house where we ate the memorial supper. It was truly a solemn time—yet joyful in view of the soon coming glory.

Am now at my home after an absence of twenty-one days, but expect to leave for the east in a few days.

MAOY, Ind., Aug. 16, 1881.

Editor Restitution:

Have just returned from a trip to Clinton county, at King's Corner, in the vicinity of brother Thurman's, where I held meetings on Saturday night at their school house, twice on Sunday in a beautiful grove, and at night again at the school house. There was a large attendance at each meeting, and the best of attention. Two souls confessed faith in the name of Christ and the things concerning the kingdom, and on Monday morning I buried them in baptism in the likeness of the Lord's death, and raised them up to walk in newness of life. May they so walk as to win the crown of life.

A Disciple preacher held meetings at the same place one week before I was there, by the name of McKinzie, and following are some of the points he brought out: That we get our reward at the resurrection, that Christ shall return to this earth to reward his saints, and that at that time the saints will be made immortal, and that eternal life will be given at the end of our pilgrimage. So it is evident that they are improving in faith.

I left a challenge there for Aaron Walker, their celebrated warhorse, and have had a standing challenge for him for the last six years. If I could get to meet that man I should then be prepared to say with one of old: "Now let thy servant depart in peace," but I am afraid I will never enjoy that gratification.

Editor Restitution:

One by one our ranks are being thinned out by the great enemy death. We of the Pacific Coast miss a fallen one more perhaps because there are so few of us.

In the death of Sister Erringer the church here has lost one of the veteran soldiers. She by her orderly walk and godly conversation, and sincere and untiring devotion to the cause of truth did much for the cause.

Her work in this world is done. Are we all as zealously at work in the Master's cause as we should be? Let us all commence again the work of self examination, and at the same time aid others in every way we can. The Lord has left us a guide book. May we all see to it that we are following that book.

Are we leaving off any of the precepts Christ has given us? His precepts should appear in our works, so that others can read us by what we say and do. Are any of us doing what the Lord has forbidden? It is written that the "whole duty of man is to fear God and keep his commandments." Eccl. xii. 13, 14.

It is important then that we be not found doing too much of some things or too little of other or good things.

I have been in Butte Co., Cal., since June 23. Have preached a number of times. Some persons attended who had not been to church for more than twenty years. Gold mining is the business here. More anon.

LIGHT SPREADING.

A. R. MAGRUDER.

It is cheering to the children of God, often faint and weary in their conflict with evil and sorrow to see light dawning and the truth of God breaking through the clouds of ignorance and prejudice which have so long obscured it.

I have distributed freely and without postage charge to them many copies of my "Reply to Ingersoll" to prominent clergymen, not merely to convince them of the reality and truth of the Book they preach about, but in hope of their reading and pondering the chapters on the Design of Creation, the Coming Ruler of the Nations, Future Punishment and the Bible Doctrine of Life, Death and Immortality, and by that means opening their eyes to the shroudom to which they are enslaved by their deceptive theological dogmas and traditions which lead them captive. From some of these I have received replies expressive of kindness and appreciation.

Notably among these is one from a famous Presbyterian minister, Dr. Byron Sunderland, of Washington, D. C. Soon after he had read my pamphlet, as he informed me, he was called to preach a funeral sermon, which was published in the Washington Post, in which he gave utterance to what the Post described as, "some remarkable sentiments," touching immortality, eternal punishment, etc.

I send you an extract with these "remarkable" deliverances, underscored, as indicating some new and clearer light and an eccentric departure from the beaten track of the heathen mythology, as to immortal souls and endless torment which give us ground to hope for some progress toward "the more excellent way" of the word of truth. Speaking of death he says:—

"At such a time we pause at the door of exit from this mortal stage, confronted by questions which death itself suggests. What am I, whence was I, and whither bound, are thoughts which evermore pursue the thinking soul. Answers have been framed and accepted. Men have lived and died in beliefs or no beliefs, according to their adopted theories.

The evolution of to-day attempts to account for the origin of man without a God. But the law of evolution is progress, and in the eternities to come man by this law of progress must develop into God. The difference, therefore, between evolution and Christianity is simply this:—

The first ends in God, the second begins in God—and we prefer the latter.

The answer of Christianity is:—

'I am a creature of God, a sinner saved by grace, an heir of immortality. If I comply with the terms of the gospel I shall finally be exalted into the society of pure and noble beings and have a range of life felicitous beyond all mortal conception.'

On these vast themes Atheism begins by saying:—

'There is nothing in existence but nature, which produces man without purpose and obliterates him without regret'—like a child idly drawing figures on a slate and then wiping them out with a sponge. But when Atheism comes to bury its dead it sings a more tender song. Then 'Hope sees a star and listening love can hear the rustle of a wing.' And when, later on, Atheism confronts the almost universal sentiment of mankind as to the certainty of a future life, it ignores the homicide of nature and denies that it aims to rob the world of the solace of immortality. It professes to be striving only to remove 'the consolation of hell' and has no effective means for this but the doctrine of annihilation. Overlooking the existence of sin and that invariable law, that where sin is there, in one measure or another, is the very essence of hell, it jeers at the thought of such a possible destiny. Whereas, the Christian has a far better hope in that system of grace whose whole aim is to deliver men finally from the power of sin and death and hell, by pointing out a way of rescue without involving annihilation.'

We are not over anxious as to the conflict between Atheism and Christianity, nor doubtful of the final issue. Our religion gives us peace and rest—Joy for those who die believing, even though it be in tears and confidence in the justice of God; concerning those who die in unbelief, a confidence begotten of the truth that no human soul will ever suffer in eternity that which he does not deserve. How much better to accept the actual situation—to think of God as our heavenly Father, and ourselves as his grateful children—instead of hating, to love him; instead of doubting, to trust him; instead of insulting, to honor him; instead of rejecting, to obey him. This will be a support in life, a solace in death and a triumph in the resurrection. This is the light which Jesus sheds over the sorrows of the soul and the gloom of the grave.

On the cold cheek of death, smiles and roses are blending.
And beauty immortal awakes from the tomb!"

THE WONDERFUL WORKS OF GOD.

S. K. BOWLES.

The sun, the earth, the moon and planets, comprise the solar system. The sun, which is by far the largest of them all, is said to be more than ninety millions of miles from us, and to contain a volume of matter equal to fourteen hundred thousand globes of the size of our earth. The human mind can hardly form any adequate idea of a body so vast in its dimensions. The next grand idea still more vast in our conceptions of it is—

"The spacious firmament on high

which can contain a body of such magnitude, and apparently occupying so small a spot within its regions, and still afford ample room for all the fixed stars we see, and the spaces between them, of whose distances from us and each other no reliable estimate can be formed, yet it is said that Sirius, one of the nearest of the fixed stars to our earth, is too remote to admit of that swift winged messenger light to traverse the distance between himself and us in less than about three years. Light is said to reach us from the sun in about eight minutes; then as eight minutes are to ninety millions of miles, so are three years to the estimated distance of that star from our earth. And others too which are within the grasp of our vision and yet more remote; and still others which are beyond the range of mortal sight. It is said that Herschel saw one hundred and sixteen thousand stars which are invisible to the naked eye pass the disk of his telescope in fifteen minutes; on the supposition that there may be something like an equal distribution, ninety-six times that number might have been seen in twenty-four hours; yet that would have been only one belt of the heavens as wide as could be covered at one time by his telescope. What also and how many may then be beyond the range of that instrument and which may yet be brought into view by one of greater power? And all these have been in motion from all eternity so far as we know, flying noiselessly and untiringly across the regions of space like so many in a scream without any collision, without the necessity of any change for improvement, without stoppage for repairs. Such considerations display to us the omnipotent energies of the Eternal Mind. By telescopic aid we have presented to our vision, objects of overpowering magnitude and splendor; planetary globes a thousand times as large as our earth, traveling at an almost inconceivable velocity, and performing circuits around other bodies still larger and carrying with them a retinue of revolving worlds in their swift career; such thoughts fill us with a display of the magnitude of the Creator, his eternal power, and the majesty of him who sits on the throne of the universe and by whom all these mighty works are controlled.

Then when we turn our minds from this vast display of creative power to the most minute living specimens of his skill, we find that there are objects far too small to be seen with the naked eye; beings whose existence the microscope only can bring to view; countless numbers of which may be seen in a few drops of water, or may be collected on the point of a needle, all endued with life and motion; and as small as they are, are all made up of parts, possessing bodies having all the varied organs required by those bodies both inwardly and outwardly, all the circulating fluids necessary for their organization for the full purposes of life and reproduction of their kind. These add to the already overwhelming consideration of the wonder, the greatness, and the versatility of genius of that power which spoke into existence all that we can conceive of, and can perpetuate that existence in the harmonious order which we have abundant evidence has been maintained for at least near six thousand years on this earth; an assurance whereby we may see the possibility of an existence even into eternity itself, and if we were to pursue this it would just be to add scene to scene, wonder to wonder, of the greatest variety of which the most fertile imagination can boast, and then fall short of the range of creative power and intelligence.

How then can we for a moment doubt that power in the matter of the resurrection of the dead?

Though Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the worthies now lie in the dust of death, as we may also, under the degrading curse of "to dust return," on account of sin, in which case the vantage ground in the matter of life will be altogether against us, as those who brought us into being once being gulphed in the same calamity cannot in the least help us or themselves, nor can any of the forces of nature help us, till the all-creative and re-creative power of the Spirit of God who has thus taught us by what he has done what he can do, shall speak into existence again in a moment all whose names are recorded on the resurrection list for immortality and eternal life; no more the natural birth, but the birth of the Spirit, or being "born again." Well may we say with the Psalmist:—

"When I behold thy heavens the work of thy fingers, the moon and stars which thou hast ordained, what is man that thou art mindful of him?"

Though man is thus dishonored by this death decree on account of sin and transgression, which he brought on himself, we have an assurance historically that he was far more honored in the creation than any other creature belonging to this earth; for we are told in Genesis that he was made in the "image of God;" and lest we might mistake the idea intended to be conveyed, Paul tells us in Col. i. that "Jesus was also made in his image," and more pointedly in Heb. i. that "he was made in the express image of his person," ascribing to one as much personality as the other; "very image of his substance."—Revised Version. Nor can we suppose that any other form or image could have been devised which would have been so well adapted to all the rational enjoyments and the purposes of life as that of the perfect form of the human being in the maturity of youth as was in the case of Adam; even the highest artistic skill which draws the picture of an angel, can conceive of no other form but the human form for one of the messengers of heaven. Man therefore is in the image of God; and God who is a Spirit is not an immortality, but a Spirit in the sense of a living being, ever living without any death, and formed man in his image that should he attain to immortality he might be like him, or in his image which is perfect.

Memories of Childhood.

BY A. P. G.

That old log-house I'll ne'er forget
Where'er my feet shall roam;
Rough were its white-washed walls, and yet
It was my childhood's home.

Nothing on all my journey through,
As backward oft I gaze,
Brings brighter fairer scenes to view,
Than thoughts of childhood's days.

As oasis green mid desert sands,
Where cooling palm trees wave,
Cheer on these weary pilgrim bands
Who seek the Prophet's grave.

So one fair spot, one oasis bright,
In visions oft I see,
As gentle memory "brings the light
Of other days" to me.

Search where I may, the whole world round,
That home that gave me birth
Seems brighter, better, holier ground,
Than any spot on earth.

Teach the Boys About It.

At home and at school the boys should be taught the natural effect of alcohol upon the processes of human life.

1. They should be taught that it can add nothing whatever to the vital forces, or to the vital tissues—that it never enters into the elements of structure.

2. They should be taught that it disturbs the operation of the brain, and that the mind can get no help from it which is to be relied upon.

3. They should be taught that alcohol inflames the baser passions, and debases the feelings.

4. They should be taught that an appetite for drink is certainly formed in those who use it, which destroys the health, injures the character, and, in millions of instances, becomes ruinous to fortunes and to all the high interests of the soul.

5. They should be taught that crime and pauperism are directly caused by alcohol.

So long as £400,000 are daily spent for drink in England, and probably $2,000,000 per day in the United States, leaving little else to show for its cost but diseased stomachs, degraded homes, destroyed industry, increased pauperism, aggravated crime, the boys should understand the facts about alcohol, and be able to act upon them in their earliest responsible conduct.

No Smoker Need Apply.

I was sitting in the office of a mechanic not long since, when a lad of about sixteen entered, with a cigar in his mouth. He said to the gentleman:—

"I would like to get a situation in your shop to learn the trade, sir."

"I might give you a place, but you carry a bad recommendation in your mouth," said the gentleman.

"I didn't think it any harm to smoke, sir; nearly everybody smokes now."

"I am sorry to say, my young friend, I can't employ you. If you have money enough to smoke cigars, you will be above working as an apprentice; and if you have not money, your love for cigars might make you steal it. No boy who smokes cigars can get employment in my shop."

Youth's Companion.

The Young Robin's Grave.

In a tree near an old-fashioned farmhouse, way up in Vermont, two robins built their nest. A lady watched them day by day as they brought straws, a bit of cotton or thread, and weaved them deftly in, to form their summer home. One morning she found three blue speckled eggs in the nest, and on another, three tiny little birds in their place. How busy the father and mother birds were, providing for their wants! and how prettily and tenderly they cared for them!

When they were large enough they gave them lessons in flying, and herein comes the point of my story. While they were trying their wings one day a cat caught one, and before the lady could rescue it, it was injured beyond recovery. She put the poor, trembling little creature back in its nest, and left it there for the mother bird to nurse back to life if possible.

It was of no use. The cat's cruel claws and sharp teeth had done their work, and their victim died. A few days after, the lady, seeing and hearing nothing of the other birds, went to the nest, and found they had built a thatched roof over the poor little bird, and there he lay on his back, with his claws sticking up through the straws. They had buried their dead, and deserted the nest.

Skipping.

Boys, I want to ask you how you think a conqueror would make out who went through a country he was trying to subdue, and whenever he found a fort hard to take, left it alone. Don't you think the enemy would buzz wild there, like bees in a hive; and when he was well into the heart of the country, don't you fancy they would swarm out and harass him terribly?

Just so, I want you to remember, will it be with you if you skip over the hard places in your lessons and leave them unlearned; you have left an enemy in the rear that will not fail to harass you and mortify you times without number.

"There was just a little bit of Latin I hadn't read," said a vexed student to me, "and it was there the professor had to call upon me at examination. There were just two or three examples I had passed over, and one of those I was asked to do on the blackboard."

The student who is not thorough is never well at his ease; he cannot forget the skipped problems, and the consciousness of his deficiencies makes him nervous and anxious.

Never laugh at the slow, plodding student; the time will surely come when the laugh will be returned. It takes time to be thorough, but it more than pays. Resolve, when you take up a study, that you will go through with it like a successful conqueror, taking every strong point.

If the inaccurate scholar's difficulties closed with his school life, it might not be so great a matter for his future career. But he has chained to himself a habit that will be like an iron ball at his heel all the rest of his life. Whatever he does, he will be lacking somewhere. He has learned to shirk what is hard, and the habit will grow with years.

Are You Serving God?

S. ROXANA WIXON.

I was absolutely startled the other day by the awful solemnity of this question. We had been talking over the subject of serving God. Our little boy seemed lost in a deep reverie. Two ladies that were dear to his child-heart came into his mind.

"Are they serving God, auntie? Are they serving him every day?"

I was obliged to confess that I knew so little of their daily life that I could not tell.

"But I want to know, I want to know for sure," burst from the precious little lips, and was driven like a nail home to my heart.

"For sure." Am I serving God for sure?

Are all the things that I do, done to please him?

Is there no shrinking back from the thorny way?

Am I just as ready as in the past, to drop my own work, that the work of the Lord may be done?

So questioned I my heart, and now, dear brethren and sisters, I want you just as sincerely to question yours.

Do you envy?

Do you vaunt yourselves?

Do you want to take the lead?

Do you seek your own, and not the good of others?

Can you bear all things, endure all things?

Can you let God work, while you wait?

Are you willing that he should choose the poor?

Can you listen patiently to the speech and the prayer of the humble?

Try yourselves by God's word and see. I love you all. The great day of trial is just at the door.

Would you enter in to the marriage supper of the Lamb?

Be ready.

OBITUARY.

DIED—At Healdsburgh, Sonoma Co., Cal., July 17, 1881, after a lingering illness and much severe suffering, Sister Eliza E. Erringer.

Sister Erringer was born in Delaware Co., Penn., Jan. 4, 1818. She was a member of the Baptist Church of Philadelphia, and remained a strict member of the Baptist Church for 17 years.

Some time after she and her husband, John R. Erringer settled in Louisville, Ky., they both heard and believed the things of the kingdom, eternal life only through Christ, and other kindred doctrines, and at their own request they were baptized by Dr. N. Field, I believe at Jeffersonville, Ind. I cannot tell what year this was, perhaps at least 30 years ago.

I was from home at the time of her death. There was no funeral discourse but her daughter, Sister Hattie Russell, selected the following passages of Scripture, favorites of the deceased, which were read at the house just before her burial:

Job xix. 23-27; Psa. cxvi.; 1 Cor. xv. 12-58; John vi. 32-41; Col. iii. 1-5.

The hymns sung after the reading were, "I Know that My Redeemer Lives," "Asleep in Jesus Blessed Sleep," and "Go to thy Rest."

All who know our beloved sister know that she did not keep her light under a bushel—but did much in instructing anxious inquirers after the truth.

She died in full faith that the coming of the Lord is near, and that she would be of the number who would "see the King in his beauty." At that time may she meet all her friends in whose welfare she was so much interested, and for whose salvation she so devoutedly prayed.

Till the first resurrection we bid our beloved sister adieu, and now the little time remaining to us let us all improve that we may have an abiding hope of meeting the Lord at his coming, "and having done all may stand."

DIED—At East Whitby, Ont., Brother George Mitchell, in his forty-sixth year.

Brother George learned the plan of redemption or human salvation a number of years ago at the chapel in Solina, but neglected immersion for the remission of sins until June 1880, when he was immersed by the writer, and as he came up out of the water he said, "All is well; I now have the evidence that I shall have a resurrection when Jesus shall come."

Being sensible that his earthly pilgrimage would soon close, he settled his estate, or set his "house in order," and made his request to be buried in our cemetery which joins our chapel in Solina, for said he, "It is there I learned the truth, and it is there I wish to rest till Jesus shall come." He also requested that the writer should preach his funeral sermon, and be liberally rewarded. All was done as requested.

A large audience attended and listened attentively whilst the writer presented brother M.'s hope of a future state.

In his death a large circle of relatives and friends are left to mourn, but none more so than the writer and the church with whom he was associated. But we sorrow not as those who have no hope of a resurrection. 1 Thes. iv. 13-17.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NORTHERN INDIANA CONFERENCE.

The Annual Conference of the Churches of God in Northern Indiana will be held at Argos, Marshall Co., Ind., and will commence on Thursday, September 8, 1881, at 7:30 p. m., and continue Friday, Saturday, and Sunday the three days following. Public services will commence at 10:30 a. m., on Friday and other appointments will be made as shall be thought most advisable. A general attendance is requested, as the desire of our brethren, as has been expressed, is to have one more good meeting, at least, before the close of this dispensation. Argos is on the Michigan City, Peru, and Indianapolis railroad, eight miles south of Plymouth, the County-seat of Marshall County. Let it be our prayer that we may meet in the fulness of the gospel of Christ.

BY ORDER OF COMMITTEE.

I will preach as follows: At brother Guffin's the 3d Sunday in September, at Gospel Grove the next Sunday, at Dundee, Blackford Co., Ind., the next Sunday, in brethren Elton's neighborhood, south of Delta, O., the next Sunday, at Raisin, Mich., as brother L. C. Chase may appoint the next Sunday, at Buchanan, Mich., the following Sunday.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

Providence permitting, the brethren of the Abrahamic faith will hold a General Conference for the state of Wisconsin, at Greenfield Station, Monroe county, commencing Friday evening, Sept. 9, 1881, and continue over Sunday. H. V. Reed has promised to be with us to expound the Word of Life, and Sister A. C. Sedgwick is expected. Come brethren, one and all, and let this meeting be a general rallying for the Master.

Greenfield is on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R.

WM. B. PUTNAM.

Tunnel City, Wis.

The brethren of the Abrahamic faith of Southern Wisconsin and Northern Illinois will meet in Conference at Lanark, Ill., commencing Friday evening, Sept. 30, and hold over Sunday, Oct. 2. A general invitation is extended to all.

J. M. GLOTFELTY.

Patience, brethren; more light, more faith and we shall see eye to eye on these deep things of God, and unite in such an interpretation of Scripture as shall leave human responsibility unimpaired and the Divine Sovereignty unchallenged.—H. Dawson.

A NEW MONTHLY.

THE AGES TO COME!

A monthly periodical, entitled as above, will be issued from the office of Our Race, Chicago, Ill., the first number of which will appear on October 1, 1881. It will be in size the same as Our Race, 16 pages, 7x11 inches, printed on good paper, from clear type, and in every way a first class journal.

Its title, THE AGES TO COME, indicates the principal character it will sustain, viz., an Advocate of what the Editor believes to be the Bible view of God's plan concerning the ages, showing that "God is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe;" that He is now "taking out of the Gentiles a people for His name" (name-bearers); and that he will exalt these in due time to heavenly places, and unite them by marriage to His Son, thus constituting them the Wife of Him to whom all power is given in heaven and upon earth. Then will they reign with Him the glory of an everlasting reign, and with Him become a means of blessing all nations.

It will also teach the doctrine of Life only through Christ; the destruction (not eternal torment) of the wicked; and doctrines akin to these, as revealed in God's Holy Book.

It will strenuously maintain the inspiration of the Bible, as opposed to the growing infidelity of the days; and in the line of Christian duty it will oppose the tendency to worldliness so common in all churches, and advocate a holy life and pure speech, that we may be always ready to meet our blessed coming Lord.

In every respects it will occupy the same ground as that which was occupied by the Bible Examiner, so long and ably published by our late lamented brother, Geo. Storrs, and is intended to take up the work where he laid it down.

We wish to hear from every one who believes in the views we have outlined, and to secure their assistance in the procuring of subscribers. Let us hear from you at once, that we may know how large an edition to print on the first number. Send for a prospectus.

COMING.

RAYMOND H. STEARNS.

"Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."—Matt. xxiv. 44.

He will come, perhaps, at morning,
When to simply live is sweet!
When the arm is strong, unwearied
By the noonday toil and heat;
When the undimmed eye looks fearless
Up the shining heights of life,
And the eager soul is panting,
Yearning for some noble strife.

He will come, perhaps, at noontide,
When the pulse of life throbs high,
When the fruits of toil are ripening,
And the harvest time is nigh;
Then, through all the full-orbed splendor
Of the sun's meridian blaze,
There may shine the strange new beauty
Of the Lord's transfigured face.

Or it may be in the evening—
Gray and sombre is the sky,
Hoods around the sunset gather,
Far and dark the shadows lie.
When we hang for rest and slumber
And some tender thought of home
Fill the heart with vague, sad yearning,
Then, perhaps, the Lord will come.

If he only finds us ready
In the morning's happy light,
In the strength and duty noontide,
Or the evening of the night,—
If he only finds us waiting,
Listening for his coming call,
Then his coming when we think not
Is the sweetest hope of all.

ISRAEL AND THE CHURCH.

NUMBER TWELVE.

J. CAMERON.

THE NATURAL SENSE OF THE SCRIPTURES.

One great cause of this confounding Israel and the kingdom of God with the church is the very prevalent departure from the plain sense in reading the Bible. The manner in which the Scriptures are treated by the great mass of religious teachers is termed "spiritualizing," because it is supposed that a higher sense than the natural is obtained. This would not be so injurious if the natural sense was not in most instances altogether lost.

A decided advantage arising from the plain reading of the predictions we have been considering is that we do not require any system of interpretation to make them intelligible. They speak for themselves, and the way-faring man as he reads of the glory in store for Israel is relieved from the task of inventing a meaning other than the plain words naturally bear.

But the plain way-faring man who might happen to read these pages, would doubtless be puzzled to know why so much required to be said in favor of such a natural and common sense method of reading the Scriptures. But it should be borne in mind that even in the days of Jesus the professed teachers of the people had made the word of God of none effect by their tradition, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men. Hence the sufferings and death of the Messiah, although predicted by the prophets, had no place in the Jewish mind. This fact is mentioned here simply to show the necessity of subjecting to the strictest scrutiny, all interpretations which are presented to us, no matter how time-honored and venerable. Let us meanwhile briefly trace the pedigree of the spiritualizing system.

PROTESTANT AND ROMAN CATHOLIC MODES OF INTERPRETATION IDENTICAL.

It is important to bear in mind that the apostles predicted a falling away from the faith, which should begin to show itself even in their own days. The most distinct form of this falling away or apostasy is generally allowed by Protestants to be the Roman Catholic church. Be this as it may, it is a fact that this religious body constituted, with little exception, the only form of Christianity which existed for nearly a thousand years previous to Luther's Reformation. And as matters, according to apostolic prediction, were to wax worse and worse until the coming of the Lord, the faith being hardly to be found on the earth, it could not be expected that the mass of professors in the sixteenth century, should be found standing fast in the faith of the gospel. But the question arises:—

Has there not been a reformation from the religion of Rome?

Did not Luther and Calvin deliver us from all the errors of Popery?

And are not Protestants now rejoicing in "the faith once delivered to the saints?"

Without deciding on the extent of the Reformation, it may be interesting to notice the identity of the respective views of Roman Catholics and Protestants respecting the kingdom of God, the restoration of Israel, etc. Perhaps the most distinct illustration of this is to be found in the notes and comments to various passages in the versions of the Scriptures used by the two divisions of the professing religious world just referred to. The Roman Catholic English version of the Scriptures furnishes the following notes on the passages we have selected, and we also give annotations by Protestant commentators, which will serve to indicate the source of the popular theories respecting the important truths we are considering:—

Dan. ii. 44. "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed."

ROMAN CATHOLIC BIBLE.

"A kingdom, viz., the kingdom of Christ in the Catholic Church which cannot be destroyed."

DR. THOMAS SCOTT'S COMMENTARY ON THE HOLY BIBLE.

"The kingdom of Christ was evidently intended: from small beginnings it has already made immense progress. It has subverted and will continue to subvert Pagan and Antichristian kingdoms, and to entirely destroy and disperse them; and at length it will triumph over all opposition, and become a great mountain and fill the whole earth."

Ezek. xxi. 27. "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him."

ROMAN CATHOLIC BIBLE.

"I will show it to be iniquity, etc., or, I will overturn it; viz. the crown of Juda for the manifold iniquities of the kings; but it shall not be utterly removed till Christ come whose right it is; and who shall reign in the spiritual house of Jacob, that is in his church for evermore."

DR. JOHN BROWN'S SELF-INTERPRETING BIBLE.

"Nor shall it ever attain its wonted lustre and dignity, or any of the family of David wear a sceptre till Christ take his spiritual kingdom in the Gospel Church hay in the millennium."

Psa. lxix. 35. "For God will save Zion, and will build the cities of Judah: that they may dwell there and have it in possession."

ROMAN CATHOLIC BIBLE.

"'Zion.' The Catholic church. The cities of Judah, etc., her places of worship which shall be established throughout the world. 'And there,' viz. in this church of Christ shall his servants dwell," etc.

DR. THOMAS SCOTT'S COMMENTARY ON THE HOLY BIBLE.

"Zion seems to denote the church at large, the cities of Judah, the several divisions of the church throughout the world; evangelical blessings being predicted under allusions taken from the then existing state of things. God will preserve his church, and every sound part of it, and all true Christians; continuing to them, and entailing on their posterity the blessings of a new covenant, yea all that love God shall dwell for ever in Zion, in the church militant on earth, without being finally overcome by any enemy, and in the church triumphant in heaven."

Ezek. xxxvi. 8–16. "But ye, O mountains of Israel, ... I will multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel, even all of it: and the cities shall be inhabited, and the wastes shall be builded .... Yea I will cause men to walk upon you, even my people Israel, and they shall possess thee, and thou shalt be their inheritance, and thou shalt no more henceforth bereave thee of men, ... neither shalt thou cause thy nations to fall any more, saith the Lord God."

The note in the Roman Catholic Bible on this passage shows that the last scattering of Judah by the Romans is viewed as the final end of the nation, and therefore some other kind of fulfillment is necessary. It is as follows:—

"This whole promise principally relates to the church of Christ, and God's perpetual protection of her; for as to the carnal Jews, they have been removed out of their land these sixteen hundred years."

Here then we see that the doctrine commonly held by Protestants regarding the promises of Israel is precisely that held by Roman Catholics. Of course it may be said that notwithstanding this the doctrine may be true. This is at once granted; but the fact remains that it is held by Protestants in very suspicious company, rendered all the more suspicious because of being the immediate source whence Protestants derived the doctrine of the Reformation. Hence the necessity for subjecting to the law and testimony all interpretations obtaining among contemporary professors.

I esteem it an honor, not to be lightly held, that I have been permitted to recognize upon so many of earth's dusty highways, the trail of an angel's robe; to discern under homeliest disguises, here a warrior, and there a saint.—Marion Harland.

THE NEW COVENANT.

NUMBER TWO.

BY J. P. COX.

We can see from my last quotations, that this new covenant is to be a covenant of peace, it is also to be everlasting. This fully agrees with the prophet Isaiah who speaks of Jesus as the "Prince of peace." Isa. ix. 6. Also with the angel's anthem, or, the song of the heavenly host, when they praised God, and said, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace good will toward men." Luke ii. 14. So we need not look for this new covenant to be established until "He (God) shall send Jesus Christ which before was preached unto you; whom the heavens must receive until the times of the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Acts iii. 20–21. This new covenant is one of those "all things," spoken of by the mouth of the holy prophets. In ver. 22, we read, "For Moses truly said unto the fathers, a prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethern, like unto me: him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you." The old covenant was given through Moses by God, to the children of Israel, and this old covenant was the same covenant that God established with Abraham, for the 25 verse says, when speaking to the children of Judah after the day of Pentecost, "Ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, and in thy seed shall all the kindreds (nations) of the earth be blessed."

Thus we see it is the same covenant that God made with Abraham. He also established it, with his decendents, through Moses before they were divided into two nations. So the new covenant must be made with the same people, when they shall have been gathered together, and again become one nation, and as Moses was a type of Jesus the Christ, the new covenant must be established Jesus the antitype, and as the first was national, the second must also be national, and as Moses was the deliverer of the children of Israel from the land of bondage, so Jesus will be the deliverer of the same people from among the countries whither-soever they have been scattered. But we must patiently wait, "until the spirit be poured upon us from on high, and the wilderness be a fruitful field, and the fruitful field be counted for a forest. Then judgment shall dwell in the wilderness and righteousness remain in the fruitful field, and the work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever. And my people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting places." Isa. xxxii. 15–18.

Thus we plainly see that this new covenant is to be made with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah, and it will not be established until the house of Israel, and the house of Judah, have been gathered together and become one nation again.

For then will Jesus the antitype of Moses have descended from heaven, and will make this new covenant with them. And it will be a peaceable covenant, for, God has ordered it to be established in the time when Jesus the "Prince of peace" shall be among his people in person: and as "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself," 2 Cor. v. 19, so will God be manifest in Christ in the execution of this new covenant. For they shall be his people, and He will be their God.

This new covenant will be a better covenant than the old one, for Paul says, "If that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been found for the second." Heb. viii. "For the law made nothing perfect." ver. 19. Paul also says, "We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, ... by how much also He is the mediator of a better covenant which was established upon better promises." Heb. viii. 1–6. So in this new and better covenant, established upon better promises, the tables of stone will no longer be needed. "I will put my laws in their hearts, and in their minds will I write them," is the language of our text.

But now the question arises, if this new covenant is to be made with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah. What does this new covenant concern the Gentiles? The same question may be asked about the old covenant, that God at first made with Abraham. It does really appear by so little interest manifest by professors of Christianity that we Gentiles have nothing to do with either of these covenants. But if we read in the Acts of the Apostles we will see.

Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said. It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you, but seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles for so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth." Acts, xiii. 46–47. James, in his speech before the apostles and elders, said, "men and brethren, hearken unto me; Simon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for his name, and to this agree the words of the prophets; as it is written. After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down, and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up: That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles, upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things." Acts, xv. 13–17. Paul, in his letter to the Romans says, "I am the apostle of the Gentiles." Rom. xi. 13. In the same chapter he also speaks of the Israelites as the branches of the true olive tree, and the Gentiles, the branches of the wild olive tree, and the natural branches have been cut off, because of their unbelief, and by faith the wild olive branches have been grafted in." Again he says, "Blindness in part is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." ver. 25.

In Paul's epistle to the Galatians, we see the connecting link between the Gentile believer and the covenant that God made with Abraham. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us .... that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ, that we might receive the promise of the spirit through faith, ... For ye are the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ, ... And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise." Gal. iii. 13–14–28–29. Jesus also shows the same thing in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. The rich man representing the house of Judah. He was very rich in the promises of God, and had in his possession Moses and the prophets, but because of his unbelief he was greatly abased. Lazarus, representing the Gentile people, to whom the promises were not (at the first) made. But now as the Jewish nation died, Lazarus (the Gentile) was exalted into the embrace of Abraham.

By these things we see that the Gentile is much interested in the covenant God made with Abraham.

Shall the Gentiles not also be much interested in the new covenant, when it shall be established?

Inasmuch as the middle wall of partition is broken down between the Jew and Gentile.

"For through him (Jesus) we both have access by one spirit unto the Father." Eph. ii. 18.

Now when Jesus the King shall descend from heaven, and re-establish the throne of his father David, all who by faith have become the seed of Abraham, or one with Christ, who may be sleeping in the dust of the earth shall come forth, in the likeness of Jesus: and the saints who shall remain alive unto his appearing shall be changed from mortality to immortality, and "shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord." 1 Thess. iv. 17.

Then we shall be one with Christ, "and shall reign (with him) on the earth." Rev. v. 10.

So if we become kings and priests, and reign with him (Jesus) on the earth, we shall become executors of this new covenant with him. Jesus said to his disciples when here on earth with them:—

"Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, ye shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging (or ruling) the twelve tribes of Israel." Matt. xix. 28.

The Psalmist said, "Let the saints be joyful in glory; let them sing aloud upon their beds; let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a two-edged sword in their hand, to execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people. To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron. To execute upon them the judgments written, this honor have all his saints." Psa. cxlix. 5–9.

Such is the allotment to the saints in their immortalised state, when this new covenant shall be established.

The Gentiles who shall remain on the earth in their mortal state, under this new covenant shall also be interested in the matter, "For the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time.... saying, That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore: and thy seed shall possess the gates of his enemies; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice." Gen. xxii. 15–18.

The prophet Isaiah says, "And the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord. As for me this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord: My spirit is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever. Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee. For, behold the darkness shall cover the earth, and great darkness the people, but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee. And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." Isa. lix. 20, 21; lx. 1–3.

Another prophet says, "And the Lord shall be King over all the earth. .... And it shall come to pass that every one that is left of all the nations, which come against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year, to worship the King the Lord of hosts and to keep the feast of tabernacles." Zech. xiv. 9–16.

Thus we have an abundance of evidence that God will establish a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah: and it will be made with them after they are gathered together from among the Gentiles, and become one nation, and shall no more be divided into two nations again, then the Gentiles shall be blessed by this new, better, peaceful, and everlasting covenant.

Therefore, we believing Gentiles as well as the Hebrews may look forward to the time when these things shall come to pass, which is in the near future.

So now, "Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering: for he is faithful that promised. And let us consider one another to provoke unto love and to good works: not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is, but exhorting one another: and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching." Heb. x. 23–25.

We all can set our daily deeds to the music of a grateful heart, and seek to round our lives into a hymn—the melody of which will be recognized by all who come in contact with us, and the power of which shall not be evanescent, like the voice of the singer, but perennial, like the music of the spheres. —William M. Taylor.

It is well to find out, if we can, what is the doctrinal minimum of our religion; but doctrinal minima are not good foundations for sermons. It is the fulness of the gospel that needs to be preached. And there is one thing in the world drier than "dry doctrines," and that is religious philosophizing emptied of doctrine.—Literary World.

The husks of emptiness rustle in every wind; the full corn in the ear holds up its golden fruit to the Lord of the harvest; a good man's faith is manifested by his labors, standing not in words but in the demonstration of the spirit.

The patient pursuance of a high ideal is the crucial test of nature; desperately to miss it may be the final discipline of character.—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel the literal re-surrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

No. 81.

J. F. WEETHEE.

History of the events of the Sixth Trumpet.—When about to investigate the history of a power which we believe to be the chief agent of the second woe, which now exercises despotic rule, and which is destined to fill an important station in the closing drama, the third woe, close observation is necessary, since every feature of his character from his birth to his final extinction, becomes a matter of general interest. Only one dynasty can fill the conditions of the symbols—that of the Turks.

This is the proposition we design to establish. In order to do this it will be necessary to trace that power from its birth onward. We shall see that God raised this power, as Cyrus of old, for a specific work; as soon as that work is accomplished, it will be dismissed to its proper home—the lake of fire.

The chief actor of the first woe trumpet was born and reared in the burning wilds of Arabia; the Turk, chief of the second woe, was a native of Central Asia, northeast of the Caspian Sea.

The Arabian dynasty, or empire of the Caliphs, was the first family that ruled over the Mohametan empire; the Turks constituted the second, last, and a more powerful dynasty, one that still continues, and will rule the empire till the times of the Gentiles be accomplished.

It is remarkable that two races so unlike as the Arabian and Turk, should be called to one religion, one empire, and one great work, to overthrow the Eastern, or Greek division of the Roman empire; they were the two great branches of the unitarian family, raised up for the overthrow of Roman idolatry in the Christian Church. They were, therefore, officially partners, though enemies in their civil organizations. The one conquered and succeeded the other. The one was prepared by nature to torment, the other to kill.

The Turks, or Turkmans.—To the Turks was assigned the specific work of subjugating the Greek empire. They were educated for that purpose. We divide their history into three periods:

1. Before the Crusades.
2. During the Crusades.
3. Period of their special work, after the Crusades.

1. Before the Crusades.—The Turks are traced to a country east of the Caspian Sea. The term Turk, includes not only those that worked as slaves in the iron forges at the foot of the Altai mountains, but an entire family of Asiatic races. Those slaves originate from Scythian shepherds. These iron forges were used to forge arms for their master, the Great Khan of the Geougen. Brought up as slaves, skilled in forging weapons of war, and acquiring strength and skill in the use of the smith's hammer, they were prepared to commence a new empire so soon as an able leader should arise.

Bertezena (gray wolf) was their first chief. Through his eloquence and courage they obtained their freedom and a crown for their prince. The neighboring tribes were conquered, and the New Power, that, for a thousand years or more, has exerted such despotic sway among the nations, came into being.

Bertezena's request of the daughter of the great Khan, in marriage, was haughtily rejected, since he was a slave and a mechanic. He was, after that rejection, allied to a princess of China; and in a battle, destroyed the power of the Geougen.

This new empire of the Turks became exceedingly great. The Altai mountains was the center of their empire.

"As the subject nations marched under the standard of the Turks, their cavalry, both men and horses, were proudly computed by millions; one of their effective armies consisted of 600,000 soldiers, and in less than fifty years they were connected in peace and war with Romans, Persians, and Chinese. They extended to within three or at least ten degrees of the Polar circle."—Gibbon.

This empire was divided into four parts, was weakened by luxury, and after continuing two hundred years, fell into fragments. This was the first Turkish empire.

"The revival of their name and dominion in the southern countries of Asia, are events of a later age; and the dynasties, which succeeded to their native realms, may sleep in oblivion; since their history bears no relation to the decline and fall of the Roman empire."—Gibbon.

This first empire has been introduced to show the reader the origin and character of the Turks. We shall now take up the history of the latter time of their kingdom, having nothing further to do with the Turko-Scythian empire of the sixth century.

The empire of the Turks seen in the vision of St. John, grew up out of the fragments of the Scythian (shepherd) empire.

"The thrones of Asia were occupied by slaves and soldiers of Turkish extraction, a swarm of these northern shepherds overspread the kingdoms of Persia; their princes of the race of Seljuk erected a splendid and solid empire from Samarcand to the confines of Greece and Egypt; and the Turks have maintained their dominion in Asia Minor, till the victorious crescent has been planted on the dome of St. Sophia."—Gibbon.

Mahmud was one of the most noted of these princes, who reigned about one thousand years after Christ. His power increased into a formidable empire. The title of Sultan was first applied to him.

His holy war against the Gentoos of Hindostan, which was extended through twelve expeditions, was the great work of his life, and afforded him immense wealth. Such was his destruction of idols and their temples, that the Sultan was called "Mahmud the Idol Breaker."

He invited into his dominion (Persia) a Turkman chief, of the race of Seljuk, to aid him in recruiting his armies. The Sultan inquired what supply of men he could furnish for military purposes. "If you send," replied Ismael, "one of these arrows into our camp, fifty thousand of your servants will mount on horseback."

"And if that number," continued Mahmud, "should not be sufficient?"

"Send this second arrow to the hordo of Balik, and you will see fifty thousand more."

"But," said the Gaznovide (Mahmud), dissembling his anxiety, "if I should stand in need of your whole kindred tribes?"

"Dispatch my bow," was the last reply of Ismael, "and as it is circulated around, the summons will be obeyed by two hundred thousand horse."—Gibbon.

The son of Mahmud was conquered by this Seljukian chief, and a race of shepherd kings succeeded in Persia. Seljuk was followed, in the royalty, by his son's son, Togrul Beg, who became Sultan.

This monarch conquered Persia, extended his conquests to the Euphrates, and even demanded tribute of the Roman emperor. He was a zealous Moslem. A mosch was erected in every city before he attempted to found a palace. For his delivering the Caliph Cayem of Bagdad, he added a new kingdom to his empire. Great honors were awarded to him by the Caliph.

"The Turkish Sultan embarked on the Tigris, landed at the gate of Racca, and made his public entry on horseback. At the palace gate he respectfully dismounted, and walked on foot, preceded by his emirs without arms. The Caliph was seated behind his black veil; the black garment of the Abbassides was cast over his shoulders, and he held in his hand the staff of the apostle of God. The conqueror of the East kissed the ground, stood some time in a modest posture, and was led towards the throne by the vizier and an interpreter.

After Togrul had seated himself on another throne, (by the vizier) his commission was publicly read, which declared him the temporal lieutenant of the vicar of the prophet. He was successively invested with seven robes of honor, and presented with seven slaves, the natives of the seven climates of the Arabian empire. His mystic veil was perfumed with musk; two crowns (turbans in the form of crowns) were placed on his head; two cimeters were girded to his side, as the symbols of a double reign over the East and West. His titles were proclaimed by the voice of heralds and the applause of the Moslems.

In a second visit to Bagdad, the Seljukian prince again rescued the Caliph from his enemies; and devoutedly, on foot, led the bridle of his mule from the prison to the palace. Their alliance was cemented by the marriage of Togral's sister with the successor of the prophet.

Without reluctance he had introduced a Turkish virgin into his harem; but Cayem proudly refused his daughter to the Sultan, disdained to mingle the blood of the Hashemites with the blood of a Scythian shepherd, and protracted the negotiation many months, till the gradual diminution of his revenue admonished him that he was still in the hands of a master.

The royal nuptials were followed by the death of Togrul himself. As he left no children, his nephew Alp Arslan succeeded to the title and prerogatives of Sultan, and his name, after that of Caliph, was pronounced in the public prayers of the Moslems."—Gibbon.

We have given this lengthy sketch that the reader may understand the relationship, in its origin, existing between the Turkish Sultan, and the Caliph or high priest of Mahometanism. Under the empire of the Saracens, the Caliphs were royal high priests; in the beginning of the Turkish dynasty there was a transfer of civil authority to the Sultan; still the Caliph was, nominally, the head of ecclesiastical authority. Church and state were for a time partly divorced. As the civil power increased, it gradually absorbed the power of high priesthood, till finally the Sultan filled the offices of Priest and King—"Royal High Priest."

Another point to be kept constantly in view is, that the Turkish empire has always been a nation of Horsemen. Its youth were trained to horsemanship from childhood. It was their principal school. So skillfully were they trained that their arrow seldom failed to do its fatal work. They could discharge volleys of arrows on full speed. A Turk and his charger were constant companions.

Central Asia, as well as the Arabian deserts, abounded in horses. Those extended plains around the Altai—sloping toward India, China, the Arctic Ocean and the Caspian Sea, gave them wide pasturage and an easy range.

These wild horses, reared amid the wilds of that region, partook of all the attributes that adapted them to their future mission.

In vision John never saw a Turk on foot. The horse and his rider constituted one agent—a compound being with a single will.

As we advance in the history of the Turkish dynasty let the reader keep John's symbol before him. What could more appropriately represent the Turkish empire than an army of cavalry?

One other remark may be of interest. The symbols of the first four trumpets are quite unlike those of the fifth and sixth; yet the nations they symbolize are quite as dissimilar.

Compare the German nations and the various tribes that overrun the Western empire, with the Arabians and Turks that conquered the Eastern empire. See their armies, and especially their cavalry.

Among the Hebrews, all thought stands in immediate contact with living impressions and feelings, and so, if incapable of rising to the abstract, is prevented from sinking to the unreal. —Robertson Smith.

ISRAEL AND THE CHURCH.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

J. CAMERON.

THE NATION OF ISRAEL, AND "THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD."

The necessity for adhering to the plain reading of the Scriptures is rendered more urgent by the fact that the future destiny of Israel is intimately connected with the gospel of the kingdom of God as proclaimed by Jesus and the apostles. God, by the mouth of the angel, promised that Jesus should reign over the house of Jacob, and Jesus promised that in his kingdom his apostles should sit on thrones and judge the tribes of Israel. The good news concerning this reign was preached to Israel during the personal ministry of Jesus, and Jesus said concerning it:—

"Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein."

In order then to the reception of the truth concerning the kingdom of God, it is absolutely necessary to understand the promise made to the mother of Jesus by the angel concerning the reign over the house of Jacob, and also the promise of Jesus to his apostles as to their judging the tribes of Israel. Any uncertainty on these points implies ignorance of the kingdom of God as preached for salvation by Jesus and the apostles.

This will further appear if we consider that the apostles while they preached the kingdom of God had no notion of any other kingdom than that of Israel restored to their own land, under the new covenant, and the Messiah ruling over them and the subjugated nations. Hence, after they had preached the kingdom for several years, and even after they had enjoyed the special teaching of the Lord during the forty days that elapsed between his resurrection and ascension, their hope of this restoration of the kingdom to Israel was as strong as ever. They desired information on one point, however, but only one; and this they put to Jesus in the form of a direct question. This was solely as to the time:—

"Lord, wilt thou AT THIS TIME restore again the kingdom to Israel?"

If their hope had been without foundation, this was the time to correct it—but Jesus uttered not a word to obscure the brightness of their fondly cherished hopes; but confined himself purely to the matter of time raised by the question of the apostles:—

"It is not for you to know the TIMES or the SEASONS."

Verily then the kingdom they preached and the kingdom they hoped for was one and the same. If it were not so the record would surely contain some allusion to the fact of their correction by their Divine Master; for it cannot be thought that he would employ a staff of preachers without seeing that they were duly qualified for the work before them. And it surely cannot be said that the apostles were qualified to preach a kingdom in which the nation of Israel should have no existence.

I have to remark here, that this subject is stamped with peculiar importance to us from the fact that Jesus told his apostles, that "this gospel of the kingdom should be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations." The mission of the Messiah in "appearing the second time," to establish a kingdom upon the earth over Israel and the nations, is ignored by the great mass of Christendom, even as a matter of Bible revelation, much more as an important element of the glad tidings proclaimed by Jesus and his apostles in "the gospel of the kingdom." And it is the gospel aspect of this great truth which constrains us the more to direct attention to it, that we may contribute our share in supplying the lack of enlightenment on so important a subject.

HAS THE CHURCH, THEN, COME IN THE PLACE OF RE-ELECTED ISRAEL?

I must now leave to the consideration of the careful reader of these pages the Scripture testimony adduced to show that Israel and the church always were and ever shall be two distinct bodies; the one God's chosen nation, the other God's elect individual saints. The former the subjects of God's kingdom, the latter the heirs of God and joint-heirs with Christ." God's Anointed. The present attitude of these "heirs" is that of waiting for the appearing of him whose kingdom they expect to share. In this position they are subject to his authority. He is their Lord, and they owe him willing service. The apostle beautifully connects the present with the future relations of the disciples to their Lord in these words to the Colossians (iii, 24):—

"Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance; for ye serve the Lord Christ."

May it be ours so to serve now that we shall receive the reward—remembering our Lord's latest utterance on this solemn yet cheering theme:—

"Behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give to every man according as his work shall be."

Baby Arithmetic.

Rosebud sisinty and fair to see,
Flower of all the world to me,
Come this way on your pretty feet—
Say, how much do you love me, sweet?

Red little mouth drawn gravely down,
White brow wearing a puzzled frown,
Wise little baby there in chief,
Trying to measure her love for me.

"I love you all the day and night,
All the dark and the sunshine bright,
All the candy in every store,
All the dollars, and more and more!

Over the tops of the mountains high,
All the world, way up to the sky!"

Sunshine At Home.

Many a child goes astray, not because there is a want at home, but simply because home lacks sunshine. A child needs smiles as much as the flowers need sunbeams. Children look little beyond the present moment. If a thing pleases, they are apt to seek it; if it displeases, they are apt to avoid. If home is a place where faces are sour, and words harsh, and faultfinding is ever on the ascendant, they will spend as many hours as possible elsewhere.

Toledo Blade.

"You some time ago published the names and description of the seven wonders of the world. If not asking too much, will you please republish the article, as there is considerable interest here to see it?"

The seven wonders of the world are: The Pyramids, the Colossus of Rhodes, Dana's Temple at Ephesus, the Pharos of Alexandria, the Hanging Gardens at Babylon, the Statue of the Olympian Jove, and the Mausoleum by Artemisia at Halicarnassus.

The Pyramids are numerous, and space forbids anything like even a list of them. The great piles were constructed of blocks of red or syenitic granite, and of a hard calcareous stone. These blocks were of extraordinary dimensions, and their transportation to the sites of the pyramids and their adjustment in their places, indicate a surprising degree of mechanical skill. The Great Pyramid covers an area of between 12 and 13 acres. The masonry consisted originally of 89,028,000 cubic feet, and still amounts to 82,111,000 feet. Its present virtical height is 460 feet, against 479 originally, and the present length of the sides is 746 feet against 764 originally. The total weight of the stone is estimated at 6,316,000,000 tons.

The city of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius Poliorcetes, King of Macedon; but, aided by Ptolomy Soter, King of Egypt, the enemy were repulsed. To express their gratitude to their allies and to their tutelary diety, they erected a brazen statue to Apollo. It was 105 feet high, and hollow, with a winding staircase that ascended to the head. After standing 56 years it was overthrown by an earthquake, 224 years before Christ, and lay nine centuries on the ground, and then was sold to a Jew by the Saracens, who had captured Rhodes about the middle of the seventh century. It is said to have required 900 camels to remove the metal, and from this statement it has been estimated to weigh 720,000 pounds.

The Temple of Diana at Ephesus was built at the common charge of all the Asiatic States. The chief architect was Chersiphon, and Pliny says that 220 years were employed in completing the temple, whose riches were immense. It was 425 feet long, 225 feet broad, and was supported by 127 columns of Parian marble, (60 feet high, each weighing 150 tons), furnished by as many kings. It was set on fire on the night of Alexander's birth by an obscure person named Erostratus, who confessed on the rack that the sole motive which prompted him was the desire to transmit his name to future ages. The temple was again built, and once more burned by the Goths in their naval invasion A. D. 256.

The colossal statue of Jupiter in the Temple of Olympia, at Ellis, was by Phidias. It was in gold and ivory, and sat enthroned in the temple for 800 years, and was finally destroyed by fire about A. D. 376.

From the best information it is believed that the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus was a rectangular building surrounded by an Ionic portico of 36 columns, and surmounted by a pyramid, rising in 24 steps, upon the summit of which was a colossal marble quadriga with a statue of Mausolus. This magnificent structure was erected by Artemisia, sister, wife, and successor of Mausolus.

HYMN OF THE FATHERLAND.

It is related of the famous King of Sweden, Gustavus Adolphus, that, after long and severe fighting, he conquered a strongly-fortified town, in which were citizens who had been born within the limits of Swedish rule, but departed to seek new homes and take upon themselves new allegiance. These people he condemned to death. They were marched out from the town at nightfall to be held in camp until the following morning, when they were to be shot for treason. Several of his own officers interceded with the King for the lives of these poor people. But Gustavus felt that he had already granted enough. First in the heat of his passion he had consigned the whole tribe to death; but since then he had greatly modified the sentence, consenting to be shot only those of the former subjects of Sweden who had been taken with arms in their hands; and from this no power of argument or persuasion could move him. All the talk of his old chaplain about these people having only joined their fellows in protecting the homes of their wives and children moved him not an atom.

"They are traitors!" he said, "and as traitors they shall die."

At a late hour—it was past midnight—Gustavus Adolphus threw on his cloak, drew his slouched hat over his eyes, and, staff in hand, wandered forth into the darkness. Without thinking whither he went, he walked slowly on, answering the sentinels as they hailed him, until at length his steps were arrested by a strain of music.

"Who is that?" he asked of a sentinel whom he chanced to meet a moment later.

"It is in one of the tents of the prisoners, sire. The wife and children of one of their chief men have had permission to spend the night with the husband and father."

The King nodded his thanks for the information and moved on. Slowly he approached the tent whence the music had issued, and as he drew near he heard the sound of weeping and wailing, for the song had ceased. As he stopped by the rear of the tent he heard a deep, manly voice.

"Hush! hush! weep not. God will provide!" the voice said.

The King looked in through a seam in the cloth and saw a gray-haired man, with an imposing presence, a grand face, head, and a clear, flashing eye, surrounded by his wife and children, who clung to him with passionate fondness.

"Hush!" he said. "Let us not make these precious moments darker than they need be. It is but the fortune of war, my loves. Come, my Hermoine—sing to me once more my dear old song of the Fatherland. For though Gustavus will take my life, yet I love the land that gave me birth. God bless dear Sweden, now and evermore. Now, Hermoine, sing! Come—let thy voice give my poor heart cheer, if it may be."

Presently a beautiful girl of fifteen or sixteen summers threw back the silken hood from her golden curls and began to sing. Her song was the Swedes' oldest and most deeply cherished piece of heart music—the words full of love and devotion, love of home and country—and the melody was peculiarly sweet and touching. And never had the King heard it sung so grandly. The words fell upon his ears with a new meaning and the music touched the spirit with a strangely awakening power. As the melody swelled to grander and grander tones and the voice of the singer deepened and strengthened, the listener felt his heart hushed with awe. And, finally, when the last rich echoes died away, in mellow melting cadence, he pressed his hands over his eyes and burst into tears.

After a time Gustavus lifted his head, and looking once more through the aperture in the wall of the tent he saw the family upon their knees, and heard the voice of an old man raised in prayer. He listened for a few seconds, then turned and strode away toward his quarters, where he found two of his attendants waiting for him. To one of them he said:—

"Colonel, I wish you to go to the prisoners' quarters, and in a large tent nearest the river—it is at the extreme northwestern corner of the camp—you will find the family of a prisoner named Hoven; and of the family is a girl named Hermoine. Bring her to me. Assure her that no harm shall befall her."

When the messenger had gone, the King turned to his table and having found the necessary materials he at once began to write. He wrote rapidly and heavily, like one moved by ponderous ideas; and he had just finished his work when the Colonel appeared with the gentle songstress.

"Fear not, my child," the King said as the maiden stood trembling before him; "I have sent for you because I wished to repay you for a great good you unconsciously did me this night. Do you call to mind that you sang the dear old song of the Vasas—the hymn of the Fatherland?"

"Yes, your Majesty; I sang it for my father, who is to die on the morrow. Though no longer in Sweden, he dearly loves the memory of the land that gave him birth."

"Well, I chanced to hear you sing, and you shall ere long know how your song affected me. Here, take this paper, and go with it to the officer commanding the camp of the prisoners, Colonel Gorsbo will go with you. And, my child, the next time you sing that song, think of Gustavus Adolphus Vasa, and bear witness that his heart was not all hard nor cold."

The girl looked up in the monarch's face as he he held forth the paper, and when she saw the genial, kindly look that beamed upon her, she obeyed the impulse of the moment, and caught his hand and kissed it.

And when she went away she bore with her the royal order for the free pardon and instant release of all the prisoners. The old General to whom the order was directed for promulgation and execution was one of those who had earnestly pleaded in behalf of the condemned, and we can readily imagine the joy with which he received it. He fairly caught the beautiful messenger in his arms and kissed her upon the forehead and blessed her; and he went with her to the tent where her father was held and allowed her to publish the joyful tidings.

With the dawn of day the prisoners, to the number of over two hundred, were mustered into line, many of them believing their hour had come, to receive the intelligence of pardon and freedom.

What transpired beyond that can be imagined fully as well as we can tell it. We will only add that Gustavus Adolphus, by that act of mercy, secured friendship which was to be of inestimable value to him in coming time.

And one other thing. In less than a year from that time Colonel Ulrich Forsby, of the King's staff, gained for a wife the beautiful singer whose sweet notes had melted the heart of Gustavus Adolphus, and given life and liberty and joy to suffering men.

THE RESTITUTION.

J. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 1, 1881.

We once more greet our friends after the interim of one week. As manuscripts have accumulated we give a large share of the present number to original articles.

In this number we give the concluding part of the dissertation communicated by Brother J. Cameron, of Edinburgh, Scotland, on "Israel and the Church." The kind and logical manner with which our talented and esteemed correspondent has treated this important subject, is well worthy the imitation of some, who, in taking a different view of this question, treat everything pertaining to Israel's future restoration only with burlesque and ridicule. Of Israel, as a nation, the Bible is largely a biography and prophecy. The Church, Israel, and the nations have a distinctly defined, and widely different destiny in the coming age. The redemption of a glorified church is not all that God contemplates as the result of the plan of salvation.

LIVING EPISTLES.

Everything makes its own historic record. The rocks bear the story of their formation in such legible inscribings upon themselves as to give us a most instructive chapter in the creation narrative. Every man, wittingly or unwittingly, so imprints upon himself his own biography, that all who know him read his character clearly from the letters that have been instamped upon it by types that have been set by his own hand. By the thoughts as uttered, and the deeds as performed, every one discloses, for the perusal of the world, those lines that are imprinted on the pages composing the volume of the existent self in characters so indelibly marked as never to be erased by time or circumstance. From our self-made, self-instamped records, in the book of self-personality, will be read our individual worth or worthlessness in the soon-coming judgment. O for the enduring tracings of the Divine Spirit on our heart tablets.

THE COMING STORM.

L. S. BRONSON.

Editor Restitution:

In reading an article in No. 29, of THE RESTITUTION, entitled "The great tragedy at Washington," in which the writer speaks of the Nihilists of this country and of Europe, and the principles which they advocate and seek to establish, our heart grew sad for the world as we thought of the dark storm that is soon to settle over this once fair and beautiful earth before the day-dawn of a better day can come to this world.

By the Scriptures of truth can we not see that such principles as the writer alludes to will obtain, and that such a power as the one to which he refers will at some time be fully inaugurated?

Is not this power spoken of by John the revelator, in Rev. xvii. "And there came one of the seven angels and talked with me, Come hither, I will show unto thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters. . . . . So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness, and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. . . . . And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel? I will tell the mystery of the woman and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns."

Leaving the woman we wish to notice briefly the beast with the seven heads.

Verse 8: "The beast that thou sawest was and is not and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition. . . . . And there are seven kings, five are fallen (in John's day) and one is (the sixth) and the other is not yet come (the seventh) and when he comes he must continue a short space. And the beast that was and is not he is the eighth and is of the seventh, and goeth into perdition."

Here we find a description of a beast with seven heads or forms of government, which succeed one another in their power or rule. From the standpoint where John writes, five of these forms of government have passed away, and one is, the sixth, and the other is not yet come.

We believe it to be a fact admitted by many, that we are now living under the seventh head or form of government, which was inaugurated by Victor Emanuel in 1870, "and is to continue a short space."

Now the beast that John saw had but seven heads, but after the seventh and last head appeared and continued for a short space, then the beast now a headless monster, "the eighth which is the seventh, rises out of the bottomless pit and goeth into perdition." In other words, the body of this beast which had borne the seven heads now rises for the last death struggle.

With no head or controlling center it appears before us. Rising in such a condition what might we reasonably expect would be the result? Anarchy, confusion, and lastly ending in perdition.

The present aspect of affairs among the nations and kingdoms of earth indicates that the "short space" in which the seventh head is to rule is nearly if not quite passed, and that soon the beast without a head will rise from the bottomless pit, and what could more fitly represent the standing up of this headless monster than for the principles advocated by Communists and Nihilists to be fully inaugurated?

May we be found ready to escape all these things and stand before the Son of Man.

SINGING.

O. M. MYERS.

Among the people of God, both individually and collectively, singing praises to God has largely entered into their worship. When God had safely delivered Israel across the Red Sea, and from the cruel hand of the oppressor Moses and Israel sang unto the Lord; and then followed in turn Miriam the prophetess, Moses' sister, and the women in song. Exod. xv.

David said:—"Sing unto the Lord a new song: sing unto the Lord all the earth." Psa. xcvi. 1.

Paul wrote:—"Speaking to yourselves in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord." Eph. v. 19.

And again he wrote:—"Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom; teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord." Col. iii. 16.

But one thought further is submitted by Paul which we all would do well to take heed. It was written to the Corinthian brethren, and reads:—

"I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding." 1 Cor. xiv. 15.

I am truly sorry, that as a body of brethren largely we are departing from this statement of the apostle. We sing, but not as we teach, we sing, but not as we believe. It is not unfrequent that we hear brethren sing of the kingdom now, sing of a present reign of the Savior, sing of a home above, sing of a home beyond the skies, sing of going home at death, and many other unscriptural expressions which are contrary to our teaching and contrary to our faith.

Why is this? Is it because our brethren are gradually being led away from Scriptural teaching upon these points?

I am persuaded that it is not, in faith, while it is in practice. They sing, but not with the understanding.

But why is this?

I am fully persuaded that it is because of the use of books that are not entirely pure upon many of these points. There is no book among us that is in general use. The Psalmodist has been largely purchased but from some cause, we care not now to inquire, or to speak of, it has been largely abandoned. We find now some using the hymns of the Advent Minstrel, some using the Hymns of the Advent, some using the Jubilee Harp, and some using Gospel Hymns Nos. 1, 2 and 3. These books all contain in them many excellent pieces that are calculated to stir the soul-life—and can with a few exceptions—sometimes a verse, sometimes a line, and sometimes only a word—be sung with the understanding.

Now what we want is an Eclectic Hymn Book, containing the good of all these books. We do not want a voluminous book. Twenty years experience upon the field as a laborer teaches me that no religious body of people have over fifty pieces in general use. A book of two hundred hymns will give us sufficient variety, if properly selected. We need the book that we may have these soul-stirring pieces collected together for us. We need the book that we may be enabled to sing the truth as well as teach it. Yes by all means we need the book.

Shall we have it?

Yes, inside of sixty days we shall have it printed, bound and ready for use.

I have for the last six months devoted my spare time to the arrangement of this little book. I have selected from the old Millennial Harp, Jubilee Harps—old and new—Minstrel, Hymns of the Advent, Winnowed Hymns, Gospel Hymns Nos. 1, 2 and 3, Christian Hymns, Hymnal, and others—fifteen books—but more largely from the Millennial Harp, Jubilee Harps, Minstrel, and Gospel Hymns No. 1.

I have talked with and corresponded with a number of brethren and have obtained their selections, and have found them to be quite uniform. Just a few days ago out of a list of thirty-seven selections from two books sent us we had already thirty of them on our list.

Our little book will contain two hundred pieces, all of which as to sentiment have been scrutinized, and we think will be in complete harmony with the Bible. Those desiring the Eclectic Hymn Book can have them in flexible muslin covers at 20 cents each, or $2.00 per dozen, or in stiff board binding at 25 cents each, or $2.50 per dozen. Send to me at Lanark, Ill.

BURN THE BRIDGES.

S. ROXANA WING.

In a recent letter to us from a beloved brother in the faith, he says: "When I left Egypt and Babylon in 1844, I left to go forward, guided by the word of God, and like Napoleon, burnt the bridges. My faith was never stronger than now. Jesus alone has the words of eternal life. What is the wealth and glory of this world compared to the kingdom of God? It is light, it is nothing. My prayer is, O God, send thy Son to reign. Let thy kingdom come, let the earth be filled with thy glory and thy truth."

Well would it have been with many more, if when they enlisted as soldiers of Christ, they had burnt the bridges behind them.

There had been no going back into the world then. No forsaking the assembling of themselves together. No spending of the Lord's money for the upbuilding of earthly governments. No taking of the world's papers in preference to the heralds of the Coming Kingdom. No neglect of the Lord's poor, no letting go of the watchman's hands, no cause of hatred in the church.

Ye who start for the kingdom, let me entreat you to burn the bridges. Look not back. Go forward. Canaan is ahead. The Jordan will soon divide. We shall soon be in the delectable land forever.

DEAN STANLEY ON THE REVISED VERSION.

Extracts From His Last Article.

The question will arise in many minds, is there any change produced in the doctrine presented by the New Version?

To this question the answer is No and Yes.

There is no change in any of the great doctrines which all Christians alike hold; the importance of charity, of mercy, of judgment, the transcendent and Divine beauty of the Character in the Gospels, and the force of the incidents and arguments in the Acts and in the Epistles are beyond any possibility of alteration from a new reading or a new collocation of phrases. But if it be asked whether some of what are commonly called doctrines are placed in a new light, then the answer must be in the affirmative. For example, the very word "doctrine," perhaps not from the fault of the translators, but from the change of meaning which has taken place in the lapse of time, has undergone a transformation which converted a perfectly general expression into one synonymous with dogmatic teaching. This error, if so we may call it, has been removed almost uniformly in the present Revision, which renders the original word, not by "doctrine," but by "teaching." "Heresies" and "heretical," which in ecclesiastical parlance for many centuries have come to mean "error in opinion," have now the mask taken from off them, and they appear in their true light as "factions" or "party spirit."

All the modern fandas which have congregated round the words "hell," "everlasting," and "damnation" have from different causes been exploded in this version. The words which have been hitherto translated "hell" are now, either in the text or the margin, reduced to their original meanings of "gehenna," "hades," or "tartarus," each with a very different signification the one from the other, and all from the meaning which they had acquired in modern popular language. The word "everlasting," at least in the margin, is always accompanied by an indication that its real meaning is "for the age" or "for the ages," or else the far more sublime and ethereal word of "eternal." "Damnation," which had acquired so harsh a signification in later English, is now entirely banished from the Sacred Volume, and appears only as "condemnation" or "judgment." "Inspiration," although it might fairly have been interpreted in a less technical sense, yet now in the one text which was employed for vindicating the verbal authority of the Sacred Scriptures has been transformed from "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable," into "Every Scripture inspired of God is profitable." Some of the great scholastic doctrines have lost their chief supports, and that sometimes by variation of interpretation, more often by variation of reading.

The passage in Phil. ii. 6, is now not translated, "He thought it not robbery to be equal with God," but "He counted it not a prize to be on an equality with God." The word "person," in Heb. i. 3, has made way for a phrase which in the Athanasian Creed is used as the opposite of it, and reappears as "substance." The text "God manifest in the flesh" is now "Who was manifested in the flesh," and the old reading, we are told, rests on no sufficient evidence. The last twelve verses of the last chapter of St. Mark, which formerly were quoted as decisive for the rigid character of the Gospel teaching, are now separated by a space from the genuine narrative, and we are told that the two oldest Greek manuscripts and some other authorities omit them. The King of the Belgians is reported to have said to Bishop Wilberforce:—

"I say with Athanasius, the only ground for a church to stand on is, 'Believe this or you are damned.'"

He would have found himself at a loss in the new translation, both in the spirit and in the letter. The curious appearance of Patri-passionism in Acts xx. 28, is permitted to bear the alternative rendering of the words "the Lord." The doxological passage in Rom. ix. 5, has a shadow of uncertainty cast over it by a long marginal variation. The verse 1 John v. 7, which in the last century was regarded by divines as the surest bulwark of an Orthodox representation of a cherished doctrine, has now disappeared from the Epistle, and its place knows it no more. The angel at the Pool of Bethesda (John v. 4), which has supplied many a text for sermons at the medicinal waters at Buxton and Bath, is relegated to the margin with expressions of disparagement. The implicit recommendation to fasting contained in Mark ix. 29, and 1 Cor. vii. 5, has vanished from one passage and is doubtfully mentioned in the other. There are, on the other hand, some passages which still remain unshaken in their support of established modes of expression. In Heb. i. 8, xlvth Psalm is still cited in the form most conductive to the received doctrine. The exclamation of Thomas in John xx. 28 remains intact. In John i. 18 there is a new expression of singular force introduced into the margin, with the support of many ancient authorities, in which the "Logos" is designated "God only begotten." Other variations have been accepted, which will in different ways give a shock to the public mind. In the Lord's Prayer the expression "evil," which in the Sermon on the Mount is used three times over (Matt. v. 11-37; vi. 13), is in this one instance not quite consistently translated "the Evil One." "Evil," or "the evil," however, appears in the margin. The doxology is altogether omitted. Matt. vi. 13. In the version of the same form of prayer in Luke xi. 2-4, the varieties are still more numerous. The gracious and beautiful story of the woman taken in adultery (John viii. 1-11) is preserved indeed in the text, but its doubtful character is clearly indicated. The passage so often quoted in behalf of Christian forbearance in the rebuke to the disciples who would have called down fire from heaven (Luke ix. 54) is now shorn of its most persuasive appeal. The still more pathetic and solemn prayer, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," remains in the text (Luke xxiii. 34), but not without a statement in the margin that it is omitted in some ancient authorities. Even a variation in such a matter is painful. But we may console ourselves that in all these three instances the doubtful expressions are so entirely in the spirit of the Gospel, and so entirely unlike the spirit of the fourth century, that we may fairly accept them as parts of the genuine tradition of Apostolic times.

It may be asked what are the prospects of this New Version taking the place of that which already exists. To this no positive answer can as yet be given, but something may be argued from the history of that previous version itself. We have already seen that the translation of 1611 never received the sanction of Parliament, Convocation or the Sovereign; it came in by use, and by use it still holds its ground. There is no reason to doubt that, if the present version should win a general acceptance, it will in its turn supersede the old; first in private houses, and then by public reading in the church. By the Nonconformists it will be accepted as the substitute of the older version, in all probability, after a faint struggle. In the church it will exist side by side with the earlier translation, in the same way as the Psalms already are dear to churchmen in two versions, neither of which excludes the other. In any circumstances, it may be hoped that this revision, conducted, as it has been, with such singular harmony by the various bodies of Christians in these kingdoms and in the United States, will act, not as a disintegrating, but as a uniting element to bring together the thoughts and the devotions of thousands into a nearer and more exact appreciation of the book which, above all other books—above even the Hebrew Scriptures themselves—has been fitly called the Word of God.

A SCENE UPON MOUNT OLIVET.

It was a splendid morning: The golden sun had but just risen over the hills of Jerusalem, and as the bright and beautiful rays fell upon the magnificent temple and towers of this celebrated city, then glanced down to the usually thronged streets below, they revealed but now and then a solitary pedestrian, for it was yet far too early for many to be seen abroad.

It was morning—bright; beautiful morning! that hour when nature seems to have arrayed herself in her fairest attire, and the sparkling dew-drops that lie upon each spire of grass, and nestle away in the lily cups, seem as it were her diadem of jewels.

It was at this calm and peaceful hour, that a little group might be seen passing through the East, or Beautiful Gate of the city, and wending its way toward the Mount of Olives, that rose before them in all its beauty. Slowly they walked, and sadly, it would seem, from the bowed head and speaking countenances of many of the little band, while the One they seemed to follow turned over anon to speak, in low, sweet tones, words of encouragement and advice.

Slowly they walked along over the valley, crossing the brook Kedron, and then silently commenced to ascend the green side of the lovely mountain, whose beautiful trees afforded a sweet shade from the hot rays of the sun. No word was uttered by the little company, as with thoughtful brows and wondering looks they followed the footsteps of their Lord; and as silently did our Savior pass for the last time, over that well-known path, while ever and anon as he advanced would he glance back, with a look full of affection, to the scenes he was leaving behind, each spot of which was so familiar to his eye.

There, upon yonder hill, rose the city of Jerusalem, which he had so loved and traversed, and over whose fate he had shed so many tears of the deepest bitterness!

Here, at the foot of the mountain, and about two miles east from Jerusalem, lay the little village of Bethany—the loved abode of the widowed Martha her sister Mary, and his dear friend Lazarus; that calm retreat, where many an hour of his weary pilgrimage on earth was passed, free from the taunts and jeers, the buffetings and scorn of the careless crowd. How beautiful did it seem to him, as his eye fell on the well-known spot! how calm and peaceful!

But Jerusalem and Bethany were not all that Jesus gazed upon with looks of love, in parting from the world; for as his eye wandered over the beautiful landscape, it fell upon a lovely garden, situated between the foot of the mountain and waters of the Kedron, and filled with dark-green olive trees. He started as he gazed upon it, for he knew it well; and sad memories clustered around that little enclosure.

There was the spot where he had agonized; there he had prayed at the midnight hour; there he had suffered; there he had sweat great drops of blood in the agony of his soul; and there, too, he had been so cruelly betrayed. It was a mournful, but a well-known spot to him, and long his eyes lingered upon its walks.

But moments fled, and at length he stood with his loved disciples upon the middle summit of Mount Olivet, and there he paused with his dark eyes fixed upon the wondering faces of his followers.

But see yon crimson cloud, that rises in the east, and steals along through the azure skies. How superb is its crimson hue! How magnificent its bordering of glittering gold, and lining of shining silver; and how majestically it sails along until it fairly encircles the holy mountain, where it pauses in all its splendor.

The Savior's eyes are fixed upon it for a moment, while a smile steals o'er his lips: but then they fall again upon the anxious company, and with a glance of deep affection and unchanging love, he lifts up his hands and gives them his parting blessing; and in the very act, with arms still outstretched as if to clasp them to his bosom, he is lifted from his feet and borne away, up, up, higher and higher, until the crimson cloud, which has parted to receive them, closes over him, and they see him no more.

Long that little group stand with their wondering eyes fixed upon the spot where he has disappeared. Long and steadfastly they gaze, hoping to catch another glimpse of that loved form, but in vain. Yet still the gaze went on, nor did they see, in its intensity, two strangers added to their number.

How splendid were those angel forms! How splendid, yet how strange! They were the citizens of Heaven, and their folded wings and snow-white garments were more dazzling than the eye of man is accustomed to gaze upon.

But hush! they speak, and their low, full tones, seem like a strain of music, so sweetly melodious is the sound. "Ye men of Galilee," they say, "why stand ye gazing into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven!"

The words had scarcely died away, when the awe-stricken company stood once more alone, and with hearts full of wonder and surprise, they slowly wended their way down the mountain side, and returned to Jerusalem, with their souls filled with adoration and praise.

DISCOVERY AND IDENTIFICATION OF MUMMIES AT THEBES.

The finding at Thebes of thirty-nine mummies of Egyptian royal and priestly personages, which has been hailed in Europe as the greatest archæological discovery since Sir Henry Layard's researches in Nineveh, grows in importance.

Two-thirds of the mummies are now identified by means of the inscriptions upon their cases and the manuscripts found. They are for the most part kings and queens, with their children, ranging through four dynasties, beginning with the seventeenth and ending with the twenty-first; or, stating it roughly, from 2,000 to 1,700 B. C.

The mummy of the Pharaoh of Israel is among these, in a perfect state of preservation, and the mummy of Thothmes III., in whose reign the obelisk that stands in Central Park was first erected.

The imagination fairly falters in the attempt to realize that these figures have been brought back from the vast shoreless sea of Egyptian antiquity to our own day, and our very doors. Lotus flowers that look as if they "had been plucked a few months ago," are found lying in the wrappings of kings who were dead centuries before the Pharaoh of Israel was born, and the passage of nearly 4,000 years has not dimmed the beauty of the colors of the inscriptions and pencilings, "which are as bright and fresh as if the artist had touched them but yesterday."

This is a wonderful prize for archæological science, the full meaning of which scholars probably are just beginning to appreciate.

A telegram from Tchesme, Asia Minor, says the recent earthquake there and on the island of Chios was more violent than that of last April. The inhabitants are in despair.

London, Sept. 5.—A dispatch from Quetta says: On August 31 Ayoob Khan issued a proclamation declaring that he had abandoned his intention of fighting the Ameer, and was about to fight the English.

A dispatch from Geneva to the London Daily News reports that a huge mass of rock and earth has fallen from the mountain side at Souvix in the Canton of Grisons and blocked up the course of the River Jobel, an affluent of the Rhine, converting the valley into a lake.

VICTORIA, B. C., Sept. 2.—An arrival from Honolulu reports that the Island Hilo, Sandwich Islands, was in danger of being overwhelmed by lava from the volcano Mauna Loa. The lava was moving at the rate of a sixteenth of a mile daily, and was slowly advancing on the town of Hilo, which would shortly be overwhelmed. There was great consternation among the people, who were fleeing from the approaching destruction.

A number of fires are reported in Algeria. All the country around Philippeville to the extent of sixty square kilometres is one vast conflagration. Stores, the port of Philippeville, has been destroyed. A forest of cork trees is ablaze, and the flames, fanned by a violent sirocco, are carrying all before them. It is is hardly possible for the garrison and the population to effect anything in the way of subduing the fires owing to the heat. It is feared that the fire originated with the Arabs.

The London Times of the 26th ult. says: "The damage by the late rains is to be reckoned by millions. It is impossible to gather in the corn (grain), and it will soon cease to be worth gathering. The situation of the farmers is dismal. For many of them a bad harvest must mean absolute ruin." Strange that at the same date the newspapers of many States here were complaining of long-continued drought, and saying that the corn (maize) and some other crops were much injured or quite ruined by it.

OBITUARY.

DIED—Jedidah Witham, aged about eighty years, May 30, 1881.

Brother Witham was a man who read his Bible much, and was always ready to converse on its truths, having professed Christianity for over forty years. He had taken THE RESTITUTION for a number of years, and was a full believer of the truths published therein. The last words he was heard to utter were, "Yes, I know it; as sure as I live the whole earth will be filled with the glory of the Lord."

MARAH AND ELIM.

HORATIUS BONAR.

To-day 'tis Elim with its palms and wells,
And happy shades for desert weariness:
'Twas Marah yesterday, all rock and sand,
Unshaded solitude and dreariness.
Yet the same desert holds them both, the same
Top breezes wander o'er the lonely ground;
The same low-stretch of valley shelters both,
And the same mountains compass them around.

So it is here with us on earth, and so
I do remember it has ever been:
The bitter and the sweet, the grief and joy,
Ne'er together, but a day between.
Sometimes God turns our bitter into sweet,
Sometimes he gives a pleasant water-spring;
Sometimes he shades us with his pillar-cloud,
And sometimes to a blessed palm-shade brings.

What matters it? The time will not be long:
Marah and Elim will alike be past;
Our desert-wells and palms will soon be done,
We reach the "City of our God" at last.
O happy land! Beyond those lonely hills
Where gush no joy, the everlasting springs;
O holy Paradise! above thee, heaven,
Where we shall end our desert wanderings.

Find room in your paper for an article of mine. Though I am not a member of your church—a Dunkard minister—allow me to say that since my debate with brother Fenimore, my mind has changed, because I cannot sustain the doctrine that I advocated then. I may as well make it public now as any other time. I can see now what I could not then—that I have to spiritualize one-half of the Bible that I may prove what is not in the Bible. That I cannot do, so I must say I was wrong, but by the grace of God I will preach what is in the Bible.

If man has an immortal soul I cannot find it in the Bible, because life is the opposite of death, and if the soul of man can die it is not immortal, but if it is immortal it cannot die. The Bible declares the soul that sinneth, it shall die. But what kind of a death will it die? The Bible says temporal death.

What is death? It is the extinction of animal life. But says one, There are different kinds of deaths found in the Bible. This is all true, but we must divide the word and find out what kind of death the writer has reference to. If he speaks of a death to sin, he tells us what kind of a death it is, but if he tells us it is temporal death let us believe him.

That was the trouble with me in the debate with brother Fenimore, I tried to prove that death did not mean death. Now then take the Bible at what it says, and you will have it right, for there is no word in the English language that has more than one meaning when applied to any specific thing. Take the word baptize—it means immerse, and nothing else; so with the word soul. Eight souls were saved by water, eight persons—unto Drink—English soul, spirit, breath.

Job says, My breath is in me, and the spirit of the Lord is in my nostrils, thus making spirit and breath one and the same thing. We would not suppose the attempt of the prophet would be to say that the spirit of the Lord as a person was in his nostrils, but simply his breath. The breath, then, according to Job, is the spirit of man. I have written to brother Fenemore of my change of mind.

I am still striving to live near to God that he may be near to me. My desire is to be an overcomer. I expect that the once despised Savior will soon come and claim his children. I believe the time is short, and that we must be up and doing, having on the whole armor, that we may be able to stand in the evil day.

The pathway that lies before the remnant is truly a narrow and rugged one, and were it not that Israel's God is able to save and to deliver even to the uttermost, our hearts would indeed fail us. As we view the great storm that is coming on this sin-cursed earth, although we may be called to pass through deep tribulations, and the world casts out our names and scoff because we believe that Jesus is soon coming to take his faithful waiting ones home, yet let us ever remember that Jesus says, "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

I feel truly to praise him that I have been spared to see the light of the gospel of the kingdom. I love the precious truth, and wish all could see it; but this I cannot expect, for the time has come when they will not endure sound doctrine, but choose to go in the broad road, while few go in the narrow way.

Let us strive to be of that little company that will be permitted to meet in that kingdom where there will be no war nor bloodshed, no sorrow nor dying groans, but were the redeemed will be, and sorrow and sighing flee away.

I want to be ready when Jesus comes; I cannot think of being left behind when the saints are taken away. I want an inheritance with the saints of God in the earth when it is made new.

As I am a stranger in this portion of the world, and feel lonely, having no one with whom I can converse upon the glorious promises about to be fulfilled. They treat me as though I was not worthy of citizenship, give me no employment, and try to keep all others from doing so, the labor of myself and little boy being the only means of making our support, and there being eight of us, I find myself very unpleasantly situated.

I was trying to run a repairing shop here but find it out of the question. Can do a little at almost any kind of wood work, and would like to be among brethren. I have not heard any preaching for near four years. If I can hear truth it will keep falsehood away; so let me hear the message of life proclaimed by one of God's servants once more. I crave the company, communion and fellowship of the saints, in whose hearts the love of God is shed abroad.

I would like to find a neighborhood where I could get employment for myself and son, where I could meet with brethren, hear the gospel preached. I have a wife, son and daughters that I wish to hear, understand and obey the gospel.

If there are any brethren near me I would like to have them come and see me, or drop me a card.

I am strongly impressed with the idea that the birth, lifetime, and translation of Enoch foreshadows the commencement and duration of the "time of the end," and the rapture of the church.

Enoch's lifetime was 365 years, Gen. v. 23, and I believe we have very good reasons for stating that the time of the end commenced in A. D. 1517. This I believe I satisfactorily proved in article of July 27, published in your paper under the heading "Alon." The same year witnessed the rise of Luther and the practical birth of the Reformation.

Now 365 added to 1517 gives 1882, the latter being the familiar number which gives the length of Grand Gallery in Great Pyramid.

It seems also remarkable and worthy of notice, that the combined ages of the patriarch from Adam to Enoch inclusive, should aggregate 5879 years, Gen. v. 3–24. This is truly a close approximation to the computed age of the world at the present time. It is also well to remember the odd months and days over and above years specified not being given reminds us forcibly of our Savior's words: "But of that day and hour knoweth no man," as also "So likewise ye, when ye see all these things, know that it near, even at the doors."

I am, dear sir, yours in the One Hope. H. B.

Dear Brethren and Sisters of the Household of Faith:

It is with a joyful heart that I must express my gratitude to God for his love and tender mercies, in watching over me and bringing me through so many trials and temptations, that are common to this life. Oh! I cannot praise his holy name enough. How thankful I am that the light of his countenance shines in my heart. I do rejoice for the glorious privilege the gospel affords. It gives me so much peace of mind. I care not for the fleeting things of this vain world, but my hope is in Jesus, and I know that my Redeemer liveth, that in the last days he will stand upon earth. Though after my skin worms destroy this my body, yet in my flesh shall I see God; mine own eyes shall see him and behold his glory.

Dear waiting ones, will not that be a joyful time? to see our dear Savior's face, one who died for us, that in believing in him we might have everlasting life, and live with him in that beautiful world, where no trials will ever come. Who would not be a follower of the meek and exalted Jesus, with such grand inducements before them day by day! My mind is caught away in such ecstacies of joy to the time when Jesus will come and of the resurrection morning, that I can imagine that I can see those dear faces that I once saw who slept the sleep of death coming out of their dusty beds clothed with immortal youth to die no more forever. O, how these things ought to encourage us.

Dear brethren and sisters, we only have a short time to work for Jesus; let us perform that work faithfully, taking up our cross daily—then we have the promise of being his disciples. Oh! how I love to read the good exhortations that come to us through our much loved paper. Sister Helena Hunt, and my dear sister S. Roxana Wilcox, I do love to read your sweet words of comfort from time to time. May the good Lord bless you and keep you faithful, a crown of bright glory will be given to you in the kingdom of our Father.

I often wish I could write like some, it seems to me I would devote half of my time, but I feel as though I was one of the weak ones; still I must do what I can, and my greatest desire is to be faithful to my God. My dear brother or sister, if others do not act right let us do our whole duty. Each one is responsible for what they do. It is when we do right that God will bless us.

I want to meet you all in the sweet by and by.

I am a traveler to a land
Where all is fair;
Where is seen no broken band,
All all are there.

Where no tear shall ever fall,
Nor heart be sad;
Where the glory is for all
And all are glad.

SARAH F. CHAMBERLIN.

FROM THE CHURCH IN MIDDLE TENNESSEE.

The Church scattered abroad are introduced to brethren Randall Hall and C. W. M. Hunt, who to-day (Aug. 14) for the first time sat at the Lord's table in the Lord's house, having been immersed into the saving name.

Brother Hall's case is a remarkable one, and it was profoundly interesting to see him with mental faculties well preserved at the age of eighty-six, stand up before many witnesses, and make the good confession. He gave the audience to understand that he was about to cast off 60 or 70 years of religious profession, earnest as it was, begin again at the foot of the ladder; that his rule had been to go where he could discern the most truth; that this had caused him to leave the Baptists and unite with the Disciples, and now in great mercy he had been privileged to find it just as it is in Jesus.

He would have obeyed the truth more than a year ago, but he fell and broke his thigh, and this delayed it. We were all alarmed lest it should prove fatal; but thank God, he hears prayers, and we receive our aged brother almost as one raised from the dead. He is rejoicing in hope of the glory of God.

Brother Hunt was a member of the same congregation as brother Hall, in whom, it appears, the germ of obedience must have already existed, for he fell in love with the truth as soon as the good message reached him, for on my second visit, I think it was, I found him seated upon a log outside the house, earnestly contending that Christ was NOT now seated upon David's throne. May God bless him and make him a blessing.

When we came within range of the promise that where two or three should be gathered together in the name of our Lord, we realized its fulfillment; he was in our midst; it was good to be there; for a few moments we sat together in heavenly places, and had a foretaste of our future exaltation and blessedness—when this memorial service will be fulfilled in the kingdom of God.

By way of encouragement to the beloved brethren and sisters in others states with whom we have worked together, I would say the little band of tried ones in this region are determined to meet you in the goodly land, God helping them!

WINCHESTER, Va.

Editor Restitution:

Some years back, while I was mayor of Winchester, Va., a man applied to me for the use of the town hall, to hold religious services, as an Elder in the Church of God, calling himself Elder N. J. Morgan.

It was our custom to allow all religious denominations to use the room, having no house to worship in. We knew nothing about this organization of Christians, but gave him permission to preach there on certain hours. I learned from him that there was a few near town of his church.

He soon after purchased a handsome lot and built himself a comfortable dwelling, and a neat little church building, and commenced holding services.

By this time I had learned more of his doctrines, etc., and as he held some ancient apostolic views in relation to Christ's second advent, and preached about Jesus as David's King, etc., etc., parts of which I had preached some twenty years previously (being a minister in the P. E. Church), I with others of our best citizens, went occasionally to hear. His house of worship, which he called the House of the Brethren, is situated in the southwest corner of our city, and I having appointments of mayor prevented me from hearing often, except when other speakers and people from the Upper Valley, and from border states were with him at their quarterly and other gatherings.

On becoming better acquainted I found they taught something different, Scripture lessons not familiar to me, but it did not raise opposition from me as from some others, (for I for them, etc.,) as in Paul's day, the baser sort of hired fellows were disposed to interrupt by disturbing under cover of night, by making a noise outside, and on several occasions I ordered my police to attend, and I often went myself.

They have kept up the meetings at the House of the Brethren, and at different points in the great valley of Virginia and Maryland, and keep up their quarterly and yearly meetings, frequently baptizing, etc.

On June 18, 1881, I was in the neighborhood and at R. E. Springe, in the western mountains of Virginia, and had the pleasure of being present at a quarterly communication held at J. J. Spald's beautiful grove. The woods were fitted up in camp-meeting style, and very clean and agreeable. A large congregation occupied the place during the Sunday of June 19, to which Elder N. J. Morgan discoursed freely. His mode of operation was reading the Bible with comments as he went along, singing the songs of Zion concerning the kingdom and reign of Jesus Christ and his saints. There seemed to be considerable impression and at the close he baptized on Monday two young gentlemen and one lady.

I was pleased with the entertainment and saw nothing to which I could object; a more brotherly feeling I seldom find than was manifested among them. They use the Bible, contend for it all the time, and seem to reverence and love the name of Jesus. May they do much good in the name of the holy child Jesus.

This meeting was held in one of those beautiful places, in the mountains, about three miles south of Rock Enon Springs, and within about six miles of the celebrated Copper Springs, in the neighborhood of the Spaids, Grods, Bulls, Reeds, etc., who have fine farms overlooking the most beautiful landscape in the world—mountain and mineral waters, with tables groaning under the luxuries of this life, and the kindest hearts, pleasant faces, and old Virginia hospitality not surpassed anywhere. Truly the Elder has a soft seat. Dan. xii. 3—"They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars."

"THE APPROACHING END OF THE AGE."

J. B. COOK.

The profound work of the Hon. H. Grattan Guinness, on this theme of superlative concern to us all, has interested me intensely. He has been digging "deep" (Matt. vii. 24; Luke vi. 48) and found that our faith in prophecy—its events and chronological periods—is not founded in cunningly devised fables, nor in the mere verbiage of the Bible on this subject; but in the astronomical epochs, and the lofty range, of all computations of time, as ascertained by the solar, lunar and diurnal cycles, (Gen. i. 14–18) and made necessary by the Creator in his structure of the universe!

This faith seems confirmed from analogy by "the Pattern in the Mount, as given to Moses for the building of the tabernacle!" Also by the pattern portrayed to David for the temple and its ordinances of worship! I. Chron. xxviii 11-19.

How does this appear?

By the seven-fold entities of all "truth and grace." Eph. iv. 13–14.

By "the seven pillars in the temple of wisdom." Prov. ix. 1.

By the seven steps (as Jesus says) in Jacob's ladder!

And to crown the climax—by the prayer that "God's will" may be done in earth as it is done in heaven!

"The pattern" from heaven was to be "the example of things in the heavens;" and these heavenly things will not appear in their plentitude; only as the prayer shall be answered; the prophecy fulfilled; and the full measure of the vision verified!

"His glory will cover the heavens and the earth be full of his praise. Amen, and amen." Psa. lxxii, Heb. iii. 3.

Well so far; but how does this apply to the prophetic periods?

I reply that in "the manifold wisdom" of God's works (Psa. civ. 24) it is reasonable that he should see and keep in mind the end (the consummation) from the beginning. Nay more, we are assured, that "he hath made of one blood all nations of men; and determined the times before appointed; and the bounds of their habitation"—for a yet future purpose. Acts xvii. 26.

This is demonstrated in the four great Gentile powers—Babylon, Persia, Greece and Rome—in their relations to Israel, Judah and Jerusalem. Zech. i. 18–22; vii.; ix.

This outlines the geography, chronology and history of our world.

Nay further, this is "to the intent that—all men—with angels, principalities and powers in heavenly places—may see the manifold wisdom of God, according to his eternal purpose—in Christ Jesus!" Eph. iii. 9–11.

My whole being was profoundly moved by the evidence that our right royal author gives, that the seven times, and the seven times seventy (Lev. xxvi. 28–45; Dan. ix. 24) are on a line that opens from the primary seven days! Gen. i.; ii. 1–4. Because this starts the instructed mind on the course of all Bible times.—The primal six days of the creation—culminating in "the seventh day," and completing the week! Then, the "seven days" of each of the thrice recurring seven-day-feasts every year!

Further on we find the seven times seven Sabbaths—forty-six days to the Pentecost—the memorial of Sinaitic revelation; and "the shadow of good things to come!"

Nay more, all this was still further unfolded into "the seventh—the Sabbatic year!" Thence, they were to reckon "seven Sabbaths of years—forty-nine years"—to culminate in "the fiftieth—the year of jubilee!"

Observe, this outline reaches down to the root of our present and profound theme of God's "times and seasons," which he put and keeps in his own power (Acts i. 3–5) by the constitution of the world! Because the primal six days led to the memorial and prophetic rest, on the seventh day; and that was the germ of all forms of the Sabbaths (in shadow) and Sabbatic years that filled out the jubilean cycle—their crowning type of deliverance.

Thus, these facts taken together seem to be the clear and certain finger-point that directs all faith forward to the grand reality of the "rest (Sabbatismos) that remaineth to the people of God." Heb. iv. 1–9.

We can not have it here under organized world-wide evil—Pope, Grand Turk and the Devil! No, no. The captain of our salvation will put down all rule, authority and power, and give eternal rest from evil! Amen.

Hence, as the week of days, and the week of years are each crowned with their Sabbatic periods, so on the still ascending scale of a thousand-year-day period, the last, the seventh, must be the crowning, the Sabbath of Sabbaths! "The great and appearing day of the Lord—as a thousand years!" Acts ii. 20; 2 Peter iii. 8; Rev. xx. 3–7; Joel ii. 31; Mal. iv. 5.

Thus, the root and trunk of our world's chronology is made septiform. It began and had its expansion and utmost amplitude, so far, on the line of this seven-fold series! By consequence, we should not be surprised that our author finds that the prophetic dates are epochs in the science of astronomy; and the periods so many astronomical cycles; provided for in the mighty machinery of creation!

It is on this lofty line of inspiration that the saints are to possess the kingdom forever, even forever and ever—that is for the age and the age of ages. Dan. vii. 18; Eph. ii. 7; iii. 21. Because, the primal Sabbath, in both days and years, was on the seventh; and thence, the order extended only into the septiform seven times seven, multiple of seven! Lev. xxiii.; xxv. 3–8.

It is good to build on the rock. Amen!

There are three grand crises in the seven times of Israel's punishment taken as a whole. Lev. xxv. 28–45.

The first was from Nineveh, the Assyrian capital. 2 Kings xv. 29.

The second from Babylon, by Nebuchadnezzar. Dan. i.

The third from Rome. Luke ii. 1; John xi. 48–52.

The seven times embrace the whole Israel—the twelve tribes; and should date from the Assyrian invasion, the captivity of Israel, or ten tribes—including Jerusalem and Manasseh, the king of Judah.

But the subsequent captivities of seventy years by Babylon, and over eighteen centuries by Rome, has been confined to Judah—as distinguished nationally, from Israel. Hence it follows that our author errs in dating the seven times from the Babylonian captivity, for three reasons:—

1. It applied only to Judah—not to Israel.

2. It was confined to the seventy years; and yet from that date, it extends "the times of the Gentiles" beyond their terminus, as dated from the Assyrian invasion.

3. The captivity by Rome has been more roundabout and twenty-five times more prolonged, than that by Babylon—from which the date would extend "the times of the Gentiles" over half through the millennium as ascertained from other data.

But omitting details I forbear. There can be no lease of time to Gentile supremacy beyond the seven times, from this Assyrian data—that I can see. The vision is only for an appointed time—it will not tarry. Hab. ii. 1–3; Acts xvii. 31.

The "seven times" of Moses should conform to all of Israel, and his subject of prophecy, as do the "times and seasons" of the New Testament and of Daniel, to Judah and his Gentile foes.

The conclusion is that "the day of the Lord cometh. It hasteth greatly." Delays may be to us more dangerous here than at any other crisis. Matt. xxiv. 48. Naught but an absolute, "thus saith the Lord" can justify delay. "As a snare, shall it come" on the unprepared. Luke xxi. With the word in us, we'll not be in darkness that the day may overtake us unaware.

"THE PROBLEM OF HUMAN LIFE HERE AND HEREAFTER."

J. P. GELLETLY.

"Convince a man against his will He's of the same opinion still."

I do not know whether it is most sad or most amusing to witness the absurd persistency of human nature. Man is generally supposed to be a reasonable creature, but his history manifests time and again that the arguments that to him are the most convincing are those of the knock down order, and I opine that nothing illustrates this persistent obstinacy so clearly as the subject named at the head of this paper.

Everybody knows, clergy and laity, Romanist and Atheist, rich and poor, black and white, everybody that knows almost anything knows that the Bible teaches that "there will be a resurrection of the dead," whether they believe the Bible or not they know that it teaches a resurrection. Yet we see people that profess most profoundly to accept this same Bible as their guide through life, the lamp to their feet and the light to their path, calmly but assiduously set this, its solution of the "problem," aside, as if unworthy of much consideration.

I stand ready to apologize for the poor and the ignorant who look up with staring eyes and open mouths to the great and learned, but when I see the grave and the educated, the recognized savants in Christianity, those who take it upon themselves to "represent" Christianity, when I see such as these drivelling nonsense, I rather prefer not to express all I feel. And it does seem that the more profound the absurdity, or the more transcendently preposterous are the arguments put forth, the more unanswerably wonderful are they considered—and it must be allowed that some are for the most part absolutely unanswerable.

Witness for instance such a man as the editor of Scribner's Monthly Magazine, one of the most popular periodicals in this, or any other country, propounding an argument in favor of man's inherent immortality out of Dr. Tanner's famous forty days' fast. He maintained that the worthy doctor fed as it were on his spiritual system, his outer man "was renewed day by day" from his inner man. I did suggest to the learned editor that the argument might do very well for Dr. Tanner but I hardly thought all of our "immortal souls" would stand the strain, and I might have added something about the "immortal souls" of bears, and other hybernating animals who abstain from food for long periods, but I don't suppose the suggestion amounted or would amount to anything. Now the unreasonableness of nonsense is a great evil, especially when said nonsense is clothed in rhetoric and polysyllables.

The latest thing I have seen in the same strain is a very handsome volume (put in my hands by a friend) bearing the title at the head of this article. The author is Mr A. Wilford Hall, a man, who anyone can see, who has a smattering of science, is deeply read in it. He argues that man is a duplicate being, one of him is substance and the other is "incorporeal substance," whatever that may mean. He defines his I. S. as a "vital and mental organism within the physical structure filling every part of it and constituting its exact but invisible and incorporeal counterpart."

This "incorporeal body" that is of course in English, bodiless body, at the phenomenon called death, leaves the body, that is, the bodily body—let's be clear—the bodiless body leaves the bodily body and goes to heaven, possessing all the senses and powers of both together. He argues that it is absurd to speak of a soul without an organism. He says he would be very sorry to entertain the conception that the "human soul * * * starts on its journey to heaven * * * deaf, dumb, blind, and idiotic." While the one body is in the other, the other is only the instrument the one plays on, who plays the first one we are left to conjecture. The principal argument advanced, if indeed you can call it an argument, is that the ordinary theory of sound called the "wave theory," is all nonsense and his theory is the correct one, that is, that sound is "attenuated substance." The learned author is a master of logic as well as of satire, and he labors to show that light, heat, and immortal souls, are all attenuated substances as well. But it seems to me if man's "incorporeal body" consists of the same sort of stuff as a sound I am sorry for its immortality! The whole thing is about as broad as it is long, with this difference, that rather than accept the Bible doctrine of the "immortality of the soul" by the resurrection from the dead, they will credit anything.

They will not give God the glory nor trust the power of his promise by his word and by his Son. No, but they will compass sea and land for some ridiculous premises, and when they have found one then do they call a credulous public to behold a wondrous pyramid of "words, words, words," that entirely covers up the view, then to finish, they cap the mass with a nicely rounded quotation from the apostle Paul, and the thing is done.

The whole subject is in a nutshell. The Christian doctrine of a life hereafter is by a resurrection from the grave (except those of course who are exempted by the appearance of our Lord). No resurrection, no hope.

SAURIVIE.

S. S. FURRY.

Whenever I hear one, in doleful tones, constantly telling of what great sacrifices he has made for Christ, I can but feel sad. It seems so much as though he feels himself in the service of a hard task-master. Did we feel that it is a sacrifice to labor for and help and try to please those whom we love? How gladly the loving wife and mother works day after day to make the home a pleasant place for the dear ones; and how patiently the fond husband and father toils from early morn to closing day to bring to the home of his loved ones his scanty earnings; never counting it a sacrifice, but only glad to do it for the loved ones. And shall we count the service of the dear Lord a sacrifice? I hope not—even though we must give up some things we are delighted in. The privilege of working for and pleasing our dear Savior more than compensates for all. Let us be careful how we harbor the thought that what we do for Christ is a sacrifice.

TO CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

Christian worker! pause and listen:
Christ is seeking thee to-day:
Cease thy labors for one moment—
Solemn words he hath to say.

He is standing close beside thee.
And behold his face is red
As he gazeth on thy service,
Which methought would make him wed.

Yes, the Lord is sadly gazing,
Hark! he now doth question thee:
Listen well—it's no ars gentle—
"Dost thou work for love to me?"

Ah! how often, fellow-Christians,
Do we need the question still!
Are we now from pure affection
Working out the Master's will?

Does not conscience sometimes tell us
That the motive power is wrong
Of what seems our fairest actions—
And what sounds our sweetest song?

Jesus, Savior, O forgive us
As with rhapsor we this confess:
May our love to thee grow stronger—
May our love of self grow less.

REPORT OF AN ORAL DISCUSSION

Of Four Days at Wall's School House, Between Marshall and Paris, Illinois, Between Elder G. W. Payne of the Predestinarian Baptist Church and Elder J. S. Hatch of the Church of God.

A. MALONE.

This is not intended as a report of the debate, nor even a synopsis of it; for, to give the Scriptures used and the arguments had by both, THE RESTITUTION entire could not hold it. The brethren, some of them, at that place, and some from Good Hope, requested that I should notice it in some of its features in THE RESTITUTION. For their sakes, not mine, I notice the men, their propositions, and the impressions made upon myself, and all others with whom I conversed and heard from, save the Old School Baptists. I was one of the moderators and gave good heed all the time to all said and done. And—

1. Elder Payne had two preachers all the time taking down Scriptures quoted by Brother Hatch, and aiding him in every way they could.

2. He had been preparing for the debate by selecting his Scriptures, noting them down, and arranging his line of argument for a long time, I was informed, and his notes, etc., proved this true.

3. Brother Hatch came without any notes or arrangement, as he did not believe Elder Payne would meet him, even after the debate, time and place were agreed upon. Therefore, he alone, unaided by any one had to select his Scriptures and arrange his line of argument as the debate proceeded.

4. As to the men themselves. Elder Payne is a small man, physically, of the bilious temperament predominating, in the prime of life, having a pretty fair English education, calm, cool, unexcitable, a smooth speaker, with fair language, generally courteous to his opponents; and, so far as the man is concerned, until his last speech, where no notice of it could be taken, acted very well. But in that he not only used new argument, which he had no right to do, and for which no one had any right to call him to account, excepting the president moderator who did not, but he most grossly misrepresented Brother Hatch and the church concerning infants, idiots and the heathen—asserting that he and they believed in the damnation of them all, or at least their non-resurrection, and that he had a book written by authority within fifteen minutes call which would prove his assertion. If so, why not produce it? Or, if the whole thing was not a premeditated insult to Brother Hatch and the church, why did he not make the assertion during the debate when it could have been noticed and refuted? Manifestly it was a low clap-trap dodge to prejudice the people against Brother Hatch and the church. I was much surprised, as before this he had acted fairly and honorably.

Brother Hatch is an older man than Payne, much larger, physically, of a nervo-sanguine temperament, the organ of language smaller than Payne's, with a very limited education, not so smooth in address, indeed rather rough, personally, at times towards his opponent. With these men pitted against each other, had not Brother Hatch had the advantage of truth on his side in the propositions and the Bible, Elder Payne would have been an overmatch for him. I give my impressions fairly, having no prejudice against either as men, and as honestly as my pen can depict them.

5. The propositions were—

a. Resolved, That the Bible teaches that men and women, or, almost, are born of God in this life; and that they must possess everlasting life before they can believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. Elder G. W. Payne affirms and Elder J. S. Hatch denies.

b. Resolved, That all adults where the gospel of Christ is are gifted with the ability to obey or disobey that gospel. Elder J. S. Hatch affirms and Elder G. W. Payne denies.

c. Resolved, That the Bible teaches the doctrine of Two Seeds before conversion; one of these being the children of God; the other the children of the Devil, and all of God's people were absolutely saved by the laying down of Christ's life. Elder G. W. Payne affirms and Elder J. S. Hatch denies.

d. Resolved, That the Bible teaches that Christ will come in the future to set up his kingdom on this earth, which then will be purified and constituted the eternal abode of the saints. Elder J. S. Hatch affirms and Elder G. W. Payne denies.

6. Neither of them defined the leading terms and phrases of their propositions, and logically attempted to make the Bible fit them; but proceeded as if they were well understood by the audience, and both quoted many Scriptures in their proof, as both thought.

7. Each proposition occupied one day, and four half-hour speeches from each.

8. The ordinary rules governing in such debates were agreed upon; and nothing was to be taken as proof but King James' version of the Bible.

9. With these propositions and with these men, it is easy to determine the result. No man, Elder Payne not excepted, can sustain the first proposition by the Scriptures. Elder Payne did not attempt it. His own efforts, without Brother Hatch's negative arguments proved an entire failure. Indeed, as before observed, he did not attempt to prove his proposition. He did not attempt to prove that the sinner had "everlasting life" and that "before he could believe on the Lord Jesus Christ." He asserted it, and quoted a Scripture or so which Brother Hatch proved had no relevancy to the proof of the proposition; and which everybody, (excepting his favored few) in other churches and in no church, saw was worse than a failure. He contradicted himself and the Scriptures, and made such a failure as all could see, without one word from Brother Hatch. But when he proved that "eternal life" is "the gift of God," that it is "in the Son," and not inherent, and that this life cannot be had before believing, and not in this life at all only as by faith and hope, then his proposition went by the board.

That Elder Hatch abundantly sustained the second proposition by many plain Scriptures and arguments deduced from them, was so far as I could learn, excepting Payne's own brethren, the universal voice of the people. Elder Payne did not prove that these Scriptures did not teach what Brother Hatch said they did, but arrayed other Scriptures against them. Brother Hatch noticed all these, and proved that they did not invalidate those appealed to by him, but that they harmonized with them when given their proper position, and comparing Scripture with Scripture.

10. The third proposition, affirmatively, was an entire failure. Payne made one lame effort to prove that God had a seed and the Devil, also. God had his while sinners, and the Devil had his always. How did he prove it? By quoting the text in Genesis where part of the penalty for sin against Eve, he impugned her chastity and made her have commerce with the Devil! And, in that connection, asserted that "the creation," God's people, "were always as safe as if then housed in heaven!"

Brother Hatch showed up this bit of predestinarian romance to perfection, and negatively demonstrated that all came from one pair, that Christ died for all, and that the gospel in its provisions included all in the arrangement of salvation, and that Christ called upon all to come to him to be saved; and that the old iron-clad Baptists represented God as tying up the sinner and making sport of his inability to come! Also, he demonstrated beyond controversy the falsity of Payne's member of his proposition, That all of God's people were saved absolutely by the laying down of Christ's life." If Christ had not arisen, ascended to heaven, and made provisions of salvation in his gospel, none could be saved; agreeing with Paul's teaching in reference to himself that, although an elect apostle, he taught that, if he did not bring his passions and appetites into subjection to Christ, after preaching to others, he himself "might be a castaway." Brother Hatch also proved by the Bible that all sinners, while sinners, were called satans, devils, even Peter was so called; and that Jesus talking to the Jews, his own people, his chosen Israel, called them "a generation of vipers." and affirmed that, whilst denying him, they could not escape the damnation of hell!" That the Bible calls them in Hosea "which were not [once] my people, [now] my people." And that they, therefore, have not always been God's people, His Seed, "as safe always as if they had been housed in heaven!" And that, if God's people were always his, Paul could not have been in Christ after his kinsmen according to the flesh, as he asserted!

11. The fourth and last proposition, though thought by many not to have been as well sustained by Brother Hatch as some others, I think, was much better sustained. Here Brother Hatch seemed to arise beyond himself, and with a thronging array of Scriptures well chosen and admirably commented upon, demonstrated beyond any reasonable cavil that Christ's second coming is in the future, contemporaneous with the resurrection and judgment, and that without it religion is a failure, the promise of God made to Abraham is a myth, and that all have perished, or shall perish; that if Christ do not come to earth again, raise the dead saints and immortalize the living ones, and establish his kingdom and reign on earth, personally, with his saints, and subdue all governments, and bring all nations, languages and peoples into subjection to him, then the Bible is untrue and meaningless, the prophetic record is dark, false, and "the hope of Israel"—immortality and eternal in the kingdom of God—go out in eternal gloom and death, and all the arrangement of God and his dealings with men, will be meaningless, untrue, and a dark pall of gloom and eternal night will cover the earth as the waters cover the mighty deep!

Elder Payne did not, could not, show, that the bright array of Scriptures brought forth by Brother Hatch did not mean what they said, and what Brother Hatch proved that they did mean; but he scrapped some Scriptures, detaching them from their contexts, forcing upon them an unnatural and untrue meaning, thereby arraying Scripture against Scripture instead of harmonizing Scripture with Scripture. Here he had the kingdom now in existence, men and women in it, and it in them, the resurrection past and the judgment going along all the time, the thief in the kingdom, the rich man in hell, Paul in Paradise, and death gained! Not a Scriptural argument did he make negatively only "the kingdom of God is within you," and then they were in the kingdom! 'Twas here he showed his utter failure, his utter inability to grapple with the question, and here he left all attempt at argumentation and filled up his time in exhortation, an utter foolish thing for an Old Hard Shell Baptist to do, if all things were irrevocably fixed from all eternity without reference to man's deeds, good or evil, and it was here that he libeled Brother Hatch's teaching and the teaching of the church in reference to infants, idiots and pagans.

I am fully satisfied as to the result of the debate, and so are all the brethren and sisters there and at Good Hope who heard the debate, and so, too, are all outsiders, whose judgment was had; and so, too, all of the denominations who heard it and expressed themselves, (excepting the Baptists), upon every proposition excepting the last: and my impressions, my honest convictions are, that this one was more than four-fold better sustained than any point advocated by Brother Hatch. His proof-texts and his arguments were cumulative, convincing, irrefutable, absolutely astounding, and buried Elder Payne beyond any hope of a resurrection! Let God be true, though every man may be a liar!

In the hope of eternal life.

REPORT OF ANNUAL ASSEMBLY.

E. J. MORGAN.

The Annual Assembly of the Church of God convened, according to announcement, at the house of the brethren in Winchester, Va., on Friday, Aug. 6, 1881, and continued until Tuesday, Aug 9.

The One Faith as usual was well represented, both from Maryland and Virginia. It was truly a foretaste of the glorious day when the saints of all ages will, in harmony meet their Savior and brethren transported to greet, while anthems of rapture unceasingly roll, and where the smile of the Lord is as a feast to the soul.

The brethren read each in turn, till they read the whole epistle of Paul to the Romans, the reading being mingled with some of the sweet songs of Zion, which was followed by the writer, who endeavored to rightly divide each lesson in order to the edification of the assembly, and instruction of the respectful congregation in attendance.

The brethren and sisters said it was the best meeting that we have ever had here.

Three precious souls, being well instructed in the things of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ were baptized by the writer, in the one all-saving name, for the remission of sins, a son and married daughter of Brother Jacob Good, and brother Green of Clark Co. Brother Green has passed through two religious elements, the Methodist and Baptist, but like the dove in Canticles, he was still going about the great Babylonish city, enquiring for him whom her soul loveth, and as the Lord would have it he attended our Quarterly Assembly in last February, and not only listened attentively to your humble writer, but conversed freely with him, and said it was the first time he ever heard the truth, that he had seen so much of sectarian religion that he had almost lost all confidence in anything of the kind, but he had now, by my preaching, been enabled to see that there was a reality in the religion of the book of all books, as he now calls it.

I got him at once to subscribe for THE RESTITUTION. He promised to come and see me, and correspond with me, and to attend the Annual Assembly. He complied faithfully with all his promises, and the blessed result is now no longer a stranger and foreigner, but a fellow-citizen with the saints, (bless the Lord, O my soul!) and of the household of God, and built upon the foundation of the apostles and the prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone.

On considering the many sore trials through which we have been compelled to pass, by being as it were in perils on land and sea, and in perils among false brethren, who made their boast like the false prophet of old, who said that if even a fox ran upon the wall it would fall.

The meeting inspired the dear brethren and sisters with fresh courage to fight on under the conviction that instead of our adversaries putting us down, they were putting us up.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again:
The eternal years of God are hers
While error, wounded writhes in pain,
And dies amid her worshipers."

On Sunday night the God given description of a Christian was given by the writer to a well filled house of attentive listeners, and quite a number out of doors. Then an invitation was given to all who could answer to it, to seats with us, thus showing conclusively to all honest hearts, that we have no one man system, as we have been charged with, neither do we call any man master, for one is our master, even Christ, and we all brethren. As such we distinguished ourselves from the world, by participating together in the rich memorials of a Savior's love, there being six accessions to our number, seeing them in the faith as the fruit of the labor of love and good works of the household of faith, a Paul as it were planting, and an Apollos watering, and God giving the increase, while singing one of the sweet songs of Zion:

"Gracious Father guard thy children,
From the foes destructive power," etc

We are in the time of waiting,
Soon we shall behold our Lord,
Wafted far away from sorrow,
To receive our rich reward.

Keep us then till his appearing,
Pure, unspotted from the world;
Let thy promises inspire us,
Till thy banner is unfurled.

We gave them the right hand of fellowship. The meeting continued with good interest from the city, till Tuesday night, when it closed with the understanding that our next Quarterly Assembly be held with the One Faith near Browntown, Warren Co., Va., when we expect another good time in the all-saving name of our blessed Master.

Winchester, Va.

Our seventh annual meeting's past,
It was a source of sweet comfort
To those whose lot with us was cast,
All looking to our future joy.

Our brethren and our sisters dear,
Who came this meeting to attend,
Fresh courage take and persevere,
And fight the battle to the end.

And may those precious souls who did
Obey the truth in Jesus name,
Still follow Christ their living head,
And all his wondrous love proclaim.

Now may the God of peace and love,
Still smile upon his children here;
Look down upon us from above,
And watch us with a Father's care.

E. J. MORGAN.

FROM THE WINCHESTER NEWS.

"The Annual Meeting at the house of the Brethren in this place, has been in progress during the past week, the usual number from the country being in attendance.

On Sunday afternoon, Elder Morgan administered the ordinance of baptism to three persons in Hillard's dam, a large crowd witnessing the impressive ceremony."

The word of God moves along like a passing shower; wherever it comes it must be received at once, or it will be gone. How soon a man's "not now" becomes a "never."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NORTHERN INDIANA CONFERENCE.

The Annual Conference of the Churches of God in Northern Indiana will be held at Argos, Marshall Co., Ind., and will commence on Thursday, September 8, 1881, at 7:30 p. m., and continue Friday, Saturday, and Sunday the three days following. Public services will commence at 10:30 a. m. on Friday and other appointments will be made as shall be thought most advisable. A general attendance is requested as the desire of our brethren as has been expressed, is to have one more good meeting, at least, before the close of this dispensation. Argos is on the Michigan City, Peru and Indianapolis railroad, eight miles south of Plymouth, the County-seat of Marshall County. Let it be our prayer that we may meet in the fulness of the gospel of Christ.

BY ORDER OF COMMITTEE.

I will preach as follows: At Baxter School House, near Chilesdale, Mich., the 3d Sunday in September. Will brethren come from different parts of Missouri, and have a general meeting. At Gospel Grove the next Sunday, at Dundee, Rockford Co., Ind., the next Sunday, in brethren Elton's neighborhood, south of Delta, O., the next Sunday, at Raisin, Mich., as brother L. C. Chase may appoint the next Sunday, at Buchanan, Mich., the following Sunday.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

Providence permitting, the brethren of the Abrahamic faith will hold a General Conference for the state of Wisconsin, at Greenfield Station, Monroe county, commencing Friday evening, Sept. 9, 1881, and continue over Sunday. H. V. Reed has promised to be with us to expound the Word of Life, and Sister A. C. Sedgwick is expected. Come brethren, one and all, and let this meeting be a general rallying for the Master.

Greenfield is on the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R.

WM. B. PUTNAM.

Tomah City, Wis.

The brethren of the Abrahamic Faith of Southern Wisconsin and Northern Illinois will meet in Conference at Lanark, Ill., commencing Friday evening, Sept. 30, and hold over Sunday, Oct. 2. A general invitation is extended to all.

J. M. GOODSELL.

The Lord willing, the Michigan Quarterly Conference will be held at the brick school house, three and one-half miles north of Meadon Village, St. Joseph county, Mich., commencing Sept. 30, and lasting over the following Sunday. May all the brethren that can be present, for a little longer and the storms of life will be over, when the cares shall be exchanged for the crown.

Let all the brethren who [illegible]
Their cares and labors lay aside,
And let us at the conference meet,
Where we can bow at Jesus' feet;
And by the strength that he'll impart,
May change the vilest sinner's heart.

K. N. WOODWARD,
Secretary.

A NEW MONTHLY.

THE AGES TO COME!

A monthly periodical, entitled as above, will be issued from the office of OUR HOME, Chicago, Ill., the first number of which will appear on October 1, 1881. It will be in size the same as OUR HOME, 32 pages, 9x12 inches, printed on good paper, from clear type, and in every way a first class journal.

Its title, THE AGES TO COME, indicates the principal character it will sustain, viz., an advocate of what the Editor believes to be the Bible idea of God's plan concerning the ages, showing that "God is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe;" that He is now "taking out of the Gentiles a people for His name" (Acts 15:14-17); and that he will exalt these in due time to heavenly places, and unite them by marriage to His Son, thus constituting them the Wife of Him to whom all power is given in heaven and upon earth. Then will they share with Him the glory of an everlasting reign, and with Him become a means of blessing all nations.

It will strenuously maintain the inspiration of the Bible, as opposed to the growing infidelity of the day; and to the line of Christian duty it will oppose the tendency to worldliness so common in all churches, and advocate a holy life and pure speech, that we may be always ready to meet our blessed coming Lord.

In many respects it will occupy the same ground as that which was occupied by the Bible Examiner, so long and ably published by our late lamented brother, Geo. Storrs, and is intended to take up the work where he laid it down.

We wish to hear from every one who believes in the views we have outlined, and to secure their assistance in the procuring of subscribers. Let us hear from you or some, that we may know how large an edition to print on the first number. Send for a prospectus.

TERMS, ONLY ONE DOLLAR A YEAR.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXX. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, SEPTEMBER 14, 1881. NO. 34.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

J. P. WEETHEE.

History continued—Alp Arslan.—To this period no lasting impression had been made by the Turks. Asia Minor had been overrun, and 130,000 Christians had been sacrificed by the Mahometan power, but Togrul retired upon a town in Armenia, and the empire was again left free from her Scythian shepherds.

Alp Arslan crossed the Euphrates with his cavalry, and after a series of severe and well contested battles, severed Armenia and Georgia from the Greek empire.

Alp Arslan resigned the conduct of the war to his emirs, who, intent on rapine and plunder, dispersed their forces over the country, and were easily overcome by Romanus Diogenes, the Greek emperor A. D. 1068.

In three campaigns, the Turks were so badly defeated that they were again driven across the Euphrates.

In the fourth expedition Romanus undertook the recovery of Armenia. In this he was opposed by the Sultan in person, at the head of forty thousand horse. A great battle was fought. Before the engagement, Alp Arslan, after offering a fervent prayer, "with his own hands tied up his horse's tail, quiver and arrows, for a sign of desperate intention, clothed himself in a white garment, perfumed his body with musk, and declared that if he were vanquished, that spot should be the place of his burial. The Sultan himself had affected to cast away his missile weapons, but his hopes of victory were placed in the arrows of the Turkish cavalry, whose squadrons were loosely distributed in the form of a crescent."—Gibbon.

The Romans, though in number three to one, were totally defeated, and the emperor taken prisoner.

"In the preliminaries of negotiation, Alp Arslan asked him (Romanus) what treatment he expected to receive, and the calm indifference of the emperor displays the freedom of his mind. 'If you are cruel, you will take my life; if you listen to pride, you will drag me at your chariot-wheels; if you consult your interest, you will accept a ransom, and restore me to my country.' 'And what,' continued the Sultan, 'would have been your own behavior had fortune smiled on your arms?' 'Had I vanquished,' he fiercely said, 'I would have inflicted on thy body many a stripe.'

The Turkish conqueror smiled at the insolence of his captive; observed that the Christian law (the emperor was a Christian by profession) inculcated the love of enemies and forgiveness of injuries; and nobly declared that he would not imitate an example which he condemned."—Gibbon.

He was required to pay a ransom, a large annual tribute, and to restore all Moslem captives. No province nor city was demanded, and the empire continued as it was, except the loss of its Asiatic provinces.

The Turkish empire now covered the fairest countries of Asia.

"Twelve hundred princes, or the sons of princes, stood before his throne; and two hundred thousand soldiers (horsemen) marched under his banners."—Gibbon.

After this great victory the Sultan turned his arms against Turkestan, the native seat of the Seljukian dynasty. After crossing the Oxus, he was opposed by the governor of Bersem, Joseph, the Carismian, by whose dagger he fell.

"The Turkish prince bequeathed a dying admonition to the pride of kings. 'In my youth,' said Alp Arslan, 'I was advised by a sage to humble myself before God, to distrust my own strength; and never to despise the most contemptible foe. I have neglected these lessons, and my neglect has been deservedly punished. Yesterday, as from an eminence I beheld the numbers, the discipline, and the spirit, of my armies, the earth seemed to tremble under my feet; and I said in my heart: Surely thou art the king of the world, the greatest and most invincible of warriors. These armies are no longer mine; and, in the confidence of my personal strength, I now fall by the hand of an assassin."—Gibbon.

On his tomb were these words: "O ye who have seen the glory of Alp Arslan exalted to the heavens, repair to Maru, and you will behold it buried in the dust."

It does not appear, to this date (A. D. 1070), that the Turkish Sultans had formed any notion of conquering the Grecian empire; if otherwise it would have been developed after the defeat and capture of the emperor. Some power seemed to hold them to the region of the Euphrates. If that were not so, why did the Sultan march to the Oxus instead of Constantinople? The time for the fall of that empire was many centuries in the future.

Mahometan empire under Malek Shah.—Malek Shah, the oldest son of Alp Arslan, succeeded to the throne of his father. He was, perhaps, the most able Sultan, of the Seljukian dynasty. History makes him utter a very noble sentiment.

"On the eve of a battle, (with his brother who aspired to the crown) he performed his devotions at Thous, before the tomb of the Iman Riza. As the Sultan arose from the ground, he asked his vizier Nizam, who had knelt beside him, what had been the object of his secret petition. 'That your arms may be crowned with victory.' 'For my part,' replied the generous Malek, 'I implored the Lord of Hosts that he would take from me my life and my crown, if my brother be more worthy than myself to reign over the Moslems."—Gibbon.

He was victorious, and was the first Sultan that was called "Commander of the Faithful."

He subdued Turkestan, extended his conquests far north and east to the borders of China; west to Georgia and to the vicinity of Constantinople, including Asia Minor and Syria to Jerusalem.

He asked the daughter of Alexius I. Comnenus (A. D. 1081) in marriage. Death, however, put an end to the negotiations, and prevented the union of the Cross and the Crescent.

With Malek Shah the unity and greatness of the Mahometan empire expired. Under that Sultan it was more powerful than that of Cyrus, or that of the Arabian Caliphs. His vacant throne had five aspirants, his brother and his four sons. The civil contests resulted in dividing the empire into four lesser parts, each under the control of the royal family.

These divisions were Persia, it being the oldest dynasty, or at least this kingdom was the first conquered by the Turks; it was, therefore, "the eldest and principal branch of the house of Seljuk. The three younger dynasties were those of Kerman, of Syria, and of Roum; the first of these commanded an extensive, though obscure, dominion on the shores of the Indian Ocean; the second expelled the Arabian princes of Aleppo and Damascus; and the third, our peculiar care, invaded the Roman provinces of Asia Minor."—Gibbon.

The seat of the Turkish empire, remaining east of the Euphrates, that river was for centuries its permanent western boundary; though their immense armies of cavalry often crossed that river, in their invasions of the Roman empire, yet they were driven back. They held no lasting conquests beyond the Euphrates, while the Roman empire made that river its eastern boundary, or as long as the Greek division of that empire held possessions in Asia Minor.

This great river was the natural boundary between the western and eastern empires. As long as those powers were under the control of great sovereigns, the river was so defended by armies and fortifications and fortresses, that it was exceedingly dangerous for any force to undertake its passage.

Thus it was, for centuries, the boundary between the Roman and Persian empires.

When Persia was conquered by the Turks, and was made a province of the Turkish empire, the eastern guardianship of that river devolved upon that power; while the western guardian was the Greek empire so long as it maintained its vitality in Asia. As its eastern possessions were taken from her the ability to guard the Euphrates diminished.

Up to this period (A. D. 1082) the Turkish empire was confined (bound) to the east of that river. Persia and Kerman were east of the river, as well as all the eastern parts of the empire extending to the Arctic Circle, China, India, and as far west as Georgia and the Black Sea, including nearly all the countries on the eastern tributaries of the Euphrates. Syria was west, but it was a late acquisition. Roum was west also, but it was not yet permanent. It constituted the immediate battle-ground between the two great empires.

The Turkish empire was still lying east of that river, and partially bound at it. She was breaking her fetters, as the Roman power weakened; still an event was then in embryo, which would extend her bondage two centuries. Her haste to be free waked up a power that held her (Turkish empire) there for about two hundred years.

The taking of Jerusalem from the Saracens and their severe treatment of those Christians that visited the holy sepulchre, originated the Crusades, which moved all Europe against Asia.

This movement forced the Cross against the Crescent and caused its confinement, principally, to its old boundaries for about two centuries longer. Let us now continue the chain of history.

Soliman, the eldest son of Malek Shah "accepted the royal standard, which gave him the free conquest and hereditary command of the provinces of the Roman empire, from Arzeroum to Constantinople, and the unknown regions of the west.

Accompanied by his four brothers, he passed the Euphrates; the Turkish camp was soon seated in the neighborhood of Kutaiah in Phrygia; and his flying cavalry laid waste the country as far as the Hellespont and the Black Sea.

Soliman joined the Crescent to the Cross in aiding Botoniates to ascend the throne at Constantinople. At this time 200,000 Turkish troops came into Europe. By this movement, the Greek empire, for a time, lost all her Asiatic possessions, and the way appeared then open for an easy and speedy conquest of the eastern Roman empire; but the time had not come. God had decreed otherwise.

After the death of Soliman, Alexius the emperor, extended the eastern boundary of the Roman empire, not to the Euphrates, but Nicomedia, sixty miles east of Constantinople. The kingdom of Roum, established by Soliman, included nearly all Asia Minor, and extended east to the Euphrates. It was rich in mines, cities, and other resources; was zealous in support of the Koran, and in its position, well calculated to hasten the Crusades.

The Sultan fixed his capital at Nice, 180 miles east of Constantinople, "and the divinity of Christ was denied and derided in the same temple in which it had been pronounced by the general synod of the Catholics."—Gibbon.

Jerusalem was taken from the Saracen Caliphs by the Turks about A. D. 1076, twenty years before the first Crusade. It was at first taken by Atsiz, a lieutenant of Malek Shah, when 3,000 citizens were put to death. This cruelty was soon punished by Sultan Toucush, brother of Malek Shah, who took possession of the city.

The Sultan afterward abandoned the city of Jerusalem to the hereditary command of the emir Ortok, chief of the Turkmans. These Turkmans, strangers of the north, put heavy burdens upon the Christians. The whole country from Nice to Jerusalem, was exposed to the rapine of the Scythian shepherds.

The highway of the Christian pilgrims was infested with bands of these Turkish robbers, too indolent to cultivate the soil. The pilgrims (who had become very numerous, as they were looking for the return of Christ, and expected to meet him at the mount of Olives) were despoiled before they arrived at the Holy City. Even there, at the Holy Sepulchre, they were treated with every indignity. Thousands never saw their native land. The road through Anatolia was whitened with their bones.

MY REVERED PAPA.

I cannot drop the subject of which we were speaking; and although I may never again have so pleasant an opportunity to speak with you face to face, yet I must resume the subject with the pen.

"The greatness of God, the vastness of his creations, is too great for you," you say.

And so it is to all—however learned they may be, the wisest man on the face of the globe—finds after all his study and researches that he has gained but the alphabet as it were; and his wisdom is weak and puny in comparison to the vast knowledge beyond his reach. Mortal man cannot expect to fathom the eternal mysteries of God; nor is it necessary he should.

"God is love."

And what is love?

The unselfish heart can answer best, love is not what it is generally termed, and those who partake most of the nature of God love most, when we contemplate the vastness of the universe, the countless ages of creation, the myriads of globes hanging in immensity of space, and remember that the great being who created them is after all a dear loving father.

Something within must, should tell us that all this is not purposeless, the stupendousness of the work alone bears the impress that its foundations are immortal and shall never be removed, so saith the Book of books. Pss. c. 4, 5.

Saith Eccl. i. 4: The earth abideth forever.

Psa. lxviii. 69: The earth he hath established forever.

The work is too vast to be done over again, and God desires it on which to create a new order of things for those who love him and keep his commandments, a world in which dwelleth righteousness.

You may be able to trust him, and feel that all is well, but oh papa! he wants more than your trust, he wants your love and your belief in his word. He has told you plainly that you shall inherit the earth when he has removed the curse and the sting of death, that the meek shall inherit the earth. Psa. xxxvii. 11, 9, 22.

I know, dear papa, this must mean you, for you never scold, never get impatient, never censure, calm in excitement, gentle and considerate with the most violent tempers, hence these beautiful characteristics which have governed your whole life must class you with the meek of the earth.

It is also said, that this kingdom which is under the whole heavens shall be given to the saints of the Most High. Dan. vii. 27.

And that Jesus whose character you think so beautiful, shall be King over all the earth, for the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign forever and ever. Luke ii. 32, 33.

Only believe, for the word is so plain, do not think it is incomprehensible because God's great creations are.

Oh, papa! you must believe and hope in eternity and heaven, I shall want you there, I could not bear to think this is all of life to those I love, and I whose life has been so much of sorrow and disappointment save in the precious gift of God of the dearest father that ever blessed a daughter's life—to believe there was no eternity for me when this life is done, no more to do for those I love. No! no! I could not believe it, I shall begin again where I left off, but more perfectly, my opportunities here are many, but means and strength too limited. And oh, papa! I've never done half for you that I wish to do, and you know not all my love for you. I would not leave my God for thee, but next to God thou art to me. I could not spare you. There you would learn how unselfishly I love you, and how I long for your prosperity and happiness in this life, and in the beautiful purified city of God you will be wanted so very much.

Search the Scriptures, believe and obey the word, be true to your God and yourself, seek the way of life and walk therein. And now may God bless you abundantly and give you entrance in his beautiful kingdom, is the earnest prayer of your affectionate

PARTNER.

THE ECLECTIC HYMN BOOK.

C. M. MYERS.

We do not expect this little book will find its way into, and take the principal place in our congregations which have regular organized choirs, for it is to be issued without music, but as our congregations are largely without choirs, and sing without note, it will be just what these will want, as it is a collection of 200 of the very best and liveliest pieces. Many have long since desired a collection of our best pieces from various books into one for general use. This is just what has been done. Our older brethren will at once recognize near 100 pieces as once occupying a place in the old Millennial Harp with now and then a change in a verse or a line or a word. Those who have used the Minstrel—an Advent book extensively used, but now out of print—will find full one-half of its pieces here, but not all of them taken direct from that collection. Those who have used Gospel Hymns No. 1 and admire the life of its pieces will find in this little book forty of its pieces with the objectionable words stricken out and others supplied so that the pieces can be sung with the understanding. This book will be ready for distribution by October 15th, and those desiring will please send in to me immediately. Price in flexible muslin covers, 20 cents, or $2.00 per dozen. In stiff board covers, 25 cents, or $2.50 per dozen.

Letter in Zion's Herald.

THE JEWISH PERSECUTIONS IN RUSSIA.

The wails of the persecuted people come to us in the loudest accents from Southern Russia. In the principal cities of this region the houses of the Jews are taken by storm, and sacked to thorough destruction. A brutal mob, inbrutated by rum, enter the quarters of the Jews, and break, destroy, burn or plunder all that is within their reach. In many cases it is the most absolute and wanton ruin; the very streets are rendered impassible by the mass of flour, sugar and merchandise of various kinds that there lies destroyed.

And the persecution is not solely confined to the towns and cities; the peasants of the rural districts wreak their vengeance on the poor Jews, whom every orthodox Russian finds it in his creed to hate. In this dilemma, the attitude of the police and the military authorities is without excuse. These parties show themselves only when the harm is all done and the destruction complete. When the Jews are robbed of their last treasures, when the women and girls have scarcely wherewith to conceal their nakedness, then the troops issue from their barracks and drive back the hordes of robbers and incendiaries. To excuse this conduct on the part of the authorities, it is said they have not the force at hand to suppress these outrages; but they seem everywhere to have enough to appear quickly and effectively when the rioters are political malcontents. Then the public force and energy are on hand at the fitting moment.

It is said that the Jews of Southern Russia have now nothing more to sacrifice to popular madness, and fearing an extensive massacre, they are preparing for a general exodus that will take thousands of them over into Austria. This anger against the Jews is instigated by the fact that they are enriching themselves at the expense of the poor and the peasants, by usurious demands. But the rapacious trader or money-lender is surely less odious than the dishonest public officer who oppresses the tax-payer and deceive his sovereign.

When the serfs were liberated they were obliged, after a time, to purchase their lands; and to do this, they needed to borrow money. This led them to the Jews, who are the holders of most of the capital of Southern Russia. But the guilty one was in reality neither peasant nor petty lender; it was rather the severe law which demanded of the serfs what they really could not do. Now, when it is too late, the Government is trying to aid the serfs; but they are so involved in debt that their case is hopeless, in many instances, and their land, far and near, is passing into the hands of the Jews. But the latter are within the strict letter of the law, however odious may be their position.

The official telegrams from Odessa and Kieff do not deny the acts of vandalism in these cities, but they lay the odium of them at the door of the Socialists. They argue thus: The Nihilists consider that the more misery there is in Russia, the better will the people comprehend the views of the present regime. Universal misery will be the preface to general enfranchisement, and consequently the Nihilists have incited the peasants especially against the Jews. These people, having lived on them as long as they could, will now kill them in order to be freed from their demands. But if the Nihilists are in this business, then certainly the Government ought seriously to interfere. But the Government does not wish to interfere too decidedly or effectually, for fear of driving to revolt the only great support of autocratic power.

But it is a mere subterfuge that the Nihilists have influence enough over the masses to move them to such work as that of Odessa and Kieff. It is just these serfs that are most orthodox and loyal, and the least likely to listen to the Nihilists. These are in reality too few in number, and too closely watched by the Government, to become popular leaders. The real animus of these attacks on the Jews is in the jealousy of their enemies, and obstinacy of prejudice, and the traditional hatred of Christians towards the Jews. These grave events in Russia are the first act of a sort of anti-Jewish crusade that has been nurtured in Germany for a year, and is now beginning to bear fruit. In Berlin for example, it is surprising to see this crusade urged on by statesmen, learned professors, and even pastors remarkable for their age and piety.

These men do not of course preach extermination, but they counsel exclusion from political rights and posts, from the army, and, as far as possible, from the places in the schools. They would deprive them of many rights by demanding that all affirmations be taken on the Bible, which would virtually exclude all orthodox Jews from office and the law. This alloy of patriotism and piety is not very pure, for it seems to be mixed with a large measure of jealousy and cupidity. This Jewish question is destined to give a great deal of trouble to both Germany and Russia, and if this excitement results in a general exodus of the 2,000,000 of Jews in these two countries, they will take much wealth with them to enrich the land to which they escape. For to the nation that will welcome them, their expulsion may prove a second revocation of the Edict of Nantes—they carrying to their new home treasure, skill and industry.

Sententious.

Sorrows are our best educators. A man may see farther through a tear than a telescope.

Longfellow defines poetry as the flower and perfume of thought, and a perpetual delight, clothing all the commonplace affairs of this life "with golden exhalations of the dawn."

Pray, though the gift you ask for
May never comfort your fears,
May never repay your pleadings,
Yet pray, and with hopeful tears;
An answer, not that you longed for,
But diviner, will come one day;
Your eyes are too dim to see it,
Yet strive and wait and pray.

It requires but very few words from unbelieving lips to consign verbally to oblivion a great truth, a great book, a great system, a great man. But to sweep out of being the great work that these have done in the world—that is a different affair.—Austin Phelps.

Would you understand the Bible? Like Hezekiah, take the letter before the Lord.

Kind words produce their own image in men's souls, and a beautiful image it is. They soothe and comfort the hearer. We have not begun to use them in such abundance as they ought to be used.

What our hand findeth, do it with might;
Ask less for help, but stand or fall,
Each one of us, in life's great fight,
As if Himself and God were all.

It is a vain thought to flee from the work that God appoints us, for the sake of finding a great blessing for our own souls, as if we could choose for ourselves where we shall find the fullness of the Divine Presence, instead of simply seeking it where alone it is to be found—in loving obedience.—George Eliot.

Revelation means uncovering; and we shall understand the Bible better if we think of it not as the uncovering, but as the history of God's uncovering himself to man.—J. Dawson.

All our sorrows, doubts and fears,
All our longings, hopes and fears,
All that we do which leads to shame,
All that we do for his blest name,
Our Jesus knows.

Congregationalist.

SILENT INFLUENCE.

We are touching our fellow-beings on all sides. They are affected for good or for evil by what we are, by what we say and do, even by what we think and feel. May-flowers in the parlor breathe their fragrance through the atmosphere. We are each of us silently saturating the atmosphere about us with the subtile aroma of our character. In the family circle, besides and beyond all the teaching, the daily life of each parent and child mysteriously modifies the life of every person in the household. The same process on a wider scale is going on through the community. No man liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. Others are built up and straightened by our unconscious deeds; and others may be wrenched out of their places or thrown down by the unconscious influence.

BRIGHT SPOTS.

There's a great deal of work in this vast world of ours;
And the sunshiny days are fewer than showers;
And the pleasure is less than the deep throbbing pain,
And the losses are greater than ever was gain,
And the sorrow is darker than joy ever was bright;
And the beauties of day are clouded by night.
But yet, through it all, in this dark world of ours,
There are rainbow-hued spots, and bright, cheery hours.
Still, strange! When they come with their smiling, caressing,
Through our dim veil of pining, we see not the blessing!
But, losing ourselves 'neath our burdens of woe,
Need not their rare music as swiftly they go.
And then, when they're gone like the songs of before,
Lament that our lot is so darkened and sore!
Ah! if darkness and toil are the chief part of man
Let's enjoy the bright spots, though few when we can.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

I will preach as follows: At Baxter School House, near Chilicothe, Mo., the 3d Sunday in September. Will brethren come from different parts of Missouri, and have a general meeting.

J. M. STEPHENSON.

The brethren of the Abrahamic faith of Southern Wisconsin and Northern Illinois will meet in Conference at Lanark, Ill., commencing Friday evening, Sept. 30, and hold over Sunday, Oct. 2. A general invitation is extended to all.

J. M. GLOTFELTY.

The Lord willing, the Michigan Quarterly Conference will be held at the brick school house, three and one-half miles north of Mendon Village, St. Joseph county, Mich., commencing Sept. 30, and lasting over the following Sunday. May all the brethren that can, be present, for a little longer and the storms of life will be over, when the cross shall be exchanged for the crown.

Let all the brethren who in Christ reside,
Their cares and labors lay aside,
And let us at the conference meet,
Where we can hear at Jesus' feet;
And by the strength that he'll impart,
May change the vilest sinner's heart.

K. N. WOODWARD,
Secretary.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 14, 1881.

THE Conference at Argos was well attended and a very good meeting indeed. Fuller particulars from the secretary next week.

A TELEGRAM from Brother J. M. Stephenson says—"Drop all my appointments except at Baxter School House." We accordingly leave out his list of appointments this week.

NEWS from President Garfield this morning is very encouraging. He was placed in a reclining chair yesterday and enjoyed the changed position for thirty-five minutes; and it is reported that Dr. Bliss is of opinion that the bullet has become encysted, and that the wound has become healed for about three inches from the position of the ball.

THE following tribute to Christianity is the concluding part of Judge J. S. Black's reply to Col. Ingersoll's article on The Christian Religion published in the North American Review for August, 1881. The terse and decisive manner in which the learned Judge disposes of the Colonel's pettifoggings stamps the article as one of marked ability, in which the author has exhibited himself as no ordinary controversialist. We are very glad, not only that the Atheist has found a man worthy of his steel, but also that, once in his life, he has had an antagonist privileged to reply to him, if not before the same hearers, at least before the same readers, and not have a one-sided contest with no one to point out his numerous errors, sophistries, and misrepresentations:

WHAT CHRISTIANITY HAS DONE.

Reflect what kind of a world this was when the disciples of Christ undertook to reform it, and compare it with the condition in which their teachings have put it. In its mighty metropolis, the centre of its intellectual and political power, the best men were addicted to vices so debasing that I could not even allude to them without soiling the paper I write upon. All manner of unprincipled wickedness was practiced in the private life of the whole population without concealment or shame, and the magistrates were thoroughly and universally corrupt. Benevolence in any shape was altogether unknown. The helpless and the weak got neither justice nor mercy. There was no relief for the poor, no succor for the sick, no refuge for the unfortunate. In all pagandom there was not a hospital, asylum, almshouse, or organized charity of any sort. The indifference to human life was literally frightful. The order of a successful leader to assassinate his opponents was always obeyed by his followers with the utmost alacrity and pleasure. It was a special amusement of the populace to witness the shows at which men were compelled to kill one another, to be torn in pieces by wild beasts, or otherwise "butchered, to make a Roman holiday." In every province paganism enacted the same cold-blooded cruelties; oppression and robbery ruled supreme; murder went rampaging and red over all the earth.

The Church came, and her light penetrated this moral darkness like a new sun. She covered the globe with institutions of mercy, and thousands upon thousands of her disciples devoted themselves exclusively to works of charity at the sacrifice of every earthly interest. Her earliest adherents were killed without remorse—beheaded, crucified, sewn asunder, thrown to the beasts, or covered with pitch, piled up in great heaps, and slowly burnt to death. But her faith was made perfect through suffering, and the law of love rose in triumph from the ashes of her martyrs. This religion has come down to us through the ages, attended all the way by righteousness, justice, temperance, mercy, transparent truthfulness, exulting hope, and white-winged charity. Never was its influence for good more plainly perceptible than now. It has not converted, purified, and reformed all men, for its first principle is the freedom of the human will, and there are those who choose to reject it. But to the mass of mankind, directly and indirectly, it has brought uncounted benefits and blessings. Abolish it—take away the restraints which it imposes on evil passions—silence the admonitions of its preachers—let all Christians cease their labors of charity—blot out from history the records of its heroic benevolence—repeal the laws it has enacted and the institutions it has built up—let its moral principles be abandoned and all its miracles of light be extinguished—what would we come to?

I need not answer this question: the experiment has been partially tried. The French nation formally renounced Christianity, denied the existence of the Supreme Being, and so satisfied the hunger of the infidel heart for a time. What followed? Universal depravity, garments rolled in blood, fantastic crimes unimagined before, which startled the earth with their sublime atrocity. The American people have and ought to have no special desire to follow that terrible example of guilt and misery.—J. S. Black.

WE give the following from Brother Magruder's pamphlet—"The Bible Defended and Atheism Rebuked"—in reply to Ingersoll's pamphlet publications of different titles. In the science of ethnology the separate existence of the Jewish race is a standing miracle. This race fills a place in Bible History and in Bible prophecy that demonstrates the intervention of a divine hand in the origin and wonderful preservation of this peculiar people. As an argument against atheism, and in proof of the credibility of the Scriptures, it is unanswerable. We consider Brother Magruder fully the peer of Judge Black of whom we speak in terms of merited commendation in this number of our paper. Both have received, like Col. Ingersoll, a legal education, and both have done themselves honor in the replies they have made to this champion of modern infidelity. We heartily wish that the same readers that have read Mr. Ingersoll's pamphlets, could read Brother Magruder's reply, giving him the same advantage that Judge Black had in the North American Review. Judge Black was limited for space but has made every paragraph tell—while Brother Magruder, with more ample space, has made all his sentences equally expressive:

CHAPTER VII.—SECTION IX.

The Jews, as a people in history and prophecy, are living witnesses for the Bible. They can, with confidence, be placed on the witness stand, for they are the most conclusive and the best known attestators of the Bible in all history.

It is known that Frederick the Great was prone to assemble at his court the most learned scholars, philosophers, theologians of Europe. It is related that one day, with his accustomed brusqueness, he accosted one of his chaplains, saying,

"Give me without argument, in a word, the strongest proof you can present of the truth of the Bible."

The answer was promptly returned, "The Jew, sire, the Jew. It is impossible to account for his history and his presence among us on any other hypothesis than the literal and absolute truth of the Bible."

The reply could not have been more apposite.

If we cast away our Bible, as Mr. Ingersoll would have us to do, if we seal up the pages of that oldest and most venerable history of our race and world, what an unaccountable anomaly, what an insoluble mystery, what an unnatural social interpolation is The Jew?

Here they are among us and not of us. Pioneers of our race and among the first proprietors of the earth we inhabit, once at the zenith of human prosperity and renown, now exiles, fugitives, and Arabs among the nations—without a home or a country, without a temple or an altar or a victim; without prophet, priest, or king; without rule, cities, or institutions; without lands and flocks and herds.

Yet once, in the days of David and Solomon, their land and temple and capital city were their boast and pride as the glory of all lands, and themselves the people of God, so richly blessed that the fame of their greatness spread to distant lands, whose monarchs came from the uttermost parts of the earth to behold their wisdom and glory, and confessed that the half had not been told them.

Now the same people are exiled from their once fair and fruitful, but now deserted and desolate land, and have become a byword and a hissing reproach among the Gentiles, who are descendants of nations whom their ancestors looked down upon in scorn and contempt. They remain among us to this day witnesses among all mankind and, to the confusion and reproach of all infidels, a standing monument and miracle of the truth of the Bible.

Let Mr. Ingersoll open the book he has rashly covered with reproaches, and read in Moses and the prophets, as in Deut. xxviii., the predictions relating to the children of Israel, and then note their exact fulfillment now present before his eyes. He will read all the details in this chapter, and a brief summary in these words of Hosea, a prophecy delivered nearly eight hundred years before Christ:

"For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince and without a sacrifice, and without an image and without an ephod, and without teraphim; afterwards shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days."

Is he not a witness to the first part of this prophecy? The testimony of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John will exhibit to him, in outline, the same prophecies in the words of that "great and serene man to whom he gladly pays the tribute of his admiration and his tears."

He will read, speaking of his countrymen the Jews, these words of the Lord:

"They shall fall by the edge of the sword and shall be led away captive into all nations, and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," concluding with his touching and most affecting lamentation over them and their beautiful city in ruins:

"Oh! Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, but ye would not! Behold your house is left unto you desolate, for I say unto you, ye shall not see me henceforth till you shall say: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

Nor is even this all our proof. There are patent physical facts in regard to this ancient people that are known to all men and cannot be denied, and which, being so peculiar and phenomenal, prove to a demonstration the direct impress of the hand of the Almighty and carry us back to the Bible for the only explanation that can be found.

Of these is their continued unbroken practice of the rite of circumcision, from its original institution down to the present day. This has always kept them distinct from every other people and race; and that most wonderful though indescribable mark in the face and countenance which causes their descent and lineage from Abraham to be easily, even instantly, recognized. We meet the Jews everywhere. They are scattered among all nations, and yet are not reckoned with or among any. They preserve their distinct isolation and their own peculiar habits and customs in the midst of the peoples among whom they may be said to sojourn rather than to live.

What the gulf-stream is to the seas, "a river in the ocean"—what the burning bush of their own Sinai is to other mountains, scorched and blasted, but not consumed, so are they to the nations and countries to which they migrate.

They do not adopt our habits or avocations. They do not build, or buy or deal in real estate. They do not cultivate the land, nor sow, nor plant, nor reap. These pursuits would identify them with the soil and give them a permanent footing in the earth; this they do not desire and will not accept. On the contrary, they deal in money and bills of exchange, in merchandise and clothing, in buying and selling, in bargaining and brokerage; all their wealth and possessions are portable or easily convertible into coin or bills, so that they may be ready at a moment's warning, to move on and change their abode to some other region, or to return to Palestine, the home of their race.

Not their customs and business habits alone make them a peculiar people, but their visage, their physiognomy, is unique, and unlike any other race of people. We meet them in the cities or on the crowded thoroughfares of business, and as soon as our eye rests upon them, we say, without hesitation or risk of mistake, "There's a Jew"—there is a son of Abraham, a wanderer and an exile far from the home of his fathers. Arabs in the desert of the people, they are the oldest of existing nations, and you cannot help asking where are now their conquerors and persecutors; the Pharaohs of the Egyptian bondage, the Assyrians, the Medes and the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, the Romans, and the Saracens?

The answer comes back:—"They have been swept down the tide of time, and are utterly lost in the ocean of oblivion."

Yet here is the proscribed, wandering Jew, who, in spite of cruel and unrelenting persecutions, and contrary to all the calculations of human probabilities, remains the survivor of them all, and now the only inheritor of the fame and glory of the most renowned and illustrious race that ever lived. And if you ask the meaning of all this, is it not the Bible and the Bible alone that gives the answer, that solves and explains the mystery?

Opening the venerable record, you find there the revelation of the secret, for you will read that [illegible] back in the beginning, "when the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel" (Deut. xxxii); that "the people of Israel shall dwell alone, and not be reckoned among the nations" (Num. xxiii. 9); and that after their long dispersion, "shall the children of Israel return and seek the Lord, their God, etc., in the latter days" (Hosea iii.); that "Behold the days come, saith the Lord . . . when I will bring again the captivity of my people, Israel . . . and I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God." Amos ix.

The long banishment and exile of this ancient race, and the waste and desolation of their native land to this day, are not more clearly proved by prophecy and history, than their return and gathering together again is predicted by their prophets. The intelligent Christian not only recognizes the exact and literal fulfillment of the prophecies of their return to Palestine, but he hails it with grateful joy, because he knows that it is their Messiah who is his Savior and deliverer. He does not forget that "Salvation is of the Jews," that "in him shall the Gentiles trust," that "if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise," and in brief that all the promises "are yea and amen in Christ Jesus." Accordingly we are not surprised to see on the broad theatre of international affairs, in the movements among the nations of the earth, the daily growing evidence of the rising prominence and importance of the Jews and their affairs in respect to their historic country, their restoration to their ancient home, and the reconstruction of their long-lost nationality. Within the memory of living men their long continued and unjust civil disabilities have been almost everywhere removed, and they have risen to the platform of political and legal equality with their former Gentile oppressors. These are only preparatory steps to future developments. Even the very recent and significant fact that in the German empire, where they are most numerous, as well as in Hungary and Bavaria, in Austria and Russia, they seem to have become obnoxious to the native populations through envy and jealousy of their extraordinary wealth and prosperity; which goes to show that this persecution is but another feature of the divine programme, and will necessarily quicken their predicted exode from the nations among whom they are scattered, to Palestine their future home, from which, as the prophets say, they will "remove no more."

As Joseph in Egypt, Mordecai in Persia, and Daniel in Babylon, rose to the highest rank and dignity at the courts of their former Gentile oppressors in the ancient world just previous to their emancipation from oppression and exile, so now their countrymen are filling the highest places and positions in Gentile governments. The Rothschilds, the late Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield), Sir Moses Montefiore, and other Jews in England; Grevy, Gambetta, and others in France; Gortschakoff and Todleben in Russia, and others in Germany, Italy, and Austria, distinguished as statesmen, diplomatists, historians, professors, bankers, orators, composers, and actors, are witnesses in this generation of the long promised but now approaching deliverance and restoration of this pre-historic people to their ancient inheritance.

Doubtless Mr. Ingersoll is either ignorant or faithless of this purpose of God in regard to his ancient people, the children of Abraham, the father of the faithful and the friend of God. In attempting in one of his lectures to set aside the prophecy of future events of a kindred nature, he quotes with avidity the saying of the Master: "Verily, I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled," by which he supposes that such prophecies as we have cited have either failed altogether or relate to past events. There are two conclusive answers to such an objection.

THE PHENOMENAL YEAR.

Whether the approach of several of the planets to the perihelion has any influence on the meteorological conditions of our planet or not, one thing is indisputable, that we have celestial and terrestrial prodigies without number.

The sun is covered with spots; three comets have tracked their course ominously across our skies; a band of light four or five degrees in width spanned the heavens over New England and New York two evenings ago; the sun has been destructively blazing over our country, cutting short the crops of a continent; the day was recently so darkened in its going forth that they were compelled to burn gas at mid-day along the coasts of New England; a large area in Michigan has been swept by forest fires by which several villages, numerous farms with all their improvements, crops and stock, and hundreds of human beings have been burned up; Canada is a-blaze in her extensive woodlands; over the lakes such a veil of smoke is resting that vision scarcely extends for one-eighth of a mile, and vessels have to make their way through an atmospheric ocean of smeary dunkiness painful to the eyes and injurious to the lungs, navigating by guess and avoiding collisions with invisible vessels by the sounding of fog-horns; the East, too, is parched, and the flames are spreading desolation in different localities; the monarch of the largest empire on earth has fallen a prey to the assassin's madness; the President of this Great Republic is now hovering between life and death in consequence of a wound inflicted by one of the Serpent's slimy seed; volcanoes are pouring out fiery deluges; earthquakes ingulph cities and horribly mar the fairest landscapes; cyclones sweep the country with the besom of destruction; the floods drown out whole districts; the tidal waves roll inland; grim visaged war lays his blood-red hand upon his sword, and sounds the tocsin of present and coming woes; men's hearts are so failing for fear that reason reels and insanity is almost an epidemic; the end is not yet, all these are only the preliminary travailing throes that will bring to birth the great tribulation; we are living in a grand and awful time. Watch and pray.

COMFORT ONE ANOTHER WITH THESE WORDS. 1 Thess. iv. 10.

HELENA M. HUNT.

The trials and difficulties which surrounded the early Christians had called forth from the apostles many words of cheer and consolation for their encouragement. The persecutions and privations which they suffered under the pagan emperor of Rome only too plainly taught them that their only choice lay between martyrdom and apostacy! How sweetly then must the words of Paul, of Peter and of John sounded in their ears, and how eager must they have been to comfort one another, while gladly laying down their lives for the Master in the glorious hope of a resurrection from the dead.

To them death was only a sleep, only a putting off this earthly tabernacle in weakness, till the Lord should return from heaven to raise it in power and immortality. Paul, in his beautiful address to the believers in the above chapter, after bidding them not to sorrow for their dead ones as those who had no hope (which some apparently had done) goes on with his heart-thrilling description of the glories of Christ's return and concludes by saying:—

"So shall we be forever with the Lord. Therefore comfort one another with these words."

Although we in the present day, can but faintly imagine the sufferings of the early saints, or compare our trials with theirs; still we have so much to contend with in the common lot of fallen humanity that we will be fully able to realize what it will be when we are "for ever with the Lord."

Alas! how weak the flesh is to struggle against the difficulties that surround us, how much we need that comfort that can only come from above—how much we need that peace of which Jesus spoke when parting from his disciples:—

"Peace I leave with you. My peace I give unto you, let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

Each one of us has our own share of responsibilities and cares, and although the apostle James says:—

"Bear ye one another's burdens"—later on he says, "Every man must bear his own burden."

Does not this teach us and show us that there are some sorrows which we must bear alone?

An old proverb say:—"The world see our smiles—only those very near to us, see our tears."

How natural, how true! to the world around us we show the bright side—but our secret cares, disappointments, fears and griefs are not for the censorious criticism of the world; even in the hearts of many of us, are hidden sorrows over which we mourn in silence unknown to all but God, cares that we could not bear to speak of—yet we are able to spread them out before the Lord.

Pascal, the great French writer and philosopher, held his greatest trial to be a fear of death—it was in the last closing moments of his life that he uttered those closing words, "Il faut mourir seul"—"I must die alone."

And another greater still than he, said:—

"It is easier to die than to live."

I think that even under the most adverse circumstances, a Christian's earnest cry would be:—

"Come Lord Jesus; come back to thy waiting people, put an end to death, to trouble and cares and partings; return and let our weary hearts find rest in thee."

A verse of one of Dr. Kable's hymns in the "Christian Year" occurs to me as I close:—

Thou will be with us, nor forsake us turn the bitter pool
Into a bright and breezy lake, the throbbing brow to cool.
Till left as while with Thee alone, the willful heart be fain to own
That He, by whom our bright hours shone
Our darkness best may rule.

From darkness here and divariance, we ask and full repose
Only be Thou at heal to bless, our trial hour of woes.
Is not the pilgrim's toil o'er paid, by the clear rill and balmy shade,
And now we not through earth's dark glade
The gates of life enclose?

A TRAGIC HEART HISTORY.

One day last summer a temperance lecturer was being driven from one town to another, where he was to hold a meeting in the evening. His friend, in whose carriage he was riding, and who was most zealous in everything associated with temperance, was asked:—

"How is it that you, who have never felt the touch of the serpent, should always be so ready to make sacrifices for the good cause?"

He gave a quick, searching, telegraphic glance at the speaker. A tear gleamed in his eyes as he said:—

"One reason why I wanted to ride with you was to tell you the story of a most important crisis in my life.

"I was born in the year 1823. My father was a very intemperate man. The most of his time was spent in the tavern in my native town, or at a village tavern about three miles distant. We often suffered for the necessities of life while my father poured all his earnings into the tills of those two tavern-keepers. My mother was quite expert with her needle, and thus kept the wolf at bay by her industry and close economy. Our little home had been left to us by my grandfather in such a way that my father could not spend it or deprive us of a shelter. We kept a cow, which furnished a large share of our living. The family consisted of myself and three sisters.

"One day, when I was about seven years old, my father went to the tavern, and while taking his accustomed drink discovered that some one had spoken of him as a common drunkard. He furiously demanded of the landlord the name of the person who had said this, and the fellow replied, 'Your wife knows all about it.' He came home infuriated with drink, and began abusing my mother in language which it makes me shudder to remember, she protesting that she did not know anything about it. Finally, his face purpled with passion, he dealt my mother a terrible blow, which prostrated her bleeding and insensible to the floor."

Here the relater broke down completely, bursting into tears. After a moment he said:—

"I hope you will pardon my emotion; but now, after a period of fifty years I cannot refer to this picture without the sad, suffering face of my mother rising before me. My sister shrieked, 'Oh, father, you have killed my mother!' Affrighted, I sprang from my bed, and ran to the barn and hid myself.

"When daylight came all was still in the house, and I crept back to find that my grandmother had gone to seek a doctor, who, finding my mother in a critical condition, told my father, who had just risen from his drunken slumber, that he would certainly be punished for his violence. He gathered together what few clothes he had, and absconded, leaving us to get along the best way we could. When my father had left the house, my mother tenderly drew me to her breast, and, with the tears streaming over her cheeks, made me promise never to drink a drop of liquor while I lived, and sealed that promise with a passionate kiss, which left an indelible impress upon my heart. For nearly fifty years I have kept that pledge.

"That summer we got along comfortably. With the help of our neighbors we cultivated the little patch of ground, and with our sow we did not suffer for food. My mother raised a flock of turkeys also, with the sale of which she hoped to obtain the means to purchase our shoes and other necessary clothing for the winter. There was to be a militia muster near the village. The landlord of the little tavern I have spoken of came to purchase our turkeys for that occasion, offering a good price, which my mother gladly accepted. He put them in his cart, and handed my mother a bi[ll] father had contracted at hi[s] jumping into his cart, dro[ve] fast as his horse could go.

"My poor mother stood [it] founded, and bursting [into] walked into the house. [I] all that autumn she wor[ked] till past midnight, to g[et] clothing, and I went b[are] snow covered the grou[nd] could purchase our sh[oes] I think of my broken-h[earted] and my sorrow-laden [mother] wonder that I am a [good] man? It seems as [though] followed that tavern-[keeper] a poor, loathesome dr[unkard] of God and man."

PALESTINE IMPROVEMENT.

New ideas are working into Palestine. A new city is going up on the west side of Jerusalem, outside the gates. Along the turnpike to Jaffa runs the telegraph wire, and on the plain of Sharon stands the large Jewish Agricultural College, surrounded by a model farm and fine nurseries. The Jews compose about two-thirds of the population of the holy city. They that live on or about Mount Zion are of the most bigoted type, and a large number of them are dependent on the gifts of Sir Moses Montefiore and other rich Jews in Europe.

Bethlehem is a thriving town, and carries on extensive manufactories of mother of pearl. The Bethlehemites brought back from the Centennial Exhibition, at Philadelphia, about seventy thousand dollars as their net profit from sales of their beautiful ware.

A ride among the enchanting orange-groves near Jaffa furnishes one of the finest oriental views to be witnessed in Judea. The oranges attain their luscious perfection, and three millions a year are produced in this vicinity. Figs, brilliant pomegranates, and stately palms line the road. Looking east, Jaffa rises on its hill-top, and beside it sparkles the blue Mediterranean.

HAMMAMET DESTROYED.

TUNIS, Sept. 9.—It is reported that a severe engagement took place on Wednesday between the French troops occupying Hammamet and the Arabs, during which the Town of Hammamet was entirely destroyed. No details are received. All communication with the capital is intercepted.

It is reported that the French occupied Sfaxs on Wednesday.

FAMINE INEVITABLE.

TUNIS, Sept. 9.—The Arabs in the disturbed districts have rented no farms for the coming season, and famine in the regency is therefore inevitable. The French are daily making enormous purchases of land and house property in all directions. Several rich Arabs, including the Prime Minister, are disposing of their estates.

GEN. LOGEROT.

TUNIS, Sept. 9.—Gen. Logerot has declared he will resign if 20,000 more troops are not sent.

The separation of Armenia from Turkey, and its formation into an independent state, is declared by the Russian General Count Melikoff, to be near at hand. The Armenians, many of whom are very intelligent, constitute 70,000 of the 120,000 inhabitants of Tiflis, the headquarters of their agitation for Armenian freedom. M. Arsruni, a millionaire, and his party, are now seeking to obtain practical self-government for Armenia under Russian protection. They affirm that Europe must, before long, resound with the noise of the Armenian question.

TERRIBLE CALAMITY.

BERNE, Sept. 12.—A land-slip occurred last evening near the village of Elm, in the Canton of Glarus. Two hundred persons were killed and thirty houses destroyed.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Lord willing, I will be at the Roose neighborhood the third Sunday in September, soon after the close of the Conference, and continue one week. Then to Michigan, near Three Oaks, as Bro. Kinzie may appoint, and continue one week, or more. Bro. S. Andrews can also make an appointment for his neighborhood as thought best.

Editor Restitution:

I like THE RESTITUTION, but would like it better if it contained fewer pieces clipped from other papers and more original articles from the members of the Household of Faith.

I think we ought to have some articles on practical Christianity and the work of the saints in the millennial age.

And will some kind brother write on the second chapter of Daniel—giving the history of, and locating the ten kingdoms as designated by the ten toes of the metallic image?

Are the ten kingdoms in existence now?

If so, what powers are they?

I have read with much interest Bro. Magruder's reply to Atheism. It ought to be put into the hands of intelligent infidels. Any brother knowing a good and honest Atheist could not do a nobler act than to present him a copy of this work.

I attended in August a four days' debate between Bro. Hatch and a Mr. Payne, of the Baptist order, which gave me a chance to learn something of the Baptist (not Bible) doctrine. I was pained in that debate the unrighteousness and dishonesty of man in handling God's word. I saw Pilate and Herod made friends. Although Bro. Hatch had almost all the people with him on the first three propositions, yet on the last one (the kingdom) the Baptists, Methodists, Christianites, etc., were as a unit to see the man who had been preaching the return of Jesus to establish permanently the throne of David, occupy the same and bring about the restitution of all things that God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began, defeated.

But all outsiders and others unbiased could say, as some did to me:

"Hatch has proved his proposition and Payne has not made a point."

It is to be hoped the debate will finally be the cause of much good. It brought together people from a distance—infidels as well as outsiders and church members.

When Bro. Hatch had finished his third speech on the kingdom, one old infidel said to me:

"Hatch gave him some hard nuts to crack that time."

I said yes; and if you had heard such wholesome, soul-stirring doctrine as that in your young days you would now be a defender instead of a persecutor of the Bible.

Editor Restitution:

It is a long time since I reported to THE RESTITUTION. I have been laboring at Moscow since last spring by request of the brethren here.

The Church at this place are somewhat scattered, but they are rich in faith, in fact they are critics in the word of truth. They have been gathered mostly by the labors of brother T. Finn, and are well posted in Bible knowledge.

Our meetings are quite interesting and profitable. Last first day I baptized two very intelligent believers into the body of Christ for the remission of sins, after which nineteen of the church sat down and partook of the supper in remembrance of our blessed Lord. By faith we looked forward to the final gathering of the waiting ones, to the song of triumph, the glorious jubilee, when the peals of Allaluia will vibrate from pole to pole, and while contemplating the grand events that lie but little in the future, our hearts were glad.

The prospects here are quite encouraging. Brother Wilbur, with a little help from the brethren, has fitted up a very convenient hall over his drug store, where we have preaching Sunday, and gladly welcome Brethren who may pass this way.

Some are are quite interested in the truths we advocate, and are searching the Scriptures to see if these things are so.

Since writing the above we had the privilege of adding one more through the obedience of faith, to the number of the waiting bride of Christ. While we see the truth gradually working its way into the hearts of the thoughtful, our hearts overflow with gratitude and thanksgiving to God for the great plan of redemption,—the hope of future life by a resurrection, through our Lord Jesus Christ.

PIEDMONT ADVENT CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

Pursuant to previous notice in THE RESTITUTION, Crisis, and Banner, the Piedmont Advent Christian Conference convened with the church at Tabernacle, Caldwell county, North Carolina, August 6, 1881.

The President, Elder G. D. Sherrill, in the chair.

Ministers present: Elders G. D. Sherrill, Lenoir, N. C.; T. F. Nelson, Patterson, N. C.; Hiram West, Blowing Rock, N. C.; I. R. Sherrill, Lenoir, N. C.; J. M. Lyda, Edneyville, N. C.

The Conference was cheered by the presence of our beloved brother, Elder John A. Cargile, of Alabama, who was invited, and took a seat in the Conference.

The following churches were represented, to-wit:

Beren—sixty-five members. Delegates—D. D. Coffey, Elijah Moore, W. C. Crisp, and Jacob J. Harshaw.

Tabernacle—sixty members. Delegates—C. L. Coffey, Sion Sherrill, Rufus Catroll, and Elisha Powell.

Philadelphia—six members. Delegate—A. B. Ledbetter.

Holly Springs—ten members, (proxy) Elder J. M. Lyda.

Edneyville—forty-one members. Delegates—Elder J. M. Lyda and J. L. Whitaker.

Yadkin Grove—sixteen members. Delegate—Elijah Coffey.

Beaver Creek—thirty-six members. Delegates—W. F. Hendrix and Triplet.

OFFICERS ELECTED FOR ENSUING YEAR.

President, Elder G. D. Sherrill; Vice-President, Elder T. F. Nelson; Secretary and Treasurer, Jacob J. Harshaw; Supervisor, H. C. Coffey.

COMMITTEES.

Order of Business—Elders G. D. Sherrill, J. M. Lyda, J. A. Cargile, and brethren W. F. Hendrix, D. D. Coffey, C. L. Coffey, and Jacob J. Harshaw.

Devotional—W. F. Hendrix, Sion Sherrill, and Jacob J. Harshaw.

Credentials—C. L. Coffey, W. Hendrix, and Jacob J. Harshaw.

Ways and Means—H. C. Coffey, J. L. Whitaker, A. B. Ledbetter, John Patterson, W. F. Hendrix, Elijah Coffey, and C. L. Coffey.

The Committee on Business submitted a report which was received and adopted.

REPORT OF EVANGELIST.

Our Evangelist, Elder T. F. Nelson, addressed the Conference in reference to his labors during the past year. Has been preaching, but hindered by domestic duties, notwithstanding he hopes good has been accomplished.

[We expect much of our Evangelist during the coming year.—Secretary.]

REPORT OF MINISTERS.

Our ministers made statements of the work in the past year. A great work remains to be done and we hope by next Conference that they will be able to report great gain. Elder J. A. Cargile, of the Southern Advent Christian Conference, gave a brief account of his labors—very encouraging.

EVANGELIST FOR THE ENSUING YEAR.

Considerable discussion was had on this subject of an animated nature. Elder T. F. Nelson was re-elected. A considerable amount was pledged to our Evangelist, which will enable him to remain in the field much more than usual.

After some remarks it was decided not to appoint a place at present for holding our next session and empowered the board of officers of the Conference to name the time and place. Ordered that the proceedings be published in THE RESTITUTION, Crisis, and Banner.

JACOB J. HARSHAW, Sec'y.

P. S.—Our Conference was well attended and a fraternal feeling existed. The sacrament was administered on Sunday. The preaching was excellent, especially Bro. Cargile's sermons were much appreciated. The Adventist church at Wilmington, N. C., numbering 200, were not represented. Hope to see it represented in our next Conference.

TRAVELS, DEBATE AND SUCCESS.

AZORAH M. HATCH.

Dear brethren and sisters, pa and I left home the 29th of July for Edgar county, Illinois, where we held an interesting meeting for two weeks, and on the 8th of August the debate commenced between pa and Elder G. W. Payne, a Baptist preacher. The time occupied in the debate was four days, which time was not sufficient to do justice to the case.

We continued our meeting a week longer with good success, fourteen persons being immersed and five more presenting themselves on the last night of meeting which were not immersed, for we had to leave the neighborhood at an early hour the next morning. Some of the persons baptized were formerly Old Baptist in faith. So this shows plainly the minds of the people in regard to where the truth lay.

We went to DeWitt county, Ill., and held meeting over two Sundays. There were no additions, as we had hoped for, but we had a very good attendance, good order, and much prejudice removed. It was what I would call a very good meeting.

During our time from home pa preached thirty-six discourses, made sixteen speeches, and immersed fourteen persons. We arrived at home the 29th of August, making just a month, and we felt very much fatigued, especially pa.

Bidding the Sun "Good Night" in Lapland.

JOY ALLISON.

When the short, bright summer of Lapland is ended, and the sun is about to set, to rise no more for seven or eight months, the people of the hamlets and villages ascend the neighboring hills to see the last of the Day God, and chant a requiem or farewell psalm for the parting day.

"Come, little daughters, hasten,
Ye should be bravely dight!
Make ready, boys, for we go forth
To bid the sun good night.

"Your mouths with steady shining
He's made the whole earth fair,
And myriad blossoms greeted him,
And bird-songs filled the air.

"But now October waneth;
He setting draweth near;
We shall not see his face again
For more than half a year."

So forth they go, together,
Parents and children, all,
The aged and the little ones,
Young men and maidens tall.

From many a neighboring village,
From many a humble home,
To climb the rocky summit
The thronging people come.

The sun hangs low in heaven;
He throws his glancing rays
Across their loving faces turned
To meet his parting gaze.

And now he's gone! The darkness
Is settling like a pall,
A long, low dirge of sad farewell
Breaks from the lips of all,

In mournful cadence chanting,
The requiem of the sun,
The dear, bright day departed now,
The long, long night begun.

And yet with cheerful patience
They take their homeward way,
The elders talking how the time
May best be filled away.

And many a youthful face is bright,
With glad expectance still,
And many a merry little child
Goes dancing down the hill.

Boys, do you know how to convince another boy that he does wrong? Girls do you know how to convince another girl that she does wrong? I will tell you how. Do right yourself. It is the best logic in the world.

The Reason of Birds.

Several years ago a pair of my canaries built; while the hen was sitting the weather became intensely hot. She drooped and I began to fear that she would not be strong enough to hatch the eggs.

I watched the birds closely, and soon found that the cock was a devoted nurse. He bathed in the fresh water which I supplied every morning, and then went to the edge of the nest, and the hen buried her head in his breast and was refreshed.

Without hands and without a sponge, what more could he have done?

The following spring the same bird was hanging in a window with three others, each in a separate cage. I was sitting in the room and heard my little favorite give a peculiar cry. Looking up I saw all the birds crouching on their perches, paralyzed with fright. On going to the window to ascertain the cause of their terror, I saw a balloon passing over the end of the street. The birds did not move till it was out of sight, when each gave a chirp of relief.

The balloon was only in sight of the bird who gave the alarm, and I have no doubt he mistook it for a bird of prey.

I have a green and a yellow canary hanging side by side. They are treated exactly alike, and are warm friends. One has often refused to partake of some delicacy till the other was supplied with it.

One day I had five blossoms of Jonquilion; I gave three to the green bird and two to the yellow one. The latter flew about his cage singing in a shrill voice, and showing unmistakable signs of anger. Guessing the cause, I took away one of the three flowers, and both settled down quietly to enjoy their feast.

A Child's Faith.

Under the above head the Cincinnati Commercial tell one of the most touching stories in connection with the president's struggle for life and universal wish for his recovery that we heard or read:

An incident recently occurred so beautifully illustrative of child faith that it is worthy of record, not only in the Commercial, but it would seem it might cheer those more nearly related to this great and general sorrow.

A lovely little girl said: "Mamma, the sky don't look very blue, and the sun don't shine so bright when every body is crying for the president, do they, mamma?"

"Oh, my dear, everybody is not crying."

"Crying inside, I mean." Then, turning as she heard a step, added: "Oh, here is Annie. Come to play, Annie?" and away darted the bright creatures, like butterflies on the wing.

After a short time the two were seen walking slowly toward the house, tightly clasped.

Said the mother, "You may not believe me, but those children looked as though their faces had caught the jasper glitter Mrs. Browning wrote about, and my Lillie said:

'Mamma, we went into the playhouse, but we didn't play; we kneeled down and asked Jesus to please to make Mr. Garfield well, real quick, and Annie said, Don't let Mrs. Garfield die too.'"

Dawn of the Morning.

The Borrowed Baby.

"Please ma'am, I've come to borrow the baby."

The speaker was a rosy-cheeked girl who lived with the family across the way.

It was a regular nuisance, this lending the baby all the time. She did not seem to belong to us, at all, any more. I suppose we were all a little jealous, because she really did love those new people so much, and they took so much pains with her, teaching her cunning ways and pretty sayings; and I must say they were most judicious; never giving her sweet things to make her sick, nor letting her take cold. So, for the hundredth time, I rolled little Dudu up, and kissing her good by, sent her off to act her part as a borrowed baby.

When John came home to dinner and found baby gone he was just as angry as could be.

"Why can't they get a baby of their own!" he said crossly. "They could go over to the asylum and take their pick of babies."

"But not like ours, John," I said quickly.

"Well, no, of course not: but I don't propose to have strangers going halves with our baby. Besides I won't have them teaching that child any more nonsense of the religious sort, and they may as well know it, and so when they bring her back this time you may as well settle it once for all."

I forgot to say that John and I were both Free Thinkers and did not go to church or subscribe to any of the religious beliefs to which we had been educated.

We had both graduated in a brilliant intellectual school, utterly devoid of foolish superstition of any religious faith, and we intended to bring up our child in the same severely moral atmosphere. It did not once occur to us that ours was the strength of youth and presumption.

The baby came home. She was nearly three years old, but, after all, only a baby, and as I took her from the girl I said:

"We won't be able to lend the baby any more, Mary; her papa and I both think it isn't a good plan; and we cannot possibly do without her; the house is too lonely. Tell your mistress so with my compliments."

"I'm sorry, ma'am," said the girl, "because we all love little Dudu so, and she's real sweet. She can sing 'Jesus Loves me' all through, and not miss a word."

"Superstition!" I exclaimed angrily, "tell your mistress for me that I do not wish my child to learn any of those senseless hymns. I do not believe in them, nor do I intend that she shall."

"N-o-t b-e-l-i-e-v-e them," gasped the girl. "Why, you ain't heathen be you?"

I dismissed her curtly, and when John came told him of the message I had sent.

"That is right, little woman! I should guess we know enough to take care of this little blossom, don't we?"

Somehow just then an old forgotten text dashed into my mind. "My grace is sufficient for thee," and it run up and down the garret of my thoughts all the evening.

When I put Dudu to bed I noticed her hands were hot and her eyes seemed heavy. There were lots of diphtheria in the place, but she had not been exposed to it in any possible manner, our neighbors who borrowed the baby being as afraid of it as we were, for that was why no baby was in their home.

Oh, that dreadful time! I cannot recall it now—the day—hardly more than a day—of anguish; the awful suffering and the end, the parched lips and the fever-bright eyes—the awful realism of death, and not one hope, one word of comfort, only the cruel, dreary, unlighted grave yawning for our darling.

Just at the last there was a moment's peace. It was not on us that her last look fell. We turned to see who or what she saw, and there stood our neighbor over the way, whom she, at least, sweet darling, had loved as herself, and then she lifted the weary little hands, and a glad look of recognition was in the wan face, and we all heard the last broken words as they fell in awful distinctness from the baby lips, "Desus loves me, dis I know!"

Yes, they sung it at her funeral, for we buried her with no heathen rites, and some good man prefaced a few consoling words with the text, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

But O, the tender melody of the sweet child's voice that sung above her:

Jesus loves me, this I know,
For the Bible tells me so;
Little ones to Him belong,
We are weak, but He is strong.

And when it was all over, and only the memory remained of so much beauty and loveliness, and our hearts were going back to the dust and ashes of unbelief, our good neighbor came like an evangelist, and giving us of her own brave Christian strength, gained at the foot of the cross, said wisely:

"Be content; God has only borrowed the baby."

Yes, God took the little one and laid it away to sleep until Jesus comes. How many darling children will be waked up to life from a state of unconscious slumber at the resurrection of the just, and restored to pious parents.

What happy reunions there will be then. Friends and kindred in Christ will there meet never to part.

Half happy time so near, when all the sleeping saints shall spring up from their graves to immortal life, and be joined by the living saints who will then be changed so as to live on without passing into death, undying forever.

Brevities.

A strange and peculiar electric phenomenon occurred at the house of S. O. Smith, at Bustl, N. Y., recently. Mr. Smith was sitting by a closed window, as the storm was coming up, when he noticed a ball of fire run slowly across the floor of the room into the parlor, where it ripped a seam in the carpet some three feet long, set fire to the straw underneath and then disappeared. Mr. Smith extinguished the fire, and then looked for other depredations of the strange visitant, but found nothing but a few splinters from a post in the cellar. No one felt the shock in the house, and no damage was done beyond that above stated.

Some interesting discoveries have been made in Lower Chaldea by the Vice-Consul of France at Bassorah. He has spent nearly three years making researches among the ancient ruins of the province, and has brought to light a large number of objects, including eight very handsome statues, all of which are covered with inscriptions in the old Babylonian characters, and which are supposed to be 3,800 years old. The French Government proposes to buy the collection for the Louvre.

The British Museum has recently purchased a collection of Biblical and other Oriental manuscripts, which are considered of great importance to the criticism and exegesis of the Old Testament. The collection, which was made in South Arabia, consists of forty manuscripts. Fifteen of these are portions of the Hebrew Scriptures, and two are probably the oldest which have as yet come to light of the Old Testament Scriptures. A third which contains the Hagiographa, exhibits a recension of the Hebrew text, the other two portions of which are already in the Museum, thus completing the whole Hebrew Bible. Several of these manuscripts have the Arabic translation of Saadish, in alternate verses with the Hebrew, while others have the superliniary, or Assyrian, vowel-points, which till comparatively recent times were unknown. The remaining twenty-five manuscripts are Midrahim, or homiletic commentaries and liturgies, which are more or less unknown.

At Homer, N. Y., lives a man in a green old age, as straight as an arrow, and eye undimmed, though this week he has passed his eightieth year—the veteran missionary printer of Burmah, Thomas S. Hanney, who, in April, 1830, was privileged to attend the dying couch of Adoniram Judson, Burmah's great apostle, and amid his terrible paroxysms of pain, heard the last words of the intense sufferer on shipboard, as possibly delirious with pain, he longed to depart, and be with Christ, and whispered, "Bury me quick! bury me quick!"—and so, after six days out, from the Pilot between the shore of Burmah and Sandaman Island, he buried him. "All those six days," said Bro. R., "the sea was calm and smooth as glass; but the next day after we buried him, a fearful storm arose"—and thus God's ocean chanted his requiem.

The separation of Armenia from Turkey, and its formation into an independent State, is declared by the Russian General Count Milikoff, to be near at hand. Melikoff is likely to know, because Russia has for many years devoted her energies to stirring up discontent in Turkey, treacherously hoping to discredit that Power in Europe, and to profit by her fall. The Armenians, many of whom are very intelligent, constitute 70,000 of the 120,000 inhabitants of Tiflis, and they make it the headquarters of their agitation for Armenian freedom. M. Aroutni, a millionaire, devotes himself to promoting the movement by publications, and his party are now seeking to obtain practical self-government for Armenia under Russian protection. They affirm that Europe must before long resound with the noise of the Armenian question. We know from prophesy that the solution of the problem will be the separation of Syria, along with Armenia, from Turkey, and their establishment as an independent kingdom.

We may question, equivocate, and disbelieve; but that will not serve to stay the chariot-wheels of an avenging God. There is mercy now, but mercy despised is certain death.—Joseph A. Seiss.

A NEW MONTHLY.

THE AGES TO COME!

A monthly periodical, entitled as above, will be issued from the office of OUR HOME, Chicago, Ill., the first number of which will appear on October 1, 1881. It will be in size the same as OUR HOME, 16 pages, 9x12 inches, printed on good paper, from clear type, and in every way a first class journal.

Its title, THE AGES TO COME, indicates the principal character it will sustain, viz., an advocate of what the Editor believes to be the Bible view of God's plan concerning the ages, showing that "God is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe;" that He is now "taking out of the Gentiles a people for His name" (name-bearers); and that he will exalt these in due time to heavenly places, and unite them by marriage to His Son, thus constituting them the Wife of Him to whom all power is given in heaven and upon earth. Then will they share with Him the glory of an everlasting reign, and with Him become a means of blessing all nations.

It will also teach the doctrine of Life only through Christ; the destruction (not eternal torment) of the wicked; and doctrines akin to these, as revealed in God's Holy Book.

It will strenuously maintain the inspiration of the Bible, as opposed to the growing infidelity of the days; and in the line of Christian duty it will oppose the tendency to worldliness so common in all churches, and advocate a holy life and pure speech, that we may be always ready to meet our blessed coming Lord.

In many respects it will occupy the same ground as that which was occupied by the Bible Examiner, so long and ably published by our late lamented brother, Geo. Storrs, and is intended to take up the work where he laid it down.

We wish to hear from every one who believes in the views we have outlined, and to secure their assistance in the procuring of subscribers. Let us hear from you at once, that we may know how large an edition to print on the first number. Send for a pro-pectus.

NOW AND THEN.

C. A. H. T. WADDLE.

Now, sad and faint, I seek that kind
Where sorrow is unknown.
I long to join the happy band
Around my Father's throne.

O Father! hear my humble prayer;
I sink in deep distress.
Without thy kind protecting care
To cheer me on my way.

And may thy peace, a priceless gift,
Come to my breaking heart;
This heavy load, these burden's lift,
And cause them to depart.

But soon will come a glad release
From pain and want and strife,
In God's own time I'll lose all these,
And gain eternal life.

Then, when I reach that blissful shore,
And lay all burdens down,
I'll hear the weary cross no more,
But rise from cross to crown.

NEW BIRTH.

J. H. THOMAS, M. D.

The apostle Paul says in his Epistle to the Corinthians, that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," and as the same apostle also says, in his letter to the Thessalonians, that, "God had called them unto his kingdom and glory," it is important that we understand how persons of a flesh and blood nature, who have been called to God's kingdom and glory, are to inherit it; for the Savior says:—

"Many be called, but few chosen."

The logical deduction from the words of the Savior is, that the large number of the many that are called to God's kingdom either fail to understand, or will not comply with, God's revealed way of putting off the flesh and blood nature, and putting on an incorruptible nature, which is the only nature that can "enter" or inherit the kingdom of God. This is clear from Paul's words:—

"For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality."

Believing then that the Scriptures teach that this change from corruptibility to incorruptibility is brought about by being "born again" or "born from above," leads us to the consideration of "the new birth."

In John iii. 3, we are told that Jesus said to Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews:—

"Except a man be born again (born from above—Diaglott) he cannot see the kingdom of God."

The call to God's kingdom and glory was commenced by Jesus in person to the Jews of that generation, as recorded by Mark in these words:—

"Now after John was imprisoned Jesus came into Galilee publishing the glad tidings of God, and saying, The time has been accomplished, and God's Royal Majesty has approached; reform and believe the Good Message."—Diaglott.

This call to the Jews had been sounded by Jesus through every city and village (see Luke viii. 1), and telling them that "God's Royal Majesty had unexpectedly appeared among them" (Matt. xii. 28—Diaglott), or as rendered in the common version, "the kingdom of God has come unto you." Nicodemus had been attracted by this announcement, and being a ruler of the Jews himself, and not understanding the nature of the kingdom proclaimed in glad the tidings, but believing that Jesus spoke with authority, having "come from God," he evidently sought Jesus with a view of securing for himself a continuation of his rulership in the kingdom which Jesus announced. Jesus, evidently perceiving the thought of his heart, said unto him:—

"Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God."

This was a startling announcement to Nicodemus, which his unenlightened understanding could not comprehend; and he immediately asks:—

"How can a man be born when he is old? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb and be born?" showing by the questions he asked that his thoughts rose no higher than the natural man.

He did not understand the difference between the kingdom of Israel, or of God, under the Mosaic constitution of things, and the kingdom of God under the constitution of things to be established by Jesus. He did not understand that while "flesh and blood" could inherit and rule in the one, that it was necessary to become incorruptible in order to inherit and rule in the other. Hence the answer of Jesus again (6th verse):—

"Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the spirit he cannot enter into the kingdom of God; that which is born of flesh is flesh, and that which is born of spirit is spirit."

This was not only an answer to the question, How can a man be born when he is old? but an explanation of the first answer given by Jesus in the third verse:—

"Except a man be born again, or born from above, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

We see then that to be born from above a man must be born of water and of spirit; he then becomes a spirit, or incorruptible in nature, and can enter or inherit the kingdom. But just here the question arises:—

What is it to be born of water and of spirit, and so be born from above?

As there can be no birth without a begettal, I answer in accordance with what we have written, that to be the subject of a new birth, a man must first be begotten by the Spirit, or Word; then be quickened, or his begettal made manifest by obedience, which is being born of water in the act of baptism or immersion; after which he must continue to be nourished by the Word, or Spirit,—"continue in all the apostle's doctrine and teaching" until he is brought to the birth, which takes place at the coming of Jesus, and which is, if the subject of it be dead, a resurrection to incorruptibility and life; if the subject be living, it is a change to incorruptibility.

Having affirmed the above proposition, we will endeavor to show that such is the Scripture teaching; in so doing we will establish the last proposition first, namely, that a change to incorruptibility, or a resurrection to incorruptibility and life, is the birth. That "conversion," or "change of heart," is not being "born again," as popular teaching has it, is evident from the fact that, though a man may be converted, or have his heart changed, he is still "flesh and blood;" whereas, Jesus says that, "he that is born of spirit is spirit," that is, he is no longer flesh and blood, but incorruptible or deathless, as we shall see.

Again Paul says, "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God."

Is not that man who is converted still flesh and blood?

Yet Jesus says, or teaches that he that is born again can enter the kingdom of God; therefore, those who teach that a man who is converted is born again not only make Paul contradict Jesus, but make Jesus affirm that which is not true.

But, again, if a man is born again at conversion, when and how is he begotten?

It is evident that popular teaching confounds begettal, with the birth of the Spirit; therefore, we must turn to the Scriptures for instruction. If, then, the birth of the Spirit, or being born again, is, as I have affirmed, to be made incorruptible, or raised from the dead to die no more, then Christ who was begotten by the Spirit must have been born again; for Paul says:—

"Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." Rom. vi. 9.

If, then, he could die no more, he must have become incorruptible—born again, born of Spirit. The following passages will show this to be correct:—

Rev. i. 5: "And from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness, and the first-born [chief-born—Diaglott] of the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth."

Again, Rom. viii. 29: "For whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren."

Again, Col. i. 15, 18, Paul, speaking of Jesus, says: "Who is the image of the invisible God—the first-born of every creature; and he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead, that in all things he might have the pre-eminence."

We submit the passages quoted as positive proof that to be raised from the dead to incorruptibility and life is to be "born again"—"born of Spirit." Hence, says Paul, Rom. viii. 11:—

"If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead will also make alive your mortal bodies through the in-dwelling of his spirit within you."—Diaglott.

The Spirit of God, by which a man is begotten, continuing to dwell in him eventually, by the power of God brings him to the birth, and changes him to incorruptibility, and he becomes a "new creation in Christ Jesus," both in mind and body, and, therefore, being born from above, or born of Spirit, he is spirit. This being true, Jesus became spirit not a "phantasma," or phantom, nor yet a ghost, or immortal soul creation of popular theology, but an incorruptible being or spirit, whom Paul affirms to be "an exact impress of the substance of God." Heb. i. 3.—Diaglott.

Also in 1 Cor. xv. 45, Paul says, "And so it is written, the first man Adam was made a living soul: the last Adam was made a quickening spirit," [life-giving Spirit—Diaglott.]

As God is a Spirit, so Jesus, through a birth from the dead, became, in the words of Paul, "an exact impress of the substance of God," a spirit-giving life from the dead to all that are his, for he says:—

"As the Father has life in himself, so he gave also to the Son to have life in himself; for as the Father raises up and makes alive the dead, so also the Son makes alive whom he pleases." John v. 21, 26.—Diaglott.

We now proceed to prove the second proposition, and show that to be "born of water" is to be quickened by the spirit in the act of baptism. As the resurrection of Christ to incorruptibility or spirit substance—a new life to die no more—is a birth of the spirit, so a resurrection, from a watery grave, in the act of immersion, to lead a new life, is a birth of the water, for water is used in Scripture as an emblem of spirit. We die to sin, are buried in water, and rise to walk in a new life, in a new character. This is clear from the words of Paul to the Romans, vi. 2 etc.:—

"Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life: for if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death we shall also be in the likeness of his resurrection. * * * Now if we be dead with Christ we believe that we shall live with him. Knowing that Christ being raised, from the death dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him; for in that he died, he died unto sin once; but in that he liveth, he liveth unto God. Likewise reckon ye yourselves dead unto sin but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Now as Christ's resurrection from the dead to a new nature, incorruptibility and life, was a birth from the grave, a being born of spirit, so being dead to sin and buried in water, our resurrection therefrom to a new character of life of the mind is a birth from the water, a quickening by the spirit.

It will be understood that in a birth of the flesh there is first a begettal, of which, however, there is no positive evidence until quickening takes place. Quickening is simply action of body, the first evidence or sign of life. So in the birth of the spirit there is first a begettal by the spirit, but the first positive evidence of that begettal or reception of the word into the mind is action of the body in obedience to the faith by immersion in water, thus showing that the spirit has quickened or made alive the mind, which causes the individual, as says Paul, "to walk in newness of life." Thus a new creature or creation in Christ Jesus has been begotten and quickened by the Spirit, evidenced by a birth from the water of the individual in the act of immersion: hence Paul says to the Colossians, ii. 12, 13:—

"Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead. And you being dead in your sins and the circumcision of your flesh hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses."

As an individual is born of the Spirit by resurrection from the grave to incorruptibility, leaving behind him his corruptible, sinful, fleshly nature, so when he is born from a watery grave he leaves behind him his sinful character, the old thoughts and doings of the flesh, and walks in newness of life. Such an individual, if he continues to be nourished by the Spirit, by continuing in all the apostles' doctrine and teaching, will, when Christ comes, be born of the Spirit by a resurrection from the dead to incorruptibility and life, and be permitted to inherit the kingdom of God.

Having shown what it is to be born of the spirit, and born of water, we will now endeavor to see how we are begotten by the spirit. The importance of understanding this will appear to every mind that stops to consider the words of Jesus:—

"Except a man be born of water and of spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of God."

That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of spirit is spirit. It will not do to pass this over carelessly without giving it thought: for flesh and blood cannot enter the kingdom of God. It is absolutely necessary, then, that we be born again, born from above, born of spirit, and so become, like Jesus, "a spirit, giving life." As no one can be quickened by the spirit, nor born of spirit unless he be first begotten by the spirit, the importance of understanding how an individual can be begotten by the spirit will, I think be fully realized by every reader of THE RESTITUTION. It is to be deeply regretted that there are so many earnest seekers after truth, many who sincerely believe they are accepted of God, having much light, who have rejected the dogma of immortal-soulism, and rejoice in the knowledge of the truth that there is life only in Christ, have been immersed, and believe in the literal personal reign of Christ on the earth and yet have never been begotten by the spirit, and hence have never been quickened, or Scripturally baptized, and therefore can never be born of the spirit and have a right to enter the kingdom of God unless they do their first work over and, like Apollos, learn the way more perfectly.

Every atom of my nature goes out in love and anxiety for those of my brother according to the flesh who, in their zeal for God, are rejoicing in his glorious promises, while, at the same time, they have failed to acquaint themselves with God's revealed way, whereby they may become heirs to all he has promised.

Our right to enter the kingdom of God depends upon our becoming the children of God by a begettal and birth of the spirit: therefore, God, in his wisdom and goodness, has made plain how children of the flesh may be begotten by the spirit. Everyone understands how persons are begotten of the flesh or incorruptible seed, but how a person is begotten of "incorruptible seed" is not well understood, and cannot be understood except by those who are the "taught of God" by his word. We should say here, then, that to be begotten of the spirit is to have the incorruptible seed planted or sown in the heart or mind. The question then arises:—

What is the incorruptible seed?

On this question Peter will best enlighten us. He says:—

"Being begotten [Diaglott] again not of corruptible seed but of incorruptible, by the Word of God which liveth and abideth forever."

The incorruptible seed, then, is the Word of God. But the question naturally arises:—

What Word of God? or how much of the Word of God? for it would require a lifetime for the most astute to have a comprehensive knowledge of all of God's Word.

If such were necessary the law of faith or of Christ would, like the law of Moses, be unto death through the weakness of the flesh. But here again Peter makes it very plain. He says:—

"And this is the Word which by the Gospel is preached unto you." See 1 Peter i. 23, 25.

With this passage before us there can be no disputation as to what the incorruptible seed is, and how we are begotten by it. It will be clearly seen that the Word of God announced by "the Gospel" is the "incorruptible seed," or germ of life—that by which every child of God is begotten. Such, at least, is the plain testimony of Peter.

But what says James?

In the 1st chapter and 18th verse he says:—

"Of his own will begat he us with the Word of Truth."

But is the "Word of Truth" the Gospel?

We will let Paul answer. He says, in writing to the Ephesians:—

"In whom ye also trusted after ye heard the Word of Truth, the Gospel of your salvation."

It is very clear, then, from the testimony of Peter and James that the "incorruptible seed"—the "Word of God" that begets—is the Gospel. There can, then, be no part of the revelation of Deity so important to man as the Gospel. Paul was not ashamed of it, and declares it to be the power of God unto salvation. No man, then, can be begotten by the spirit who has not a comprehensive understanding of the Gospel. He must first have heard, understood and believed, then, being immersed for the remission of sins, he is introduced into the Name—"the only name given under heaven whereby men can be saved"—and is then the begotten son of God. It is important, then, to know what the Gospel is by which we are begotten. Paul will help us to an understanding of this, for he tells the Corinthian brethren that in Christ Jesus he had begotten them through the Gospel. Now, as there is but one Gospel, as there is but one faith and one hope, it is evident that the Gospel which Paul preached, and through which he begat Corinthian brethren, is the only Gospel that will beget children of God at this present day; therefore every truly honest heart must turn with pleasure to the Word that may ascertain what Gospel Paul announced, what were the glad tidings he proclaimed. If we turn to Acts xxviii. 23, 30, 31, we there read:—

"There came many to him into his lodgings to whom he expounded and testified the the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses and out of the Prophets, from morning till evening. And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came into him proclaiming the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ.

We find, then, that the Gospel Paul proclaimed was the glad tidings of God's kingdom in connection with the things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ.

We see that Paul did not merely tell the inquirers after truth that God would set up a kingdom on the earth, but the Word says, he "expounded the kingdom," that is, he explained it, made it clear that they might understand it, for this was necessary to their hearty belief and reception of the truth, that they might be begotten thereby. He not only expounded the kingdom, but "persuaded them concerning Jesus." He assured them that he was the Messiah, the Son of God. He referred them to Moses and the Prophets as proof that he was the seed of Abraham to whom the promises were made (see Gal. iii. 16); that he was the promised seed of David and, therefore, heir to David's throne, and that God had fulfilled his promise to the fathers to raise him from the dead (see Acts xiii. 17–36); that through him was preached the forgiveness of sins (see Acts xiii. 38); that "as many as were immersed into Christ had put on Christ, "and were Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise," which promise embraced the land or territory of that kingdom which he had expounded or explained to them, and made Abraham and his seed "heirs of the world;" that in Abraham and his seed should "all the nations of the earth be blessed;" that "his seed should possess the gate of his enemies," or rule over them. See Gen. xii. 1, 3; xiii. 14, 17; xxii. 17, 18; also Rom. iv. 12, 13.

It is clear, then, that the "incorruptible seed" which Paul cast abroad, and by which believers were begotten, was the Gospel, or things concerning the kingdom of God and name of Jesus Christ.

Ought not every reader of THE RESTITUTION who claims to be in Christ heed the injunction of Paul, "examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith," and ask himself this question:—

Was it this incorruptible seed which was sown in my heart before I was immersed; or have I come to a knowledge and belief of these things since my immersion?

It is plain that the hearing and believing the glad tidings of the kingdom and things concerning Jesus the anointed King, as announced by Paul, begat the Corinthian brethren.

Can anything else beget us, anything but the Gospel of the kingdom?

Let Paul's words answer the question:—

"Though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you let him be accursed." See Gal. i. 8.

But it is said by some that in 1 Cor, xv. the three facts, namely, the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus Christ are called the Gospel. This is a delusion which a more careful reading ought to dispel. Paul calls their attention to the glad tidings which he had announced to them, and which he says they received, and through which they were being saved, if, as he says, "you retain a certain word I evangelized to you; for I delivered to you among the first things (not first in order, but pre-eminent, or 'chief things,' see Diaglott) that which I also received, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures," that he was buried and raised the third day according to the Scriptures.

We see, then, that the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ was not all that Paul announced when he preached the Gospel to the Corinthians, but was among the chief things.

There were other pre-eminent or "chief things" which, we are told in Acts, were "things concerning the kingdom of God." It will also be observed that when Paul announced the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ he says he did so according to the Scriptures, which no one can do without announcing the things concerning the kingdom of God, for he was crucified because he claimed to be the Messiah—the Son of God, and King of the Jews. Hence we find when Philip went down to Samaria to sow the incorruptible seed, or "preach Christ unto them," that he announced the glad tidings "concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ," which, "when they believed, they were baptized, both men and women," and so were begotten of God by the spirit through hearing the "Word of the kingdom." We see it was impossible for Philip to preach Christ "according to the Scriptures" without announcing the things of the kingdom, so I may add, to preach "life" only in Christ, according to the Scriptures, it is necessary to announce that "Jesus Christ hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel;" therefore the life and immortality in Christ can be obtained only by a hearty belief of the Gospel, and obedience thereto by immersion into the all-saving Name. "He that believeth the Gospel and is immersed shall be saved," are the words of Jesus, and he doeth well who taketh heed thereto.

We find, then, from the testimony of the apostles that the incorruptible seed sown by them, by which believers were begotten, was the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, to which were added "the things concerning the name of Jesus Christ" after he rose and opened their understanding that they might see "that it behooved Christ to suffer and rise from the dead, and that repentance and remission of sins be preached in his name." If we turn to Matt. xiii., and Luke viii. we find that the Master himself sowed the same "incorruptible seed," "the Word of the kingdom," teaching his disciples that it must fall into "good and honest hearts" and be "understood" in order to produce fruit or bring forth children of the children of the kingdom.

With all this testimony before us we think it should be plain to every one, how a child of God is generated from a man of flesh and blood; in other words how a person is begotten of spirit and born of spirit that he may have a right to enter the kingdom of God. A summary of what we have written is that to be born from above a man must—

1. Have a "good and honest heart," as the seed will not bear fruit in any other. Luke viii. 11, 15.

2. He must have the incorruptible seed or "Word of the kingdom sown in his heart, Matt. xiii. 19–23; or, in other words, he must hear "the things concerning the kingdom of God and the Name of Jesus Christ." Acts viii. 12.

3. He must have a comprehensive understanding of the things. Matt. xiii. 23.

4. He must believe the things with a lively faith.

5. He must obey the faith by immersion in water for the remission of sins, and for introduction into the all-saving Name, in the doing of which he is "born of water" or quickened by the Spirit. Mark xvi. 16; Acts iii. 38; Rom. xvi. 25, 26; Col. ii. 12, 13.

6. He must be nourished by the spirit, "the Word," by continuing steadfast in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayers. Acts ii. 41, 42.

7. He will, then, at the return of Jesus, be born of spirit (if dead) by a resurrection to incorruptibility and life; (if living) by a change from a corruptible flesh-and-blood nature to an incorruptible spirit nature, and so, being born of spirit, he will be of spirit and have right to inherit the kingdom of God. Rom. viii. 11; vi. 5, 9; John iii. 6; 1 Cor. xv.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:
THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with Christ as King of Kings, and the immortalized saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and baptism as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Turkish Dynasty Continued.—The advancement of the sultany of the new Roman empire, called Roum, to the gates of Constantinople, by Soliman, fully armed the Greek emperor with the most alarming fears for his personal safety, and of the insecurity of his dominions. The capital of the empire of the Crescent had been moved from Ispahan, a position far east of the Euphrates, to Nice, within one hundred miles of Constantinople; and nearly all of the Asiatic provinces had deserted the Cross for a position under the Crescent.

The Greek emperor sent letters to the western empire, containing statements of the rapid encroachments of the Turks.

Returned pilgrims told of the horrors of Turkish persecutions, till all Christendom was filled with a feverish excitement. It was not simply the Grecian empire that was exposed; but the whole Christian world was threatened. The alarm came from every pulpit in the West.

To add to this general alarm, Peter, the Hermit, a native of Amiens, of Picardy, in France, visited Jerusalem, (A. D. 1095) about twenty years after it had been taken by the Turks. Seeing the suffering of those who visited the holy sepulchre he formed the plan of raising forces enough to recover the land from the power of the infidels. Peter returned, and prostrated himself at the feet of Pope Martin II. The pope called a council of 4,000 ecclesiastics, and 30,000 seculars. They met in an open plain at Placentia. This vast assembly was addressed by the pope and by Peter, who related the extreme sufferings of the pilgrims. After this, Peter visited the principal courts in Europe, telling the same tale of woe.

This hermit was a remarkable personage: he was rather under medium size, contemptible in appearance; his eyes keen; his speech vehement; his body emaciated; his fancy active; full of dreams and visions. His preaching was attended with great power. He entered the cottage and the palace. He had no fears. He had seen the Savior in vision! A letter had fallen from Paradise, where he had, professedly, conversed with Christ and his mother; with saints and angels.

Another council was convened at Clermont, where were gathered the great dignitaries of church and state; all his cardinals, thirteen archbishops, and two hundred and twenty-five bishops: the mitred prelates were four hundred. Through all the kingdoms of western Europe the spirit was kindled. The pope at Clermont ascended a lofty platform in the market-place; his eloquence moved the masses, who exclaimed:—

"God wills it! God wills it!"

The pope answered:—

"It is indeed the will of God, and let this memorable word, the inspiration surely of the Holy Spirit, be forever adopted as your cry of battle, to animate the devotion and courage of the champions of Christ. His cross is the symbol of your salvation; wear a red, a bloody cross, as an external mark, on your breasts or shoulders, as a pledge of your sacred and irrevocable engagement."

This proposition, relative to the cross, was accepted, and an imprint was made on their garments or on their flesh. The masses, therefore, received the sign of the cross.

Their departure for Palestine was appointed on the 15th of August, the day of the festival of the Assumption; yet so full of restless zeal were the masses, that 300,000 of both sexes, but of the lower classes, began their pilgrimage in early spring. Their leaders were Peter the Hermit, and Walter the Penniless. These were soon followed by 20,000 Germans under the monk, Godescal. They went without proper supplies, assuming that God would feed and protect them as he did the children of Israel in the wilderness. Their way was through Hungary and Bulgaria, a distance of six hundred miles before they could reach Constantinople. Their track was one of rapine and bloodshed. Vast multitudes perished by hunger as well as by the swords of their brethren of Hungary and Bavaria.

Through incredible hardships a fragment arrived at Constantinople; but, becoming exceedingly troublesome to the Greek emperor, he transported them across the waters and assigned them quarters in his dominions on the Asiatic coast. These restless spirits were not satisfied with their new homes, but moved on against the Turks who occupied the road to Jerusalem. On the plains of Nice they were cut to pieces by the Turkish army under David, "the sword of the lion," and their bodies erected into a pyramid.

Three hundred thousand pilgrims were destroyed before a city was rescued, or the regular army had completed their outfit.

The great sovereigns of Europe did not enter into the first crusade, in person, for reasons satisfactory to themselves, at least. Nobles and princes of the second class took command of the armies. They did not reach Constantinople till winter. They crossed the Hellespont in early spring. The Greek emperor being very jealous of their numbers, did not allow any two armies to assemble under the walls of the city at the same time; but after ferrying each army to the Asiatic coast he immediately withdrew his vessels. Against the day of Pentecost, the army of the crusaders was in Asia Minor. Six hundred thousand were gathered from Europe to recover the holy sepulchre.

If all had entered these armies that took the vow there would have been not less than six millions on the pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

Alexander the Great entered Asia with about 35,000 men, and with them overthrew the Persian empire, and carried his conquests over that mighty continent. Here are more warriors, perhaps, than composed the army of Xerxes, gathered to recover from one nation, the possession of a sepulchre, which could be of no intrinsic value to either power.

The kingdom of Roum, under David, the Turkish sultan, must be overthrown before the crusaders could advance. Under Soliman, its sultan, Roum had assumed the magnitude and power of an empire. This had been accomplished in less than thirty years. Soliman had been slain in a battle against his uncle, and David, his son, reigned on his vacant throne. It had conquered all lesser Asia, and had left the Euphrates, its ancient boundary, many hundred miles in the rear. They first laid siege to Nice, the capital of this new empire. Their encampment extended six miles in circuit, and contained as many fighting men as were ever gathered into one body. The sultan, with 50,000 horse, took shelter in the mountains, from which he made two ineffectual sallies. After some months, by aid of the Grecian fleet, Nice was surrendered. The cruelty of the crusaders was great. They ate many of their prisoners; hence they were called Cannibals by the sultan.

The fall of Nice aroused the Mahometan world. From all quarters of the empire the emirs with their forces rushed to the sultan's standard, who was soon at the head of 250,000 horse. As the pilgrims advanced carelessly in two dense columns, the sultan made frequent attacks upon their rear column. A severe battle was fought, which resulted in the defeat of the sultan, who, with ten thousand horse, fled toward the Euphrates, that he might enlist his Eastern princes.

The pilgrim army marched onward five hundred miles through Asia Minor, without meeting an enemy, or seeing any thing but wasted lands and deserted towns. While passing over desert wastes the army suffered severely for want of water. Their march over Mount Taurus was dangerous; and, to many, it was the terminus of their pilgrimage.

Baldwin, one of the French nobles, entered Armenia and Mesopotamia and established a kingdom beyond the Euphrates, which continued fifty-four years. The Franks did not enter Syria till the beginning of winter. The siege of Antioch, the capital of Syria, was immediately commenced, and its gates were opened by the sword of the duke of Normandy, to three hundred thousand crusaders. Under the humane Antioch was a populous, rich, and proud capital. Under the Turkish rule much of its splendor had faded; it was still a city of wealth, and filled with a population of corrupt morals.

The citadel contained a Turkish force of 6,000 horse and about 18,000 foot, commanded by a noted emir. One hundred thousand Moslems were slain in the siege. The siege of Antioch was severe, and protracted; and had they not been aided by a pretended miracle (the "steel head of the lance that pierced the side of the Redeemer." "In three days that instrument of eternal, and now of temporal salvation, will be manifested to his disciples. Search, and ye shall find; bear it aloft in battle; and that mystic weapon shall penetrate the souls of the miscreants,") they would have failed.

The holy city of Jerusalem was the last place to fall into the hands of the crusaders; which was, taken, after a protracted siege, A. D. 1099, four hundred and sixty years after its conquest by Omar.

"On the seventh of June, 1099, the crusading army appeared before the walls. Their camp extended from the gate of St. Stephen to that beneath the tower of David. On the fifth day after their arrival the crusaders attacked the city, and at three o'clock on Friday, the 15th of July, Jerusalem was in the hands of the crusaders. Churches were established, and for eighty-eight years Jerusalem remained in the hands of the Christians."—Smith.

The battle of Ascalon, in which the Christians were victorious, put an end to the first crusade.

Reflections.—The question may be propounded, with interest:—

Why did God allow Christian Europe to be loosened from its deep foundations, and hurled against Mahometan Asia?

What ultimate results could justify such a movement?

Such questions are perplexing; yet they are suggested to the thoughtful. God's "dominion (is) from generation to generation." He has his plans, which can never fail of accomplishment. In order to bring about such results the Deity must reserve to himself supreme authority. The Scriptures are full of illustrations.

"All the inhabitants of the earth (are) reputed as nothing, and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and (among) the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?"

The winds are his messengers; clouds, tempests, lightnings, yea, all nature, waits around the throne of his power. When the old world had corrupted itself, he sank it under an ocean of waters; when the cities of the plains had filled their cups of pollution, he covered them with a lake of fire; when the captivity of the people in Egypt had accomplished its days, he forced them out of the hands of Pharaoh by ten terrible judgments; when the Canaanites had filled their cups, they were, in part, removed; when the seventy years' captivity were about closing, he raised up Cyrus as his shepherd to deliver them out of Babylon.

Daniel's visions show that all Gentile rule is under his supreme control.

Why, then, when the papacy had done such violence to pure Christianity, should he not raise up a power for their punishment?

A perfect portrait of Christopher Columbus is said to have been found in the colonial office at Madrid, Spain. It is reported to have been made during his lifetime, and if it was, it is undoubtedly a correct likeness of the great navigator. If true, this is one of the most interesting finds of recent years.

A little while our trials will be ended,
And we no more this vale of tears shall tread.
A little while our anthems shall be blended,
With those whose teardrops never more are shed.

Daffodil.

M. L. MINARD.

Fragrant little blossom,
Blooming all alone;
Greeting me with sadness,
Darling little one;
Near thy velvet pillow,
Angels fleet have trod,
And thy form was fashioned,
By the hand of God.

Restless little blossom,
Then I hear you say—
"Why was I created
In this plain way?
For I hear the robbins
Laughing as they trill—
Though so early blossom
'Tis but a daffodil."

Darling little blossom,
Beauty, love and grace
Are not always blended
In a handsome face;
Each has a station
He may nobly fill,
Though it may be lowly
As the daffodil.

The Bower Bird.

This remarkable bird is native to Australia, is from eleven to sixteen inches long, yellow or grayish brown, with a deep frill or rosy pink across the back of the neck.

They build extraordinary bower-like structures combining taste with ingenuity. On the ground, in a retired but sunny place, they make a smooth pavement of rounded shells, and from the fields and forests bring fine shoots of trees and twigs, the thick ends of which they thrust in firmly between the shells and pebbles in two parallel rows, making the tops incline toward one another to resemble a miniature avenue. The forks of the sticks always point outwards so as to offer no obstruction to the ingress and egress of the birds. When the bower is finished it is furthermore embellished.

With great perseverance they collect all kinds of brilliant objects, such as gleaming mother-of-pearl shells, bright stones, small bleached bones and gay colored rags to lay at and near the entrances; the gaudy feathers of parrots and other birds are eagerly carried off and hung up like flowers to the dry ends of the twigs forming their bower; in fact so prone are these birds to pick up any striking looking object that the natives always search their bowers, pretty sure of finding missing articles.

Their materials are often brought great distances.

A New Version.

A little boy who had attended a funeral was asked by his mother what the text was. He replied:

"He's dead, and they went up the road."

This was the boy's version of the passage in Ecclesiastes:

"Man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets."

A Truthful Son.

Shortly after, a number of persons appeared, supported a young man upon horseback, who had been mortally wounded. His mother walked on before, quite frantic with grief, clapping her hands, and enumerating the good qualities of her son. "He never told a lie," said the disconsolate mother; and as her wounded son was carried in at the gate, bitterly did she exclaim, "He never told a lie—no, never!" The heathen mother considered truth so important, that whatever other good qualities her son might possess, the greatest of all, in her eyes, was his veracity.

Review and Herald.

"Here I Am."

A lawyer had a sage hanging on the wall in his office in which was a sterling. He had taught the little fellow to answer when he called it.

A boy named Charlie came in one morning. The lawyer left the boy there while he went out for a few minutes. When he returned the bird was gone.

He asked, "Where is my bird?"

Charlie replied that he did not know anything about it.

"But," said the gentleman, "Charlie, that bird was in the cage when I went out. Now tell me all about it; where is it?"

Charlie declared that he knew nothing about it; that the cage-door was open, and he guessed the bird had flown out.

The lawyer called out, "Starling, where are you?"

The bird spoke right out of the boy's pocket, and just as plain as it could, "Here I am!"

Ah, what a fix that boy was in! He had stolen the bird, had hid it, as he supposed in a safe place, and had told two lies to conceal his guilt. It was testimony that all the world would believe. The boy had nothing to say. The bird was a living witness that he was a thief and a liar.

We have not all of us a starling, but we have a conscience—not in our pocket, but in a more secure place—in our soul; and that tells the story of our guilt or our innocence.

As the bird answered when the lawyer called it, so when God speaks our conscience will reply, and give such testimony as we cannot deny or explain away.

Filial Love.

There is not on earth a more lovely sight than the unwearied care and attention of children to their parents. Where filial love is found in the heart we will answer for all the other virtues. No young man or woman will turn out basely, we sincerely believe, who has parents respected and beloved; a child affectionate and dutiful will never bring the gray hairs of its parents to the grave in sorrow. The wretch who breaks forth from wholesome restraints and disregards the laws of his country, must have first disobeyed his parents, showing neither love nor respect for them.

It is seldom the case that a dutiful son is found in the ranks of vice, among the wretched and degraded. Filial love will keep men from sin and crime.

There never will come a time, while your parents live, when you will not be under obligations to them. The older they grow, they more need will there be for your assiduous care and attention to their wants.

The venerable brow and frosty hair speak loudly to the love and compassion of the child. If sickness and infirmity make them at times fretful, bear with them with patience, never forgetting that time are long may bring you to need the same care and attention.

Speaks Pleasantly to Children.

The habit of speaking in pleasant tones to the sensitive hearts within our care, is of the utmost importance. If we would have them speak gently and kindly to all, we must teach by precept and example in their early years, while their are so elastic as to be led to pattern after the influence which surrounds them.

I will relate a little incident of my own experience. I was unusually busy one morning preparing for company to dinner. My little son of four years was amusing himself with his playthings about the room.

He, too, seemed hard at work, building bridges, block-houses, and churches. We was constantly coming to me asking questions and desiring assistance.

After a little time I noticed he had left his play, and was back against the wall under the table, sobbing like his heart would break.

I said, "Georgie, dear, what is the matter?"

No reply.

When I repeated the question, the answer came between broken sobs, "You didn't speak pleasantly to me."

"Well," said I, "don't cry; come and tell me about it."

So he came to me; I took him upon my lap, and asked him to tell me just what I had said. Years have passed since then, and I have forgotten all about the impression it made. A few pleasant words, the tears kissed away, and he was comforted and happy, and at play again, but I learned a lesson not to be forgotten.

He is now grown up, and I would no more think of speaking unpleasantly or unkindly to him than I would to company who might be visiting me. On the other hand, a rude, selfish, or unkind word never passes his lips. His attentions toward me are always most respectful, kind and loving. If we would gain respect and esteem from our children we must also speak to them in a uniformly kind and courteous manner. As we teach, so they will learn.

Who Took the Orphan.

A few days ago a boy about ten years of age, lame and sickly, who had been living with his mother in rooms in the city, found himself alone in the world. The lad was too ill to ride in the one poor carriage which followed the body to the grave, yet no one thought his condition serious.

After the funeral a number of persons gathered in the poverty-stricken room where he lay weeping and what disposition could be made of him.

"If he wasn't lame I'd take him into my family," observed one of the men in a tone that seemed to show that he blamed the poor boy for his misfortune.

"Well, it's awful hard," sighed one of the women, "but I know he never could get along with my children.

"Nor with mine," added a second.

"If I should take him he'd run up a big doctor's bill on me," said a man as he filled his pipe.

Each and every one had some excuse.

The boy heard them all without a word, but with quivering chin and eyes full of tears. Under one pretext and another all slipped out, and left him alone, promising to have another talk in the morning. Perhaps, that night before they closed their eyes in sleep, some of them thought of the poor lad lying in the dreary room, alone and almost helpless, but if so none of them went near him.

Late in the morning a woman living on the same floor went in to see if he might not want a bite to eat, and the question of who should take care of him was settled. God had taken him. Hugged close to the wall, as if he feared the midnight shadows, and with eye-lashes yet wet, he was lying dead and cold, no longer a burden to any one.

The boy too lame to be taken care of on earth—too feeble to earn the crusts that some one would have given him, had a home better than the best. When they know that he died alone, women bent over him and wept. When they lifted his wasted body from the bed, men's consciences smote them for their harsh words, but it was too late. He had gone feeling that there was no mercy in human hearts.

National Baptist.

This week I want all to read Mrs. Harley's letter to the children in the Baptist Courier. Will you not try to remember the lesson she teaches?

Dear Children:—For the past few weeks we have all felt deeply concerned about the fate of our president—shot down by the cowardly assassin, when the whole country was at peace, and he striving nobly to do his duty to this whole country. We should all pray that a life so valuable to our country may be spared.

There is one Bible promise that gives me great hope of his recovery: "Honor thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Never can we forget that scene in the Capitol last March. Thousands were gathered there, the wealth and beauty of the land. The thunder of cannon and the crash of martial music announced

Hail to the chief, who in triumph advances!

The solemn vow of inaugural was taken; and then turning away from all that glittering throng, all that scene of dazzling glory, the chief magistrate of the mightiest country in the world sinks the President in the man, and in lowly reverence bending before his gray-haired mother, kisses those lips which first taught him to reverence God and his country.

"One touch of nature makes the world kin;" and this act of beautiful devotion and lowly reverence to the mother, who had been his guiding star through life, touched the hearts of all who witnessed the scene, and sent an electric thrill through the whole country. It taught a lesson which is sadly needed in these degenerate times—reverence for parents.

Over and over again recall that touching scene, and let it bring to mind the words, "Honor thy father and thy mother," "Children obey your parents in the Lord." Think how much you owe them. Think of their love and devotion, the many sacrifices they have made for your comfort and happiness; and strive by every means in your power to make them happy. God will smile upon you lovingly when he sees your efforts to please him; and oh, how happy your parents will be, how they will rejoice that God has giving them such loving, thoughtful children.

Little things make up the sum of human life. Show your devotion to your parents in these little things; and then, when great occasions arise, you will not be found wanting. Study their comfort, wait on them, always rise when they enter the room and place the most comfortable chair in the most pleasant place for the dear parent.

Anticipate their wants—the cool glass of water, the fragrant bouquet, the slippers handed to "father" when he comes in weary from the day's labor—these and many other little nameless attentions make home a Paradise indeed. And when only a grass-grown mound remains, and the loved one has gone, how your heart will swell with gratitude to God that he enabled you to be a loving, faithful child, a comfort and blessing to those who gave you birth.

God help you, dear children, to be dutiful and obedient, honoring "thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Lord willing, I will be at the Reese neighborhood the third Sunday in September, soon after the close of the Conference, and continue one week. Then to Michigan, near Three Oaks, as Bro. Kinnie may appoint, and continue one week, or more. Bro. S. Andrews can also make an appointment for his neighborhood as thought best.

Your brother in Christ.

J. S. HARCH.

The brethren of the Abrahamic faith of Southern Wisconsin and Northern Illinois will meet in Conference at Lanark, Ill., commencing Friday evening, Sept. 30, and hold over Sunday, Oct. 2. A general invitation is extended to all.

J. M. GLOTFELTY.

The Lord willing, the Michigan Quarterly Conference will be held at the brick school house, three and one-half miles north of Mendon Village, St. Joseph county, Mich., commencing Sept. 30, and lasting over the following Sunday. May all the brethren that can, be present, for a little longer and the storms of life will be over, when the cross shall be exchanged for the crown.

Let all the brethren who in Christ reside,
Their cares and labors lay aside,
And let us at the conference meet,
Where we can bow at Jesus' feet
And by the strength that he'll impart,
May change the vilest sinner's heart.

K. N. WOODWARD,
Secretary.

The brethren of the Abrahamic Faith of California, will meet in conference, at Woodland, commencing on Saturday, Sept. 24, and continue for about two weeks. Brethren B. Corbaley and H. Wilson and perhaps others will be in attendance. Come brethren one and all, and let this meeting be a grand rally for our Master.

By order of the Committee.

W. H. LULLEN, Sec.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 21, 1881.

WILL say next week whether we can attend the Conference at Lanark or not.

OWING to circumstances that we need not explain some notices and articles are deferred for a future number.

As the year draws toward its close let all our subscribers decide on renewing, and let all make some exertion to increase our list that the paper may become self-sustaining without appealing for extra relief. We have no doubt but that the decade of the eighties will be most momentous in its history. All should keep posted on passing events as this dispensation is nearing its termination.

MOURN, COLUMBIA MOURN!

The slow heavy strokes have tolled on: from every bell, and the slumbers of a continent have been broken by the dismal night echoes. The morning has dawned, and the sun comes out of the chambers of the East to gild ten thousand streets where the National Emblem no longer streams in the winds with its emblazonings of starry lustres, but to look down upon darkened avenues where the pendent glories are all eclipsed in the solemn draperies of death.

To-day the dead hopes of millions are enshrouded, to be coffined and tombed on a soon-coming morrow. Death has launched the fatal arrow—the honored President, JAMES A. GARFIELD, is the victim whose heart has been pierced by the poisoned shaft, and the world contemplates the sad spectacle of a whole nation in mourning.

Three times within a fleeting century have the people of this Great Commonwealth simultaneously and spontaneously bowed the head in agonizing grief, and three times have the pages in our national volume been specially written in lines of "lamentation and mourning and woe."

The fingers that wrote in heavy dark tracings across the Scroll of the Great Republic when the Father of his Country lay cold in death in his tree-embowered home on the banks of the Potomac, and that dipped the craped feather once more in fluid jet to write the gloomy paragraph that registered the assassination of the Great Emancipator, as he lay in state under the dome of the Temple of Liberty, are now, once more, summoned to enter the black letters of grief in memoriam of the world-honored Nobleman who, while we write these lines, is sleeping the death-sleep in a cottage-mansion on the shores of the billowy Atlantic.

We had hoped—we had even trusted that it would have been otherwise. We had become persuaded that the patient sufferer would be raised up to yet resume the chair of state. But there is one—"The Most High that ruleth in the kingdom of men"—that has otherwise ordained, and with reverential awe we say—"Thy will be done." In praying as we have for the President's recovery we have not prayed as a political partisan. "Our citizenship is in heaven; from whence also we wait for a Savior." But while thus waiting for the "King of kings and Lord of lords," we could feel that the fallen President was worthy of our honor, and we honored him as one to whom honor was due as the apostle has commanded. We also could hardly divest ourself of the feeling that a "lengthening of tranquility" was in a great degree dependent upon the continuance of his life.

When a confirmation of the sad news reached us, in a short printed extra this morning, we were reading a verse that had been literally rendered from Job in the Syriac version, which reads: "I, even I, know that my Redeemer is alive, and that in the end he shall appear upon the earth." Yes, though the multitudinous billows of the mighty ocean have wailed their funeral dirge upon the death of our honored earthly ruler, yet our Redeemer is alive—and liveth forevermore: and though our gloomy forebodings of the ever-nearing approach of the time of trouble may become more and more intensified, as we are constantly compelled to witness that the earth is already filled with violence, yet beyond the soon-coming tempest and its world-wide wake of devastation and death, we behold the paradises of enchanting loveliness that will overspread this our world when God shall make all things new. Yes, our Redeemer is alive—and "because he lives, we shall live also." We near the boundary line of dispensations, and as our footsteps track the border lands of the solemn ages, let us walk with holy circumspection, for the fashion of this world is passing away.

Our prayer now is that God may sustain the bereaved devoted wife, and the orphaned children, and that he may mercifully watch over the destinies of these United States till the Sovereign Ruler of the Universe shall take to himself his great power and reign supreme in this revolted province of his universal empire.

THE SMITTEN ROCK.

Any discovery made in Bible Lands illustrating the past history of Israel, particularly during their forty years sojourn in the wilderness, is most certainly important to all students of God's word. We this week give our readers the following narrative of discoveries that have been made in the locality where the hosts of Israel were encamped shortly after the spies were sent out to explore the land of promise. During the stay here Miriam died. It was here, too, in bringing water out of the rock, that Moses "spoke an unadvisedly with lips" as to exclude him from entering into the promised inheritance. As the piece following is somewhat lengthy we refer our readers to Num. xx. By the latitude and longitude the place may be easily located:

SITE OF KADESH-BARNEA.

From the July Quarterly Statement of the English Palestine Exploration Fund.

REV. H. CLAY TRUMBULL, OF PHILADELPHIA.

Among the unsettled sites of the desert of the Exodus none is entitled to more prominence than Kadesh-barnea.

Dean Stanley says:—"There can be no question that next to Sinai, the most important resting place of the children of Israel is Kadesh."

Professor Palmer adds:—"This is perhaps the most important site in the whole region, as it forms the key to the movements of the children of Israel during the forty years' wanderings."

And Dr. William Smith declares:—"To determine the position of Kadesh itself is the great problem of the whole route."

Yet there is a remarkable barrenness of material for the settlement of this important question, supplied by the notes of travellers in the desert; and any fresh contribution to that material is likely to be heartily welcomed by Biblical scholars everywhere.

In 1842 the Rev. J. Rowlands, of Queen's College, Cambridge, discovered a fountain bearing the name Kades, or Qadis, a name having the same meaning as the Hebrew "Kadesh," and was confident that this was the site of Kadesh-barnea. His account of his discovery was published in the appendix to Williams' "Holy City," with his reasons for deeming it the disclosure of the long-desired site. At the same time, he made mention of two other wells, neither of which, however, had been visited by him, bearing "the names of Adoirat and Asdimeh, sometimes called Kadeirat and Kasdimeh," which in his opinion represented Adar and Asmon of the southern boundary of Judah. This reported discovery by Mr. Rowlands has been a fruitful source of discussion for now nearly forty years. The probable correctness of his conclusions has been recognized by such scholars as Ritter, Kalisch, Keil, Kurtz, Schultz, Winer, Professor Palmer, President Bartlett, and others well known in Germany, Great Britain, and America. On the other hand, it has been opposed by Robinson, Stanley, Porter, Espin in the "Speaker's Commentary," Hayman in "Smith's Bible Dictionary," and many others.

It is a singular fact that in all these years the site thus discovered by Mr. Rowlands has never been revisited. Indeed it has been questioned if he did not confuse the names and the wells, Kades and Kadeirat. Dr. Robinson distinctly declares that he did so. Espin follows Robinson in this error, and on the topography of "el Ain," the location of Kadeirat, builds up an argument against the identification of Kades or Qadis with Kadesh-barnea. Even Professor Palmer, who agrees with Rowlands in his main conclusion, and confirms his reasoning with cogent arguments, thinks that Rowlands wrongly applied the name 'Ain Qadis "to 'Ain el Quderat, some miles farther northward, and seems not to have visited this spot [the true 'Ain Qadis] at all." President Bartlett, of Dartmouth College, in his "From Egypt to Palestine," while favoring Rowlands' identification, is confident, after a visit to the region in question, that there is no such fountain as 'Ain Qadeirat, and that Rowlands was mistaken in both the location and the distinctive peculiarities of 'Ain Qadis.

Apart, therefore, from the discussion over the identification of 'Ain Qadis with Kadesh-barnea, there has been so little confusion as to the facts of the location and surroundings of the well itself. No traveller, except Mr. Rowlands, has ever reported a visit to 'Ain Qadis, until President Bartlett found a well in that region, which he supposed to be the one seen by Rowlands, although it did not meet the published description of it. 'Ain Kadeirat has never been reported as visited; and its existence has been squarely denied. The question is therefore still an open one:—

Are there three wells, or two; or is there only one in the region of this supposed site of Kadesh?

A scholar so familiar with both the land and the book as Dr. Thompson, says on this subject, in his latest work, "Southern Palestine and Jerusalem:"—

"When I was at Mr Rowlands' Muweilih, I made diligent inquiries about Kadesh; but both our own Arabs and other Bedawin we met in the neighborhood were either absolutely ignorant of such a place, under any possible pronunciation of the name, or they purposely concealed their knowledge of it."

Referring to the "singularly brief and unsatisfactory" description of it already given to the public, Dr. Thompson very naturally adds:—

"One sadly wants a little more information in regard to several points;" "for if 'Ain Qadis be in reality the Kadesh-barnea in the wilderness of Paran, . . . it is one of the most interesting sites in the entire history of the Hebrew wanderings."

In view of this state of the case, I am sure that a report I am now enabled to make of a personal visit to each of the three wells in question will be a matter of interest to all who are familiar with Bible geography.

At about the first of April of this year, while crossing the desert of Kala 'ats Nakhl to Hebron, I determined to satisfy myself concerning the existence and relative position of these wells. Turning eastward from Wadi Jerur, at about latitude 30 degrees 28 minutes north, and longitude 34 degrees 20 minutes east, I went on for three hours, to Jebel el Hawadeh, over which I passed into Wadi Qadis. Following up this Wadi, in a direction a little north of east, for three hours more, I came to the place so glowingly described by Mr. Rowlands, and found it all that he had pictured. It was an oasis unapproached by any I had seen in the desert since leaving Feiran, and not surpassed, within its limits, by that. It was carpeted with grass and flowers. Fig-trees laden with fruit were against its limestone hillsides. Shrubs in richness and variety abounded. Standing out from the mountain range at the northward of the beautiful oasis-amphitheatre, was the "large single mass or small hill of solid rock" which Rowlands looked at as the cliff (sela) smitten by Moses to cause it to "give forth its water" when its flowing had ceased. From beneath this cliff came the abundant stream. A well, walled up with time-worn limestone blocks, was the first receptacle of the water. Not far from this was a second well similarly walled, supplied from the same source. Around both these wells were ancient watering troughs of limestone. Several pools, not walled up, were also supplied from the stream. On from the line of these pools, a gurgling stream flowed musically for several hundred yards and then lost itself in the verdure-covered desert.

The water was clear and sweet and abundant. Two of the pools were ample for bathing. Before the cliff, and around its neighboring wells, camel and goat dung was trodden down as by the accumulations of centuries, showing that the place was much frequented for watering purposes.

Mr. Rowlands was certainly correct as to the name, the general location, and the description of this remarkable place. It is Qadis. There is a Jebel Qadis, a Wadi Qadis and an 'Ain Qadis. It is quite far to the eastward as he put it, fully twelve to fifteen miles east-southeast of his Moilahhi, or 'Ain Muweilih. The Wadi, at the head of which it is situated, is an extensive and fertile plain, larger by far than er Rahah before Jebel Musa, where the children of Israel received the law. Remains of rude stone buildings and other ruins abound in the vicinity, showing that it was once a well-peopled region.

From 'Ain Qadis I went to 'Ain Qadeirat. Coming out of the oasis above described into the main valley of Qadis, and following that westward for twenty minutes, I turned to the northwest, and went over a lofty mountain pass, Nakb Hawa, descending into Wadi Umm 'Ashla (or Hashla) where Sinaitic inscriptions were numerous. In two and a quarter hours after leaving 'Ain Qadis I reached the upper end of Wadi el 'Ain. Going down this, westerly, for half an hour, I came to one of the several branches with which that Wadi is spurred, and turned up this in a northeasterly direction. At the entrance to this branch stands a noteworthy ruin, built of huge blocks of hammered stone laid in courses. It is a rectangular quadrangle, some seventy feet by seventy-five, with double walls about six feet high. Along this branch of Wadi el 'Ain I found vegetation increasing in fullness and beauty. Trees and shrubs and grass were in luxuriance. One tree, called by our Arabs a seyal, but differing from the seyal of the lower desert, surpassed anything I had seen elsewhere. The reach of its branches had a circumference of nearly 250 feet. It had a double trunk, one arm having a girth of six feet, and the other of four and a half. Soon I heard the sound of running water. A channel of forty to sixty feet wide, bordered with flags, was the shallow bed of a running stream. At the head of this was the fountain itself, pouring a rich stream of pure and rich waters out of the hillside, with a fall of about seven feet, into a basin of some twenty feet sweep, and from twelve to fourteen feet deep. It was such a fountain as one would expect to find in the mountains of Lebanon, rather than in the Desert. There is no wonder that the Wadi containing it is called Wadi el 'Ain, the Wadi of the Well. This fountain is the 'Ain Kadeirat, or Qadeirat, mentioned by Rowlands and Robinson, but not before visited by any traveller who has reported his visit.

After finding these two wells I visited, on the day following, the third well named by Rowlands, 'Ain Kasdimeh, or Qasemeh. It is several hours west and south of Qaneirat, and but little more than an hour from Moilahhi, or by 'Ain Muweilih, thought by many to be Hagar's fountain. This place is by no means so noteworthy as either of the other two. It has been visited and described by several travellers. Professor Palmer mentions the place in "The Desert of the Exodus," vol. ii, p. 357. President Bartlett was evidently deceived by the wily Sheikh Suleiman into thinking that this Qasimeh was Qadis, hence his description of it is fuller and more enthusiastic than Professor Palmer's. It is found in "Through Egypt to Palestine," pp. 358-362; and I can vouch for its substantial accuracy, except as to name.

It is therefore now clear that Mr. Rowlands was correct in his reference to the three wells; that he did not confound 'Ain Qadeirat with 'Ain Qadis; that he did find a well bearing the name Qadis, the Arabic equivalent of Kadesh; and that any argument based by Robinson or Espin or their followers on his supposed confusion of names and localities, inevitably falls to the ground. Yet it by no means follows that the site of Kadesh-barnea is settled by this new contribution of facts bearing on that question.

Among the reasons why 'Ain Qadis and 'Ain Qadeirat have not been found before during all these years of discussion over them, it may be said that they are in the territory of the 'Azazimeh Arabs, while the guides of travellers from Nakhl to Gaza or Hebron are of the Tayahah Arabs, who are not on good terms with the 'Azazimeh. Moreover the superstitious fears of the Bedawin make them unwilling to disclose to Christians what they deem the riches of their more sacred wells.

Again, there are comparatively few who travel over this route at all. Peculiar circumstances, which it is not necessary to detail here, enabled me to accomplish my desire of finding the much-disputed wells. In reporting of them now, I hope to call fresh attention to the exceeding desirableness and importance of a careful survey of the Negeb and desert of et Tih, with similar thoroughness to that already secured for Western Palestine and the lower Sinaitic peninsula.

GROUND FOR FUTURE TROUBLE IN EUROPE.

LONDON, Sept. 3.—It is rumored that Russia is engaged in an intrigue to obtain a share in the supervision of the Suez canal, on the ground that it is necessary for her to communicate by that route with her Eastern Asiatic provinces. The Russian scheme is said to be favored by France with the view of checking the growth of English influence.

The Prefect of Constantine, Algeria, announces that sixty-one persons were burned to death in one day in the recent forest fires. Many persons were wounded, and 682 dwellings destroyed. The value of the cattle, grain, and other articles devoured by the flames, is 200,000 francs.

LONDON, Sept. 14.—Russian journals publish terrible details of the diphtheria, the new epidemic in Russia. It is reported from certain communities and parishes that all children under fifteen years old have died. The origin of the attack dates from 1872, when the disease first appeared in Bessarabia. Since then it has spread far and wide over the south of the empire, whence it lately began to make rapid progress toward the east and northeast. In Poltawa, a province of considerably less than 2,000,000 inhabitants, there have been 45,543 cases, 18,765 fatal.

FRANCE AND THE AFRICAN CAMPAIGN.

A cable correspondent says: "As anticipated, the Arab troubles in North Africa have broken out on a large scale. As the elections are nearly over, reinforcements are being sent to Tunis. France, it is now evident, must subdue Tunis inch by inch—a task of from three to four years' duration. When subdued, the country must be held by an enormous military force. The ominous predictions of the English press, which were warmly attacked in Paris at the time of the invasion, are now amply verified. With her hands full in Tunis, France no longer threatens Tripoli, and the supposed jealousy of England is found unnecessary. France burdened herself without inquiring as to British interests, but the force of events is tending toward the absolute supremacy of England in Egypt."

The French Minister of War has ordered the formation of another brigade for Africa. Five are already there. The new brigade is to be 4,000 men strong.

JEWS.

LONDON, Sept. 10.—A hundred and sixteen Russian Jews embarked Saturday at Antwerp, for New York.

BOMBAY, Sept. 10.—Heavy firing was heard in the direction of Candahar from daybreak until noon Saturday.

THE MICHIGAN FIRE.

One of the most appalling disasters that Journalism has been called upon to chronicle for many years, is the late fire in the Saginaw Valley, Michigan, through the agency of which, the towns of Bad Ax, Verona, Port Hope and Huron City have been blotted out of existence, and a large area of country left a blackened wilderness. Comparison cannot be made with the great fires which have swept through cities, from the fact that the loss of human life can not be estimated against the destruction of property. An eye witness estimates the loss of life in Sanilac and Huron counties at, at least, one thousand. It is impossible, at this writing, to get accurate estimates, but it is an occasion for the exercise of practical sympathy, in the expression of which Americans are not found wanting.

GREAT FOREST FIRES IN CALIFORNIA.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 19.—The fire in Marin county is spreading rapidly. It has burned over the Throckmorton ranch of 16,000 acres. The flames today extended up the northern slope of Mount Tamalpais to the summit, where a force of men are trying to prevent the fires going down the seaward side. The town of Sausalito is threatened. The fire extends over Mount Talmapais. There is nothing to stop it till the ocean is reached, a distance of fifteen miles. It is heavily timbered country. But few houses have been destroyed so far. The country is thinly inhabited. At Summit Station, north of the Pacific Coast railroad, the flames jumped a space of half a mile, or else the fire was started by an incendiary, and another large section is endangered. So far some 60,000 acres has been burned over, a large part of which is valuable timber land.

HE IS DEAD—THE LAST BULLETIN.

ELBERON, N. J., Sept. 19, 1:15 p. m.—The following official bulletin has just been issued:—

ELBERON, N. J., Sept. 19, 11:30 p. m.—The President died at 10:35 p. m. After the bulletin was issued at 5:30 this evening, the President continued in much the same condition as during the afternoon, the pulse varying from 102 to 106, with rather increased force and volume. After taking nourishment he fell into a quiet sleep. About thirty-five minutes before his death, and while asleep, his pulse rose to 120, and was somewhat more feeble. At ten minutes after 10 o'clock he awoke, complaining of severe pain over the region of the heart, and almost immediately became unconscious, and ceased to breathe at 10:35.

D. W. BLISS,
FRANK H. HAMILTON,
D. HAYES AGNEW.

NEW YORK, Sept. 19.—A Telegram extra says:

At the President's bedside, holding his poor, emaciated hand in her own, and watching with anguish unutterable the fast vanishing sands of life, sat the faithful, devoted wife, during the closing hours of the president's career.

Around him were other weeping friends, and physicians, lamenting their powerlessness in the presence of the dark angel of death.

Toward the last the mind of the sufferer wandered. He was once more back in Mentor, and those scenes where the happiest hours of his life were spent. He sat in the dear old homestead again, with the loved ones around him; the aged mother so proud of her big boy, the faithful wife, and the beloved children. It was a blissful dream that robbed death of its terrors, and rendered the dying man for a moment unconscious of the cruel rending of his once vigorous frame that was constantly going on.

The moan of the restless ocean mingled with sobs of the loved ones as the lamp of life flickered and went out forever.

Nearly every one around the president clung to hope to the last, and refused to believe the approach of death until the shadow deepened and the destroyer's presence could be no longer unfelt.

The flags hang at half mast from every house on Ocean avenue, and the gayety at this favorite watering-place is followed by deepest gloom.

The struggle is over, and death is victor.

THE DEATH BED.—GARFIELD'S LAST WORDS.

LONG BRANCH, Sept. 19, 1 a. m.—Previous to his death the only words spoken by the president were that he had a severe pain in his heart. It is supposed that death came from a clot of blood forming in the heart. Dr. Bliss was the first one notified of the president's expression of pain, and entering the room, he at once saw the end was near. The members of the family were immediately summoned to the bedside. All arrived, and perfect quiet prevailed.

Mrs. Garfield bore the trying ordeal with fortitude. She gave way to no paroxysms of grief, and when death became evident, she quietly withdrew to her own room. There she sat, a heart-stricken widow, full of grief, but with too much courage to exhibit it to those about her. She was laboring under a terrible strain, and, despite her efforts, tears flowed from her eyes.

Miss Mollie was greatly affected, and bursts of tears flowed, spite of her noble effort to follow the example of her mother.

The death scene was one never to be forgotten. Perfect quiet prevailed, not a murmur was heard while he was sinking.

After death had been pronounced the body was properly arranged by Dr. Boynton. Telegrams were immediately sent to the President's mother, in Ohio, and to the sons Harry and James, at Williams College, as also to Vice-President Arthur, and other prominent public men. Mr. Morris, the undertaker of the village, will be in charge of the remains. Eugene Britton, Coroner of Mammoth county, will hold an inquest over the body of the late President. He has as yet made no arrangement for the inquest, and, as far as can be ascertained, has not been notified of the President's death.

A PECULIAR RELIGIOUS SECT.

The Brethren or German Baptists have just held their annual national conference at Ashland, Ohio. They originated in this country in 1709, when Alexander Mack and seven or eight followers, fleeing from persecution in Schwartzenau, Germany, established themselves at Germantown, Pa. Now they number from 70,000 to 100,000, and are found in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Virginia, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and some other Western States. They accept the New Testament in the fullest sense of the term, as the only proper rule of faith and practice, and hold to the observance of all its commandments and doctrines. They baptize by dipping the candidate three times forward, a dip for each of the Trinity—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The Lord's Supper is a full meal, consisting mostly of beef, bread, and soup, and is eaten about twilight. Before the supper a literal washing of the saints' feet takes place, each sex washing their own feet. After the supper the communion is administered by several elders, and this exercise concludes what is known as their biennial love-feast.

In early years the Brethren opposed Sunday schools, missions, and education, the latter being regarded as a means of leading the young into vain and frivolous pursuits, and as productive of pride. Now the church supports colleges at Huntingdon, Pa., Ashland, Ohio, and Mt. Morris, Ill., numerous Sunday schools and missions, home and foreign, and six periodicals. While formerly exclusively a farming people, the Brethren are gradually entering business circles and the professions, except law, which is forbidden, the terms "lawyer" and "Christian" being considered antagonistic. Members are not allowed to accept civil offices, and excommunication follows transgression of this law. Simplicity of dress is required, and the fashions are not followed. With all their peculiarities, however, the German Baptists are wealthy, benevolent, whole-souled, and honest.

The only amaranth flower on earth is virtue; the only lasting treasure, truth.—Cowper.

Holiness is not the way to Christ, but Christ is the way to holiness.—Toplady.

Have you learned to know you are ignorant? This is God's way of making wise; he bids you ask wisdom, and promises to give.

You are always welcome to call upon God; over the throne of grace is written, "Behold, now is the accepted time."

When one that holds communion with the skies
Has filled his urn where these pure waters rise,
And once more mingles with us meaner things,
'Tis e'en as if an angel shook his wings;
Immortal fragrance fills the circuit wide,
That tells us whence these treasures are supplied.

—William Cowper.

Cloudy days are many; bright days are few; we must catch each ray of sunlight as it comes. In the east clouds gather, and as they roll they hide the distant shores from our sight. The cloud that hides our future never lifts—blessed shadow! Who could wish to see one step along the way? An Unseen Hand will guide us safely to the other side if we take firm hold and cast our care on Him. Better to lean than to labor; better to trust than to do.

THE CROSS OF CHRIST.

The cross of Christ is divided throughout the world. To each his portion comes. Thou, therefore, O my soul, cast not thy portion from thee, but rather take it to thee as thy most precious relic, and lay it up, not in gold and silver shrine, but in golden heart—a heart clothed with gentle charity, with patience and suffering submission.—Luther.

A little loving thought,
Dropped by a bleak wayside,
May comfort one who hath
No hope not help beside;
The lore hath hidden life,
And springeth manifold:
And richer he who finds
Than if the gift were gold.

A little faithful word
From a believing heart,
May come like blessed sun
When black clouds fall apart—
A word of that near world
That seems so far away;
Of Him whose tender love
Is constant as the day.

Nothing of character is really permanent but virtue and personal worth. There remain. Whatever of excellence is wrought into the soul itself belongs to both worlds. Real goodness does not attach itself merely to this life; it points to another world. Political or professional reputation cannot last forever; but a conscience void of offence before God and man, is an inheritance for eternity. Religion, therefore, is a necessary and indispensable element in any great human character. There is no living without it. Religion is the tie that connects man with his Creator, and holds him to his throne. If that tie be all sundered, all broken, he floats away, a worthless atom in the universe; its proper attractions all gone, its destiny thwarted, and its whole future nothing but darkness, desolation, and death. A man with no sense of religious duty is he whom the Scriptures describe, in such terse but terrific language, as living "without God in the world." Such a man is out of his place, out of the circle of all his duties, out of the circle of all his happiness, and away, far, far away, from the purposes of his creation.—Daniel Webster.

Ancient Nazareth is now the site of an orphanage, under the supervision of the Education Society of Scotland. It has been open four years, and there are in it thirty-six girls. Whether of Greek or Latin, Moslem or Jewish parentage, they are all taught the knowledge and worship of the true God and of Jesus Christ. They have a beautiful home, built by the generosity of English travellers.—The Boston Traveller.

MEMORY.

JAS. A. GARFIELD.

This little poem, from the pen of our beloved President, was written before his first term in Congress—a time some twenty years ago. At that time possibly the Presidency of a Christian college was the "summit where the sunbeams fell," but the last lines are all but a prophecy. Please give the whole to your readers.

W. K. ARNOLD,
Campbell St. Christian Church, Louisville, Ky.

The beauteous night: the stars look brightly down
Upon the earth, decked in her robe of snow.
No light gleams at the window, save my own,
Which gives its cheer to midnight and to me.
And now, with memories rich, sweet memory comes
And leads me gently through her twilight realms.
Who sweet's tuneful lyre has ever sung,
Or chisele pencil ever portrayed,
The enchanted, shadowy land where memory dwells?
It has its valleys cheerless, lone, and dreary,
Dark shaded by the mournful cypress trees;
And yet its sunlit mountain-tops are bathed
In Lebanon's own bliss. Upon its craggy cliffs,
Robed in the dreamy light of distant years,
Are clustered joys serene of other days.
Upon its gentle, sloping hillside bend
The weeping willows o'er the sacred dust
Of dear departed ones; and yet in that land,
Wherever our foot-steps fall upon the shore,
They that were sleeping rise from out the dust
Of death's long, silent years, and stand
As erst they did before the pet-on-tomb
Here lived the lovely clay whilst its voiceless halls.
The heavens that bend above that land are hung
With clouds of various hues. Some, dark and chill,
Surcharged with sorrow, cast their somber shade
Upon the sunny, joyous land below.
Others are floating through the dreamy air,
White as the falling snow, their margins tinged
With gold and crimson hues; their shadows fall
Upon the flowery meads and sunny slopes,
Soft as the shadow of an angel's wing.
When the rough battle of the day is done,
And Evening's peace falls gently on the heart,
I bound away, across the misty years,
Unto the almost verge of memory's land,
Where earth and sky in dreamy distance meet,
And memory dies with dark oblivion joins,
Where woke the first remembered sounds that fell
Upon the ear in childhood's early morn:
And, wandering there along the rolling years,
I see the shadow of my former self
Gliding from childhood up to man's estate.
The path of youth winds down through many a vale,
And on the brink of many a dread abyss,
From out whose darkness comes no ray of light,
Save that a phantom dances o'er the gulf
And beckons toward the verge. Again the path
Leads o'er the summit where the sunbeams fall;
And thus in light and shade, sunshine and gloom,
Sorrow and joy, this life-path leads along.

Report of Conference.

Pursuant to notice, the Annual Conference of the Churches of God in Northern Indiana, convened at Argos, Marshall County, on Thursday, Sept. 8, 1881, at 7:30 p. m.

In view of the small amount of business to be brought before the Conference, it was thought not best to organize until 2:30 p. m. on Saturday, which was accordingly done by choosing D. T. Halstead Chairman, and the writer Secretary.

The question being raised as to the financial condition of THE RESTITUTION, whether it was self-sustaining by its present subscription list, and it being ascertained that it was not in such condition, after a little discussion a committee was appointed by the Chairman, composed of brethren Dr. Leland I. G. Roberts, and Wm. Railsback, to consider and perfect a plan for raising funds to aid in rendering the paper self-sustaining.

What is meant by this is that it shall pay all expenses of publication including a reasonable and just compensation to the Editor for his labors, which labors he has been performing heretofore for a very meagre salary—but willingly of course.

The friends of our good RESTITUTION should do all in their power to increase the usefulness and strengthen the voice of this most efficient preacher of the truth. It reaches many who could not be reached by the living voice, while at the same time it strengthens and comforts and instructs the household of faith through many a long interval between sermons from the living proclaimer, especially among the poor and isolated.

The question of raising an Evangelist Fund for special cases came up; cases where a person or persons having come to a knowledge of the gospel desire to be immersed into the saving name but have not the means to pay the expenses of some suitable man living nearest but not a long distance from them, to visit and aid them in putting on Christ.

To this end it was voted that such a fund be raised, and that the Editor of THE RESTITUTION be treasurer, to receive and disburse said fund.

It was also voted that public proclaimers of the word be supplied with letters of recommendation by the Conference.

A committee appointed for the purpose decided that the Third Quarterly Conference be held at Rensselaer, Jasper county, commencing on Thursday, before the first Sunday in Nov. 1881, notice whereof will be given in THE RESTITUTION.

The meetings though not so well attended at the first as the brethren wished, improved in this respect as it progressed, the last being fully up to their expectations in point of numbers, both of believers and of citizens of the town and vicinity.

Each meeting was a feast, and the last a great feast, being an occasion of rejoicing as the right hand of fellowship was extended to four persons who were immersed during the meetings, among whom was T. W. Drennen, formerly of the German Baptist Church, who, it is known to many readers of THE RESTITUTION, debated with Bro. Fenimore at Argos last April, on two propositions—trine immersion and future punishment.

Bro. Drennen made a public statement before the Conference of his change of faith and the reasons therefor. We regard him as a valuable accession to our ranks, possessing as he does more than ordinary ability as a speaker.

One person was baptized on Monday—five in all.

In addition to sermons from different speakers social meetings were held in which many spoke and exhorted in a way to make them profitable and happy seasons, long to be remembered by the dear children of God.

Thanks to our Heavenly Father for these interviews till we meet in the great day, with the "general assembly and church of the first borns."

JOHN L. WINGE,
Secretary.

The Wisconsin Meeting.

The meeting which was advertised in THE RESTITUTION convened in Greenfield, Sept. 6–11. Quite a number from different parts of the State were present, and we trust that we have made a good beginning in the way of effective co-operation.

A committee was appointed to devise a system of rules by which the brethren should be governed in their efforts to promote the gospel of the kingdom. The committee made the following report which was unanimously adopted.

In view of the scattered condition of our cause in this state, and believing that more effective work can be done by co-operation, your committee would recommend the following statement as a basis of action.

We hereby agree to unite ourselves as believers of the gospel, under the name of "The Wisconsin Millennarian Association.

Believing it to be the duty of all who hold to the personal coming and reign of Christ and that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation and an embodiment of his purposes toward the race, as revealed to us in the Scriptures; and we further believe that we should consecrate our time our means and our ability so far as is consistent with our profession as Christians to promote a knowledge of these truths among the people.

In order to effectually carry out the above object, we would recommend the appointment of a Mission Committee, who shall have charge of the business affairs of the Association—to collect funds, employ proper persons to proclaim the gospel among the people, buy books and tracts, and do all things necessary to advance the interests of the Association. Said committee shall report to the Association the amounts received and disbursed during the year, and shall make such report at the time and place of the Association's annual meeting.

The Association shall elect a President and Secretary, and such other officers as may be necessary for the faithful discharge of the business of the Association.

The above having been adopted, the Association elected Wm. B. Putnam as President, and Geo. E. Hanchett as Secretary. A committee was also elected as follows: Geo. C. Prescott, E. E. Feloh, and S. P. Jaynes. The latter was appointed treasurer of the committee.

Having now entered upon our mission of co-operation, we trust that much good will be done and that the cause in our state may appear with new life and be a means of helping many to the crown of life.

WM. B. PUTNAM, Pres.
GEO. E. HANCHETT, Sec.
Greenfield, Wis., Sept. 18, 1881.

HEIRS TOGETHER OF THE GRACE OF LIFE.

S. ROXANA WINOR.

What a blessed union and how much in accordance with God's plan and purpose! Where husband and wife have the "like precious faith" how helpful they may be to each other. Neither being hindered by the indifference or wrong doing of the other. It is not in vain that we serve the Lord, keeping his commandments in all things. His blessing is sure to attend. There is a steadiness of purpose, a joy in working, in the married pair who work together for God, that cannot be felt by him or her who is joined to an unbeliever.

I felt this joy the other day, when the text came into my mind. "The grace of life"—eternal life, will be ours, together, in the great and final day. There will be no sad parting there, with the one whom I have loved, amid the tears and sorrows of the present time.

We love God together here, we serve him together here, we shall enter upon the joys of the kingdom together in the great beyond.

Strive to win the unbelieving ones to God, that there be no sad separation in the coming of the day of God.

MENDON, Mich., Sept. 11.

Editor Restitution:

The little Church in Mendon have just invited those of like precious faith in this State to hold their Quarterly Conference with us. We have done so, not with the hope that however interesting and profitable to ourselves, we shall be able to interest outsiders in the faith, as we fear they can never again be thus interested.

But our numbers are few, we are very seldom visited by any one from abroad, and we find it difficult to maintain that standard of interest among ourselves that is necessary to living advancement in the faith.

Hence we invite our brethren and sisters to meet with us that by conversation, exhortation, and by mingling in acts of devotion, and in the study of the word, we may be quickened in our faith and hope, and aroused to more active zeal in the service of our Lord and Master.

Now brethren and sisters, come. Come all that can do so. Come with your hearts warm with the love of the Lord and his appearing. Let all that can come whether of this state or further away. Let us forget for the time the every-day duties of life, having provided for them at home. Come prepared for a feast of fat things in anticipation of that soon to be made for Israel on Mount Zion.

Don't fear to burden us. Some of us we think, will find a relief in doing a little extra, with cheerful surroundings, instead of a daily routine with no associations to make the burden seem light.

May God prosper our assembling together, and our own labor of love one for the other.

Those coming on the train from any direction, will reach here on the Grand Rapids & Indiana railroad, and get off at Mendon, where they will be met and conveyed to the meeting.

WINCHESTER, Va., Sept. 8.

Editor Restitution:

Will you please say in THE RESTITUTION, as Brother N. J. Morgan, of Winchester, Va., contemplates a tour through Kentucky and Tennessee some time this fall, he would like to have the addresses of some of the little bodies in both states, especially in middle Tennessee that brethren Hall and Hunt have recently united with, as that is the home of his youth, and it would afford him great pleasure to meet them, while there on a visit to his brother in the flesh. He will also stop, going or coming, with other churches of the Abrahamic faith and hope.

Brethren can address him as follows:

N. J. MORGAN,
Winchester, Va.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Church of God, will, the Lord willing, commence on Friday, Oct. 7, near Browntown, Warren Co., Va., and continue over the second Sunday. All who cherish the glorious doctrine of the soon coming kingdom of God, and name of Jesus Christ, and the people generally, are respectfully invited to attend. Come brethren, one and all; and let us have another demonstration of the power of God, which is the gospel of God, by letting our light so shine before men as to constrain them to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

N. J. MORGAN.

Principles are very important, but they need to be adorned with grace to render them attractive.

THE MUMMIES.

We are enabled this week to furnish our readers with some additional information regarding the wonderful discoveries lately made in Egypt. How surprising is the fact that the Pharaoh who oppressed Israel has been kept in so perfect a state of preservation to our own times. Rameses II. reigned over Egypt about sixty-eight years. It is said that he had two wives, twenty-three sons, and seven daughters. He was the greatest builder among the Pharaohs. He was also famous as a great warrior. Being a cruel tyrant he built his great monuments by the forced labor of prisoners of war, and by oppressing those who had become his subjects by settling in his land. Among these were the Hebrews, who had become numerous, and whose increase he sought to check by dooming all the male children to death. It may be that facts of importance will be discovered when the papyra are deciphered:

The Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY IN EGYPT.

The interest of archæologists and Bible students has been excited by the discovery of a large number of mummies and a vast store of relics of antiquity in a cave in the mountains near the Temple of Deir-el Bahari, about four miles from the Nile to the east of Thebes. The number of mummies in twenty-nine, and they are all of royal and priestly personages who lived between the time of Abraham and the time of Solomon.

The identity of twenty-six of the bodies has been ascertained beyond dispute by the inscriptions upon the mummy-cases, and there is not a doubt that the very Pharaoh who reduced the Israelites to bondage, and whose daughter drew Moses out of the river, is now lying in the Boulak Museum near Cairo, where the curiosities have been removed. As that king is not designated in the book of Exodus otherwise than by the general name of Pharaoh, students of ancient Egyptian history have been obliged to rely upon collateral evidence to establish his full name and dynasty. He is considered to have been Rameses II., the third king of the nineteenth dynasty, and it is the mummy of this king that has now been found. The following is the description of it:—

"The mummy is in a perfect state of preservation, but of the three mummy-cases in which it once probably reposed, only one remains. This mummy-case is of plain sycamore wood, unpainted and unvarnished. It is carved to represent Rameses in the position of Osiris. The crossed arms rest upon the breast. In the right hand is the royal whip, and in the left is the royal hook. The features are most beautifully and delicately carved, and are surmounted by the crown of Upper and Lower Egypt, with the uræus serpent. The mummy-case is a most graceful and animated specimen of sculpture, displaying, in all its purity, the firm and flowing lines of the period of the Egyptian Renaissance.

"The nomen and prænomen cartouches of Ramses are written in plain black characters upon the mummy-case, which bears no other text or representations whatever, and its beautiful simplicity contrasts strangely with the pompous and exaggerated dedications of almost all other inscriptions which mention the name of Ramses the Great. The mummy itself is wrapped in rose-colored and yellow linen of a texture finer than the finest Indian muslin, upon which lotos flowers are strown. One of the bands which pass across the shrouds to keep them in place bears a hieratic inscription stating that this, the mummy of Ramses II., was concealed in a pit at a time when a foreign army invaded Egypt."

The cases of the other mummies present considerable variety in their carving and coloring, all being distinguished by the most costly and tasteful style of ornamentation. Several of the mumies are queens and princesses of ancient dynasties that reigned in Egypt.

Besides these human remains there were discovered in the cave the following curiosities:—

A magnificent tent made of pieces of leather of different colors and bearing the cartouche, or inscribed tablet, of King Pinotem I., with the royal vulture and stars in red, yellow, and green. Fifteen enormous wigs which were worn upon occasions of ceremony. These wigs are about two feet high, and are made of curled hair or wool falling in braids behind the back. Three thousand seven hundred small porcelain funeral statuettes, each bearing cartouches and inscriptions. Nearly two thousand other objects, such as drinking cups, baskets, vases, lamps, urns, chairs, dried fruits, boxes, etc.

There are also four papyri, or rolls of ancient Egyptian paper, covered with hieroglyphic writing, which may prove to be the most valuable part of the discovery. It is possible that they will throw light upon the history of Genesis and Exodus by confirming the sacred narrative of Israel's captivity in Egypt; or they may furnish new evidence that the highest civilization of the world was in times which it is customary to call primative, and that the savage state was not the original state of man, but that it represents a deterioration from the remarkable race of men whose achievements are chronicled in the tenth chapter of Genesis.

But whether the papyri turn out to be important or not, this discovery of the mortal remains of the grandest monarchs of Egypt in the time of its glory, of whom it was thought that all traces except the stone-inscriptions had gone from the earth, is not the least of the striking occurrences of 1881.

The discovery was brought about in a simple way. One of the Turkish provincial governors of Egypt noticed in the early part of the summer that the sale of relics to foreign tourists was brisker than usual, so he arrested several of the Bedaweens, and by means which are familiar to Oriental justice extorted from them the information that they had recently pitched upon a cave which contained the treasure. The governor had the intelligence to telegraph the news to the Khedive, and he at once directed Herr Emil Brugsch, of the Boulak Museum, to go the place and take charge of what the cave contained.

The manner in which the relics came to be in the cave is explained by inscriptions in the mummy-cases which record the fact that the priests removed the most precious of the mummies in their charge to the cave for security when Cambyses invaded and conquered Egypt in the year 520 B. C. The mummies were at least a thousand years old at that time, and they have remained concealed in the cave 2400 years.

JEWISH PERSECUTIONS.

At the last annual meeting of the Manchester branch of the Anglo-Jewish Association, the chairman made the significant statement that "in Morocco, under the present barbarous Government, frequent atrocities had been committed upon Israelites, no less than 207 distinct massacres having been perpetrated during the last seventeen years, and 1269 widows and orphans left desolate."

The Jewish World has published details, by a reliable correspondent who has visited the Kiev district, of the recent shameful outrages upon the Jews there. That paper thus comments on his reports:

"All the horrors and enormities that we have been accustomed to associate with the sack of a town stormed in hot blood in the cruellest period of the middle ages, seem here to have been instigated and permitted in a chief town of Russia in the nineteenth century.

The Bulgarian atrocities, which so justly excited the indignation of all civilized persons in Western Europe, had at least the excuse that they formed an episode in a period of insurrection and war, when political feeling was worked up almost to a state of madness. These Russian atrocities are absolutely sui generis. They were deliberately got up in a time of peace against free traders and order loving citizens by persons legally and morally responsible for their protection, and who, up till that time, were ostensibly friendly next-door neighbors; and they were marked by such elements of meanness and fraudulent craft that we hardly know whether to consider their originators more in the light of despicable swindlers or murderous brigands.

It is to be noted that Jews pay a special and very heavy tax for the privilege of residing in Kiev, besides being subject to those innumerable fees and douceurs which, under one pretence or another, the Russian officials are so well skilled in exacting.

This is a point of view to which we claim the notice of the British public in general, and the press of all civilised countries. We plainly and publicly impeach the Russian official class as directly responsible for the enormities at Kiev."

The German authorities have at last been showing some energy in repressing the Anti-Judaic crusade which has so long been disgracing the Empire. This is said to be due to the influence of the Crown Prince, who from the first has discountenanced the persecuting movement.

PALESTINE EXPLORATION.

The July number of the Society's Quarterly Statement, which has been sent to all the members of the Society, contains full particulars of the very remarkable discoveries which have been made in the last few months.

First in interest, perhaps, comes Prof. Sayce's commentary on the newly-found inscription at the Pool of Siloam. A text which dates (if the learned Professor is correct) from the time of Solomon, is indeed a rare monument.

There is, next a discovery made by Lieut. Conder, which may prove of even greater interest. He has found, close to the spot where he places the site of the Crucifixion, which is still called the Place of Stoning, a Jewish tomb of Herodian period, standing alone, cut in the rock.

"Can this be," he asks, "the new Sepulchre in the Garden?"

A drawing and plan of the tomb have been made for the Society.

Another drawing has been made of the rest mouth of Jacob's Well, recently uncovered by the Rev. C. L. Bardsley. The well mouth is much worn by the friction of ropes. It was formerly covered over by a Christian Church, and if, as is possible, this church dates back to the second or third century, the stone should be no other than the very stone on which our Lord conversed with the woman of Samaria.

Another discovery, only indirectly connected with the Bible, is that of the ancient Hittite City of Kadesh on the Orontes. Not the least surprising things about this are the facts that Lieut. Conder found it from an Egyptian record written 3000 years ago, and that the old name, though it has disappeared from history since the 13th century before Christ, is still attached to it.

Another paper in the same number of the Journal, clears up a curious story attached to Ain Gedis, the probable site of Kadesh Barnea. It was visited and described in glowing terms, by Mr. Rowland, forty years ago. No one has since been able to reconcile his statements with those of other travellers. Mr. Trumbull, of Philadelphia, has now, however, discovered that no other travellers have seen the real fountain since Rowland, having all been taken to another spring ten miles distant from the real Ain Gadis.

It is a most remarkable spring—it issues a full-grown stream from the rock; it forms an oasis in which there is abundance of grass, with great trees, even in the arid desert of the Tih; it runs away and loses itself in the sand. The place may or may not be Kadesh Barnea, but those who believe that it is will henceforth read the history of the events which took place there with far greater interest and fuller understanding. At all events, it is quite clear that there is plenty of water, and to spare, even for the large numbers who are said to have encamped at Kadesh.

ECLECTIC HYMN BOOK.

Its Arrangement.

G. M. MYERS.

Many of our brethren have long desired a more extensive and systematic collection of hymns on the subjects of Baptism, Communion, Resurrection, and Funeral. A presentation of the arrangements of our little book will at once be commendable upon these points.

We have arranged with a collection upon the following points:

	No. of pieces.
1. Proclamation of the Gospel	14
2. Invitational Hymns	32
3. Baptismal	9
4. Social { 1. Praise	12
{ 2. Prayer	14
{ 3. Reliance	20
5. Watching, Waiting, Hoping	62
6. Resurrection	12
7. Communion	12
8. Funeral	12

Boston Herald.

There is much in the manner in which the season of 1881 has opened to justify the gloomy vaticinations of astrologers. For, in spite of the tendency to consider each succeeding season an exception to all that have preceded it, no one can deny that the present is indeed really an exceptional year. The great snow-storms, unexampled here or in Europe, the cold and backward spring, the terrible floods that devastated the West, and now the frightful tornadoes sweeping through Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri and Iowa, all make up a record of elemental ravage that finds no parallel in recent experience.

Brevities.

The Comte d'Horisson, who has been on a Government mission from France to Tunis, to explore the ruins of Carthage, has unearthed a large number of curious objects and inscriptions relating to the history of the Punic city.

A great number of the exiled Russian Hebrews are to emigrate to this country. Over five hundred are expected to arrive at New York within the next two or three months.

THE POLAR NIGHT.

It is a mistake to suppose that the Arctic winter, in the higher latitudes, is a long dreary one of opaque darkness. The highest latitude yet reached by man is 83 degrees, 20 minutes, and 20 seconds, and there twilight lasts four hours and forty-two minutes on December 22, the shortest day of the Northern year. Man will have to go some 327 miles further north than he has yet gone if he is to reach the region of absolute darkness. The pole itself is in the dark out seventy-seven days—from November 13 to January 29. There is a period of about four days in the year during which the sun shines on both poles at the same time. This is due to the fact that the sun is larger than the earth, and that his rays are bent by the earth's atmosphere in such a way as to converge upon his surface.

THE DEAD SEA.

Rev. T. L. Cuyler, D. D., writing of the Dead Sea to the New York Evangelist, says: "That much maligned sea has a weird and wonderful beauty. We took a bath in its cool, clear waters, and detected no difference from a bath at Coney Island, except that the water has such density that we floated on it like pine shingles. No fish from the salt ocean can live in it; but it is very attractive to the eye on a hot noonday. A scorching ride we had across the barren plain to the sacred Jordan, which disappointed me sadly. At the places where the Israelites crossed and our Lord was baptized, it is about one hundred and twenty feet wide; it flows rapidly in a turbid current of light stone color. In size and appearance it is the perfect counterpart of the Muskingum a few miles above Zanesville. Its useless waters ought to be turned off to irrigate its barren valley, which might be changed into a garden. For beauty the Jordan will not compare with Elijah's Brook Chorith, whose right, sparkling stream went flowing past our lodging place at Jericho. We lodged over night in a Greek convent (very small) and rode next morning to see the ruins of the town made famous by Joshua, Elijah, Zaccheus and the restoration of Bartimeus to sight. Squalid Arabs haunt the sacred spot."

INTERESTING DISCOVERY OF ANCIENT REMAINS.

The special Rome correspondent of the Pilot says: "An important archæological discovery has recently been made between the towns of Capaci and Carini, in Sicily. This consists of a very singular necropolis, or sepulchre, having the form of a vase, excavated in the rock. Every indication leads archæologists to the conclusion that it is a pre-historic necropolis. In the part opened at present no object in metal has been found, and the vases discovered in it appear to have been formed by human hands without the employment of any other instrument. In the parco, near Palermo, in a circular space on the side of a hill, and surrounded by a natural cornice or barrier of rock, a small sepulchre has been discovered. Its importance consists in the form of the graves, and the arrangement of the remains found it. From these it has been deduced that a village, of which no record remains, existed here towards the end of the Pagan period, and the discovery is thought to have a certain value for students of the period immediately preceding the Christianizing of the Roman Empire. It is also valuable in a topographical point of view."

Poetry.

From the German.

IN A GRAVEYARD.

"Here rests in God." 'Tis all we read;
The mold'ring stone reveals no more.
"In God." Of other words what need?
These span the broad, eternal shore.

O'ershaden with its starry blooms,
A jasmine bush conceals the mound,
Neglected in the place of tombs,
With spicy, golden sweetness crowned.

And deep within its leafy breast
Some tuneful bird has sought a home,
The tiny brood within the nest
Fearless and free to go and come.

A holy quietude is here,
Save where the happy bird's gay song
Breaks through the stillness pure and clear,
And echoes the dark firs among.

Sleep on, sleep on, thou peaceless heart,
Where jasmine stars drop golden rain,
From every troubled thought apart,
Forgotten every earthly pain.

Sleep on; thy long repose is sweet,
Tender and cool the grassy sod,
O traveler stay thy hurrying feet;
Step softly here—"he rests in God."

"THE MINISTER USES TOBACCO."

A. J. EYCHANER.

In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works.—Paul.

The use of tobacco is either right or else it is wrong. There is no middle ground. We cannot serve God and Mammon. If it is right, it should be commended and encouraged. There should be a premium offered to those who would voluntarily become a slave to the habit. The minister should preach in its favor, should tell its virtues, dwell long and earnestly upon the wreaths of its smoke and the puddles of its spit. He should persuade those to whom its smoke is nauseating that they should bear it with patience. He should tell that poor woman to whose daily toil is added the disgusting and sickening task of cleaning the spittoon—that vessel containing the quintessence of filth and nastiness—that she must endure it because it is right. He should teach the young men and boys both by precept and example how to smoke and chew and spit; and because tobacco is the one thing eminently proper for everybody to use show how it is adapted to the ends of order, comfort, taste, refinement, beauty, and morality of mankind. He should take a comprehensive view of the matter and demonstrate its power for good in moulding the destiny of nations. How it leads away from vice, aims at self-denial, improves personal appearance and makes individuals and nations wiser and better. And the minister who uses tobacco is not only doing right, but he is setting a proper example for the young men to follow. Because he is a pattern they should look up to him and do as he does. But if the use of tobacco is wrong, what can we say for the minister who uses it?

What excuse can he offer for himself?

Is he a pattern of good works, as Paul says he should be?

Is he setting an example in all things which if followed will lead men and boys into the good way?

"I would invite the minister to our home," said a lady, "but I cannot. He uses tobacco; and his clothes are so offensive to me from tobacco smoke that I cannot bear to sit near him. Besides I have two boys whom I have been trying to teach that the use of tobacco and whisky is an evil, and I fear for them lest his example should prove their ruin."

Here we have it in plain English. I want to say to you, my brother, that people are not going to tell you your faults to your face. They do not want to wound your feelings. They are too modest to do so: but if you find you are shunned—that they do not receive you with a warm heart and an open hand, you ought to have sense enough to suspect that the trouble is with yourself. You have some habit or manner that makes you offensive to their finer feelings. The sympathetic chord cannot be touched by words alone but its harmonious vibrations bring out the sweetest response under the influence of those actions which accord with your words.

That minister who preaches self-denial must deny self.

Would he have friends?

He must show himself friendly.

Would he win men from the filthiness of the flesh?

Then he must be cleanly in his habits.

If you receive persecution don't rejoice until you are sure that it is for righteousness sake. If it is on account of some filthy habit, such as chewing or smoking, then you deserve reproach and are entitled to no credit. Let me give you an example.

I once subscribed toward paying the minister for preaching. I labored upon a farm. I worked early and late, and by economy and self-denial was able to give something to the poor and at the close of the year to pay the above named subscription.

One Saturday having just paid the minister the amount of my subscription, I was in town and passing a tobacco store, or a store where tobacco and cigars were kept, I saw our minister inside. To my surprise and mortification I saw him purchase two boxes of choice cigars, and for which he paid the exact amount of my subscription—perhaps the very note that had just passed from my hard earnings—the product of my self-denial. To say that I was shocked is too mild. I was indignant. I thought that I was contributing to the support of the gospel, but my money had been used to support an expensive habit—used to gratify self, and the indulgence of an abnormal appetite.

After a few days of sober thought I came to the conclusion that I would never support other men's vices by my influence or contribution. Such an act—such gratification of self on the part of any minister sets aside years of preaching on virtue and self-denial and when he is reading to me from Holy Writ—"Be thou an example of the believers in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity," or, "in all things showing thyself a pattern of good works"—I am thinking how his actions belie his tongue. I am thinking how not only my subscription but perhaps ten times the amount in one year "shall consume, into smoke shall it pass away."

And all for what?

That any one may be made wiser and better?

That the poor may be fed and the destitute cared for?

That the glad tidings of salvation may reach poor sinners?

None of these. But that the desire of the flesh may be gratified.

What can we say in defense of that minister—that preacher of right-doing—that advocate of self-denial, who would thus bring reproach upon the cause of Christ and upon his own life?

The most contemptible things the Jews could do to our Savior was to spit on him: but I would rather a hundred times you would spit in my face, than to have you blow your poison, stinking tobacco smoke upon the air which I must breathe into my lungs. I can wipe off the spit and no harm is done (unless it is tobacco spit), but the smoke will enter my lungs and carry its poison into my system and may lead to fatal diseases. And to my brethren who are not ministers I want to say:—

Would it not be better if you stop the habit of smoking and chewing and spitting?

Would you not feel that you were more free and more like gentlemen and Christians; and that you were more respected and loved by the pure and good of your fellow mortals?

Come. Let us be clean men, and save the proceeds of the time and money spent in smoking and give it to the poor. He who gives it to the poor lends to the Lord; but he who gratifies self by the use of tobacco is sowing tares for the devil—is sowing to the flesh and will reap corruption.

You say this is a strong letter. Well, what "I have written I have written." Let it stand; and if it hurts some of you preachers who chew and smoke I am glad of it, and hope it may lead you to think how disgusting you appear in the eyes of clean, sensible people. Remembering that you are a pattern in all things let your actions speak for you.

Yours for the truth.

[We have received a number of communications on tobacco. We give place to this. We never used the weed in any form. Some of our brethren have given up the pernicious habit. We hope all will before the Lord comes. Let ministers of the word especially be careful.—Ep.]

THE DELETERIOUS NATURE AND EFFECTS OF BIGOTRY.

M. I. LEWIS.

The word bigotry, originally signified simply hypocrisy, but as it is now used, signifies not only that, but is now used in a more extended sense, viz., a blind zeal for a party, sect or creed,—a narrow minded superstition, and exclusiveness. Intolerance inheres in it, and it very early cropped out, and culminated in the murder of righteous Abel, by his brother, Cain.

The history of our race is replete with persecutions, and in too many instances, the barbarities of which would far exceed even the Indian massacres.

All the persecutions for opinion's sake may be justly chargable to blind bigotry, and this grows and flourishes by what it feeds upon, viz., ignorance.

Man is a religious being, the term religion signifies any system of worship or faith. It is inherent, he cannot, if he would, be disassociated from it, as part and parcel of his very nature, and the main spring of all his actions, "pure and undefiled religion" or Christianity, and is the only one which is acceptable with Jehovah. But pure and undefiled, are qualities which presupposes its opposite qualities also inhere in religion.

The religion which the apostle Paul possessed (the Jew's religion) previous to his conversion to Christianity, was one that prompted him to persecute the Christians with a zeal worthy of a better cause; hence, the inference is plain that impure and defiled religion may run in many channels, while the pure and the undefiled can run in only one channel. Bigotry is a counterfeit religion, and is very often mistaken by those unskilled and inexpert in the knowledge of the word, as being identical with the true.

Ignorance is always the underlying cause, it was so in Paul's case; he obtained forgiveness, because he did it ignorantly and in unbelief. He was ignorant (being a bigot) in things pertaining to pure and undefiled religion (Christianity), notwithstanding his attainments in the arts and sciences as taught in the schools of his day. Bigotry is very blinding, selfish, exclusive, like Popery is arrogant, its language is—"Stand back, for I am holier than thou."

It has become axiomatic with many "that in ignorance there is bliss, and as per consequence, it is folly to be wise." But it is difficult after all to say whether this is the rule, or the exception; I am inclined to the latter, from observation and experience.

"The wicked are like the troubled sea, which cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt."

Ignorance is one of the chief ingredients (to say the least) which constitutes wickedness, and consequent bigotry: the latter is an indigenous plant which will flourish like the "green bay tree" in any clime where either the surface or the sub-soil is composed largely of ignorance. Bigotry is the germ of the works or fruits of the flesh, which are these:—

Adultery, fornication, and all the crimes in the criminal calendar, the commission of which excludes the culprits from the kingdom of God, the opposite of the fruits of the spirit which are love, joy, peace, etc., all the graces which adorn Christian character, and essential and indispensible to an inheritance in the kingdom of God. See Gal. v. 19–26.

A DARK DAY IN NEW ENGLAND.

Lamps Have to be Lighted at Noon.

For several days previous to the one of which I write, a heavy storm had prevailed, when on the morning of the 6th of September, 1881, the sky was overspread with what seemed to be thick, heavy clouds. At sunrise it became of a deep copper color, which gradually changed to bronze near sunset.

Throughout the entire day the carnivorous insects became unusually troublesome, the cattle were uneasy, the loud bleating of the sheep on the hills spoke of their discontent, the birds ceased singing, the crickets chirped as lively as in the night, and day seemed changed into night.

At sunrise it was quite dark and the gloom increased until noon, when people were obliged to use lamps in order to proceed with their household duties. Among the superstitious great alarm was felt, they thinking that the darkness foreboded some great calamity, or the immediate destruction of the earth.

About 2 o'clock p. m. the darkness began to recede and at 4 o'clock the outline of the sun was discernible and looked like a ball of blood rolling through the heavens, after this there was no change until night.

During the whole day a strong smell of smoke was observed, and the atmosphere was exceedingly oppressive, the thermometer indicating about 88 degrees Fahrenheit.

It is supposed the darkness was caused by an excessive amount of vapor in the air and a dense cloud of smoke from the great forest fires of the Northwest.

It is probable that this occurrence was similar to the "dark day" of which our grandfathers tell; although its singularity was not exhibited in so great a degree, yet it will long be remembered as the dark day of '81.

Wilmot, N. H., Sept. 9.

CURIOUS CELESTIAL PHENOMENON.

HANOVER, N. H., Sept. 12.—The sky, viewed from this place to-night, presented a singular appearance, of which the following description is furnished by C. F. Emerson, Professor of Astronomy at Dartmouth College: A band of yellow light, from five to ten degrees in width, and quite uniform throughout, extended from about twenty degrees north of west to thirty degrees south of east, dividing the heavens into northern and southern divisions of about three-fifths and two-fifths respectively. Its direction was almost at right angles with the milky way. A very distinctive feature was the regular and definitely marked northern boundary. From 8 p. m. until 8:15 p. m. it remained comparatively fixed. At 8:30 it swept off toward the south, gradually disappearing. Just south and east of the crossing of the streamer with the milky way were ten or twelve lines of light and at right angles with the streamer, but separated three or four degrees from it and nearly parallel to each other. These bands were five or six degrees in length. During this time there were faint northern lights streaming up at right angles to the band.

UTICA, Sept. 12.—A celestial phenomenon was witnessed here to-night which attracted much attention. A band of light started in the north and moved to the zenith, spanning the sky from the western to the eastern horizon. The eastern end then divided into what looked like white clouds, which moved rapidly toward the west until the whole disappeared. The band differed from an auroral display in that the edges were sharply defined, and that when the band broke up it did so in the form of white, luminous clouds. It was thought by some that a nebulous belt had touched the earth's atmosphere.

N. Y. Sun.

DAYS OF MYSTERIOUS DARKNESS.

Strange darkness at midday, caused by a yellow haze filling the sky, which awakened surprise and alarm in Boston, Providence, Portland, and other Eastern cities on Tuesday, is not without parallel in meteorological history. Everybody has heard of the Dark Day of 1780, which is sometimes spoken of as Black Friday. The year 1780 resembled 1881 in its wonderful physical phenomena. It was a year to drive weather prophets mad, and it impressed its memory indelibly upon the minds of the people. Its freaks culminated on May 19, when the light of the sun seemed suddenly to fail, and all of New England, and portions of New York, Pennsylvania, and Canada, were plunged into mysterious gloom. Birds and fowls retired to their roosts; dinner was eaten by candle light. The air seemed of a brassy color, and there was a sulphurous or sooty smell pervading it. Very many were in the greatest alarm, thinking that the day of judgment had come. The Connecticut Legislature was in session when the mysterious darkness fell upon the face of nature and the Senate Chamber was shrouded in gloom, so that business could not be transacted. The general alarm spread to the lawmakers, and one of them solemnly moved that the Senate adjourn. Col. Abraham Davenport immediately arose and opposed the adjournment. His speech, though brief, was a remarkable one, and is had the effect of restoring composure of mind in the assemblage:—

"I am against the adjournment. Either the day of judgment is at hand, or it is not. If it is not, there is no cause for adjournment. If it is, I wish to be found in the line of my duty. I ask that candles be brought."

Nobody who ever saw that day ever forgot it. The New England coast was shrouded in darkness, which turned away incoming ships. Evidently the phenomenon observed on Tuesday was of the same nature as that of 1780. Such darkenings of the sun's light have been witnessed in various parts of the world.

In the year 526 the whole Roman empire was covered with a reddish shadow, caused by a strange haze in the air.

In 1783 all of Europe, most of North America, and the western portion of Asia were covered with a great dry fog of a pale blue color, which dimmed the light of the sun and at times almost extinguished it. It lasted for several weeks, and was accompanied by violent electrical storms. It spread alarm everywhere. "It was," says one writer, "a time of terror, of tumult, and of universal excitement."

In 1831 there was another great fog that made the sun look green or blue, and tinted all the objects of the landscape with similar hues.

Sometimes these phenomena are confined to comparatively small areas of country. The fogs of London are examples.

In December, 1873, London was darkened for a week so that traffic had to be suspened on the Thames, street travel became almost impossible, and many persons lost their lives through accidents.

A year ago last spring a mysterious darkness overspread a portion of Minnesota. The inhabitants, as in 1780, ate their dinner by candle light, and all ordinary occupations were suspended.

The causes assigned for these phenomena are various. Sometimes they are due to the smoke arising from the burning of great forests or vast peat bogs. Occasionally these fogs have been ascribed to the passage of the earth through the tail of a comet. In 1861, when the earth is supposed to have passed through a portion of the tail of the great comet of that year, a slight haze was discernable by day, and at night the air seemed aglow with a strange phosphorescence, which in some places rendered it possible to read print at midnight. The same phosphorescence at night was witnessed during the great fogs of 1783 and 1831. The country within a few hundred miles of large volcanoes is sometimes darkened by matter thrown into the atmosphere from the craters. At times there seems no way to account for such darkening of the heavens, except upon the supposition that the earth, in its sweep through space, suddenly encounters a mass of attenuated meteoric matter, which spreads through the atmosphere. This does not appear improbable when it is recollected that the earth in revolving about the sun does not continue to travel in the same path, but, in consequence of the sun's own motion, is every year passing through new fields of space. The sun is carrying his squadron of world's on a stupendous voyage through the vast ocean of ether, or whatever fills the interstellar spaces. If some of these phenomena are really due to matter that the earth ploughs through in her marvellous cruise, we may conclude that therein lies another peril to the mad and merry crew of our rock-ribbed ship, for some of the great dry fogs of history brought epidemics with them. In 1783, especially, men and beasts were seriously affected with a disease resembling catarrh, that prevailed as long as the fog lasted.

A NEW MONTHLY.

THE AGES TO COME!

A monthly periodical, entitled as above, will be issued from the office of OUR HOME, Chicago, Ill., the first number of which will appear on October 1, 1881. It will be in size the same as OUR HOME, 16 pages, 9x13 inches, printed on good paper, from clear type, and in every way a first class journal.

Its title, THE AGES TO COME, indicates the principal character it will sustain, viz., an advocate of what the Editor believes to be the Bible view of God's plan concerning the ages, declaring that "God is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe;" that He is now "taking out of the Gentiles a people for His name" (name-bearers); and that he will exalt these in due time to heavenly places, and unite them by marriage to His Son, thus constituting them the Wife of Him to whom all power is given in heaven and upon earth. Then will they share with Him the glory of an everlasting reign, and with Him become a means of blessing all nations.

It will also teach the doctrine of Life only through Christ; the destruction (not eternal torment) of the wicked; and doctrines akin to these, as revealed in God's Holy Book.

It will strenuously maintain the inspiration of the Bible, as opposed to the growing infidelity of the day; and in the line of Christian duty it will oppose the tendency to worldliness so common in all churches, and advocate a holy life and pure speech, that we may be always ready to meet our blessed coming Lord.

In many respects it will occupy the same ground as that which was occupied by the Bible Examiner, so long and ably published by our late lamented brother, Geo. Storrs, and is intended to take up the work where he laid it down.

We wish to hear from every one who believes in the views we have outlined, and to secure their assistance in the procuring of subscribers. Let us hear from you at once, that we may know how large an edition to print on the first number, and for a prospectus.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXX. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, SEPTEMBER 28, 1881. NO. 36.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

No. 8.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Second Crusade.—The first, we may call the pioneer crusade. It opened the way, and gave the pilgrims a lesson of experience, quite useful to the succeeding crusaders. It taught them not to look for any direct aid from heaven, but to rely upon their own resources. It afforded them a knowledge of the character of their enemy; that it was a contest for supremacy; not simply between two races, but between two religions, the Cross and the Crescent—the religion of Jesus, as professed by the Roman Hierarchy, and that of Mahomet. It might be called a war of religions.

The Christian church, under the domination of the pope, his cardinals, priests, monks and nuns, with a semi-barbarian membership, devoted to image worship, was in the field against a new faith, whose cardinal doctrine was a great central truth of Christianity—"THERE IS ONE GOD."

The contest, then, was or should have been Jesus, or Mahomet.

Jesus claimed to be the Son of God:—that prophet like unto Moses.

Mahomet said that he was the Apostle of God:—the Divine Paraklete, and, consequently, superior to Christ, in his office.

True Mahometanism was, therefore, contending against false Christianity. God had evidently raised up Mahomet as he did Pharaoh. The apostacy required punishment. No one claims that Cyrus was a righteous man, as were Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, yet God says of Cyrus:—

"My shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure: even saying to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid: and I will loose the loins of kings, to open before him (Cyrus) the two leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut; I will go before thee, and make the crooked places straight: I will break in pieces the gates of brass, and cut in sunder the bars of iron: and I will give thee treasures of darkness, and hidden riches of secret places, that thou mayest know that I, the Lord, which call (thee) by thy name, (am) the God of Israel. For Jacob my servant's sake, and Israel mine elect, I have even called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me." Isa. xliv. 28; xlv. 1–4.

a. This prediction was uttered before Cyrus was born, and before Persia had become powerful, and nearly 150 years before its accomplishment, and when Babylon sat a queen.

b. God says, I do, what was done by Cyrus his agent. Cyrus was, therefore, under the direct control of the Almighty. In the same manner do we regard the position of Mahomet, sustained by his Arabian and Turkish dynasties. Let us now continue the history.

The second crusade was commenced 48 years after the taking of the Holy Sepulchre, A. D. 1144. This crusade was headed by the emperor, Conrad III. and Louis VII., King of France. They marched forward, in two columns; the first having in it about 260,000 persons; the second containing 100,000 foot, and 60,000 horse. Their design was the overthrow of the Mahometan empire by the conquest of Bagdad, the seat of the caliphs. The nobles of France and Germany were in this immense army. The army of Conrad was partly destroyed by the Turks, and partly through the treachery of Manuel, the Greek emperor; the second army, under Louis VII, through the unfaithfulness of the Syrian Christians, was compelled to abandon the siege of Damascus and to return. This crusade was a disgraceful failure. Though the Turks had lost the kingdom of Roum, in Asia Minor, and had removed to an obscure town 200 miles east from Nice, the results of the first crusade, the second great European attack of the Turkish empire added nothing to their former conquests.

The third crusade (A. D. 1188) followed the taking of Jerusalem by Saladin the sultan of Egypt. The principal forces were Germans, under the emperor Frederic Barbarossa. There were many dukes and counts, besides about sixty other princes of the empire. The kings of France and England joined the crusade. But these kings fell out by the way, which resulted in causing the king of France to return. The emperor Frederic defeated the sultan of Iconium; but the siege of Ptolemais was a failure. The battle ground was principally in Palestine; the jealousy of the Greek emperors kept the Latin crusaders as far from their capital as circumstances would allow. They often went so far as to ally themselves with the Turks.

The fourth crusade (A. D. 1195) was undertaken by the emperor Henry VI., Saladin being dead. Many victories were gained by the Christians. They took many towns, and were pushing forward towards the entire conquest of the Holy Land, when the death of the emperor obliged their return.

The fifth crusade was published at Rome by Pope Innocent III., A. D. 1198. This resulted in an entire failure through the ravages of the plague, and disputes between various rival princes. Their troops were easily defeated by the sultan of Aleppo, A. D. 1204. After thirty campaigns the Franks were driven west, beyond the Euphrates; and the Turks again had control of that boundary, though it had been more or less controlled by the Crusaders for sixty years. Edessa the key of the Euphrates, fell into the hands of the Turks after a siege of twenty days. Noureddin gradually united the Mahometan powers and extended his dominion from the Tigris to the Nile.

The sixth crusade began A. D. 1228. The town of Damietta was taken by the Christians, and re-taken by the Turks. In 1229, a peace was made with the sultan for ten years, by Frederick, the emperor. An English crusade was undertaken in 1240 by Richard, earl of Cornwall, brother to Henry III., king of England. Concluding a peace with the Turks he returned home.

The seventh crusade (A. D. 1249) was undertaken by Louis IX., king of France. He took the city of Damietto, in Egypt; but sickness happening in the Christian army, the king made an effort to retreat; in which, being pursued by the infidels, nearly his entire army fell a sacrifice to the Turks, and the king and nobility were taken prisoners. He was not able to enter Jerusalem.

The same monarch undertook the eighth and last crusade, but did not accomplish anything worthy of the effort. Prince Edward, of England, landed a small body of English and French, in Ptolemais, and hindered the Turks from laying siege to that city. But being obliged to return to take possession of the crown of England, the crusade was a failure. In 1291 the town of Acre (Ptolemais) surrendered to the Turks, and the crusaders were driven out of Syria. Thus ended the crusades; and with them, the Christian efforts to conquer and hold possession of the Holy Land.

Reflections.—These eight crusades occupied the forces of the Crescent and the Cross about two centuries. The result of these terrible conflicts of two rival religions, so far as now concerns us, was to delay the fall of the Eastern Roman empire.

The empire of Roum, one of the four sultanics of the Turkish empire was preparing to extend its domination over Constantinople. It was located near (within twenty-five miles) of the source of the great western branch of the Euphrates. The Turkish empire was still, in its central location, bound at the Euphrates. If a right line had been drawn from the head of the west branch to the mouth of that river, the power of the empire would have been nearly equally divided; and, as Babylon was at, or upon the Euphrates, though extending many miles east and west of it, so may we regard the Turkish empire at this period of its history. The empire was moving westward, but was still confined in its axis to the river.

The sixth angel was commanded by a voice from the horns of the golden altar which is before God:—

Loose the four angels (sultans) which are bound at the great river Euphrates; two east, and two west of that river.

Our history of the empire, so far, has not extended to the period of this command. So far they are bound. They are making, in every division of the empire, preparations for a western, a European home. The empire, that of Roum, had spread over, and absorbed nearly all of Anatolia, when the alarm aroused all Europe to a holy war against the Mahometan world. The results we have already described.

The sultany of Roum first fell under the power of the crusaders, and the sultan, defeated, fled beyond the Euphrates, their ancient boundary. Though he gathered another army, and opposed the crusaders in the siege of Antioch, Asia Minor, or Anatolia was not occupied, even as a temporary possession, for many years. The loosing time had not yet come. The angels must be kept bound at the great river, till God cuts out and prepares their work; then, and not before, can they go forth.

The Jewish history contains similar examples. God does not punish a nation till its cup is full. The Jews were to leave Egypt by judgment plagues. Their wickedness must come to the full before judgment could be executed. Hear what God said:—

"And he (God) said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land (that) is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years. And also that nation whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterwards shall they come out with great substance. And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age. But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full." Gen. xv. 13–17.

Much has been said, by infidels, against the treatment of the Canaanites by the God of the Hebrews. In answer let us say:—

The Canaanites were not driven out until their cups of iniquity were full. The land being his, it was his right to dispossess them, and to give the land to whom he pleased. That land was his vineyard. He required fruits of the husbandmen. It was taken from the antidiluvians, from the Jews, and will be taken from the Gentile. So has God dealt with the Christian church. So soon as its cup was full he brought nations against them to chastise them for their idolatry. To do this two nations were employed under one standard—One God. Arabians and Turks defended this great truth. The Christian church was full of images, and given up to gross idolatry. God had resolved to visit his professed followers with severe chastisements.

We have already dwelt at considerable length on the binding of the four angels, and still have more to write; our reasons are obvious:—

1. Revelation states the fact.
2. It is a matter of history.
3. It is the key to the proper understanding of their loosing, since they represent opposite acts.

They were bound at the great river Euphrates, and along its tributaries.

Their loosing is to be understood that these restraints were to be removed.

The crusades continued the bands two centuries longer.

Does the command then go forth? Another binding occurs.

IS IT AUTHENTIC?

Mark xvi 9-16.

O. M. MYERS.

A brother writes to me and desires to know what I think as to the authenticity of Mark xvi. 9–16. Many of the writers, and of the regular contributors to THE RESTITUTION are perhaps as well, or even better prepared to write upon the authenticity of this text than myself, and it would have been as well for the question to have gone to them; but as it comes to me I will give what information I have at hand and then all will be as well prepared as myself to form a conclusion.

1. In a Bible which I have containing foot notes, prepared by consulting the principal manuscripts and best authors on original texts, I find the following note:

"Alexandrian, Ephraem and Bezae manuscripts contain the text; the Sinaitic and Vatican omit the text. Alford and Tischendorf believe these twelve verses not to have originally formed part of this gospel; Lachman and Scrivener accept them; Tregelles does not pronounce decidedly; Wescott and Hort double bracket them, as being probably an early supplement, by which the mutilated or unfinished close of St. Mark's gospel was completed; similarly Alford."

2. Murdock's rendering of the Syriac contains the text without any brackets, break or note. This is of value as the Syriac is one of the oldest versions now extant, and antedates any known MS. by two centuries.

3. Tafel's Interlineor of the Greek text contains no note on the text.

4. Rotherham in his rendering of the Tregelles text says: "Judged by Dr. Tregelles not to have been written by Mark himself, and yet, by whomsoever written, to have full claim to be received as an authentic part of the second Gospel—to which he attaches it in the manner here imitated,—A FURTHER ACCOUNT—using the inscription twice. It is well known that the Sinai manuscript ends with verse eight."

5. Noyes in his rendering of the Tischendorf text says: "The remaining twelve verses, according to Tischendorf and others, made originally no part of Mark's gospel. As the passage was added very early, however, since it is referred to by Irenaeus in the latter part of the second century, it is here given, as an appendix."

6. Andrews Norton, who has made a valuable rendering of the first four historical books has a note: "In respect to Mark's gospel, there is ground for believing that the last twelve verses were not written by the Evangelist, but were added by some other writer to supply a short conclusion to the work, which some cause had prevented the author from completing."

7. Alexander Roberts, who has prepared a companion to the New Version, says: "The reader will be struck by the appearance which this long paragraph presents in the Revised Version Although inserted, it is marked off by a considerable space from the rest of the gospel. A note is also placed on the margin containing a brief explanation of this, but it may be well here to say something more respecting such an important section of the evangelical history.

The case then stands as follows: It cannot be denied that there is something peculiar about the paragraph. We find that it has no place in the Sinaitic and the Vatican MSS., the two oldest MSS. in our possession. It is true that the writer of the Vatican MS., has left a blank space at the end of St. Mark's gospel, clearly indicating that he knew of something more that might be inserted, but the fact remains that he did not insert it.

Again, as Tregelles has remarked Eusebius, Gregory of Nyssa, Victor of Antioch, Servetus of Antioch, Jerome, as well as other writers especially Greeks, testify that these verses were not written by St. Mark, or not found in the best copies."

Moreover, it must, I think be admitted that the style of the passage is not that of the evangelist. Not only are there seventeen words in the compass of only twelve verses which are nowhere else made use of by St. Mark, but the general complexion of the paragraph is unlike that of the gospel. This much may be urged against the genuineness.

But, on the other hand, in support of it we are told to reflect how improbable it is that a writer of the gospel history would abruptly end his narrative with the statement contained in verse 8. That may be admitted, and yet there may have been circumstances unknown to us that compelled the author to make such a sudden termination.

How many works might be referred to, such as Macaulay's History of England, which close abruptly, for the too-sufficient reason that death arrested the pen of the writer!

But again it is argued that Irenaeus quotes the passage without the slightest misgiving, in the second century. True, and that is the most weighty proof of the authority assigned to the passage even from the earliest times, but does by no means prove the authorship of St. Mark. Nor can the evidence of versions be deemed conclusive, for reasons which have been already stated.

On the whole, a fair survey of all the facts of the case seem to lead us to these conclusions:

First, That the passage is not the immediate production of St. Mark; and Secondly, That it is, nevertheless, possessed of full canonical authority.

We cannot ascertain its author, but we are sure he must have been one who belonged to the circle of the apostles. And in accordance with this view of the paragraph, it is marked off from the words with which, for some unknown reason, the gospel of Mark ended; while, at the same time, it is inserted, without the least misgiving, as an appendix to that gospel in the Revised Version."

This composes the amount of external evidence which I have at hand, both for and against the authority of the text. It may be summed up briefly thus:

Against Mark as the author—The omissions of the text by the Sinaitic and the Vatican MSS., with the remarks and opinions of Roberts, Tregelles, Tischendorf, and others founded upon these omissions.

For Mark as the author—First, The Alexandrian, the Ephraem and the Bezae MSS.

Thirdly, Irenaeus' use of the text in the second century without any questions or misgivings as to its genuineness.

Fourthly, Its presence in the Syriac, which antedates the Sinaitic and also the Vatican manuscripts by two centuries.

For a retention of the text in its place, is the general admission of its canonicity, either whether Mark wrote it or not. With the evidence as it now stands we are inclined not to reject it. But let us examine some further.

INTERNAL EVIDENCE.

1. Upon this point we ask the reader to read once more the last quotation above made, as to what Roberts says upon this head. Then read the book of Mark through with a comparison as to style with this text, and decide if the difference is sufficient for its rejection.

2. Bishop Newcome has written: "Many copies omit the last twelve verses of this chapter; probably, as Jerome says, because they were thought to be irreconcilable with the other accounts of our Lord's resurrection."

We have read the several accounts of the resurrection in view of this point, and find nothing in these verses contradictory to the other accounts; or irreconcilable to them. The author here records something more at length than the other historians, and to the reverse the others have recorded some incidents more largely than here. The same is found true upon a comparison of the others.

3. Henry Constable in an article on the Revision, in the Rainbow for July last remarks: "The revisors in separating the paragraph from that which precedes it by an unusual space, and by calling attention, in the margin, to the fact that the two oldest Greek MSS. as well as other authorities omit it altogether, very plainly intimate that its authenticity is doubted by them. Yet still they retain it in the text. We regret this much. In this passage, short as it is, is one indubitable contradiction of St. Luke's narrative. In Luke xxiv. 34, we are told that when the two disciples returned from Emmaus they found the apostles full of faith in the Lord's resurrection. Whereas in Mark xvi. 13, we are told that when these returned and told their story the apostles refused to believe them. Surely an error of such a nature as this should decide the revisors in giving that submission to the oldest MSS. which, even without it they ought to manifest."

But does the contradiction here referred to by Mr. Constable really exist? Let us put the two verses referred to down together and look at them.

Luke xxiv. 34–35: "And they rose up the same hour, and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together, and them that were with them, Saying, the Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon. And they told what things were done in the way, and how he was known of them in breaking of bread."

Mark xvi. 12, 13: "After that he appeared in another form unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country. And they went and told it unto the residue: neither believed they them."

Now note that while Mark says the residue did not believe, Luke in verses 33–35 says nothing about the faith of the residue; yet further along after that Jesus appeared unto them in the room it is said that "They believed not for joy, and wondered." Verse 41. They were not decided yet upon the matter.

Next upon the internal evidence as to the text we will notice the entire passage by way of comparison with the other historians.

Verse 9 is corroborated by Matt. xxviii. 9; Luke xxiv. 10; John xx. 1, 14–16.

Verse 10 is corroborated by Matt. xxviii 7, 8, 10; Luke xxiv. 9, 10; Jno. xx. 17, 18.

Verse 11 is corroborated by Luke xxiv. 11; John xx. 18.

Verses 12, 13 are corroborated by Luke xxiv. 13–35.

Verse 14 is corroborated by Luke xxiv. 36–42; John xx. 19, 20.

Verse 16 is corroborated by Matt. xxviii. 19; Luke xxiv. 45–48; John xx. 21–23.

Verses 17, 18 are corroborated by Matt. xxviii. 20; Luke xxiv. 48; John xx. 22.

Verse 19 is corroborated by Luke xxiv. 50, 51; Acts i. 9.

Verse 20 is corroborated by Hebrews ii. 4, and Acts of Apostles entire.

Thus stands the evidence relative to the text, as we have it and understand.

May God give us courage and help us to stand for his truth.

LETTER TO THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

J. SHAFFER.

Greeting:

But a few years have passed since you were persecuted by the other sects because you did not hold the same doctrines that they held. When feeling the sting of persecution it was your boast that your houses should not be closed against any for difference in doctrine, but, alas, how soon you have abandoned this resolution. You have shut your house of worship against one who for forty years has lived among some of you. I can say that I have not knowingly defrauded or wronged any man; if I have inadvertently wronged anyone I stand ready to make it good when I am convinced of the wrong. But a man's Christian deportment avails him nothing, when doctrinal differences are made a test. When one will not renounce his honest belief, he is branded as a heretic, and his name cast out as evil. In this way the minds of people are soured against those who do not believe as you do.

It was this spirit that led the harlot woman, Rome, to persecute the saints till she finally became drunk with the blood of martyrs. All this blood was shed because they would not renounce their faith which differed from the old mother's. Because Servetus differed from the faith of John Calvin, he was burned to death on a pile of green wood to strike terror into the hearts of the bystanders. If the political authorities had not set bounds to the ecclesiastical power—the earth helped the woman—no Christian flesh could have been saved. My own blood would, like Abel's have been crying from the ground, as my life has been threatened. The true Christian never sits in judgment in religious matters. But there is a family likeness; and the resemblance pertains more or less to the disposition. John calls the old drunken woman the mother of harlots.

How could this be unless she has children who are like her in features and disposition?

Do you not know that Christ dwells in his children, and that whatever is done to them is done to him?

It seems you have lost sight of this when you deny his children the privilege to worship in your house.

John says:—"God is love, and he that dwells in love dwells in God, and God dwells in him."

Then to deny the child of God is to deny God, and Christ who dwells in him.

If Paul had known that God, by his Spirit, dwelt in Stephen would he have held the clothes of those who stoned the dying martyr?

No, for he could never forgive himself, nor think himself worthy of being called a Christian because he persecuted the church of God; but he obtained mercy because he did it ignorantly in unbelief. But as the dying martyr said, "Lord lay not this sin to their charge," so I, from my heart pray, Lord lay not this sin to your charge. When the Lord comes, with all the holy angels, he will judge every one according to his works. I look upon it as one of the most heinous sins to sit in judgment on a child of God, as what is done against him is done against God and Christ who dwells in him. Abel's blood cried to God; and the Revelator (chap. vi. 9–11) hears the cry for retribution on the murderers. They were slain because they differed from those perverters of God's truth, who had departed from the faith, and given heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils.

Remember, and forget it not, that Christ never had but one church, and this he compares to a body having many members. 1 Cor. xii. 12–31; Eph. iv. 4–6.

As Christ is the head of his church, which is his body, then this is not two, nor one hundred, nor one thousand, but one body scattered among different nations. The sects differing from each other have different founders, or heads. What poor imitators of the blessed church of Christ are all the sects.

Let all those whom God hath chosen out of the world keep themselves unspotted from all political and ecclesiastical organizations. Though he must be branded as a heretic, and suffer persecution, let him live as his Master has commanded.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The brethren of the Abrahamic faith of Southern Wisconsin and Northern Illinois will meet in Conference at Lanark, Ill., commencing Friday evening, Sept. 30, and hold over Sunday, Oct. 2. A general invitation is extended to all.

J. M. GLOTFELTY.

The Lord willing, the Michigan Quarterly Conference will be held at the brick school house, three and one-half miles north of Mendon Village, St. Joseph county, Mich., commencing Sept. 30, and lasting over the following Sunday. May all the brethren that can, be present, for a little longer and the storms of life will be over, when the cross shall be exchanged for the crown.

Let all the brethren who in Christ reside,
Their cares and labors lay aside,
And let us at the conference meet,
Where we can bow at Jesus' feet;
And by the strength that he'll impart,
May change the vilest sinner's heart.

K. N. WOODWARD, Sec.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Church of God, will, the Lord willing, commence on Friday, Oct. 7, near Browntown, Warren Co., Va., and continue over the second Sunday. All who cherish the glorious doctrine of the soon coming kingdom of God, and name of Jesus Christ, and the people generally, are respectfully invited to attend. Come brethren, one and all; and let us have another demonstration of the power of God, which is the gospel of God, by letting our light so shine before men as to constrain them to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Sept. 28, 1861.

MONDAY of this week was a day unparalleled in all history. When the President was placed in his grave a nation gathered for the funeral. On his coffin Royalty placed wreaths, and Nobility draped itself in mourning in realms across the seas. Though dead history will embalm some of his noble utterances. "GOD REIGNS."

Our paper is full. We leave out news items this week; which, so far as foreign news is concerned, are not specially important. If nothing disappoints, shall probably attend the Conference at Lanark. Should we do this our paper may be one day late next week in consequence of our absence. Our absence too may delay some communications a week or more.

THE FIERY VENGEANCE.

That irretrievable and complete destruction is sometimes symbolized as a catastrophe resulting from a consuming fire is not denied. But that every expression in relation to a fiery doom is to be interpreted figuratively will by no means follow from this admission. The predictions of wrath to come must be explained by the examples of wrath in the past. In this, as in other cases, history becomes the expositor of prophecy. As a general expression illustrated in the history of the past and undoubtedly to be more terribly illustrated in the future we may quote Ps. xcvii. 3; "A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about."

The only example we will give from the inspired records of the past is the destruction of the cities of the plain. This is briefly told, Gen. xix. 24–29: "The Lord rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven; and he overthrew those cities and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and that which grew upon the ground. * * And Abraham got up early in the morning to the place where he stood before the Lord: and he looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, and beheld, and, lo, the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace."

We will now quote a prophecy that is to be fulfilled in connection with the coming of the Lord, and of which events transpiring in our own times may be the partial accomplishment.

"For, behold, the Lord will come with fire, and with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire and by his sword will the Lord plead with all flesh; and the slain of the Lord shall be many." Isa. lxvi. 15, 16.

Of the terrible instruments of vengeance that will be employed to exterminate the enemies of God at the close of the present dispensation,—as famine, fire, war, and pestilence—we see no reason why fire should not be as literal as the others. For the harvest of death when the sword shall reap the earth from one end to the other and cover its surface with the unburied slain the nations are making the most ample preparations in the days in which we live. Jer. xxv. 33. Of the wasting famines of the future China and India have recently afforded terrible examples. Of those predicted pestilences that will "walk in darkness, and waste at noon-day," the cholera and black death have been frightful premonitions. Is it not true, also, that the world has witnessed the preliminary kindlings of the last-day fires? Ever since the terrible fires of 1871, which proved so destructive to Chicago, Peshtigo, and other localities, we have been firmly persuaded that fire would be one of the agencies employed to punish the world for its iniquities at the closing of this present age.

The skeptic that has scouted the prophetical declarations as impossible of fulfillment, has been confronted with the fact that fires devouring the earth are possibilities, and that the atmosphere itself is combustible, or that destructive elements easily combustible and terribly destructive can be diffused widely through the air itself. This combustible condition of the atmosphere, or of some singularly developed and unknown gases blended with it was a terrible feature of the fires of 1871, when Chicago was burned, and when the flames spread such fearful desolations over large portions of the country.

In Chicago it was the burning fire in the air that, like scattered incendiaries, kindled simultaneous wide-severed and resistless conflagrations that speedily reduced the boasted fire-proof blocks, and the wooden tenement to the same sudden and undistinguishable ruin. It was really fire in the air that burnt up Peshtigo, and that sped like condensed lightning over the contiguous parts of Wisconsin, sweeping the surface of the earth with air-blazings that left only death and utter desolation in the terrible course. It was literally a fire-tempest that has lately desolated so large a district in the state of Michigan.

To give some idea of the extent of this conflagration it is said that "upward of fifty townships, covering an area of about 2,000 square miles, have wholly or partially burnt over: scarcely a green sprig being left in the track of the fire. Immense trees were twisted off by the force of the tornado which prevailed, and the darkness was so great that nothing could be distinguished at six inches distance. This accounts for the great loss of life, as the people were bewildered and knew not which way to turn to escape."

Many enveloped in this thick darkness had no notice whatever that fire was anywhere near. All at once "fire would come out of the sky" and quickly everything would be in flames. In these fires the heated air would roast and kill like the heat of an oven when it was not kindled into a blazing flame.

In the dreadful plague recorded in Ex. ix. 22–24, it may have been this frightful air-fire, that was blended with the other elements of destruction, that "ran along upon the ground" in that desolating hurricane of the Divine vengeance.

The difference in the miraculous fire that destroyed the cities of the plain is possibly only one of geological circumstance. Asphaltum is found along the shores of the Dead Sea, and during some recent earthquakes, to which the country is still subject, it has been thrown up in large quantities. Sulphur is also found intermixed with the disintegrated carbonates of other formations. There are evidences of volcanic action of a date long since the formation of the deep valley.

The fire from God out of heaven would find ample fuel in the inflammable bitumen and sulphur, and thus Sodom and Gomorrah perish in a fire-tempest of air above and a land of burning pitch beneath all blended in one volcanic seething furnace of aerial and terrestrial fire explosions.

But bitumen and sulphur are not necessary fuel when the fires of wrath are kindled. Chicago's boasted fire-proof palaces went to dust and ashes as rapidly as Sodom's buildings of polished bituminous blocks.

In Michigan there are places where the surface land has been burned off to the depth of twelve inches if reports are true.

Our design at present is only to call attention to these fires as the precursors of more dreadful conflagrations to come in the future. That prophecy is fearfully literal in its denunciations of coming vengeance is proved by the forerunning heraldings of calamitous burnings yet to be. We near the time of trouble when war, famine, fires, cyclones, earthquakes, and pestilences shall all combine to scourge this sin-polluted world that will soon reel to and fro under the devouring curse of impending judgments.

The Church will be above the storm of wrath that will so desolate the earth that but few men comparatively will be left. Mere fragmentary remnants of nations will survive the crushing demolition of the Great Image. But beyond the political chaos, and the charred cities and countries, dawns the restitution of all things, when the kingdoms shall be the Lord's, and our earth be filled with the glory of God.

THE SOLID GROUND OF FAITH.

G. DOWIE.

If there is one thing more than another by which we seek to be characterized and distinguished from the bulk of professing Christians it is surely our regard for the words of God. Those words have been prepared and kept for us in the Bible. The Bible therefore is our standard, our foundation, our guide of life, and our hope. Some men may blame us for an over particularity about the very words and their grammatical construction and meaning, but having already learned how much is to be gained by a close discriminating examination of the Scriptures, we rather prefer to be so blamed. Such solicitude about the letter of Scripture does not interfere with our appreciation of the spirit of the word of God; for we esteem every idea thus acquired as a pregnant truth, having moral bearing as well as intellectual force.

We do well to be particular about the very words of God when we find them so often perverted from their manifest meaning by the cunning ingenuity of men schooled in the class of Swedenborg, or bred in the open field of rationalism. The speculations of the one are perhaps all too wild to have any charms for us, but are we beyond the risk of being led astray by the apparent freedom of the other?

Rationalism (so-called) is the danger of the age. In almost every religious community we see it at work, and in many cases not stopping short of positive infidelity. It is rationalism which talks in this vague and irreverent way:—

"If I thought the Bible taught such and such doctrine I would put it in the fire," or in more deliberate words say, "My position is in religion, infinite doubts as to the records, the circumstantials, and the genesis of religion; but infinite love for Christ, and for Christianity as his reflex for all its grand moral and spiritual elements."*

What a contrast is between this and the entireness of confidence displayed by Paul:—

"I know whom I believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. Hold fast the form of sound words which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus."

A system of faith which is based on the supernatural cannot admit the short-sighted and hasty conclusions of human reason to be paramount.

What is this rationalism?

Try it in the domain of the exact sciences, and its absurdity becomes manifest.

If one were to judge of possible discovery of phenomena by his own experience he would constantly err. Sixty years ago the idea of a man being able to submit the substance of the sun to chemical analysis in a European laboratory would have been treated as a chimerical and insane fancy; but the spectroscope has shown it not only possible but certain.

Twenty years ago who would have believed that we should be capable of speaking in audible voice to a distance of thirty miles, yet the telephone has made such experience familiar to every city in the empire.

Whenever I hear a person peremptorily closing with the statement—"I cannot believe that; nobody can!" I feel disposed to set him down as either an ignoramus or a fool; for there is no saying what any one may—and indeed it were wrong to set bounds to what a man should—believe.

The essential quality in anything which calls for belief is that it be well accredited. Mere probability is nothing at all, no matter how it fits into our previous experience, or harmonizes with our present theory; a fact is a fact still, and must stand. This is true not only of the tangible facts of science, but of the unseen facts of faith; and the Bible is full of such—the great acts of creation and the flood; the lives of Abraham and Joseph: the exodus from Egypt; the kingdom in the Holy Land; the dispersion of Israel; the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus the Christ; the miraculous powers of the apostolic age; the preaching of the gospel; the early church and the sanctification of common experience by the life of faith, out to the finest reticulations of thought and character—all are fact. And the future hope is of the same strong and palpable character. We cannot abandon the objective features of our holy religion; for all the moral and spiritual power of the faith is dependent on the Word of God; all godly life is founded on the testimony of the Scriptures—

"If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?"

But they cannot be destroyed, and therefore the righteous are safe—

"For ever, O Lord, thy word is settled in the heavens, thy faithfulness is to all generations!"

One specious objection—we cannot call it an argument—against our adhesion to the old documents of the faith is that this age has made great advances, and we should therefore follow the advanced philosophy, and keep ourselves abreast of the times—the "church of the future" being a great improvement on the old apostolic one. If we allow ourselves to be deluded by this notion, we might be led to conclude that every previous period of human history has been a dark age, and that the production of a respectable, not to say authoritative, literature was impossible.

But is it so?

Herodotus, Virgil, and Shakespeare are not yet outdone; why should we grudge the credit due to Moses, Isaiah and Paul?

Of what value is the affectation of criticism which sometimes accompanies the rationalism of which we speak if the critic is to whittle away even the subject of his research, and put aside the very substance which he proposes to analyze?

We are not afraid of honest critics; but the Colensos and Renans who fill the whole region with the air of doubt are subtle enemies to be avoided—wolves in sheep's clothing, of whom every sheep and every shepherd should beware. The best critics are those who really handle the great facts of our faith when they survey the solid field of the Holy Land, or exhume and decipher the old world inscriptions, which antedate all humanly-written history. Such men as Warren and Layard, Champollion and Rawlinson, are the true critics; by their service the foundations of faith are tested and found strong.

There are some who display great caution in avoiding the disturbance of old and settled ideas, from a fear that if the crust were broken the interior would prove rotten and unsatisfactory. But we have no such fear. What cannot stand examination is not worth retaining, and all thorough search has hitherto more and more proved the stability of the whole Scripture. On this solid ground we can therefore build with confidence. Since "faith cometh by hearing and hearing by the Word of God," let us take heed how we hear, that our report is correct and our understanding intelligent and comprehensive. We sometimes fall in with those who disparage all translation and revision of the sacred Scriptures, as if the very ground beneath their feet would be loosened thereby; but that cannot be. The Word of God is not confined to a seventeenth century English classic; but is in a library of old Hebrew and Greek books, which may yet be susceptible of other and better renderings by scholars, and may consequently bring us still nearer to the original source of all truth. While we are thus free to change when change we must, we cannot conceal our gratification at the result of recent revisions, showing us how well we have been served by our time-honored "authorized version."

The ear and the heart filled with the sublime strains of Divine truth has no relish for the trifling reasonings and deductions of human philosophy—a philosophy which tends to bewilder simple minds, and to unsettle those who are able to pursue its subtle ratiocinations. The philosophers themselves admit that the tendency of their speculations is toward scepticism, and away from the noble issue of a life of simple faith.† I presume it is exactly what now passes current as metaphysics that we are warned about by the apostle Paul:—

"Beware lest any man make a spoil of you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ."

This seems to me a far greater danger than thorough and genuine criticism, than new translations, literal or free.

When we speak about the solid ground of faith, we must remember that it is like the world which God has made—not bare earth or barren rock, but rich flower and fruit-bearing soil. In the Scriptures God has spoken to man in the choicest language, and invested his revelations with surpassing beauty. The essential structure of Bible history is epic, and the prophecy of the future is Divine poesy—as far in advance of human imaginings as the heaven is higher than the earth, or as its eternal schemes and purposes are superior to the blundering and time-serving politics of the ordinary statecraft of to-day.

Did not the Hebrew bard say, "Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage?" and the apostle of the Gentiles exhort, "Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly, in all wisdom teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord?"

Such Divine melody sounds in the heavenly oracle that it is calculated to evoke music and bud out in poetic sentiment. So it should be to us. We have not half learned the value of the Word of God if we do not feel the glow of its heavenly warmth in our hearts, and can enter with our whole soul and strength and mind into the work of praise and the grateful service of loving life. And thus the world of faith, while, like the earth, is "fixed from moving," yet also blooms like the garden of the Lord—its bowers overshadowed with the trees of righteousness, and its parterres beautiful with eternal virtue.

*"Gillilan's Posthumous Papers."

†"Pantheism, under one of its various shapes, is the necessary consequence of all metaphysical inquiry when pushed to its logical limits; and for this reason do we find it in every age and nation. The dreamy, contemplative Indian; the quick, versatile Greek; the practical Roman; the quibbling Scholastic; the ardent Italian; the lively Frenchman; and the bold Englishman, have all pronounced it as the final truth of philosophy."—Lewis' Biographical History of Philosophy.

THE JEWS AND THE PROMISED LAND.

The idea of an extensive Jewish colonization in Palestine has not been viewed with much favor heretofore by the wealthy and enlightened representatives of the race in the civilized countries of the world. They have evinced doubts of the wisdom as well as of the practicability of such a scheme, and have given no substantial support to movements looking in that direction. The desire to see the Jews re-established as an independent nation in the land that belonged to them twenty centuries ago and the hope of bringing that consummation about have been cherished, apparently, much more by others, like George Eliot, who are not of the race, than by those who are.

It is true that the large body of Jews of orthodox faith, in which nearly all of those in Russia and a large proportion of those who live in the rest of the world are to be counted, pray for their restoration to the Holy Land, and make it a doctrine of their belief that this event will some day, through Divine interposition, come to pass; but this is rather a vague religious doctrine than a matter of belief and desire by which practical every-day life is influenced, while the Reformed Jews have gone so far as to strike the prayer for national restoration from their ritual.

Within the past two years, however, the view taken of this idea appears to have undergone a change. The outrages upon the Jews in Russia and Germany, and their hard lot in Morocco and Roumania, and to some extent in Bohemia and Hungary, have forcibly suggested the question whether the scheme of colonization on a large scale in Palestine would not be the best way that can now be devised to secure them against such wrongs and such an unfortunate condition in the future. In Germany, where the Government is able to enforce the law whenever it desires to, and where the assaults upon the Jews have been merely part of a political plan, their troubles are probably nearly over; but in the other countries where they are most numerous and most oppressed, the prospect does not present so favorable an appearance. Even were the governments there well disposed toward them, it is questionable how far they are able effectually to protect them.

Under these circumstances it is not strange that the wealthy representatives of the race should be inclined to look at the Palestine projects with a different eye from what they have done heretofore. Extensive colonization in other countries is not so feasible as there. The scheme of founding agricultural colonies in the United States can, at best, provide for only a very small number, although a free country where law and order prevail would undoubtedly be the most desirable.

The various movements of which we hear to obtain allotments of land from the Turkish Government for colonizing purposes are therefore being regarded by the Hebrews themselves with more practical interest than formerly, such projects in the past being viewed as the well-mean efforts of persons laboring under a delusion. The Alliance Israelite Universelle has long busied itself with agricultural and other schools in Palestine, and the labors expended there might now return good fruits and prove useful for larger ends.

The readiness on the part of wealthy Jews to give liberal support to such a purpose, if evidences of probable success are forthcoming, cannot be doubted. Large amounts that have been promised to aid the proposed agricultural colonies in the United States would probably be equally available to promote colonization in Palestine.

THE DEPRAVITY OF THE TIMES.

To the Editor of The Post:

Your editorial on the "Juvenile Depravity" of the city of New York, as developed by the statistical records, is well adapted to other localities also. Precocity in vice and general crime among the young is, unhappily, but too common everywhere, and, as "men are but children of a larger growth," we are not surprised to find among bearded men, also, the same and even greater recklessness and wickedness, even as the full-grown tree bears more fruit than a sapling.

Is not this proclivity to vice characteristic of "the last days of the Gentiles," in which we live?

There is an old book, but little read and greatly neglected in these "last days" (the Bible), in which the present social and moral and even civil condition of human affairs is prophetically described by the pen of unerring wisdom. Your very just and apposite reflections forcibly illustrate such lessons of Holy Writ as the following:—

"This know also: that in the last days perilous times shall come; for men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof; men who resist the truth, of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith," etc.

It is in view of such characters and of such an almost universal declension from the strait and narrow way in the latter days that the Savior of men asks, prophetically:—

"When the Son of Man comes shall we find faith on the earth?" and that the apostle Paul testifies that in these same "perilous times" "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceivers and being deceived."

The only remedy and recovery from these admitted evils is in an honest return to the faith and practice of the Bible as the only true standard of morals and religion.

EXCELLENT EXTRACTS.

SELECTED BY SARAH MACRUDER.

"Let us reflect upon the great truth that the essence of Christian and religious perfection consists in incessant combat with and victory over the interior passions.

Without this abnegation, as without the spirit of continual prayer, all the exercises of piety are a body without a soul, and are only an appearance of virtue. What an illusion it is to aspire after perfection and yet to neglect the absolutely necessary means for arriving at it—to desire to be a saint and not to do violence to one's self by a universal and continual mortification.

Examine what is your predominant passion. You will be able to detect it by your thoughts and most disorderly inclinations, and by your most frequent falls. What have you done up to the present time toward eradicating it—toward combatting it by zealous efforts? Have you been watchful over its gradual extinction?

STRONG CHARACTERS.

Strength of character consists of two things—power of will and power of self-restraint. It requires two things therefore for its existence—strong feelings and strong command over them. Now here we often make a great mistake. We mistake strong feelings for strong character. A man who bears all before him—at whose frown domestics tremble and whose bursts of fury make the children of the household quake; because he has his will obeyed and his own way in all things, we call a strong man. The truth is, that he is the weak man. It is his passions that are strong—he, mastered by them, is weak. You must measure the strength of the man by the power of the feelings he subdues, not by the power of those that subdue him. And hence composure is very often the highest result of strength. Did we never see a man receive a flagrant insult and only grow a little pale and then reply quietly? That is a man spiritually strong. Or did we never see a man in anguish—stand as if carved out of solid rock—mastering himself? Or one bearing a hopeless daily trial remain silent, and never tell the world what cankered his home peace? That is strength.

He who with strong passions remains chaste—he who, keenly sensitive, with manly powers of indignation in him, can be provoked and yet restrain himself and forgive—these are the strong men—the spiritual heroes, who will be exalted and honored when the Master comes and reckons with his servants."

Editor Restitution:

If I may be allowed to say what is beautiful and at the same time useful, I would cite the first thirteen verses of the eleventh chapter of Luke. A person has only to read them, with the spirit of faith, hope and love and he is at once conscious of a superior power attending, they are truly sublime and at the same time apparently artless, being spoken in the simplicity of plain common sense and in the most natural manner. I suppose their native beauty arises from their being so natural. But the glory of the piece of composition is to be found in its divinity.

The point to which I wish to draw attention is contained in the words:—

"Lord teach us to pray as John also taught his disciples."

I was in conversation with a Baptist preacher touching that point in reference to which he said that the disciples only wanted the Lord to teach them how to pray, without regard to any particular matter or form of prayer, that there was no sameness between the forms—that of John's and that of Christ's. I immediately thought of the similarity between the two in reference to the subject of the kingdom of God in their teaching and could not help thinking that whatever the form of John might be it would at least be about the kingdom of God, with other matters having reference thereto. So that John did in some wise pray for the coming kingdom when the Majesty of the heavens was at hand. John said, repent and believe the gospel of the kingdom. Christ told his disciples to pray thy kingdom come; now we take it that John and Christ preached and prayed about the same kingdom, and as John was proposed as an example for Christ to follow in prayer and they preached about the same kingdom they must have prayed about it.

The object of Christ's coming was to set up a kingdom. John as a forerunner proclaimed the same, or published it to the people, and the disciples were not surprised or disappointed at being told to pray, Thy kingdom come.

The current testimony of all Scripture upon this subject goes to prove that the design of Almighty wisdom was to set up upon the earth a kingdom, which like a mustard seed cast into the earth, should germinate and grow and spread about to all quarters until its salutary influence should be felt in the community of man. It was for the great teacher to particularize and to make distinctions, and to propose conditions to those who might be his followers. Yet leaving the matter wholly with God, therefore he sayeth further, Thy will be done; manifestly showing that the will of God had something to do with the coming of the kingdom.

Well, the Majesty of the heavens is departed, and in reference to us it is yet to come to be established upon the earth and is a subject to which our affections should be continually directed, and our most ardent prayer should be, Thy kingdom come, and our most earnest endeavor a daily preparation for a seat in the kingdom. Being fully persuaded that the time of its setting up though future is not very far distant.

Even so Lord Jesus come quickly.

CHRISTADELPHIAN.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a religious discussion held at the Christadelphian meeting-house, at Valley Springs, Texas, between Mr. W. H. Meadows, of Field Creek, and the undersigned, commencing at 10 a. m. on Thursday before the fourth Sunday in October, and continuing four consecutive days. Two propositions will be discussed, viz:—

1. "The kingdom of God, referred to in Dan. ii. 44, is a future dominion to be set up at the second coming of Christ." The undersigned affirms, Mr. Meadows denies.

2. "Jesus Christ is now a reigning King." Mr. Meadows affirms, the undersigned denies.

All friends and lovers of Bible truth are invited to attend.

Poetry.

LINGER NOT.

Time is short!
If thou wouldst work for God it must be now;
If thou wouldst win the garland for thy brow
Redeem the time.

Shake off earth's sloth!
Go forth with staff in hand while yet 'tis day,
Not out with girded loins upon thy way—
Oh, linger not.

Fold not thy hands!
What has the pilgrim of the cross and crown
To do with beauty or couch of down?
On, pilgrim, on!

Sheathe not the sword!
The battle lies before thee and the prize
Hangs yonder, far above these earthly skies.
Fight the good fight!

Life ebbs apace!
Fast crumbles down this house of mortal clay.
Fling not like dust thy precious hours away,
The end is near.

Faint not, O man!
Follow the Master through the glorious strife,
Follow his footsteps till they end in life;
Be strong in him.

With his reward he comes,
He tarries not, his day is near,
When least men look for him will he be here;
Prepare for him!

REVISED VERSION.

THOS. CHURCHILL.

Editor Restitution:

As you are aware we have at last been favored with the appearance of the Revised edition of the New Testament, but not very materially different from its predecessor. Of course there are some alterations, but not as many as there might be, and it scarcely comes up to the point which was expected by numbers, according to the advance of improvement, which has taken place in other matters, during a period of three and a half centuries since its appearance among all classes of the community, or in other words, since the Reformation, in A. D. 1517.

It scarcely comes up to what might be expected from a committee of seventy-five or eighty members of what are supposed to comprise the highest order of British erudition and Biblical knowledge, and though I do not pretend to a high order of criticism, nor to a full and thorough standard of education, I think I can see that no great achievement has been accomplished, after about ten years' attention has been given to the subject by the elite of English literature.

I do not think we gain any appreciable amount of useful or necessary information concerning the things of the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus, beyond what may be collected from the Authorized Version, so-called, already in our hands.

I consider the American Revision of the New Testament quite superior, in point of perspicuity and faithfulness, so far as the text is concerned. Of course the addition of the notes casts a little more light on some things, but very little if anything, upon the great truths which form the basis of the glorious hopes of those who are expecting and waiting for the appearing and kingdom of the Messiah, nor do the said notes make anything for, or against, the faith once delivered to the saints.

There are some words in this revision which ought not to have appeared in it, for instance the word baptizo in the Greek Testament, stands untranslated, as in the old version. Every intelligent reader knows that this word means immersion, and it is equally plain that no other mode of what is called baptism, can by the most severe method of forcing, be made to represent a burial, in which state we are said to be placed with Christ by immersion. See Rom. vi. 4; Col. ii. 12.

This point ought to be seen by the most ordinary intellect.

However, upon this point we could hardly expect any change, from a committee consisting of a large majority of men who ignore immersion; nor will it be regretted by their followers, who represent a large portion of the professing community.

In order to send forth a faithful translation or revision that word must be translated.

The word Ghost has also been retained, although it cannot be produced by translation from any word in the Greek Testament.

It is satisfactory to see that they have abandoned the use of their favorite dogmas of hell and damnation, and given them their proper meaning of hades, condemnation and gehenna. The change of these words is about the greatest improvement they have made in the revision, but it will be a hard struggle for some of the preaching friends to leave them out of their discourses, as they are powerful agents in keeping their number of adherents together.

They have left out a good portion of John viii., as unworthy of notice. I mean the woman taken in adultery, and brought before Jesus. This does not interfere with the great truths of the gospel, but whether spurious or otherwise, it looks very like what the Savior would do on such an occasion, as the class composing her accusers were not his greatest favorites.

Acts viii. 37, is also one of those points harmless to truth. Of course it would be quite irrelevant in the case of the vast majority of those who are brought to obtain what is called baptism, as they would not be able to give any answer, but in the case of those who come and apply themselves personally for the ordinance, the question would be quite applicable to put to any candidates presenting themselves for immersion, because unless they are genuine believers in Jesus, they have no claim to the ordinance. nor should it be administered to any one who is unable or unwilling to give just such an answer as the eunuch is said to have given, whether the passage be spurious or not.

The passage in 1 John v. 7, is also left out, but it is questionable whether this will alter the doctrine which is built upon it, and which it assists to uphold, in the estimation of thousands, although it has been a matter disputed since the first century.

The three names in themselves considered, are quite scriptural, and in the relations of each name to the believer, are absolutely necessary. This however, by no means constitutes the fact that they are three distinct persons, equal in all things, and yet form only one personal God, and by multitudes called a Trinity, which word is unscriptural, and only a human invention.

God is a personal being, and Jesus is the "express image of his person," or according to the Diaglott, the American Revision, Alford, the Rhemish (Catholic), and the New Version, "the impress of his substance."

Of course there cannot be an image, impress, or likeness of anything, unless there is something tangible to take it from, but there is no such thing said of the Holy Spirit, and when the Holy Spirit is spoken of in the Acts of the Apostles, or elsewhere, it must be referrable to God himself, who is a Spirit, and also holy, (I mean as to the spirit speaking or directing) as we sometimes read in Acts and other parts of the word.

It is remarkable that the apostle Paul does not in any instance, give the Holy Spirit any such thing as personality. At the commencement and conclusion of every one of his letters to the churches, his invocations for peace, blessings, etc., are all to "God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ." Never once to the Holy Spirit.

At the conclusion of 2 Corinthians he mentions the "communion of the Holy Spirit," but this can only mean influence, or impulsive power, because if the Spirit is a person, as it is said to be by thousands, there must be some thousands of personal Spirits, because a personal being must be confined to one place, or locality, however widely his influence may extend from that location.

This can be easily understood, as in the case of any personal influence, either for good or evil. Indeed, if the Holy Spirit was a person, and given to any one individual, what are all the rest of his people to do?

It is better we should understand the Spirit's influence as coming from God himself through the intercession of Jesus. In such a way did our beloved Lord give his disciples to understand it. John xvi. 7.

It is expedient for you that I go away, for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come; but if I go away I will send him," etc.

The Spirit is spoken of here in the masculine gender, but the Hebrew speaks of inanimate things in the same masculine gender.

For instance, speaking of the sun in Psa. xix. 5, "Which as a bridegroom cometh out of his chamber, and rejoiceth," etc.

Verse 6, "His going forth is from the end thereof," etc.

Here the sun is spoken of three times in the masculine gender, and other inanimate things are so spoken of in the Hebrew language.

I am glad to see, however, that the revisers retain some other portions of the Scriptures, which some who preach and profess to believe them, attempt to make null and void; and by so doing strike at the very root of Christianity. In the first place I refer to Matt. i. and ii. It is loudly asserted by men who have no more intelligence than many others, that both these chapters are interpolations, and consequently spurious.

The principal or chief objection, is contained in the account given of the begetting of Jesus, i. e., by the power of God, without intervention of man in any way. Now, in the first place, it is gross impertinence for man to question or arraign the power of Jehovah before the bar of human judgment and reason. If it is not blasphemy it does not require an astounding degree of knowledge to come to a satisfactory conclusion on this point.

Take the case of Sarah. She was past the time of child-bearing when Isaac was born. Also in the case of Elizabeth, when John the Baptist was born, and so far as we know the very same power was necessary for the begetting and birth of both these children, as in the birth of Jesus, although not in the same manner, nor perhaps in the same degree, and perhaps the same degree was necessary; for the general course of humanity in either of these cases was out of the question.

Human ability is ignored in each of the above cases: so acknowledged by themselves, and so taught by the apostle Paul.

See Gen. xvii. 15–17; xviii. 10, 11; xx. 18. Here it is seen that Jehovah can prevent the birth of children as well as bestow them.

See Rom. iv. 18: "He considered not his own body now dead, neither the deadness of Sarah's womb."

Any one ought to be able to see that extra power beyond human nature, had to be exercised in every case.

See Luke i. 36, 37, in the case of Elizabeth—"Behold thy cousin Elizabeth, she also hath conceived a son in her old age—for with God nothing shall be impossible."

I say these poor creatures of men are opposing the wisdom, the power, and the truth of the Creator of the universe.

If it could be proved that these two chapters were spurious, there would be no line left open to us but to receive the idea that Jesus is just the son of Joseph and Mary; consequently a man the same as any other. This point they insist upon, and tell us they are prepared to prove.

What then becomes of Christianity? That noble structure instituted by Jesus! What foundation have we upon which to build our faith and hope in the future? I say we have none. Take away the account of the begetting and birth of Jesus in in those Scriptures which treat of them in Matthew and Luke, and any one except a blind man can see that we have no gospel, nor Savior to this hour; as upon their showing Jesus is nothing but a mere man.

The Scriptures tell us that no man can redeem his brother nor give to God a ransom; besides we are burning under the curse of Jehovah, pronounced by Jer. xvii. 5, "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm." Are these men so blind that they cannot see the position which they would bring themselves and all who follow them into?

But this doctrine can be set aside by a few Scriptures from the lips of Jesus himself.

He says, I came down from heaven, not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me. John vi. 38. If the son of Joseph how did he come down from heaven?

The old Pharisees said, "Is not this the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know," John vi. 42, and these men say the same. But the old Pharisees were not sure; they ask, "Where is thy father?"

Jesus answered, "Ye neither know me nor my father," and I am satisfied that Jesus would tell these the very same thing, they don't know either. If Joseph was his father they knew both father and mother.

John vi. 62: "What if ye shall see this Son of Man ascend up where he was before?" Where was he up, if Joseph's son?

Peter knew who he was; "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Why did not Jesus correct this answer if it was an error? Instead of that he pronounces a blessing upon him, and tells him it was a revelation from "my Father which is in heaven." What need of a revelation from God to know that a man is a man?

Where did Jesus ever acknowledge Joseph as his Father? or where did he ever mention the name of Joseph? He stated more than twenty times that God was his father, and that his father was in heaven; but Joseph as such—never!

Paul tells us in speaking of Jesus, "That he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor," etc. When was he rich, as a man, from his birth to his death? He neither had a house nor a bed of his own—not where to lay his head.

There are others who do not ignore wholesale, but quibble at small portions. Some set aside two-thirds of Mark xvi. This may be right, but it contains nothing for or against truth, except the commission to baptize. At all events James teaches nearly the same doctrine in ch. 5.

Matt. xxviii. 19, is objectionable to numbers of professors.

I may have something more to say upon this portion at some future time, but I say take away the account of the birth of Jesus as given in Matt. i. 18; and Matt. xxvii. 19; and Mark xvi. 16, and we have neither a foundation for the gospel we profess, we have no Savior to the present hour, nor have we any direction, or any line of action by which we can enter upon any profession of or commencement in Christianity, and these men never make the attempt to give anything instead; indeed what have they to give?

So we have neither chart nor compass by which we can steer.

If it be said we have the writings and actions of the apostles, I say these are but men, and in themselves considered they are no authority; and if Jesus was the son of Joseph, he would be no better authority than they! So we would be left just where we were.

I am thankful that I possess the New Testament translation of the Syriac MS., which is claimed to have been made in the end of the first century, before there was any necessity for interpolations, and all these objectionable Scriptures are in it just in the same style as the translations of the Greek MS. I refer now only to those Scriptures last mentioned, showing his birth and his instructions to guide us into the line of entrance into his beautiful system of Christianity, as left on record, and no man or body of men, will persuade me to give them up, until Jesus himself tells me they are wrong. They bear his impress and superscription too strongly.

Yours for the glorious gospel of the blessed God.

ADMONITION.

J. D. COOK.

Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly, in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another, etc.—Col. iii. 16.

That article, on Matt. xxviii. 19, 20, in May 18, 1881, has just been brought to my notice. Please allow me in love and meekness to quote the word on the central truth therein embraced.

"The Lord God and his Spirit hath sent me." Isa. xlviii. 16. Hebrew adonai, Jehovah, ruach—hath etc. See Isa. xi. 1–5; lxi. 1. "The Spirit of the Lord God (adonai, Jehovah) is upon me."

In Psa. cx, "The Lord (Jehovah) said to my Lord, (adonai) sit thou at my right hand," etc.

Acts ii. 34–38, The Spirit was distinctive.

2 Cor. xiii. 14, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all."

Eph. ii. 18, "For through him (Jesus) we both (Jews and Gentiles) have access by one Spirit unto the Father."

"The Spirit of God, descending—lighting—upon him; and lo, a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Matt. iii. 13–17.

"The Comforter—the Holy Ghost—whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things." John xiv. 18–26.

Surely all such Scriptures seem to have been far from the mind of him who questions Matt. xxviii. 19, 20.

Please observe, your humble brother, as a poor "bruised reed" assumes no authority here, except to cobe the word of the Lord. My reverence bows to such essential and all-pervading Scriptures, as I accept the bony structure of my frail body. He did not take counsel of me in constructing man, or creation. Nay; "In him was life, and the life was the light of men;" which, with gratitude, I accept.

Note 1. The gospel by Matthew has had its primal place in "The Gospel of God," throughout this age. Now, what becomes of his providential and paternal care, as of "the apple of his eye" if it has no right there? Deut. xxxii. 10; Zech. ii. 8; Matt. v. 17–20. Has this gospel been of less importance than "the hairs of the head?" Luke xii. 4–12.

2. What becomes of his sifting Israel as "corn in a sieve," yet "not a grain" lost? Amos ix. 9. My reference is to this principle that illustrates divine oversight.

3. What becomes of the more than cherubic guardianship over the integrity of his word? "He hath said, I testify to every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book; if any man shall add unto them, God shall add unto him the plagues which are written in this book." Revelation xxii.

Then the converse against taking away from the word is proclaimed, before earth and heaven, as his rule of judgment, to save or destroy. Mark viii. 38.

Let this suffice. We should all know that the first duty of every erring brother is to accept of admonition and be converted. Jas. v. 19.

LETTER TO G. M. MYERS.

JOS. MESSIMORE.

Brother Myers:

SIR: With much interest I have read your prospectus for a new collection of hymns, or songs for the brotherhood, as it is a thing that is very much needed. I am only sorry that it is not to contain the appropriate music adapted to the songs. But this deficiency may be remedied by getting up a second edition.

I would suggest then, that you get up a second edition with appropriate music, after the plan of Advent Hymns with this exception: not to refer to music of other books without inserting such tunes. This is a great fault with Advent Hymns, and was also a fault with the Harp, and Psalmodist. Hence I would say, let a few of the very best tunes be selected from the different books in use, for each class of hymns of the different kinds of measure; and then, over the remainder of the respective different hymns, let the name of an appropriate tune be written, indicating by figures the page on which such tune may be found.

Of course the pages of the two books will not correspond, as the second edition will necessarily be a larger book than the first, in order to contain all the hymns of the first, in connection with the music. But this will not necessarily cause any disadvantage to the singer, as the hymns can be numbered alike in both books. So the singer will be governed by the number of the hymn without regard to the page of the book.

This, I think, would be a very good and desirable arrangement. For thus all could be accommodated. Those not wishing to pay for the music could buy the cheaper edition, and those wishing music, could buy the second edition.

By this arrangement the new book would soon take the place of and supersede all others in use among us, and greatly improve the singing in our conference, as well as our social meetings.

Now shall we have it? What do you say, brethren? Speak out, and let us hear soon.

THE CRUCIFIXION.

Utterly brutal and revolting as was the punishment of crucifixion, which has now for fifteen hundred years been abolished by the common pity and abhorrence of mankind, there was one custom in Judea, and one occasionally practiced by the Romans, which reveal some touch of passing humanity. The latter consisted in giving to the sufferer a blow under the arm-pit, which, without causing death, yet hastened its approach. Of this I need not speak, because, for whatever reason, it was not practiced on this occasion. The former, which seems to have been due to the milder nature of Judaism, and which was derived from a happy piece of Rabbinic exegesis on Prov. xxxi. 6, consisted in giving to the condemned, immediately before his execution, a draught of wine medicated with some powerful opiate. It had been the custom of wealthy ladies in Jerusalem to provide this stupefying potion at their own expense, and they did so quite irrespectively of their sympathy for any individual criminal. It was probably taken freely by the two malefactors, but when they offered it to Jesus he would not take it. The refusal was an act of the sublimest heroism. The effect of the draught was to dull the nerves, to cloud the intellect, to provide an anæsthetic against some part, at least, of the lingering agonies of the dreadful death. But He, whom some modern skeptics have been base enough to accuse of feminine feebleness and cowardly despair, preferred rather "to look death in the face"—to meet the king of terrors without striving to deaden the fires of one agonizing anticipation, or to still the throbbing of one lacerated nerve.

The three crosses were laid on the ground—that of Jesus, which was taller than the other two, being placed in bitter scorn in the midst. Perhaps the cross-beam was now nailed to the upright, and certainly the title, which had either been borne by Jesus fastened round his neck, or carried by one of the soldiers in front of him, was now nailed to the summit of his cross. Then he was stripped naked of all his clothes, and then followed the most awful moment of all. He was laid down upon the implement of torture. His arms were stretched along the cross-beams; and at the centre of the open palms, the point of a huge iron nail was placed, which by the blow of a mallet, was driven home into the wood. Then through either foot separately, or possibly through both together as they were placed one over the other, another huge nail tore its way through the quivering flesh. Whether the sufferer was also bound to the cross we do not know; but to prevent the hands and feet being torn away by the weight of the body, which could "rest upon nothing but four great wounds," there was, about the centre of the cross, a wooden projection strong enough to support, at least in part, a human body which soon became a weight of agony.

It was probably at this moment of inconceivable horror that the voice of the Son of Man was heard uplifted, not in a scream of natural agony as that fearful torture, but calmly praying in Divine compassion for his brutal and pitiless murderers—aye, and for all who in their sinful ignorance crucify him afresh forever—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

And then the accursed tree—with its living human burden hanging upon it in helpless agony, and suffering fresh tortures as every movement irritated the fresh rents in hands and feet—was slowly heaved up by strong arms, and the end of it fixed firmly in a hole dug deep in the ground for that purpose. The feet were but a little raised above the earth. The victim was in full reach of every hand that might choose to strike, in close proximity to every gesture of insult and hatred. He might hang for hours to be abused, outraged, even tortured by the ever moving multitude who, with that desire to see what is horrible which always characterizes the coarsest hearts, had thronged to gaze upon a sight which should rather have made them weep tears of blood.

And there, in tortures which ever grew more insupportable, ever more maddening as time flowed on, the unhappy victims might linger in a living death so cruelly intolerable, that often they were driven to entreat and implore the spectators, or the executioners, for dear pity's sake, to put an end to anguish too awful for man to bear—conscious to the last, and often, with tears of abject misery, beseeching from their anguish the priceless boon of death.

For indeed a death by crucifixion seems to include all that pain and death can have of horrible and ghastly—dizziness, cramp, thirst, starvation, sleeplessness, traumatic fever, tetanus, publicity of shame, long continuance of torment, horror of anticipation, mortification of untended wounds—all intensified just up to the point at which they can be endured at all, but all stopping just short of the point which would give to the sufferer the relief of unconsciousness. The unnatural position made every movement painful; the lacerated veins and crushed tendons throbbed with incessant anguish; the wounds, inflamed by exposure, gradually gangrened; the arteries—especially of the head and stomach—became swollen and oppressed with surcharged blood; and while each variety of misery went on gradually increasing, there was added to them the intolerable pang of a burning and raging thirst; and all these physical complications caused an internal excitement and anxiety, which made the prospect of death itself—of death, the awful unknown enemy, at whose approach man usually shudders most—bear the aspect of a delicious and exquisite release.

Such was the death to which Christ was doomed; and though for him it was happily shortened by all that he had previously endured, yet he hung from noon after noon until nearly sunset, before "he gave up his soul to death."

When the cross was uplifted, the leading Jews, for the first time, prominently noticed the deadly insult to which Pilate had vented his indignation. Before, in their blind rage, they had imagined that the manner of his crucifixion was an insult aimed at Jesus; but now that they saw him hanging between the two robbers, on a cross yet loftier, it suddenly flashed upon them that it was a public scorn inflicted upon them. For on the white wooden tablet smeared with gypsum, which was to be seen so conspicuously over the head of Jesus on the cross, ran, in black letters, an inscription in the three civilised languages of the ancient world—the three languages of which one at least was certain to be known by every single man in that assembled multitude—in the official Latin, in the current Greek, in the vernacular Aramaic—informing all that this man who was thus enduring a shameful, servile death—this man thus crucified between two sicarii in the sight of the world, was "the King of the Jews."

Sententious.

No principle is more noble, as there is none more holy, than that of true obedience.

He only gives who gives when living; a dead man simply relinquishes what he is longer powerless to hold.

The praises of others may be of use in teaching us, not what we are, but what we ought to be.

Reflect upon your present blessings, of which every man has many, not on your past misfortunes, of which all mankind have some.—Charles Dickens.

Earnestness is the path to immortality, thoughtlessness the path to death. Those who are in earnest do not die: those who are thoughtless are as if dead already.

Love's secret is to be always doing things for God, and not to mind because they are such very little ones.—F. W. Faber.

Write your name by kindness, love, and mercy on the hearts of the thousands you come in contact with year by year, and you will never be forgotten. No; your name, your deeds, will be as legible on the hearts you leave behind as the star on the brow of evening. Good deeds will shine as bright on earth as the stars of heaven.—Chatmers.

I KNOW.

I know the crimson stain of sin,
Defiling all without, within;
But now to-day I know
That he has washed me white as snow.
I praise him for the crimson tide,
Because I know that Jesus died.

I know the helpless, helpless plaint,
"The whole head sick, the whole heart faint!"
But now I trust his touch of grace,
That meets so perfectly my case—
So tenderly, so truly deals!
Because I know that Jesus heals.

—Frances R. Havergal.

A STEP FORWARD.

The Church of Christ is not on its trial. It has successfully passed the tribunal of centuries. It stands as a colossal fact. Every human force has been tried against it. Its only times of failure have been when it has employed the world's ways of propagandism. Its whole history declares the power of the supernatural so plainly that it cannot be doubted except as men can doubt any truth and against all evidence—because they will. From a human stand-point, we are amazed at the victories which have been achieved; but when we consider the purpose of God and the power He affords, we are astonished there are no greater results.

SIMPLE FAITH.

If one could hear his mother's voice again,
And stand beside his mother's knee again,
And be again a child,
Simple and mild,
Absorbing faith as earth receives the rain,
Then only could he shake off
That he has learned too much, or not enough.

Cold is the air of reason, though serene;
Calm and unsatisfying, though serene.
Better for life and death
Were simple faith.
That ample evidence of things unseen,
But we have eaten the forbidden fruit,
Nor know the tree was rotten at the root.

OPINIONS OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy in most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for rest and perusal in the important information that it will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 14, 1879.

"It evinces a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scripture, and uniform courtesy toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York, Nov. 22, 1881.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested merely, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are second to none in importance in us. * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and comprising way, should try this book."—The Rural Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 17, 1879.

PROMPTINGS OF TRUTH.

—W. W. CROCKETT.

I read to-night of a fair child's death:
I read that when it had given its breath
To mingle again with its parent air,
That the child had passed from this scene of care
To a better world in heaven above,
And lived where life is endless love.

Deeply I thought of what I had read:
And wondered long at what was said,
Of the angel Death kindly and true,
Who carried the child to the star lit blue:
And I sought the Book whose Sacred Page
Doth speak in truth to child and sage.

I turned the pages carefully o'er,
And as I turned I wondered more:
The Angel Death I saw not there.
But the Enemy Death with a ghastly air
Was close beside a yawning grave—
And I asked my soul, Will an enemy save?

I asked my soul, but the answer came
From the book of God in words of flame—
"THE WAGES OF SIN IS DEATH"—and till
The Savior's feet touch Olivet's hill,
Death is our direst enemy,
And the foe that shall fall in victory

Oh why are deathless efforts crowned
By man's best love, and why are found
With pomp such strange perversities?
The word reveals, the father of lies
Has warped the structure of the brain
That swallows alone through faith with pain.

THE BLESSED HOPE.

MARY E. NORDYKE.

What glorious prospects and hopes are placed before us, and how real they are to every sincere member of Christ. Oh this blessed hope which we have who are looking for the glorious appearing of our Lord and Savior.

Does it not cause us to walk in the narrow path, and keep our hearts with all diligence, to see that all unsightly occupants such as selfishness, love of the world, and the pride of life are wholly banished, and our hearts are made fit temples for the indwelling of the spirit?

Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God.

Now shall we purify our hearts except we obey the truth and walk in all the commandments of the Lord blameless?

Are we all striving from day to day to cultivate all the Christian graces?

Oh let us strive to overcome every fault as nearly as we can, and be bright and shining lights in the world, as we walk in this perverse generation. Oh the power that Satan is exerting to keep us in ignorance of our real situation in the sight of God. There is no safety in those perilous times only in living by faith on the Son of God.

The solemn times in which we live should admonish us to awake from the lethargy that Satan is trying to throw around us. This is our time for labor, but by and by will come rest, sweet rest, for our weary souls. There remaineth a rest for the children of God and, oh, how sweet will be that rest to the tired and weary saints. Let us look forward to the time with joy when the dear Savior will come, for he has said:—

"I will come again and receive you to myself."

What a grand, glorious promise we have if we will only be faithful.

Your sister waiting for the dear Savior.

THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN AT HAND.

ED. WRIGHT.

It seems impossible for many to see that the setting up of the kingdom is an event yet future, because John preached the kingdom of heaven at hand, and Jesus, in charging his disciples, told them to preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Matt. iii. and x.

Now if the term "at hand" means at the very time it was spoken, then verily our looking for a kingdom still to come is without foundation.

But how about the term "at hand" as used in the New Testament?

Its use there shows that it covers a long period of time.

Rev. i. 3: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein; for the time is at hand.

Rev. xxii. 10: Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book: for the time is at hand.

And Peter in speaking of the resurrection and judgment declares that the end of all things is at hand. 1 Peter iv. 7.

These are enough to show that "at hand," as used in the Bible, takes in a long period of time.

Again: Jesus told his disciples of the signs that would immediately precede his coming, the last of which is the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, and then they should know that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. Luke xxi. 31.

So if it is only nigh at hand when all the signs spoken of are seen, then verily it was not in existence 1800 years ago, nor is it yet in an organized condition.

"Well," says one, "what did John mean when he said the kingdom of heaven is near at hand?"

He simply meant, as the forerunner of Christ, that they should reform, for the Messiah, the King of Israel had made his appearance among them.

The Diaglott renders Matt. iii. 2:—Reform, because the Royal Majesty of the heavens has approached.

That this is the correct idea the reader should notice that king and kingdom are used interchangeably in some places in the Bible.

Matthew (xxi. 5) in recording Christ's ride into Jerusalem has it, "Tell ye the daughter of Zion, Behold thy King cometh," etc.

And Mark (xi. 10) gives it, "Blessed be the kingdom of our father David that cometh in the name of the Lord." See also Luke xix. 38.

King and kingdom are also used synonymously in the second chapter of Daniel.

Now, if by comparing Scripture with Scripture we find that "Blessed be the kingdom of our father David that cometh in the name of the Lord" means simply king as given by Luke, may we not conclude that when John said the kingdom is at hand, he simply meant the king had made his appearance among them?

Those who contend that the kingdom was really in existence when John preached are referred to the above citations showing the use of "at hand."

In hope of the kingdom when it shall come.

Youths' Column.

Jesus and Infants.

There is no sweeter story told,
In all the blessed book,
Than how the Lord within his arms
The little children took.

We love him for the tender touch
That made the leper whole,
And for the wondrous words that healed
The tired, sin sick soul.

But closer to his loving self
Our human hearts are brought,
When for the little children's sake
Love's sweetest spell is wrought.

For their young eyes his sorrowful face
A smile of gladness wore—
A smile that for his little ones
It wears the evermore

The voice that silenced priest and scribe
For them grew low and sweet,
And still for them his gentle lips
The loving words repeat.

Forbid them not, O blessed Christ,
We bring them unto thee,
And pray that on their heads may rest
Thy benedicite.

What Pretty Poll Did.

The Portland, Me., Transcript tells this "auto" bird story:

A lighted cigar once happened to fall under the door of a parrot's cage. The fumes soon attracted her attention, and being a sagacious bird, she instantly set about abating the nuisance.

Taking a small cup of cold tea that was in the cage, the bird poured the contents on the burning end of the cigar and extinguished it.

Every pretty Poll, who does not live in a cage, might act on the hint given by this bright bird, and throw cold water on the whole smoking business, with good effect.

Little Annie, before going to bed, lifted up her heart in prayer to Jesus and gave herself into his keeping, while Nettie, her sister, was thoughtlessly undressing herself and jumping into bed without prayer. Annie at once fell asleep and was resting peacefully in the arms of him to whom she had committed herself, while Nettie was restlessly turning over.

At length she awoke Annie, complaining that the pillow was hard and so flat she could not sleep upon it.

"I know what is the matter with your pillow," said Annie, "there is no prayer in it!"

Nettie thought a moment, then got quietly out of bed, prayed, laid down again and found her pillow softer. She then said to herself, "That is what my pillow wanted; it is soft now," and she soon, too, was sweetly sleeping.

Are there not thousands of other pillows which might be softened by prayer?

The Little Hero.

Can a boy be a hero? Of course he can, if he has courage, and a good opportunity to show it. The boy who will stand up for the right, stick to the truth, resist temptation, and suffer rather than do wrong, is a moral hero.

Here is an example of true heroism. A little drummer-boy, who had become a great favorite with the officers, was asked by the Captain to take a glass of rum. But he declined saying, "I am a cadet of temperance, and do not taste strong drink."

"But you must take some now," said the Captain. "You have been on duty all day, beating the drum and marching, and now you must not refuse. I insist upon it." But still the boy stood firm and held fast to his integrity.

"The Captain then turned to the Major and said; "Our little drummer is afraid to drink. He will never make a soldier."

"How is this?" said the Major playfully, "Do you refuse to obey the order of your Captain?"

"Sir," said the boy, "I have never refused to to obey the Captain's orders, and have tried to do my duty as a soldier faithfully; but I must refuse to drink rum, because I know it will injure me."

"Then," said the Major in a stern tone of voice, in order to test his sincerity, "I command you to take a drink and you know it is death to disobey orders!"

The little hero, fixing his clear blue eye on the face of the officer said: "Sir, my father died a drunkard; and when I entered the army, I promised my dear mother that I would not taste a drop of rum, and I mean to keep my promise. I am sorry to disobey orders sir: but I would rather suffer anything than disgrace my mother, and break my temperance pledge."

Was not that boy a hero?

The officers approved the conduct of that noble boy, and told him that so long as he kept that pledge, and performed his duty faithfully as a soldier, he might expect from them regard and protection.

Children's Friend.

"She Was a Stranger."

A missionary was requested to go out to a new settlement to address a Sabbath school. He had preached in the morning, and was wearied, and felt quite unfitted for the task, but reluctantly consented to go. When he found himself at the spot he looked round for the assembly with great misgivings, not knowing what to say to them. He noticed a little girl, shabbily dressed and bare-footed, shrinking in a corner, her little sunburnt face buried in her hands, the tears trickling between her small brown fingers, and sobbing as if her heart would break. Soon, however, another little girl, about eleven years old, got up and went to her, led her to a brook, then seated her on a log, and kneeling beside her, she took off her ragged sunbonnet, and dipping her hand in the water, bathed her hot eyes and tear-stained face, and smoothed the tangled hair, talking in a cheery manner all the while.

The little girl brightened up; the tears all went, and smiles came creeping around the rosy mouth.

The missionary stepped forward and said:—

"Is that your little sister, my dear?"

"No, sir," answered the child, with tender, earnest eyes; "I have no sister, sir."

"Oh, one of the neighbors' children," replied the missionary. "A little schoolmate, perhaps?"

"No, sir, she is a stranger. I do not know where she came from. I never saw her before."

Then how came you to take her out, and have such a care for her, if you do not know her?"

"Because she was a stranger, sir, and seemed all alone, and needed somebody to be kind to her."

"Ah!" said the missionary to himself, "there is a text for me to preach from: 'Because she was a stranger, and seemed all alone, and needed somebody to be kind to her.'"

The words came to him:—

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

So, taking the little girl by the hand, he went back to the schoolroom, and told the people the simple story; then spoke of the great love that all should bear to one another, even as our Savior sought out those who were humble and of low estate, making them his peculiar care. The missionary forgot his weariness, and felt that God had put a good word into his mouth.

A Word to Young Ladies.

My Dear Young Friends:

Have you ever considered what is the main blessing bestowed upon man, in this present life?

In my mind the greatest of all blessings is good health.

Who can but admire a child with a rosy face, and a perfect form—one that looks like the picture of good health, in preference to a sickly unnatural one that looks like a plant dwarfed from some unknown cause?

For example, take a plant or tree; set it out, give it plenty of room, air, and sunshine as nature has arranged and it will grow and almost seem to exult for joy; then take another plant of the same kind, and set where neither sun nor air can freely reach it, and you will soon perceive the difference: the first one will grow, the latter will seem to stand for a time and then gradually dwindle and die.

If you should set out a fine thrifty tree, stand boards all around it, and then tightly rope the boards to the tree, would you for one moment think it would be as good for the tree as to let nature have its course?

No, I know you would not. I like to see a young person walk graceful and erect. For this it is not necessary to be propped. Then let me say just here—never treat the human form with less judgment than you would a plant or tree.

As God never intended woman to crush out her existence with that worst wide evil—the corset, which has caused the death of thousands, should not its use be utterly abandoned?

How ignorant are mothers of the dangers attending its use. Glance over the country and look at girls from eight to ten years of age; then look at them ten years later, and the rose has left their cheeks and a sallow paleness has taken its place; and yet mothers will lay this to anything but the true cause.

Let my dear young female readers be persuaded to never put them on, and so never have to leave them off.

With much love to you I remain the childrens' friend.

AUNTIE.

Brevities.

Some of the Egyptian mummies are encased in bandages more than 1,000 yards long.

Stone coffins occur among the Anglo-Saxons as early as 695, were not quite obsolet before the reign of Henry VIII.

Excavations commenced a short distance from the walls of Pompeii, with a view of ascertaining the nature of the surroundings of the city, have led to the discovery, within an area of a few square yards, of thirty skeletons, ten of which were huddled together in one room of a small suburban villa. Bracelets, necklaces, ear-rings, and other objects were found upon the bones.

AN ELECTRIC STORM AT SEA.

The German war schooner Nautilus reports passing through a singular storm while crossing the South Pacific from Tahiti to Sydney, Australia. On the afternoon of May 11, the whole heavens appeared to be enveloped in cloud, which made it so dark that the crew could scarcely see the length of the ship. The thunder became deafening, and the flashes of lightning almost blinded the sailors' eyes. All around the vessel the lightning was striking the water, so that persons on board expected the vessel itself would be hit. But this they were spared. The effect, however, was singular and grand, and at times the vessel appeared to be in flames in several places at once. Bolts of lightning on several occasions fell to the water within twenty or forty yards of the ship's side. While this peculiar storm lasted very little rain fell and the sea was almost entirely still.

Mr. F. W. Percival writes to the Athenæum: "In passing through Naples last spring, I noticed in the Room of the Gems at the Museum a large gold signet ring (numbered 91) with the figure of a Hittite engraved upon it. He is represented with a conical cap, and boots with the toes turned up, and his hair hangs down in long tresses, which reminded me of those of the colossal statue of Niobe or Cybele on Mount Sipylus. His left arm is stretched out, like that of the pseudo-Semiramis in the pass of Carabel, and also of the Hittite figure on the monument brought from Jerslus, the supposed site of Carchemish, which is now in the British Museum; and is holding up what appears to be some kind of animal, such as a hare or rabbit. This is worth noticing, because the Hittites seem to have kept apes and other animals, and they are often represented with them, as, for example, in the sculptures at Boghas Keui and Eyuk."

London Times.

A FIERY GRAVE.

The Westphalia papers give an account of a terrible catastrophe which occurred in the northwestern part of that province on the 18th inst. There has been for some time in operation in the neighborhood of Solingen, not far from Barmen, a strange phenomenon. A part of the soil of a hilly heath became excessively hot, so much so that some people living close by availed themselves of the heat for domestic purposes. The explanation suggested was that some inflammable subterranean gas, or perhaps petroleum, had been accidentally set on fire. Some water had been brought to the spot by an artificial channel; but its contact with the burning soil had only produced violent explosions, which seemed to shatter all the ground around. Yesterday week some persons drove out in a carriage from Remscheid to inspect the spot. When arrived at a distance of about a quarter of an English mile, they heard a strange rumbling noise, which so terrified the horses that they had to alight, and send the carriage back some distance. They walked on, discussing the likelihood of any danger, when suddenly a space of the hillside, about 100 metres square, opened, disclosing a gulf of liquid fire, and throwing up flames. The house where the family mentioned above lived was at once surrounded by the flame, and was, before their eyes, swallowed up in the liquid fiery caldron at their feet, apparently feeding the flames. It is known that several persons were in the house; none were saved, but it has not been ascertained how many perished.

ISLAM IS YET AN AGGRESSIVE FORCE.

The Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, who is now traveling in the East, writes as follows: "The most prosperous missionary operations I have yet seen—I have not been to Beyrout—are those of the United Presbyterian Board in America which are now established in Egypt. For twenty-five years they have been successful in planting several healthy churches and about forty preaching stations. I was greatly pleased with their schools in Cairo, for there, as everywhere else, the chief hope rests with the young. Neither here nor in Egypt have two Mussulmans been converted. The Upas tree of Islam is not dying out yet by any means. If any man dreams that it is let him go out and visit in Cairo the immense Mohammedan University of El Azrah, with its ten thousand students, all busy over the koran and preparing to be priests and missionaries. Moslem is still an aggressive force."

A NEW MONTHLY.

THE AGES TO COME!

A monthly periodical, entitled as above, will be issued from the office of OUR HOME, Chicago, Ill., the first number of which will appear on October 1, 1881. It will be in size the same as OUR HOME, 16 pages, 9x12 inches, printed on good paper, from clear type, and in every way a first class journal.

Its title, THE AGES TO COME, indicates the principal character it will sustain, viz., an advocate of what the Editor believes to be the Bible view of God's plan concerning the ages, showing that "God is the Savior of all men, especially of those that believe;" that He is now "taking out of the Gentiles a people for His name" (manifestation) and that he will exalt these in due time to heavenly places, and unite them by marriage to His Son, thus constituting them the Wife of Him to whom all power is given in heaven and upon earth. Then will they share with Him the glory of an everlasting reign, and with Him become a means of blessing all nations.

It will also teach the doctrine of Life only through Christ; the destruction (not eternal torment) of the wicked; and doctrines akin to these, as revealed in God's Holy Book.

It will strenuously maintain the inspiration of the Bible, as opposed to the growing infidelity of the day; and in the line of Christian duty it will oppose the tendency to worldliness so common in all churches, and advocate a holy life and pure speech, that we may be always ready to meet our blessed coming Lord.

In many respects it will occupy the same ground as that which was occupied by the Bible Examiner, so long and ably published by our late lamented brother, Geo. Storrs, and is intended to take up the work where he laid it down.

We wish to hear from every one who believes in the views we have outlined, and to secure their assistance in the procuring of subscribers. Let us hear from you at once, that we may know how large an edition to print on the first number. Send for a prospectus.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GREEK AND ENGLISH!

—REVISED—

THE EMPHATIC DIAGLOTT

—By BENJAMIN WILSON.—

Contains the Original Greek text of the New Testament, with an interlinear word-for-word English translation, based on the renderings of eminent critics, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscripts, together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references.

The different renderings of various passages in the New Testament are the foundations on which most of the sects of Christians have been built up; with this work each reader may judge for himself whether the words there literally translated are so arranged in the common version as to express the exact meaning of the New Testament writers.

New improved edition on larger paper, 901 pages, cloth $4.00, Library binding $5.00.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXX. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCTOBER 5, 1881. NO. 37.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisite to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE.

Its Proximity. Sixth, or Second Woe Trumpet, Continued. Binding Continued. Zingis the Mogul Tartar. His Life and Conquests. His Special Work Compared With Attila and Cyrus. How Far, and in What Sense He Was God's Messenger. Conclusion.

No. 85.

J. P. WEETHER.

Zingis, or Temugin, was of noble parentage. His seventh ancester was said to be from the immaculate conception of a virgin. His father reigned over about forty thousand families in the highlands of central Asia. At the age of about forty years the surrounding tribes were subjugated. Fear and recompense constituted his two-edged sword by which his enemies were subdued. The sweets and bitters of life he shared among his followers. His cruelty was terrible. After his first victory, seventy of the most guilty rebels were cast headlong into caldrons of boiling water. His savage treatment of his enemies, made the greatest chieftains tremble.

Zingis (most great) was a title given to Temugin, by one of their prophets, who could ascend into heaven on a white horse. On Zingis was conferred the divine right to universal domination. He was the author of a new code of laws, and a new system of religion; part Lamaism, yet including a "system of pure theism and perfect toleration." His chief article of faith was the same as that of Mahomet, "There is one God."

"In the same camp were the Bonze, the Imam, the Rabbi, the Nestorian, and the Latin priest, who enjoyed the same exemption from service and tribute."—Gibbon.

Zingis could neither read nor write. Neither had any of the khans a knowledge of letters. Their exploits were handed down through tradition, till collected and written by the Syrians, Arabians, Latins, Greeks, Russians and Poles.

The first conquests of Zingis were the surrounding tribes; between the Volga and the walls of China. These victories gave him his Scythian, or home empire; the empire of wandering shepherds. With these subjects he began his foreign conquests. China was first invaded. Ninety cities were taken. This northern tempest shook the empire. In this first invasion he compelled the Chinese empire to pay tribute of one thousand horses, five hundred youths, and an equal number of virgins, besides gold and silk.

In his second expedition he forced the Chinese emperor beyond the Yellow river. Pekin was decimated. China was desolated by the Tartars, and the five northern provinces changed masters.

His dominion extended west, to the territory of Mahometans, under the sultan of Carisme, whose authority was supreme from the Persian gulf to India and Turkestan. With this prince Zingis desired to live on terms of friendship. A just resentment forced him to arms. The murder of one of his caravans of one hundred and fifty merchants and three ambassadors by the command of Mohammed, justified the Tartar in the invasion of the Mahometan empire. It was not undertaken till after justice had been refused, and he had prayed and fasted on a mountain three days and three nights. He put in motion the vast forces of northern and central Asia, consisting of 700,000 fighting men, against the Turks under Mohammed, who met him in the vast plains north of the Jaxartes with 400,000 men. One hundred and sixty thousand Carismians (Turks) were slain. Mohammed retired, and threw the remainder of his forces into frontier cities.

Those cities—Otrar, Cogonde, Bochara, Samercand, Carisme, Herat, Meron, Nisabour, Balch, and Candahar, finally submitted to the Mogul chief.

"The conquests of the Mogul empire will be stated, only so far as they illustrate the binding of the Turkish empire. The power of the hands will appear in the overwhelming forces of the binder. The empire of China was first overrun and subjugated at the sacrifice of many millions of human beings.

Persia was conquered by the grandson of Zingis. The throne of the Abassides, at Bagdad, that had stood for five centuries was overturned by the Moguls, and the caliph Mostasem, the last of the temporal successors of Mahomet, was slain. The cities of Mecca and Medina were spared by the Mogul Tartars; perhaps their geographical position, rather than any other cause, saved them. They, however, passed the Tigris and Euphrates, pillaged Aleppo and Damascus, and threatened to join the Franks in the deliverance of Jerusalem. Egypt was lost, had she been defended only by her feeble offspring; but the Mamalukes had breathed in their infancy the keenness of a Scythian air: equal in valor, superior in discipline, they met the Moguls in many a well-fought field; and drove back the stream of hostility to the eastward of the Euphrates. But it overflowed with resistless violence the kingdoms of Armenia and Anatolia, of which the former was possessed by Christians, and the latter by the Turks. The sultans of Iconium opposed some resistance to the Mogul arms, till Azadin sought a refuge among the Greeks of Constantinople, and his feeble successors, the last of the Seljukian dynasty, were finally extirpated by the khans of Persia.

The great western invasion was undertaken by a select army of Mogul Tartars, amounting to 500,000 men, under Batou, the nephew of Octai, the great khan. After a feast, which continued forty days, his expedition commenced. After six years the army had traversed ninety degrees of longitude. Taking Russia in in its course, and subduing that country, they subjugated every country they entered, till they arrived at the confines of Germany. The invincible bravery of the Germans, English, and French turned them back towards their distant homes in central Asia. A large part of Europe was brought under the Mogul empire.

"The Latin world was darkened by this cloud of savage hostility: a Russian fugitive carried the alarm to Sweden; and the remote nations of the Baltic and the ocean trembled at the approach of the Tartars, whom their fear and ignorance were inclined to separate from the human species."—Gibbon.

Batou in this expedition passed nearly around the Greek empire without making any attack upon it. He had no mission against the empire; but, on the contrary, was sent to prolong its life.

"Had the Tartars undertaken the siege, Constantinople must have yielded to the fate of Pekin, Samarcand, and Bagdad. The glorious and voluntary retreat of Batou from the Danube was insulted by the vain triumph of the Franks and Greeks; and in a second expedition death surprised him in full march to attack the capital of the Cæsars. His brother, Borga, carried the Tartar arms into Bulgaria and Thrace; but he was diverted from the Byzantine war by a visit to Novogorod, in the fifty-seventh degree of latitude, where he numbered the inhabitants and regulated the tributes of Russia."—Gibbon.

Through a domestic war of the khan against his brethren of Persia, the Greek empire was delivered from any further danger from the Tartars. Thus ended the invasions of the Tartar empire of Zingis. It now remains for us to notice its effects on the Grecian and Mahometan empires. We shall see that it (the Mogul empire) protected the former, and held back and bound the latter.

At the approach of the Tartars the sultan of Iconium consulted the Greek emperor relative to his safety, who advised him to join in defence of the barriers against their common enemy. Thus for some years the Greek empire was protected, directly by the Turks, and indirectly by the Tartars. Constantinople was threatened by Holagou, the Mogul; but the Turkish empire intervening, his efforts were made against Bagdad, and the Syrian provinces. The hostility existing between the Tartars and the Turks, inclined the Moslems to unite with the Franks and the Greeks. So, also, did the same enmity incline the Tartars to unite their friendship with the Greek empire. They offered Anatolia, which was principally occupied by the Turks, to an Armenian vassal. The fragments of the Seljukian monarchy, disputed by rival emirs, were under the control of the Turkish khan of Persia, who preserved the peace and balance of the Turkish frontier at the Euphrates.

"The death of Cazan, one of the greatest and most accomplished princes of the house of Zingis, removed this salutary control; and the decline of the Moguls gave a free scope to the rise and progress of the Ottoman Empire."—Gibbon.

When the Mogul empire had reached the zenith of its glory, after the terrible battle of Wahlstadt (A. D. 1241), it extended from the northern provinces of China to the frontiers of Poland and Germany. During this period the Turkish empire was broken into fragments, extending along the Euphrates and its tributaries. It was powerless as to making any advance into the territory of the Greek empire. Towards the close of the thirteenth century this vast empire fell into fragments, and lost its supremacy. As its power declined, the Turkish power increased; and as it recovered it again cast its eye westward for the purpose of recovering its lost possessions. It had been torn to pieces by the great northern storm (the Moguls). They were thrown back and bound to the tributaries of their great river, the Euphrates.

They were driven back and chained. So soon, however, as his fetters were removed, he assumed life and power, he began anew his western conquests. During the closing years of the thirteenth century the Seljukian dynasty expired, after holding the Turkish empire and ruling it from its origin. This family, had become corrupt through a long course of pleasure, and the future destiny of that empire required the incarnation of a new dynasty.

Before entering upon the history of the Othman, or Ottoman dynasty, some reflections on the Mogul invasion will illustrate the position and mission of the Turkish empire.

Reflections.—1. The history of the Mogul empire under Zingis and his family is as remarkable as that of Persia under Cyrus. The Bible teaches us that God raised up Cyrus for a specific work—to deliver his people from their seventy years' captivity in Babylon. He was, therefore, born at the right time and place; and was also endowed with the necessary qualifications and prepared to execute his appointed mission. This position does not justify Cyrus' entire character, nor all his works; but simply those that belong to his special work. So do we reason relative to the mission of the Mogul empire. The Greek empire had not then accomplished its work. It was necessary that it should be spared a sufficient length of time to accomplish that agency. But the Turkish empire had resolved to overthrow that empire; and, unless restrained, was prepared to accomplish that work in a few years. It was necessary, therefore, to drive her back and hold her there, till the Grecian empire could complete its mission. No other power then existed, that was able to accomplish that work. And as God then governed these nations, as in the days of Daniel and Cyrus, he was required to raise up a nation to accomplish that specific work. Such a nation was the Mogul empire, and such a work did it accomplish.

2. Who can read the history of that empire without seeing the hand of God?

a. In their first invasion of Europe, wholly sparing the Greek empire when it could have been easily overthrown.

b. In their second expedition, which was undertaken expressly for the subjugation of that empire, as they were ready to attack the empire, God sent his death angel and removed their prince.

c. In the third invasion their forces withdrew to a northern city (Novogorod) where their time was wasted.

3. The position of the Turks was equally remarkable.

a. From a hostile position not far from Constantinople, the sultan of Iconium aided the Grecian emperor, Vataces, in repelling the Tartars, their common enemy.

b. The Turks first weakened in Persia, and Syria; then they were driven out of Anatolia on to the waters of the Euphrates, where they were guarded by the kahn of Persia.

c. We can say, that to this date (A. D. 1300), the empire was "bound" at the "great river Euphrates."

There they must nationally remain till God says, "Loose."

THE RESURRECTION PROVIDED IN THE GOSPEL.

JOEL A. SIMONDS.

The resurrection of the dead is a part of the gospel, and not a part of the law. It is a part of the reward of the righteous, but is no part of the punishment of the wicked. It is essential to the gospel scheme, without it God's plan in the gospel cannot be accomplished. The promise was made to Abraham and his seed, but not to the wicked. The resurrection of the dead has to do with such as have made the Lord their God, but it has nothing to do with those who live and die without hope and without God. It is always limited to those who are found worthy to live again, and never includes anyone else. It is to save men, and not to destroy them again. It does not disturb those whom it cannot save. The subjects of the resurrection provided for in the gospel, will be raised from the dead with incorruptible, immortal and heavenly bodies, so that they can die no more. It is always conditional on a fitness of character which has been formed in this life, to live again.

My object at this time is to show that the whole gospel scheme including the resurrection of the dead

IS CONDITIONAL.

I understand, and I presume it will be conceded by all, that the gospel preached to Abraham, is the gospel both of the Old and New Testaments, and that whatever is found, or not found in that gospel, will be good authority on this subject.

Without faith it is impossible for anybody to please God. This covers the whole ground, and includes all of its details. Faith is the condition without which we cannot please God. Whatever is not of faith is of sin. Abraham was justified by faith. Abraham believed God and it was counted to him for righteousness. By faith Abraham received the promises. In all these respects faith was the condition of acceptance with God.

These promises contained the everlasting covenant God made with Abraham and his seed. This covenant contained the promise of the resurrection of the dead, by implication.

The Lord had said to Abraham, that he should die in a good old age, and in this covenant he promised to give him the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, which includes an implied promise to raise him up to everlasting life. This implied promise is as definite and strong as if it was fully expressed. This covenant included only Abraham and his seed. This resurrection was promised on conditions either expressed or necessarily implied. It was to be a resurrection to eternal life in order to qualify him and his seed to inherit the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession. In this covenant the Lord was to be the God of his people.

And Christ said, that, when Moses called the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, he showed that they would be raised from the dead. The conditions of the resurrection are the same as the conditions of salvation.

The resurrection provided in the gospel preached to Abraham is limited to Abraham and his seed, to those who have made the Lord their God, to those who have become Christ's by faith, and holds according to the promise. It is limited to those who are in Christ, and who are dead in him, and to those who have the spirit of God dwelling in them in this life, and to those whose conversation is in heaven. It is limited to those whom the Father gave to Christ, and who believe on him, and who come to him, and who eat his flesh and drink his blood. It is limited to those who seek for it as Paul did, and to those who overcome as Christ did, and finally, it is limited to those, and those only, who are found worthy of the resurrection from the dead.

This is the gospel plan of resurrection, and those who do not comply with its conditions can no more be raised from the dead than those who do not comply with the conditions of salvation, can be saved. These conditions must be universal in their application.

If any must be worthy in order to attain unto the resurrection of the dead, all must. If any can be raised from the dead without being worthy, all can.

The conditions of the resurrection, and of salvation are a part of the gospel scheme. To separate them from it would break up God's plan in the gospel. There would be nothing left to connect the different parts of the plan together. Its efficiency would be wholly destroyed, and the gospel scheme could never be consummated. If the resurrection in the gospel plan is conditional, and if it is a resurrection to eternal life, then, any interpretation of the Scriptures, which makes the resurrection unconditional, and for any other purpose than eternal life, cannot be correct.

These conditions stand related to the different objects of the gospel in this way.

The gospel must be preached in order to be understood; it must be understood, in order to be believed; it must be believed, in order that men may become worthy of the resurrection; men must be raised from the dead, in order to have a eternal life; they must have eternal life, in order to inherit the rulership in the kingdom of God; they must inherit the kingdom, that they may gather out of it all things that offend, and them that do iniquity; and accomplish the restitution of all things which have been spoken by all the prophets since the world began; even to subdue all things unto God, so that the will of God may be done in earth as it is done in heaven, that God may be all in all.

Without these conditions God's purpose in the gospel cannot be accomplished.

If the gospel is not preached, it cannot be understood; if it is not understood, it cannot be believed; if it is not believed, men cannot become worthy of the resurrection; if men are not raised from the dead, they cannot have eternal life; if men do not have eternal life, they cannot inherit the kingdom; if men do not inherit the kingdom, then, all things that offend, and them that do iniquity will not be gathered out of it, the restitution of all things will not be accomplished; all things will not be subdued to God, and the will of God will not be done in earth as it is done in heaven, that God may be all in all.

Every step in this process is a condition of the step that follows, until the grand climax is reached, that God may be all in all.

If these conditions are essential to the resurrection (as they seem to be), then there can be no unconditional resurrection. The gospel provides for a resurrection to eternal life, but it does not provide for a resurrection to mortal life.

Thus, the resurrection provided for in the gospel is well defined. It is a resurrection to eternal life, on the condition of being worthy of it.

Is there any other plan of resurrection in the Bible in conflict with this?

Is there a plan that sets aside those conditions?

If there is, which is true?

For both cannot be true. If a wicked man who is not worthy, can be raised from the dead, then, the gospel plan requiring a man to be worthy in order to be raised from the dead is not true. If wicked men can be raised from the dead to die again, then the gospel plan to raise up only such as are worthy of eternal life, cannot be true.

Which plan shall we accept, as both cannot be true?

CHRIST AN EXAMPLE OF RESURRECTION ON THE GOSPEL PLAN.

Christ was raised from the dead, as head of the church—the members of his body. He was the first that should rise from the dead, the first-born from the dead, the first-born among many brethren. He was the first fruits of the resurrection—the first sheaf of the harvest of the dead. He was raised from the dead on the gospel plan, because he was worthy, because he was faithful, because he overcame. His body was raised a glorious, incorruptible, immortal body, like the angels, to die no more.

This is a sample of resurrection on the gospel plan. All who are to be raised from the dead must be like this sample.

Christ said, Because I live, ye shall live also.

He lives because he was raised from the dead, so will his people live. He was raised from the dead because he was worthy, so must those be who are to be raised from the dead. He was raised incorruptible, so must the dead be raised. He was raised up to sit on the throne of his father David, for the same purpose the dead must be raised up to sit down with him in his throne.

Thus, Christ was a sample of the resurrection of the whole of the harvest of the dead, on the gospel plan. But he was not a sample of the resurrection of any wicked man.

Having shown the kind of resurrection provided in the gospel, I will now proceed to answer one objection to this view, and when this one objection is answered, all objections are answered. It is urged against the view I have taken that

THE RESURRECTION IS UNCONDITIONAL.

As proof of this we are referred to Dan. xii. 2; John v. 28, 29; Acts xxiv. 15, 16.

It is claimed that these passages teach an unconditional resurrection for all the wicked.

1. If this is true, it nullifies, and makes untrue the whole of the gospel plan of resurrection. It introduces another plan wholly in conflict with it. The gospel plan is conditional, this plan introduces the resurrection of the wicked, which is unconditional. The gospel plan requires that men should become worthy of the resurrection in order to attain unto it. This plan denies the gospel requirement of worthiness, and says that all men will attain unto the resurrection whether they are worthy or not. The gospel plan is to raise the dead incorruptible to eternal life. This plan denies the gospel plan, and raises the dead corruptible to die again. The gospel plan raises the dead to save them. This plan raises the dead to destroy them again. The gospel plan has furnished a sample of the resurrection for all who are worthy of it. But this plan has furnished no sample of the unconditional resurrection of the wicked dead, and gives no assurance of it except by denying the gospel plan. Then whatever those proof texts may teach, they cannot teach the unconditional resurrection of the wicked dead.

2. If this is the sense of those proof passages as claimed, it would nullify and make void the penalty of the law given to Adam. That law appoints all men to die once, and only once. This view sets aside that law entirely, and requires the wicked, who have been punished once according to that law to be raised from the dead to be punished again. Such a view would entirely change the mission of Christ and the gospel. He came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them. But this view requires that he raise up the great mass of the dead to destroy them again.

Then, a sense of those passages which would introduce such damaging results, and so change the leading purpose of Christ's mission, cannot be correct.

There must be some other sense of these Scriptures that will be in harmony with the law and the gospel. For God cannot deny himself. He cannot destroy the law that was to have jurisdiction over the race of Adam for ever, and the gospel plan of resurrection, for the sake of raising up the wicked, after having suffered punishment, to punish them again.

But there may be a way out of this difficulty without doing such violence to the harmony of the Scriptures. In Ezekiel it is said:—

"Thus saith the Lord, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel."

This language is as strong as any that can be found in the Bible on the subject. And yet it is only a figure to represent that the living people of Israel will be gathered into their own land. It means the same as this:—

"I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land."

In this passage the resurrection of the dead, the bringing them out of their graves, is used to represent what will take place among living men. Paul said:—

"For if the casting away of them (the people of Israel) be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?"

This is another case where the resurrection of the dead is used to represent something besides the literal resurrection of the dead.

These two passages furnish us a precedent for interpreting all of those passages, as figurative, which speak of the resurrection of the wicked. The resurrection of the wicked being unconditional, is always in conflict with the conditional resurrection of the gospel. If we do not know exactly how such passages apply, we may be sure that they can never apply to a literal resurrection of the wicked, for in that sense they are all in flat contradiction of the gospel plan of resurrection.

If the wicked can attain unto the resurrection of the dead, without being worthy of it, the gospel plan is not true. If, as the gospel requires, men must become worthy of the resurrection in order to attain unto it, then, the resurrection of the wicked cannot be true. If the wicked are to be raised up corruptible, so that they can die again, then, the gospel plan to raise the dead incorruptible, to die no more, is not true. But, if the gospel plan of raising the dead incorruptible and immortal so that they can die no more, is true, then it is not true that any of the dead will be raised up to die again.

CONCLUSION.

1. That there is no provision in the gospel for the unconditional resurrection of the dead.

2. That the plan of resurrection in the gospel is conditional. That the conditions are the same as the conditions of salvation. That the resurrection is always limited to those that comply with its conditions and become worthy of eternal life.

3. That these conditions are essential to the gospel scheme of resurrection and salvation.

RESONANT SAND.

M. Lenz, in a recent communication to the Geographical Society of France in regard to his voyage to Timbuctoo, speaks of a curious phenomenon that he witnessed, and which he calls "resonant sand." "In the Inguidi," says he, "a region of sand dunes very difficult to cross, I observed a phenomenon which was as rare as it was interesting—resonant or musical sand. All at once one hears in the desert, issuing from a sand dune, a prolonged, smothered sound quite like the noise of a trumpet. It lasts for some seconds, and then stops to resume itself in another direction. The phenomenon renders the traveller anxious. I suppose it proceeds from the friction against one another of the burning hot grains of quartz, which are simply laid one over the other and are always in motion."

He that knows how to pray has the secret of safety in prosperity, and of support in trouble. He has the art of overruling every enemy, and of turning every loss into a gain. He has the power of soothing every care, of subduing every passion, and of adding a relish to every enjoyment. Many things are good for me, but none so good as to draw nigh unto God.—Jay.

There is a persecution sharper than that of the axe. There is an iron that goes into the heart deeper than the knife. Cruel sneers, and sarcasms, and pitiless judgments and cold-hearted calumnies—these are persecutions.—Robertson of Brighton.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Oct. 5, 1881.

SOME communications have been deferred in consequence of our absence for the last five days. We will now do the best we can for our correspondents.

OUR visit to Ladark was exceedingly interesting to us, as it gave an opportunity to form a personal acquaintance with several brethren and sisters only known to us by their correspondence. A brief report from Brother Glotfelty is given elsewhere. We shall probably write more fully next week.

THE news of the day is one continued record of wickedness and outrage in the moral world and of physical disaster in the natural. The forebodings of a time of trouble, that have impressed the minds of the more thoughtful of God's children, are fast being realized "Coming events are casting their shadows before." Come, Lord Jesus.

IN this number of THE RESTITUTION will be found two articles on the resurrection. One, advocating the universal resurrection of all classes of the dead, is from the pen of Brother Robert Pegrum, Professor of Hebrew, a resident of Brooklyn, N. Y., and sent at the request of some of our brethren in that city. It is an able article and will be read with a great deal of interest by many of our brethren and sisters. The article advocating the doctrine of the resurrection of the righteous alone is from the pen of Brother J. A. Simonds who is a well known and talented correspondent. To a portion of our readers his article will be welcome. These articles were written without reference to controversy on the subject. We submit them as such to our readers as expressive of the views of the writers. We well remember how decided the protest was a while ago on the continued discussion of this question, and shall therefore for the present let these articles suffice. There is a third view not contemplated in either of these communications, which is that a resurrection of judgment may, in the case of Israel, the heathen, and all who have not had the opportunity to receive or reject the gospel, be a resurrection for trial. As in the August number of the North American Review, the articles of Col. Ingersoll and Judge Black were submitted on their merits to its readers so we submit these. Our own conclusion is that the resurrection will be general and embrace orders. But we will forbear discussion.

REPORT OF CONFERENCE AT LANARK, ILLINOIS, OCT. 2, 1881.

Brethren met Friday evening, Sept. 29th, Brother Button and Brother Jacobs occupying the time, speaking of the promises and the faith once delivered to the saints.

Saturday morning met at 9 o'clock in social worship, and a discussion of the necessity of a church organization, not coming to any decided conclusion, however. At 11 o'clock Brother Chaplin read from Philippians, and spoke of the necessity of living a practical Christian and working out our soul's salvation, fitting us for the Paradise of God.

Met again at 2 o'clock. Brother J. Arnold opened the exercises by reading from Rom. xii., after which the hymn book, now in process of print by Brethren Myers and Arnold, was talked of with the conclusion that Brother Myers have whatever gain, if there be any, in the sale thereof.

At 3 o'clock Brother Jacobs read from Rev. xxii., and spoke of the fall and the manner of redemption of man, in his earnest way. At night Brother Button opened the meeting by reading the last chapter of Mark. Brother Myers then occupied the time speaking of the commission, "He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved," etc., to an attentive audience, hoping that some good will result.

Sunday morning brethren met at 9 o'clock in social worship, building one another up in the most holy faith; closing the business of the conference by appointing Brother Arnold to look up a place for the next conference.

At 10:30 Brother Chaplin delivered a discourse on the fall and redemption, explaining how that we can attain the Deific name and become heirs to the promises by becoming children of God—that an untoward and wicked people are not children of God. After which the ordinances of the Lord's Supper were attended to by a goodly number of brethren and sisters.

Afternoon, Brother Button took the stand and spoke from Isa. xxxv. in relative to the sure mercies of David, to a large and attentive congregation.

At night Brother Chaplin resumed his subject on the manner of getting into the name, not names, of Christ, and being the children of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ, to a very attentive audience, presenting the symbol of the resurrection in so plain a light that any and all could not help but understand the necessity of being ingrafted into the live branch; after which one arose for baptism.

Thus ended one of the most interesting meeting held for many days.

Yours in the faith.

J. M. GLOTFELTY.

P. S.—Brethren Chaplin and Button remained over. On Monday evening Brother Button spoke from John ix. 29, to the few that could be gathered together. Thus we had even more of the glad tidings than we had expected to hear. J. M. G.

Editor Restitution:

We like the paper, and it would seem as strange for it not to come to me as it would were it sent to some who cannot find pleasure in reading what may be brought out of the Treasure House for our edification. Paul said "All things edify not," and this is true, and yet I can truly say: you display great ability as an editor in making the excellent selections you do, and all, I am sure, to this end—edification.

May your life be spared you, and THE RESTITUTION readers have your valuable services as caterer-in-chief, to set before us so excellent a variety of mental and spiritual food.

Man has a natural as also a perverted appetite, and many there are, who, while in words acknowledge what they are pleased to call "the truth," show more of the perverted than the natural; and why? Echo answers, why?

It is not strange, however true, that the inclinings of humanity are more tending toward the wrong than the right, and if there is a crooked way, it is sought by preference to that which is straight; and this comes about, it seems to me, from perversity of disposition, rather than entailed proclivities. I mean by this, there is a disposition to seek some one, or some thing, on which we may put to the debtor side that which should be on our own debtor side, in a word, it ill becomes us to charge to "human depravity," that which, if we will only stop to consider, we are positively the parents of.

I am greatly pleased with your eulogium of our highly honored (and justly so) departed President. How sincerely have I wished he had done what so many of our brethren have done, after seeing the importance of scriptural baptism, as he did, to have taken the "whole counsel of God," as that is set forth in the word, and believed what you, my brother, and myself are privileged to believe, viz: The gospel scheme of redemption from death, through the Life Giver, Christ Jesus, Lord of the living and the dead.

The time was when to be a Disciple (Campbellite by derision) involved obloquy, but now like the Methodist is ranked among the Evangelicals. It was not always so. But hard names, Devil-Dodgers, Rantors, Pantilers, etc., are names once given to Wesleyans, but the race who called them such are dead, but Methodism lives.

I have no care for these hard names, they break no bones, and I conclude it is the best argument such have. We have hard names put to our credit, and are ranked among those "who don't know enough to go in when it rains," Earth-worms, No-soul folk, Infidel, and what else I know not, and care not. My foundation hope rests in the promises of Jehovah and his Son Jesus Christ, and believing all things written for my learning, as found within the Bible, and ignoring all humanly devised and gotten up creeds and forms of faith, as expressed by council, past, present or to come. I can afford to forego the honors of the majority if so blessed as to be numbered with the new minority, but who in the coming day will constitute the "powers that be," because beyond controversy, they will reign to the putting down with Christ the King, all rule, and all authority. I am anxious for this happy time to come; not because of individual good, but for the glory of God in seeing the nations blessed, in the reign of "peace on earth, good will among men."

Oh my brother, how much is lost sight of in the current forms of faith! which seems lost in the saving of an immortal soul. Query: If immortal, who made it so, and when, and where? Let those answer who can, and of course nothing short of incontrovertible proof will be accepted. The subject has so much of gravity about it that hymns cannot be offered in proof; inferences are out of the question, and analogies there are none, unless God is the original. There is involved more than can be accepted, for his days are from eternity; but not so is, or ever was, man. Pss. xc. and others, tell the truth of the matter.

I am happy in saying, we are still keeping up services in this city, and Amerieus Hall, 176 Grand St., finds a few of us every first day meeting to break the loaf and drink the cup, and hold forth the word of life, which we will do till he come, or we fall asleep waiting his advent.

Hopefully, Your Brother,

GEO. W. YOUNG.

MICHIGAN'S APPEAL.

The following is the authorized appeal from Port Huron, Mich., in behalf of the sufferers by the late forest fires:

PORT HURON, Mich., Sept. 11.—To the American People:—We have, to-night, returned from the burnt district of Huron and Sanilac counties. We have seen the burnt, disfigured, and writhing bodies of men, women, and children. Rough board coffins contained the dead; followed to the grave by a few blinded, despairing relatives; crowds of half-starved people at some of the stations, asking for bread for their families and neighbors. We hear of more than 200 victims already buried, and more charred and bloated bodies are daily discovered. Already, more than 1500 families are found to be utterly destitute and houseless. They huddle in barns, in school houses, and in their neighbor's houses, scorched, blinded, and hopeless.

Some still wander, half-crazed, about the ruins of their habitations, vainly seeking their dead; some in speechless agony wringing their hands and refusing to be comforted.

More than 10,000 people, who, only a week ago, occupied happy, comfortable homes, are, to-day, homeless and houseless. They are hungry and almost naked when found; and in such numbers, and so widely scattered, that our best efforts, and greatest resources fail to supply their immediate wants. Without speedy aid many will perish, and many more will suffer and become exiles.

Our people will do their utmost for their relief, but all our resources would fail to meet their necessities.

We appeal to the charity and generosity of the American people. Send help without delay.

A Detroit paper explains how the fire could overrun a farming country, and destroy so much property and many lives. It says:

It would seem that the flames, after consuming the forest trees and under growth, would cease at the edge of clearings, especially large ones, and that if it swept on, it must sweep around and avoid these. But such proves not to have been the fact. The swift wind, at times, exceeding eighty miles an hour, bore huge coals, burning branches of trees, clusters of flame and glowing ashes in clouds, until they fell upon farm houses, barns, and grain stacks, until they too were ignited, and added to the intensity of the furnace in which the entire region was glowing.

So thick was this falling cloud of coals and burning debris, and so intense the heat that accompanied it, that it is said that during the fires a person would soon roast to death in the center of a forty acre cleared field during the conflagration.

Governor Jerome, of Michigan, has likewise made an appeal to the people of the United States. He places the number of destitute at fifteen thousand.

The Tribune.

THE MICHIGAN CATASTROPHE.

It is, no doubt, difficult for people living in the well-cleared agricultural districts of the east, or upon the open prairies of the west, to realise how the inhabitants of a farming country could be so beset with flames as to find escape impossible. To understand the situation of the people of devastated Michigan townships, when the flaming tempest of destruction came upon them, it must be borne in mind that Northern Michigan is a heavily timbered country only recently settled. Much of the land is still covered with primeval forests of pine, oak, maple and beech.

Many of the farms are small, isolated clearings. Sometimes three or four farms lie together, but the horizon is always bounded by a wall of trees, and there is rarely a stretch of road over a mile long which does not at some point run through a "piece of woods."

Escape from one farm or group of farms to another not menaced by the advancing flames could therefore only be had by traversing the forests which fed the fire, and often the fire ran faster than could the poor creatures fleeing for their lives, and struck them down in the roads with its hot breath.

The awful tragedy of the death of these unfortunate Michigan farmers and their wives and children can only be fully understood by those who have seen great forest fires. The first warning sign of the approach of the dreaded scourge is a vast black cloud of stifling smoke which moves quickly on, blotting out the sunlight and covering the whole face of the land. Then strange noises are heard like the crackling of musketry and the boom of cannon mingled with the roar of a tempest at sea. Cattle and horses run about in blind terror uttering cries of distress. The smoke grows denser and denser until it shuts out all objects, and people endeavoring to fly from the fast coming danger often run toward its deadly embrace.

Soon there is a lurid light in the sky, the sound of falling tree trunks, bursting limbs, and crackling underbrush become more distinct, and the dull, roaring undertone grows loud and menacing; showers of sparks and big blazing brands are carried forward by the wind; the air is like the blast from a furnace door; the farm buildings take fire, and the blazing fences look like fiery serpents running across the fields. Soon the near woods are all aflame, and the whole earth seems to burn with fervent heat.

There is no assurance of safety in flight for the beleagured farmer and his family. They are fortunate if they can find their way to a swamp or a wet meadow or a field of green corn or buckwheat. In some such refuge, lying with their faces close to the ground they may keep alive until the fire is over, but if the clearing is small the air may become so heated as to cause death even where the flames do not touch them.

In the late disaster one family in the Sanilac district was suffocated in a well and many died in open fields out of the reach of the fire. Indeed, it is probable that few of the victims of the conflagration were actually burned to death, although their bodies are found in a charred condition. Nearly all were no doubt asphyxiated by hot air and smoke before the flames reached them.

Infidelity gains the victory, when it wrestles with hypocrisy or with superstition, but never when its antagonist is reason.—Geo. Bancroft.

We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

Storms rage with more or less fury about every earnest man who seeks to follow Christ fully; but with his mind stayed on God he stands safe, undisturbed, in the calm of the Master's benediction.

There is a point of rest
At the great center of the cyclone's force.
A silence at its secret sources
A little child might slumber undisturbed.
Without the rustle of one fairy curl.
In that strange central calm amid the mighty whirl.

EARTH'S CROWN.

In a valiant suffering for others, not in a slothful making others suffer for us, does nobleness lie. The chief of men is he who stands in the van of men, fronting the peril which frightens back all others; which, if it be not vanquished, will devour the others. Every noble crown is, and on earth will forever be, a crown of thorns.—Carlyle.

We are waiting, ever waiting,
For a brighter, better day,
Just beyond the clouds and shadows
That surround our lonely way;
For a day of light and gladness,
Such as earth has never known,
When in equity and justice,
Christ shall reign on David's throne.

The people in the vicinity of Florence, Italy, had a fiery experience on the 23rd of August, which produced something of a panic, and many firmly believed the last day had come. The phenomena was a hot, dry mist, then a blast of hot air, which burned the skin and took away the breath. The thermometer jumped from 93 to 108, and for half an hour the wildest consternation prevailed.

Saloon-Keepers' Revenge.

Three years ago Mr. Vanosdale, of Akron, Ohio, then a drinking man, signed the pledge and became an active worker in the cause of temperance; and in trying to enforce the laws of Ohio, as is the duty of every good citizen of the State, he incurred the wrath and displeasure of the saloon-keepers, whom he reported and had punished for violation of the statute. They swore revenge, and declared they would make a drunkard of him or his boys; they told it to Vanosdale himself, but he kept fearlessly in the path of duty, not regarding their threats, winning the respect of all with whom he came in contact, save and except the fiends bent upon the destruction of his family and happiness.

After a time the matter culminated. One of his boys went down before the wiles and allurements of these minions of Satan; broke his pledge and got drunk, and while in this condition was taken by those in league with the saloon-keepers, to the notorious "Blue-bird nest." They were there but a short time when a row occurred; a beer glass was thrown, striking young Vanosdale on the side of the head, cutting the ear nearly off, and horribly lacerating the head. In a drunken and insensible condition he was carried to an old barn, where he laid for two days.

A few days later (we know not where he was in the interim), in the absence of his parents, he was delivered to their home, struggling with that horror of horrors, the delirium tremens; his wounds unwashed, undressed, uncared for. Physicians were called, and did what was possible. Men were required to hold him by night and by day. He could not lie down, he could not sleep until Sunday, the 10th inst., when the physicians, after hours of labor, got him under the influence of anæsthetics, and then communicated to his already broken-hearted parents the dread tidings that "their boy must die of injuries and neglect."

Who can imagine that mother's suffering, weigh her heart-aches, or measure her tears?

Even if the criminals, every one in any way connected with the act, could be brought to justice and strung from a gibbet higher than Haman's, it would not take a pang from her heart; but she is denied even this consolation, in the flight of her boy's reason.

On Saturday, the 9th inst., as the father walked down the street, there was a triumphant leer upon the faces of the fiends that had brought about this great affliction, and one of them even called to him, "We've got you now, d——n you!"

Men, are you fathers, and will you give such things a passport to your homes?

Then, why do you not arise in the might of your manhood and hurl back the foul anathema at the ballot-box?

Spontaneous Combustion.

In Kornan's saloon, back of the City Hall, recently, a man was burned to death by spontaneous combustion. He had not been more than a month in the city, but in that time had been frequently arrested for drunkenness. He wandered about alone, seemingly demented, occupying his whole time in drinking the vile poison of the city front and Barbary Coast dens. He had twice been treated by Dr. Stivers for delirium tremens, and was this morning discharged after a longer time than usual. He continued drinking steadily at the various bars in the vicinity, and the large size of each potation promised to speedily send him back to the hospital. At length he staggered into the room, nearly insensible, and feebly asked for a drink. This was refused him, and he staggered toward the gas jet to light the stump of a cigar, while the bar-keeper turned away. A moment afterward he heard a low moan, and noticed a flash of fire, and turning around he saw Harley falling to the floor, his head enveloped in black, thick smoke, while flames issued from his mouth and ears. Not a moment was lost in attending to the sufferer. He was beyond relief, however. His face was perfectly black, partly charred and partly covered with a moist soot. His eyes were open. His mouth was completely roasted on the inside, but, with the exception of his head and hands, no part of his body bore marks of his horrible death. A letter found in his pocket, addressed to M. Harley or Hartley, furnished the only clue to his identity.

A tender conscience is like the apple of a man's eye—the least dust that gathers into it affects it. There is no surer and better way to know whether our consciences are dead and stupid, than to observe what impression small sins make on them.

SIGNS AND PORTENTS.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 21.—Director Swift, of the Observatory, says a new comet appeared at the very hour President Garfield was passing away. With the aid of a good telescope, four telescopic comets are now visible, a circumstance unusual, Director Smith adds, "if not portentous."

Austin Statesman.

Sunday night (Sept. 18) at 10 o'clock, just above the horizon in the southern heavens, appeared an immense ball of fire. As no sound was emitted and no track of light left in its course, it must have been at a great distance from the earth. No doubt somewhere on the coast the fall of an aerolite will be reported.

Jews are again seeking land in Syria, to which they may emigrate from European countries where life is made intolerable. They have made application for it to the Turkish Government, which, in principle, has already granted the request, reserving its approval of details until they can be more thoroughly inquired into. English and German gentlemen took the initiatory step in the matter, and they propose that roads and railways shall be built to encourage the Jews who may come to engage in agriculture. They are men of influence and wealth, and engaged to surrender to the Turkish Government any profits which may be left after the roads have been made to operate satisfactorily.

The Arabic Bible, translated by Dr. Eli Smith and Dr. C. V. A. Van Dyck, and printed at Beirut, is circulated in the Delta and along the valley of the Nile. There is a large population in this part of Africa, and westward to the Atlantic, whose vernacular is Arabic; and as rapidly as they can be reached by missionary effort copies of this Bible will be ready for them.

It is said that, when President Arthur kissed the open Bible on taking the oath of office, his lips fell on the first and second verses of the thirty-first Psalm, which are as follows:—"In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust: let me never be ashamed; deliver me in thy righteousness. Bow down thine ear to me; deliver me speedily; be thou my strong rock, for an house of defense to save me."

The scientist of the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle notes the unusual prevalence of "sun storms" during the past few weeks, caused by the appearance and disappearance of the sun-spots. He attributes the drouth and other unusual weather incidents of the season to this cause, and closes with these warning words:—"In view of the present conditions, it is well to husband the water supply, and all supplies. It is quite probable that the hot and very dry summer will be followed by a long cold winter. There has been an unprecedented evaporation of moisture from the sea and earth. When the reaction comes and condensation begins, the loss of heat will be so great that the cold will be severe. The effect of solar disturbance on the southern seas during the winter in this hemisphere will still further complicate matters by adding watery vapor, which must be condensed, robbing the air of its heat continuously."

FALL OF A HIGH MOUNTAIN PEAK.

A few days since a loud noise was heard in the mountains, on the west side of the Bitter Root, in Montana, the report resembling the firing of cannon and reverberations. It was caused by the falling of a high peak, and was distinctly heard for several miles. Thousands of tons of rock came down in the grand crash.

One of the most surprising things of the present day is the rapid increase in the number of Protestants in the capital of Spain, even to the extent of reaching and surpassing the number of 2,000. Those who were at first troubled and disconcerted by this invasion have not been slow to perceive that the new-comers professed Christianity, that they prayed every Sunday for the King as they celebrated Divine service, and that they gave an example of order and of respect for the laws. Repugnance has thus given place, if not to sympathy, at least to consideration, especially among the middle and lower classes.

GENEVA, Oct 1.—The greater part of the town of Nyon has been destroyed by an incendiary fire. Several arrests have been made.

A CONFLAGRATION IN MOSCOW.

MOSCOW, Sept. 28.—A fire, which commenced last evening in the Merchants' Bazaar in this city, has already destroyed twenty warehouses, and the whole of the bazaar except a few shops. In spite of all efforts, the conflagration is still raging. The loss is immense, and is estimated at 2,500,000 roubles. All the property destroyed is insured.

THE EARTHQUAKE IN THE ABRUZZI.

ROME, Sept. 28.—The destruction caused by the earthquake in the Abruzzi far exceeds anything indicated by the first reports. The Archbishop of Chieti appeals piteously for help. He says the disaster is only comparable to that of Casamicciola. Over 1,000 houses are uninhabitable, and the remainder are more or less fissured. Four-fifths of the population are shelterless.

CHOLERA IN ARABIA.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Sept. 28.—A telegram received at the British Embassy from Aiden says that during the past four days there have been eight cases of cholera, six of which have proved fatal. The Sanitary Board has recommended that the embarkation of pilgrims for Mecca be stopped.

ON THE ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION.

The Universal Sympathy Aroused.

J. F. GELLETLY.

God hath made of one blood all nations.—Acts xvii. 26.

Have ye read how of old it was written
In the land of perpetual thirst,
How the dry rock of Horeb was smitten,
And the life-giving waters out burst?

But which of the wonders is greater,
By the hand of the worker shown?
For behold from the crime of a traitor,
The gush of a nation's deep love.

Have ye heard of the fiat eternal,
Pronounced by the mouth of the Lord;
How the nations must gather fraternal,
And beat to the plowshare the sword?

But where is the tongue may reveal it,
Or the pen or the power to make known,
When folly And hatred conceal it,
And pride still refuses to own?

Therefore thus doth Omnipotence rule it,
And thus the great brotherhood shows,
From the wound by a murderer's bullet,
The "one blood" of humanity flows.

WHAT "NEW HEAVENS AND NEW EARTH" ARE WE LOOKING FOR?

A. W. BUTTON.

Heaven—heavens—heavenly, always express exaltation, above, over—a height; as earth expresses that which is beneath—low—under.—we read, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth;" that which is above us and that beneath us. These are the primary and literal applications of the words, "heaven and earth." An inferior, subordinate sense is oftener found in the Bible than the primary; a sense which we call metaphorical or figurative, and is merely an ideal from the original.

Thus in Rev. xii. we have a woman in the lowest heaven representing Christianity in a former age. Her clothing with the sun, the light of the gospel from Christ the religious luminary of the world, shining on her. The moon of pagan night under her feet, and the twelve apostles making the stars in the crown she wore.

But she was in trouble, and cried in pain for deliverance. The Christian cause was in sorrow in the heaven. In the same heaven there was a dragon to be seen, having seven heads and ten horns. Seven heads, one after another governed in Rome; and from the seventh, ten governments spring up; and on, and out of it, a real well authenticated fact. As he is a dragon in the symbolism, he must have a tail, which drew the third part of the stars of such a heaven as he dwelt in, and where the woman was. These stars were not those in the woman's crown; but were his satellites which he drew after him, to their ruin; for when he fell, they following him were cast down to the earth. There was war in the heaven. The manchild became the church here, being directed by God—"caught up to God"—as John calls it, and placed on "his throne" by Providence, where he was to rule all nations with Roman rigor. When the dragon—the symbol of imperial pagan government—was cast out of the heaven, and had no more a place there, nor his angel satellites; being conquered by the hero of the woman—her manchild—whom history calls, "Constantine the great," but John called "Michael," because he acted as God's agent against pagan superstition, always upheld by the dragon power in heaven—there was great joy. Christianity had before made great conquests over minds; perhaps two-thirds of the official stars had been won to renounce paganism. But now she had an emperor! And John heard an erroneous opinion proclaimed in the heaven with a loud voice. The mistake of which was:—

"Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of God, and the power of his Christ; for the accuser of our brethren is cast down," etc.

Did they suppose the immortal hope of the kingdom of God, and the power of Christ in his glory had come because the accuser was fallen?

Did they accept this for that? when with joy they cried:—"Therefore rejoice ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them."

None but worldly and more than doubtful Christians, could so fall from the true hope. We may be sure this was not the voice of the remnant, "which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus." It was joyful that this old serpent, called the Devil (accuser) and Satan (the oppressor), was cast down, which deceived the whole world, by making Christ's religion a crime, in all the world; and making any pagan superstition virtuous, just and righteous, by law. But it was not the joy of the kingdom and presence of Christ, which the voice of the unfaithful majority proclaimed it to be.

The woman in distress, the manchild birth, the dragon with his heads, and the horns in prospect, the war and changes it effected, were in heaven. Such a heaven of infinity could only be of the lowest type. A Roman earthly heaven, in symbolic language, which had principalities and powers within it, in heavenly places. In which the church of Christ in Paul's time, was making known to men the manifold wisdom of God, by preaching the gospel in them to the populace.

Eph. iii. 9, 10: "The whole armor of God"—the whole truth of the faith, was needful, to enable Christians "to stand against the wiles of the devil," the earthly accusing power. It was not the flesh and blood they warred against; the established usages and laws maintained, in the principalities and powers, the rulers of the darkness of this world, (of that age) against spiritual wickedness, (wicked ideas of spirituality) in high (heavenly—margin) places, were what they warred on and wrestled with, that is, against a prevailing false religion. Eph. vi. 11, 12.

Paul anticipates that believers in Christ "in the ages to come" will enjoy the highest honor and dignities in the "heavenly places." Eph. ii. 5-7.

Using the perfect tense for the future, because the arrangement is sure, he wrote:—

"Even when we were dead in sins, hath he quickened us together with Christ. And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus."

"And God called the firmament heaven. . . . Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear."

But oriental thought was so elastic that ideas easily caught similitudes. A firmament like a vastly expanded tent or floor overhead was conceived; to the under side of which the starry constellations were fastened as if nailed, and might fall.

"How art thou fallen from heaven, O day-star, (margin) son of the morning." Isa. xiv. 12.

And Rev. viii. 10, "And there fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp."

So a government extending over people was thought of as a firmament, beneath which sun, moon, and stars, were set in heavenly places; as the king, queen, and smaller magnates; and the populace below constituted an earth, over whom the former in higher spheres, in dignity presided.

And in accord with men's ideas and language God says by Isaiah to Israel:—

"But I am the Lord thy God that divided the sea. . . . And I have put my words in thy mouth, and I have covered thee in the shadow of my hand, that I may plant the heavens and lay the foundations of the earth, and say unto Zion, Thou art my people."

First he divided the sea and led Israel through from Egypt. Then by Moses he put the words of his law in their mouth. And covered when enemies were around. All this was done preparatory to planting the Judean heavens, and laying the foundations of the Israelitish earth, that he might have a Zion, of whom to say, Thou art my people. Here a political-religious heavens and earth were created, at least 2500 years after the material heavens and earth, "In the beginning" were created. Isa. li. 15, 16.

So in Isa. xxxiv. the idea of a political expanse over the nations is called "heaven" and "heavens," whose hosts were to be broken up:—

"And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth . . . and as a fig falleth from the tree. For my sword shall be bathed in heaven. The sword of the Lord is filled with blood, . . . for the Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozrah and a great slaughter in the land of Idumea."

Such heavens may be rolled up as a broad sheet or a written scroll, and all their hosts fall off to the ground.

Some of our judicious brethren whose opinions are worthy of respect, believe Peter in referring to "the heavens and the earth which are now"—in 2 Peter iii.—had the Israelitish heavens and earth in view, which were still in existence when he wrote. God had been "long suffering to usward (Jews to whom Peter was writing) not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance," by turning to the truth. Therefore the commonwealth had stood, and its terrible destruction with its wicked unbelievers, had been deferred so far, up to the time of writing this second Epistle.

But verily, the day of the Lord came, about four years after, (A. D. 70) when the heavens which God planted, as we read in Isa. li. 16, for Zion did "pass away with a great noise, and the elements" of the Jewish heavens and earth—the glorious Temple did "melt with fervent heat, and the earth also" whose foundations God laid for Zion, "and the works that" were "therein" were "burned up."

And verily, this was a time of perdition of ungodly men; when according to reliable authority not less than one and a half millions of rebellious unbelieving Jews perished, from the beginning to the end of the war, which resulted in their national ruin.

"For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled; . . . for there shall be great distress in the land, and wrath upon his people," said Jesus. Luke xxi. 22, 23.

But, "As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not; for a blessing is in it; so will I do for my servants' sake, that I may not destroy them all. And I will bring forth a seed out of Jacob, and out of Judah an inheritor of my mountains; and mine elect shall inherit it and my servants shall dwell there." "That he who blesseth himself in the earth shall bless himself in the God of truth; . . . because the former troubles are forgotten, etc. For, behold, I create new heavens and a new earth; and the former shall not be remembered nor come into mind; . . . for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing and her people a joy," etc. Isa. lxv. 8, 16-18.

Note this, that Jerusalem is to be the centre and the joy of the "new heavens and the new earth," far more than in the former.

Now while we urge no opinion, is it not more than probable that Peter, who begins this third chapter, second Epistle, by minding the brethren "of the words spoken before by the holy prophets," was himself fully mindful of them?

And when he wrote, "Nevertheless we, according to his promise look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. That he who blesseth himself in the earth, shall bless himself in the God of truth;" did he not refer to Isa. lxv. 17-19?

And did not the "new" have a reference to the old, then soon to be destroyed?

And was not the old, the former Judean heavens and earth, planted and founded after leading Israel out of Egypt, "the former that should not be remembered?"

If heavens and earth mean the solid globe and social or atmospheric heavens, where shall we be when, as John foresaw, "the heavens and the earth flee away, and no place is found for them; from the face of him that sat on the throne," Rev. xx. 11, becoming nonexistent?

But world burners with flaming vehemence, insist that Peter makes the flames enwrap the earth, equal to the waters of the flood; and the atmospheric or starry heavens must be in a blaze. But the parallel is this: There was something that could perish—"the world that then was." It was a heavens and earth of men's construction; and that construction perished by an overflow, with its ungodly builders. The material and natural heavens and earth did not, and could not perish. We may freely admit that the heavens and earth of Israel did perish, by fire, when "the elements" of their nation—the great Temple, the city and power of the whole people also, melted "with fervent heat;" and the earth—their foundation, "and the works thereof were burned up."

But we expect the Gentile heavens and earth shall flee away from the face of him who shall sit on the great white throne, and the great capitals of governments shall melt by means of the soldier's torch. And then "a new heavens and a new earth," as John saw. Rev. xxi. And the tabernacle of God will be with men, and he by Jesus the Lord, will be with them and be their God. The tabernacle will be equal to the kingdom of God, expansive as the new made order and construction of things.

Is not this the new heavens and new earth we look for, wherein dwelleth righteousness?

Do not Bible believers at least, look for such things?

THE LESSON OF THE ASSASSINATION.

God Speaks—Let Man Hear and Heed.

"Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord hath not done it?"—Holy Writ.

A. R. MACRUDER.

That "man in his best estate is altogether vanity—that he is of few days and full of trouble—that he cometh forth like a flower and is cut down—that he fleeth also like a shadow and continueth not"—these are all Divine oracles. Their truth is attested and their wisdom is supplemented by the experience of all men, who say in words of kindred significance to their fellow mortals:—

"What shadows we are and what shadows we pursue."

"In the midst of life we are in death."

"Man proposes and God disposes."

These solemn reflections are readily accepted in theory by the great mass of men. How few are governed by them in their daily life. Precept is good but example is better. Theory may be silver but practice is gold. The history of our race shows the ever recurring necessity of example to enforce the lessons of law, both human and Divine. The statutes against murder would be a dead letter if the death penalty were never inflicted. Human government in this respect is moulded after the Divine model:—"Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed."

The tragedy which in the assassination of President Garfield has bowed in grief and anguish a nation of fifty millions of people and awakened the sympathy and sorrow of the civilized world is not an ordinary or accidental event. If, as we believe on the highest Authority, that the very hairs of our head are all numbered and that not a sparrow falls to the ground without the cognizance of him who created the heavens and the earth—who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand and meted out heaven with a span—comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure—weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance, we cannot doubt that the striking down unto death by the red hand of violence of the chosen head and ruler of so many human beings, who are God's "offspring" cannot have taken place without his notice and consent. We cannot doubt either that he could have averted the calamity had it seemed good in his eyes, or that his refusal to do so in answer to so many prayers addressed to him must be just and wise and right.

"Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord hath not done it?"

"Shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord and not evil also?"

"Will not the judge of all the earth do right?"

We know "that he doth not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men."

It is not for finite beings to sit in judgment on the Infinite. He sees the end from the beginning. We cannot.

"As the heavens are high above the earth so are his ways higher than our ways and his thoughts than our thoughts."

The great lyric poet happily expressed this sentiment:—

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense
But trust him for his grace,
Behind a frowning Providence
He hides a smiling face.

His purposes will ripen fast
Unfolding every hour,
The bud may have a bitter taste
But sweet will be the flower.

Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his work in vain,
God is his own interpreter
And he will make it plain.

What God permits and what he does has the sanction of Divine wisdom, though we may not see it now. Abraham was ready to sacrifice Isaac in obedience to the Divine command though it seemed to him to be a dreadful deed. Jacob believed in Joseph's death and was greatly grieved at the cruel command of Pharaoh's steward to send Benjamin, the son of his old age, into Egyptian captivity; yet Joseph's bondage and Benjamin's arrest—both dreadful calamities to Jacob—proved the means which God had devised to save the patriarch and all his house from death by famine.

It is true that God rules in the kingdom of men and governs the world in the sense of controlling events and exerting a general superintendance over human affairs, subordinating man's weak or wicked rule to prevent utter ruin and overruling man's wrath or folly for good. It is by such means that in his wisdom he works out effectually and in due time, certain predetermined and ultimate results of happiness to our race and world. Man has been in revolt against the Divine will ever since the great rebellion in Eden. During this time, like the deluded phantom he has seized the reins of the King's chariot but cannot safely direct its course; for it is written:—"It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps."

All Kings and Presidents and Rulers are prone to think with Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria:—"Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power and for the honor of my majesty?" and Herod, the king, seated on his throne, apparelled in royal robes, intoxicated with vanity and self-glory, accepted with avidity, the insane flattery of the people, who shouted, when he spoke to them:—"It is the voice of God and not of a man."

In both instances the guilty offenders were overtaken by the punishment prescribed by the Divine avenger. Although it is not believed or charged that the recent tragical fate of the American President has been provoked by his personal sins, yet the people whose official Head and Representative he was, cannot claim merited exemption from the just displeasure of their offended Judge. This may appear subsequently; for the end is not yet.

All things bright and beautiful,
All creatures great and small,
All things wise and wonderful,
The Lord God made them all.

Each little flower that opens,
Each little bird that sings—

The tall trees in the greenwood,
The pleasant summer sun,
The ripened fruits in the garden,
He made them one by one.

He gave us eyes to see them,
And lips that we might tell,
How great is God Almighty,
Who hath made all things well.

Land and Water.

An Elephant's Gratitude.

We all know the nursery story of the tailor who pricked the elephant's trunk, when that intelligent animal was soliciting sweets through a shop's open casement, and how the wise beast on returning the same route soon afterward, regaled the tailor with a shower of muddy water she had carefully sucked up from the roadside, just to show that she bore him no special ill-will, but that two could play at joking; but according to a note in the Hartford Times elephants can be grateful as well as vindictive.

Some weeks ago Bostock & Wombwell's Menagerie again visited Tenbury. Our readers will remember the elephant Lizzie's wonderful recognition of Mr. Tinley, chemist of Teme street, when on a visit to that town about two years since. The animal then went out of the procession to greet him at his shop door, remembering him as her deliverer from intense pain, caused by an attack of colic, brought on through drinking cold water while journeying to Tenbury on a previous visit.

Mr. Tinley, on visiting the menagerie the other evening, was again at once seen and recognized by Lizzie, who embraced him with her trunk in such a manner as to cause some alarm to her keepers, but an affectionate hug for her preserver was all the poor creature intended.

Doubtless her remembrance of her friend will never be effaced, since this is the second time she has greeted Mr. Tinley in such a startling way.

Our Little Ones.

Story of a Red Hood.

KATE TANNATT WOODS.

Mary Clark, or Mamie, as she was frequently called, wanted a pretty red hood. Susie Gray had one. Dot Miller had one also. In fact, nearly every girl in Miss Rimmer's school had a worsted hood.

Mary's father was dead, and her mother worked very hard. Mrs. Clark made pocket-books for a man in Boston. She made a great many for very little money. It took her a long time to earn a barrel of flour. It took the little Clarks a short time to eat a barrel of flour.

Mamie, Harry, Fred, and the baby were all hungry little people. Sometimes poor Mrs. Clark was sorry they were so hungry; it was hard to find enough for them.

"O dear, I want a red hood awfully," said Mamie, one day. Susie Gray was passing with one on.

"I wish I could give you one, darling," said her mother.

"I wish you could, too."

"I would not use that word 'awfully' Mamie."

"Why not, mamma?"

"Because you do not mean it. Let us think for one moment. Awful means filled with awe, dread, or terror."

"I see, mamma. No, I do not want the hood awfully, but very much."

Harry heard all his sister said. The next day he went to the store and asked the man the price of red hoods.

"Here is one for thirty-five cents," said the man.

Harry looked sober. He went away, and the man called after him:

"Here, little shaver; who wants a hood?"

"I want one, sir, for my little sister."

"Have you any money?"

"Yes sir, I sold my knife for fifteen cents."

"Is that all?"

"No sir, I let Joe Blake have two of my agates and my best top for five cents."

"And is that all?"

"No sir, I have sold some evening papers, and so earned another five cents."

"Where did you get your agates, top and knife?"

"My uncle sent them from New York."

"Well, boy, you may have the hood for twenty-five cents. To-morrow if your mother is willing, you may come here and do my errands. I will pay you well."

"Thank you, sir."

"A boy who will sell his playthings to please his little sister must be a good boy."

Mamie Clark wears the red hood to school every day. She does not know how Harry earned the money to buy it. Her mamma knows, and she told us the story.

Dear Children:—

Readers of THE RESTITUTION,—though I have not written to you before, I have thought of you a great deal. I have wondered how many of you have learned those precious good lessons that came through our paper some months ago, written by "A Friend of Children."

Those were precious lessons to help you to understand the Bible—God's word—which he has so kindly given us to teach us how to live, and what to do every day. Yes the Bible tells us what we must do every day if we want to be good, and obey God, so that when his Son Jesus Christ comes to earth to reign as King over the whole earth we may have a place in his kingdom. It tells us to do unto others as we want them to do to us, every day in the week. When we are at home as well as when we are at school. You do not want your little school mates to strike or abuse you, but if they do be sure and do not strike them back again, because it would be very wrong for you to do so as it would only make them more angry and make them strike again.

It is better to talk kindly, when you can; but sometimes boys and girls get so very angry they will not hear you; then you had better go and leave them to their own thoughts, and they will soon see how naughty they were, and they will love you much more than if you quarrel with them.

I hope all the little folks who read this, read their Bibles. There are more beautiful stories, more wonderful stories, told in this blessed book than in any book you can read; and the best of it all is, that they are every one true. They all show the mighty power of God. How he blesses and takes care of the good, and how dreadfully he punishes those who do not love and obey him.

Did you ever read the fifth chapter of Acts, that tells what God did to the wicked Annias and Sapphira his wife, who both told the same lie? What a dreadful thing to tell a lie; although people whom we talk to may not know whether we tell the truth God knows, for he sees us all the time, and in his sight it is telling a lie to nod your head just as much as to say yes, if you try to make one believe what is not so.

Did you ever read the story of Joseph, whom his brethren sold into Egypt? and what a good man he was, and how sorry his dear old father was to think that a wild beast had eaten his little son. Read it over again. I have read it many, many times. How wicked it was of his brothers to make their father believe that Joseph was destroyed by wild beasts. They did not say he was, but it was a lie for them to make their father believe he was, as it was deceiving him, and to deceive any one in that way is to lie to them.

If you cannot find this good story will you not ask papa or mamma, or auntie to find it for you, and when you read about how he was sold into Egypt read on and see how good a man he grew to be, and how tenderly he loved his dear old father, and how glad his father was when he found out that his son Joseph was yet alive.

Yes and you will learn too that his brothers who sold him were terribly frightened, because they thought God was going to punish them for their wicked act. They were punished when they were obliged to leave Simeon a bondman in Egypt, and return without him to their father. God's ways are wonderful.

Dear Children, how happy and grateful, humble and loving, we should all be to think that the Great Creator of heaven and earth, permits us to call him "Our Father."

Your Affectionate
AUNT CARRIE.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a religious discussion held at the Christadelphian meeting-house, at Valley Springs, Texas, between Mr. W. H. Meadows, of Field Creek, and the undersigned, commencing at 10 a. m. on Thursday before the fourth Sunday in October, and continuing four consecutive days. Two propositions will be discussed, viz:—

1. "The kingdom of God, referred to in Dan. ii. 44, is a future dominion to be set up at the second coming of Christ." The undersigned affirms, Mr. Meadows denies.

2. "Jesus Christ is now a reigning King." Mr. Meadows affirms, the undersigned denies.

All friends and lovers of Bible truth are invited to attend.

JOHN DANTA.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Church of God, will, the Lord willing, commence on Friday, Oct. 7, near Browntown, Warren Co., Va., and continue over the second Sunday. All who cherish the glorious doctrine of the soon coming kingdom of God, and name of Jesus Christ, and the people generally, are respectfully invited to attend. Come brethren, one and all; and let us have another demonstration of the power of God, which is the gospel of God, by letting our light so shine before men as to constrain them to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

N. J. MORGAN.

The brethren of Kansas will meet in Conference at Severance, Doniphan county, Nov. 4, 1881, in the evening, the meeting to continue over Sunday. Brethren Adams and Pierson will be with us to preach the word. Others are invited to come and assist. All of like precious faith are cordially invited to come and participate with us, that we may have one more pleasant and joyful greeting together amid the sorrows and trials of this present life.

By order of the brethren.

LOTT CLOVER.

I will speak as follows: The first of October at Brother C. A. Saylor's, five and one-half miles northwest of Morrill, Brown Co., Kan. Next, Oct. 27, near Clifton, Nemaha Co., Neb., to continue over Sunday, where Brother Jas. Stephens may arrange. Next at Farmington, Atchison Co., Kan., on the Central Branch R. R. Those coming to Farmington will ask for Silas Goodrich. The meeting to commence November 25, and continue over Sunday.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GREEK AND ENGLISH!

—ENTITLED—

THE EMPHATIC DIAGLOTT

—BY BENJAMIN WILSON.—

Contains the Original Greek text of the New Testament, with an interlinear word-for-word English translation, based on the renderings of eminent critics, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscripts, together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references.

The different renderings of various passages in the New Testament are the foundations on which most of the sects of Christians have been built up; with this work each reader may judge for himself whether the words there literally translated are so arranged in the common version as to express the exact meaning of the New Testament writers.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD'S FAVORITE HYMN.

No, reapers of life's harvest,
Why stand with rusted blade
Until the night draws round thee
And the day begins to fade?

Why stand ye idle waiting
For reapers more to come?
The golden morn is passing,
Why sit ye idle, dumb?

Thrust in your sharpened sickle
And gather in the grain;
The night is fast approaching
And soon will come again.

The Master calls for reapers,
And shall he call in vain?
Shall sheaves lie there ungathered
And waste upon the plain?

Mount up the heights of wisdom,
And crush each error low;
Keep back no words of knowledge
That human hearts should know.

Be faithful to thy mission
In service of thy Lord,
And then a golden chaplet
Shall be thy just reward.

RESURRECTION OF THE WICKED.

Being Notes of a Sermon Preached on Tuesday Evening, July 17, 1881.

BY ROBERT PEDRIN.

PASTOR OF THE CHURCH OF THE BLESSED HOPE, PENNSLAND ST., BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Marvel not at this: for the hour cometh, in which all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice, and shall come forth: they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life: and they that have done ill, unto the resurrection of judgment.—John v. 28, 29.

Left to unaided reason, how little does man know of futurity! A thick and impervious gloom hovers over the entrance to the tomb; no can discover nothing beyond it; all is darkness and uncertainty. The torch of nature is totally inadequate to dispell the mist which envelopes futurity. And until the light of revelation gilds with its celestial rays the darkness of the tomb, the mind of man will strive in vain to penetrate the veil suspended over a future state, and to contemplate the subject with any degree of satisfaction and pleasure.

The Greek word anastasis (anastasis) which is in our text translated "resurrection," signifies standing up, or raising up, or rising up; a standing on the feet, as opposed to sitting or falling.

Thus in Luke's gospel we find it rendered "rising up"—"And Simeon blessed them, and said unto Mary his mother, Behold, this child is set for the falling and rising up of many in Israel." The rising up is, in this case, opposed to the falling.

In the Septuagint or Greek version of the Old Testament, the same word also occurs:

Lam. iii. 63, "Behold their sitting down and their rising up." Here it is opposed to sitting down. Hence, the Scriptural signification of resurrection is a standing or rising up, and it is opposed to either sitting or falling down.

The idea was probably derived from the way in which corpses were deposited in the Jewish tombs: so that to the ancient mind a return to life would imply a literal rising up of the dead person so to be able to stand erect.

The doctrine of the resurrection has been much abused in all ages. Some men have believed in one resurrection only, that of all mankind at the same time. Others have believed in the resurrection of the righteous, but have denied the resurrection of the wicked. Another class of persons have refused to believe in any resurrection at all. But those who cling to the word of God belong to a fourth class, and believe that "all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done ill, unto the resurrection of judgment."

Nature abundantly illustrates this doctrine; but revelation above teaches it. God has filled all nature with emblems of the resurrection. An unsightly seed without any appearance of life is thrown into the ground; and, then, the particles separating, there spring up the plant.

The apostle Paul selects such a seed to illustrate his teaching. Referring to it he says, "That which thou thyself sowest is not quickened, except it die; and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not the body that shall be, but a bare grain, it may chance of wheat or of some other kind; but God giveth it a body even as it pleased him, and to each seed a body of his own." 1 Cor. xv. 36, 37.

Spring-life is, therefore, a resuscitation from apparently extinct life; for not until signs of life are gone does germination begin.

What a beautiful type is this of the resurrection of the dead!

The insect tribe also illustrate this grand truth. The caterpillar dies as a chrysalis, and recovers new life under the beauteous transformation of the butterfly.

Then, again, night is the death of day; and morning is its resurrection from the shades of darkness. Winter, also, is the death of the year; and spring is its resurrection. Winter is the sleep of nature. The trees are leafless; the song of the birds is unheard and a death-like coldness reigns everywhere. But when spring returns the sleep of nature is at an end, for the invigorating powers of the sun call forth all things into life and activity. The feathered songsters once more warble in every grove, and the flowers revive and array themselves in a loveliness far surpassing the royal glory of Solomon.

'Tis night, and the landscape is lovely no more.
Yet ye beautiful woodlands I mourn not for you,
For morn is approaching your charms to restore,
Perfumed with fresh fragrance and glittering with dew.

Nor yet for the ravage of winter I mourn,
Kind nature the embryo blossom will save.
The spring shall yet visit the mouldering urn,
The day shall yet dawn on the night of the grave.

Revelation distinctly and frequently teaches us the future resurrection of mankind. Both the Sadducees and the heathen denied that doctrine. "The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit." Acts xxiii. 8.

Also the heathen Athenians, to whom the apostle Paul had been preaching, "when they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked; but others said, We will hear thee concerning this yet again." Acts xvii. 32.

These Athenians, in common with the rest of the heathen, believed in the immortality of the soul; but they had not even the faintest idea as to the resurrection of the body. Menander, a heathen Greek, expresses the belief of the ancient heathen world thus:

Die when thou will,
Mortal, except another life on earth;
And for that life make choice of all creation
What thou will be—dog, sheep, goat, man or horse.
For live again thou must; it is thy fate.

Such was the wild speculation of the ancient heathen Greek, who was a type of many modern Christians; for they practically reject the doctrine of the resurrection, and they substitute for it the unscriptural dogma of soul-immortality.

No truth is more clearly and forcibly presented in the Sacred Scriptures than the resurrection of the dead. It is a fundamental doctrine of the Christian faith; it is one of unspeakable importance. Our text, with the preceding verses, furnishes us with an exceedingly emphatic statement of this subject. Our Savior declares:

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour cometh, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live. For as the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son also to have life in himself; and he gave him authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man. Marvel not at this, for the hour cometh, in which all that are in the tombs shall hear his voice, and shall come forth."

The patriarch Job anticipated rising from the tomb; for, with full persuasion, he exclaims, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth. And though after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God. Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another." Job xix. 25, 26.

The prophet Isaiah bears similar testimony. "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise." Isa. xxvi. 19.

The apostle Paul, when at Athens, "preached Jesus, and the resurrection," Acts xvii. 18; and, in his noble and able defence before Felix, he said, "So serve I the God of our fathers, believing all things that are according to the law, and which are written in the prophets; having hope toward God, which these also themselves look for, that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and the unjust." Acts xxiv. 15.

Our text speaks of two resurrections:

1. "The resurrection of life," and
2. "The resurrection of judgment."

I. THE RESURRECTION OF LIFE.

"They that have done good, unto the resurrection of life."

The resurrection of life is that resurrection at which eternal life or immortality shall be conferred upon the followers of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, for we shall receive "in the age to come, life everlasting." Luke xviii. 30 "When Christ, who is our life, shall be manifested, then shall ye also with him be manifested in glory." Col. iii. 4.

Immortality will, then, be bestowed at the coming of Christ; at the "resurrection of life." The believer's body is buried in the earth; but it is as a seed sown in the ground, resting there until the Divine quickening power shall re-animate it, and transplant it from its present soil to bloom with immortality in the Paradise of God, in the Garden of the King of kings.

"The resurrection of life."—There are several Greek words translated "life," but they have different meanings. For instance, ψυχε (psychee) is rendered life. It refers to the animal nature or life, and it could, in most cases, be aptly translated self or person.

Another word rendered life is βιος, (bios), which signifies life in its manifestations, and includes the means of supporting life, livelihood, substance, goods or property.

But the life in our text is neither of those which we have mentioned. It is ζωε (zoee), and means neither self, nor life in its manifestations, but life in its principle, or life intrinsic.

It is especially (not entirely) used for immortal life. Christ is our ζωε, and he will grant that "life in its principle" to us at the resurrection of life. That "life intrinsic" will then be given, for "this mortal must put on immortality." 1 Cor. xv. 53.

The prophet Daniel refers to the resurrection of life, when he says, "Many of them that sleep in the dust shall awake, some to everlasting life." Dan. xii. 2.

This resurrection is also called the first resurrection. "They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. The rest of the dead lived not until the thousand years should be finished. This is the first resurrection." Rev. xx. 4, 5.

It is true that "all that are in the tombs shall hear the voice of the Son of Man, and shall come forth;" but immortality and infinite blessings belong to those only "that are Christ's at his coming," (1 Cor. xv. 23); for of such only is it said, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection." Rev. xx. 6.

It is elsewhere spoken of as the resurrection from among the dead ones. The original words are τε νεκρων αναστασις, (hoi ex phaula praxantes), and signify literally, "they who practised vile things."

In the "Handbook to the Grammar of the Greek Testament," by S. G. Green, D. D., A. M., we find that the word rendered "ill" means "vile, wicked, base."

According to Junius, Parkhurst and other lexicographers, our English word foul was derived from the Greek one which we are now considering. In confirmation of what we have already said, we will quote a passage from the revised version in which the same original word occurs, and is translated vile.

James iii. 15, 16: "This wisdom is not a wisdom that cometh down from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish. For where jealousy and faction are, there is confusion and every vile deed." Here vile deeds are classed with things earthly, sensual and devilish. And in our text we read that "they who practised vile, wicked or base things" shall come forth unto the resurrection of judgment.

Hence, we have placed it beyond doubt that the last clause of our text teaches that the wicked will eventually arise, and will stand before their Judge.

2. "The unjust." Who are they? Are they unjust Christians, or are they the wicked? In order to answer this question, we must appeal to the New Testament use of the term "unjust."

The roots of the word ἀδικος (adikos) means "to be unrighteous, or unjust, or iniquitous or vicious." It is, therefore, applied to those persons who love injustice, or unrighteousness, or iniquity, or vice.

Our Savior said, "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust." Matt. v. 45.

The apostle Paul writes, "Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints?" 1 Cor. vi. 1. This verse proves to any man of common sense that "the unjust" are not "the saints;" or in other words, that the unjust and the wicked are identical.

Christ suffered "the just for the unjust," 1 Peter iii. 18; that is, the righteous One took the place of the wicked, and suffered in his stead.

The apostle Peter uses exceedingly strong language when he refers to the unjust: "To reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished . . . . . these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things they understand not: and shall utterly perish in their own corruption." 2 Peter ii. 9, 12. So that according to the Sacred Scriptures, the unjust or wicked shall be taken and destroyed, they shall utterly perish in their own corruption.

It is, therefore, to these unjust or wicked ones that our text refers when it says that "they that have done ill, (practised vile things), shall come forth unto the resurrection of judgment," or as St. Peter has called it, "the day of judgment." 2 Peter ii. 9.

The word adikos (unjust) is translated "unrighteous" in the following passage: 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10. "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God?"

This query is then answered, and the reply contains a full description of the unjust or unrighteous. "Neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God."

In this verse we have a long catalogue of those who are unjust or unrighteous, and therefore wicked. And hence, the objection that the "resurrection of the unjust" does not mean the "resurrection of the wicked" is simply an erroneous fancy, and is in direct opposition to the teaching of God's holy word.

3. "The resurrection of Judgment." The Greek word κρισις (krisis) signifies "distinction, separation, discrimination, judgment, decision, sentence. A crisis is the decisive moment, the point of time when an affair is arrived at its height, and must soon undergo a material change.

At the first resurrection, "the resurrection of life," eternal life will be conferred upon believers; but at the final resurrection, "the resurrection of judgment," the decision, the sentence, the doom of the unjust or wicked will be pronounced. After the resurrection of life, there will be an interval of one thousand years; for "the rest of the dead lived not until the thousand years should be finished." Rev. xx. 5.

Concerning the resurrection of judgment, we read, "And the dead were judged out of the things which were written in the books, according to their works. . . . And if any one not found written in the book of life, he was cast into the lake of fire." Rev. xx. 12, 15.

This will be the awful end of all those who obey not the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

If we reject the resurrection of the wicked, we must also, in order to be consistent, reject the resurrection of the just; for they stand or fall together, both being supported by an equal amount of Scriptural evidence. Both are plainly revealed, and therefore, we must receive both, otherwise we shall oppose ourselves to the clear light of truth.

Scripture implies that the wicked will be raised from the grave; for they will possess temporary consciousness. "The angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." Matt. xiii. 49, 50. There must, therefore, be a resurrection of the wicked, else they could not be capable of "wailing and gnashing of teeth."

Future punishment will be conscious for a period; but "the end" of the ungodly will be the "second death," Rev. xx. 14, 15; everlasting unconscious punishment by deprivation, an eternal deprivation or life.

"All that do wickedly shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." Mal. iv. 1.

The wicked are dying around us; but they must have a second life, otherwise they will be unable to undergo the second death. Therefore, seeing that there will be a second death, they must be raised to life again. Hence, the resurrection of the wicked will certainly take place prior to their final destruction.

Resurrection does not necessarily involve immortality or endless life. The important idea of the perpetuation of that restored being is an appendage to the primary signification, "a rising or raising up." Accordingly, Jesus, when speaking of the resurrection of the just, adds, "Neither can they die any more," Luke xx. 36; and St. Paul declares that "Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." Rom. vi. 9.

These supplementary statements prove, therefore, that resurrection does not necessarily include the idea of immortality.

All that are in the tombs shall hear Christ's voice and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, the first resurrection, when endless life will be given to the faithful followers; and they that have done vile things, the wicked, unto the resurrection of judgment, when the sentence of everlasting destruction will be pronounced.

Destruction is the doom of the ungodly, but immortality or endless life may be obtained through Christ Jesus, for "the wages of sin is death; but the free gift of God is eternal life in Jesus Christ our Lord."

O morning star! thrice Lord!
Destroyer of the tomb!
Star of the strong and the bold,
Lift up at length thy long veiled head,
O'er land and sea thy glories shed;
Light of the morning, rise!

Speak mighty Life! and wake the dead.
Like statue from the stone,
Like music from long broken strings,
Like sparklings from deserted rings,
Like dew upon the dawn's soft wings,
Rouse each beloved one!

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXX. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCTOBER 12, 1881. NO. 38.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a firm belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins. And a holy life as essential for final salvation.

J. P. WESTHEF.

History of the binding continues. The Turks had been under the Seljukian dynasty from their origin as a nation to the close of the Crusades. That family was on the decline. A new dynasty was required to accomplish the great mission designed by God for that people.

Such a family was found in Othman, who gave name to the new dynasty, which still continues. It will be of interest to notice the rise and early history of the Ottoman empire, and the restrictions which prevented its speedy conquest of the whole Greek empire.

The Mahometan empire, composed of the Arabian or Saracenic, and the Turkish or Ottoman dynasties, is a power which occupies a place among the living nations, over whose destinies the hand of God is quite visible. Its character is necessarily peculiar, since it has been ruled by two families (the Arab and Turk) whose origin and character are so distinct, though members of one church.

Its position also, on the map of the world deserves special notice. Its origin is toward the East; yet its star of empire has always moved, like the stars of heaven, westward. Its mission was in the distant sun-setting. It never looked eastward, unless to attack a powerful enemy in its rear. When the danger was removed, it would again face the West.

Such was its course of action under its Caliphs. Such was its character under the Seljukian Sultans. And we shall see the same characteristic features under the Ottoman dynasty. It seemed to possess an instinctive knowledge of its mission—the overthrow of the Greek empire.

Its confinement to the Euphrates was always humiliating to its restless ambition. Like a war horse at the sound of the trumpet, champing its bits, and prancing to be free to rush into the contest, so did that empire manifest its ungovernable desire to possess the proud capital of the Greek empire. But God bound that eastern empire to its proper limits till the Grecian cup should be full. It was held back by the Arabian dynasty at Bagdad and by the Grecian power at Constantinople, till the set time of Jehovah should arrive.

The powerful empire of Roum, under Soliman had made ready to attack Constantinople, when a voice is heard, ουκ γρονος εν εσται ετι. "The time is not yet," (Rev. x. 6,) and all Europe is armed, and the Sultan's forces are driven over the Euphrates and bound there for two centuries.

During the latter part of that period a new dynasty arises, overthrows the Seljukian dynasty, and makes preparation to establish its seat of empire on the ruins of the Eastern Roman or Greek empire. But that time was still in the future; and, as shall see the Divine hand again put forth to draw back and bind this restless agent at his old native river—Euphrates. Under Othman the new or Ottoman dynasty was founded, and attained to very considerable power. He was situated on the confines of the Greek empire, ready to commence a holy war against the Infidels (Christians). His first invasion of the Greek empire was made into the territory of Nicomedia, on the 27th of July, A. D. 1299. During the twenty-seven years of his reign his attacks were constant and more or less successful.

From the conquest of Prusa, is dated the true aera of the Ottoman empire.

Orchan, the son of Othman, carried forward very successfully the plans of his father. The army was disciplined and the new capital, Prusa, was made a Turkish city. He carried his conquests over Bithynia, as far as the shores of the Bosphorus and Hellespont.

Under Orchan the seven churches of Asia were ruined. Under Orchan the Turkish emirs of Lydia and Ionia built a fleet, and pillaged the adjacent islands and the sea coast of Europe.

The internal discords between rival claimants of the Greek diadem brought the Turks into Europe; and soon into Constantinople.

Of these hostile movements preparing the speedy fall of the Greek empire, but "the time is not yet." God sees the future as well as the past; the iniquity of the Greek Church is not yet full, space is still given them to reform and do their first works, their lamp stand is not yet removed, and though the Greek empire was crowded with her enemies she did not fall: her proud capital remained in the hands of her Christian population; no Mahometan worship was allowed in her Christian temples.

Amurath, son of Orchan, subdued the province of Romania or Thrace; extended his conquests to the vicinity of Constantinople, and made Adrianople its European seat of empire and religion. Though the Greek empire was within his power, had he been disposed to use his advantage, yet he turned his arms against its enemies; he marched against the Sclavonian nations between the Danube and the Adriatic, the Bulgarians, Servians, Bosnians, and Albanians; all these were subdued and converted to the Koran.

Amurath, being slain, was succeeded by his son Bajazet, called Ilderim, the lightning; so called from the fiery energy of his soul, and the rapidity of his destructive march.

He reigned fourteen years. "He incessantly moved at the head of his armies, from Bourza to Adrianople, from the Danube to the Euphrates: and though he struggled long and fought for the propagation of the law, he invaded, with impartial ambition, the Christian and Mahometan princes of Europe and Asia."—Gibbon.

He conquered the emirs of Asia Minor; brought into regular servitude the Servians and Bulgarians: crossed the Danube and defeated the Hungarians, and subjugated southeastern Europe; threatened Germany, and boasted that he would feed his horse with a bushel of oats on the Altar of St. Peter at Rome. God, however, gave him the first check by inflicting upon him a long and painful fit of the gout.

Under Bajazet the Roman world, contracted to a corner of Thrace, between the Propontis and the Black Sea, about fifty miles in length and thirty in breadth. Still, it contained Constantinople, which was populous and wealthy.

Bajazet pressed the city of Constantinople more closely, when the king of France sent aid, which compelled the Sultan to retire. A stronger force was put into the field, and he was about to besiege the city, when he was called to meet a more powerful enemy—Tamerlane at the head of an immense army of Tartars.

Timour was the enemy of the Turks as well as of the Christians. He contended for universal dominion. He had issued from Central Asia, and had extended his conquests toward the four cardinal points, subduing under his standard all the lesser powers of Asia.

Before he attacked the Ottoman empire he became powerful in his conquests of Persia, Tartary and India. His Persian conquests covered the eastern tributaries of the Tigris and Euphrates: he then subdued Tartary, extending 480 leagues northeast of Samarcand, including a large portion of Siberia, and extending westward to the Russian territory.

His next conquest was that of India. His many battles in which he was victorious, brought him finally to the gates of Delhi. He became master of the capital of Hindostan, after it had been for three centuries in the hands of Mahometan Sultans.

Timour was on the banks of the Ganges when he was informed of the disturbances on the confines of Georgia and Anatolia, of the revolt of the Christians, and the designs of the Sultan Bajazet.

Such was the character of the enemy that had been permitted to rise in the Ottoman's rear to draw him back and restore him for half a century at the great river Euphrates.

Who can read these transactions without acknowledging the power of a Divine hand?

After a rest of some months at Samarcand his native city, he, though sixty-three years old, commenced a south-eastern campaign, which was to be extended into southwestern Asia, and continue if necessary, seven years. He first directed his forces against the Christians of Georgia, powerful in their mountain homes. The Christians were offered the choice of abjuration or martyrdom.

On his descent from the mountains of Georgia, Timour first met the ambassadors of Bajazet. This hostile correspondence continued for two years, before terminating in open conflict.

"The Mogul and Ottoman conquests now touched each other in the neighborhood of Erzeroum and the Euphrates; nor had the doubtful limit been ascertained by time and treaty. Each of these ambitious monarchs might accuse his rival of violating his territory, or threatening his vassals, and protecting his rebels; and by the name of rebels, each understood the fugitive princes, whose kingdoms he had usurped, and whose life or liberty he implacably pursued.

The resemblance of character was still more dangerous than the opposition of interest: and in their victorious career, Timour was impatient of an equal, and Bajazet knew no superior. The first epistle of the Mogul emperor must have provoked instead of reconciling the Turkish Sultan, whose family and nation he affected to despise. 'Know' (says he) 'that I am sprung from the valiant Turks, and my ancestors have reigned over the wide dominions of Tartary: but you are a contemptible Turk, though you call yourself Sultan of Roum. Your pusillanimity is unworthy of a soldier, and your cowardice will expose the women of your family to insult and violation. Your headstrong folly has already drawn down the arms of Timour upon your devoted head. Your resistance will be fruitless, your destruction certain.' Bajazet

BROTHER N. J. MORGAN writes that the Conference at Brownstown, Va., has been postponed from Oct. 7, to Nov. 11, 1881.

BRETHREN who have asked for the address of Brother J. M. Stephenson are hereby notified that we do not know it at present.

SEVERAL requests for back numbers of THE RESTITUTION have been received. We regret to say the supply is exhausted, and therefore we cannot send them.

WE have not found time to write particulars about our visit to Lanark, as many cares crowd upon us. Will try to write something as soon as time is at our disposal.

WHILE discussing the importance of correct faith previous to baptism would it not be well to say something more about the formation of true Christian character after submitting to this ordinance? The apostle Paul teaches us that faith strong enough to remove mountains avails its possessor nothing without love. Peter directs us to add at least seven Christian traits of character to faith, giving the last and most important place to love. The entire drift of the beloved disciple—John's, teaching is to inculcate love to God and the brotherhood. And above all it is to be remarked that the solemn decisions of judgment are mainly made to turn upon our conduct rather than upon a critical and perfectly defined faith. Let us by all means have an enlightened understanding as concerns the gospel, but let us remember that after we have been baptized we should lead a new life. Without following peace and holiness no man shall see the Lord.

We cannot vouch for the truth of the following. It may be only one of the many traditions that have come down through the ages. If Paul had ever become acquainted with the mental capabilities of the Prince of Latin Poets he might well have "bedewed his tomb with pious tears," that a mind so gifted should always have been shrouded in the darkness of paganism. To picture Paul bending over the tomb of the great Epic poet, shedding the tears of grief, and exclaiming—"O Prince of Poets, how much I would have done for thee had I only found thee living"—would be worthy the pencil of a master in painting. The Latin lines are a remarkable example of condensed thought.

PAUL AT THE TOMB OF VIRGIL.

TYRON EDWARDS, D. D.

When the apostle Paul, after appealing from Agrippa to Cæsar, was sent to Rome, the vessel which carried him, was, as we are told in Acts xxvii., detained at Puteoli for seven days. And there is an old tradition—exceedingly touching as well as beautiful—that while delayed there the apostle went up to the tomb of Virgil, and, as he stood by it, wept at the thought that the great poet had died without the knowledge of Christ!

Dean Stanley, in his Sermon on Christian Missions, after showing how Christianity seeks to make men purer, and nobler, and better, alludes to Paul's deep sympathy with this aim, and then remarks:

"It was a fine touch in the ancient Latin hymn, which describes how, when he landed at Puteoli, he turned aside to the hill Pausilipo, to shed a tear over the tomb of Virgil, and thought how much he might have made of that noble soul if he had but found him still on earth."

The verse thus alluded to is in the Latin as follows:

Ad Maronis mausoleum,
Ductus, fudit super eum,
Piæ rorem lacrymæ:
Quantum, dixit, te fortasem,
Si te vivum invenissem,
Posterum maximæ!

The condensed phraseology of the Latin scarce admits a literal translation of its touching thought, but a free paraphrase may perhaps give the English reader some idea of the original.

On his way to Nero's court,
When by storms detained in port,
At the tomb where Virgil slept,
Paul, in thoughtful sadness, wept;
Wept, that he of world-wide fame
Should have died ere Jesus came:
In his sorrings, unexpressed,
This the thought that swelled his breast:
"Oh! that I had found thee living
In the light the Cross is giving;
Could have seen thee, from above,
Taught to know a Savior's love;
Then, to love to Christ supreme,
Thine had been a nobler theme,
And thy harp, in noblest lays
Down the ages rolled his praise!"
* * * * * * * *
Thoughtful and sad, Paul from the hill went down.
To Rome—to prison—to a heavenly crown!

THE PAPACY.

One demonstration of our position, when we claim that we are near the close of this dispensation, is the present humiliating dejection of the Papal power from the exalted place it held in the world during the predicted period of 1260 years. Its temporal throne is filled by another occupant, and the successor of those proud tyrants, that formerly wore the tiara on their head and suspended the keys from their girdle, is walking over the lost estate within the walls of the Vatican as an object of the derision of the world. An incurable consumption has resulted fatally to the temporal domination, and we are now waiting for the consignment of the spiritual Babylonian system of abominations that remains to its abysmal grave. Rev. xviii. 21. Then will be "heard as it were a great voice of a great multitude in heaven, saying, Hallelujah; Salvation, and glory, and power belong to our God; for true and righteous are his judgments; for he hath judged the great harlot, which did corrupt the earth with her fornication, and he hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand. And a second time they say, Hallelujah. And her smoke goeth up forever and ever. And the four and twenty elders and the four living creatures, fell down and worshipped God that sitteth on the throne, saying, Amen, Hallelujah." Rev. xix. 1-4. The following shows the present status of the fallen Pontiff. We earnestly hope he will continue to sulk out his days in Rome:—

THE POPE'S DILEMMA.

The London Saturday Review has the following on the present unhappy predicament and waning fortunes of the Pope:—

"While the Pope was still a reigning sovereign, officious Protestant advisers not unfrequently assured him that his influence over the faithful would be increased by resignation of his secular prerogative. Since he has been forced to submit to the result of their condescending counsels he has found, as more sagacious observers anticipated, that his spiritual authority collapses almost as rapidly as his temporal power. Austria is united in close alliance with the persecuting Government of Berlin; the Subalpine King, as Pius IX., with feminine spite, delighted to call him, holds his court on the left bank of the Tiber. Spain has formally disclaimed any purpose of defending the rights of the Holy See; and in France, which used to be called the eldest born of the church, the clergy have lost all political power. It would be a suicidal mistake to renounce the security of the treaty or statute which is known as the Law of Guaranties. It is true that the Italian Government has culpably neglected to afford the protection which was due on the occasion of the late funeral procession; but it would be a poor revenge to resign the rights which are acknowledged, though they have been unduly withheld. Within his own palace and its precincts the Pope is still nominally independent and sovereign. Elsewhere he would be a subject or a resident foreigner, with no claim to rank or pre-eminence except by the courtesy of the local authorities. It is doubtful whether the large revenue which the Pope derives from the contributions of the faithful would be forthcoming if Catholic liberality were required to flow in unaccustomed channels. In the so-called ages of faith the Popes who resided at Avignon, though in their own territory, were regarded with diminished reverence. There is now no possibility of acquiring a papal appanage on either side of the Alps, and a Pope cannot afford to subside into the rank of a private person."

THE REVISED NEW TESTAMENT IN RELATION TO PROPHECY.

WILLIAM HAUDE.

Having in our former paper drawn attention to various prophetic passages, taken indiscriminately from the books of the New Testament, the true meaning of which have, in the Revised Version, been elucidated by the more correct reading or rendering of the original text: we propose, on the present occasion, to confine our attention to that which is pre-eminently the prophetic book of the New Testament—the Book of Revelation—indicating, in the first place, some of the passages in which errors and blemishes have been removed: and, secondly, pointing out a few cases in which the revisers have not given us some called-for amendations.

It so happens, as shown by Dr. Roberts (himself one of the revisers) in his very useful and compendious "Companion to the Revised Version of the New Testament" (London: Cassell & Co.) that the Greek text of the Book of Revelation on which the Authorized Version rests, was of a most unsatisfactory character.

Accordingly, rather numerous corrections of the original text, as well as improved renderings where that text has not called for correction, find a place in the Revised Version. And some of these changes, although not of the same doctrinal importance as certain others made in the gospels and epistles, are of special interest to the student of prophecy.

Among the first passages in the Book of Revelation which attract our attention as having undergone somewhat important alteration in the Revised Version, is the sublime apostrophe contained in chap. i. 7: "Behold, he cometh with clouds: and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him; and all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him."

This now reads as follows: "Behold, he cometh with the clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they which pierced him; and all the tribes of the earth shall mourn over him."

The reading of the Authorized Version, "All the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him," has very generally suggested the idea that the emotion spoken of is one of terror and despair as when, in chap. vi. the various classes of mankind are represented as saying to the mountains and rocks, "Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." This however, is

AN ERRONEOUS INTERPRETATION.

The reference to Zech. xii. 10-14, is unmistakable, and teaches us that the sorrow depicted is that of repentant Israel after their deliverance from the antichrist: and the true sense is, therefore, much better conveyed by the new reading, "All the tribes of the earth shall mourn over him."

Perhaps it would have been a still further improvement to have substituted the word "land" for "earth," as showing more distinctly the Jewish character of the passage.

This sorrow of Jewish hearts for their nation's sin in the rejection and crucifixion of Messiah, may indeed be said to have been experienced ever since the day of Pentecost, when so many Jews were pricked to the heart and made partakers of this deep penitential grief. And these tears of godly sorrow for the sin which caused the death of the Redeemer have never from that day onward ceased their flow.

Thousands and thousands of Jews have wept for their sins, as they have beheld by faith the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. But the great general mourning of the nation will take place only when in the last days the Lord shall "pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplications: and they shall look upon him whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him, as one mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him, as one is in bitterness for his first-born." Zech. xii. 10.

The next passage to which we would call attention is the gracious promise addressed to the Church in Philadelphia, which, in the Revised Version reads thus:

"Because thou didst keep the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of trial, that hour which is to come upon the whole world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."

A reading which, in its emphatic repetition, indicates much more distinctly than the reading of the Authorized Version, the future unparalleled season of judgment referred to, namely, "the tribulation, the great one," spoken of in chap. vii.

That this is undoubtedly the correct reference is admitted by Dean Alford, who says, in his Greek Testament, "The time imported is that prophesied of in Matt. xxiv. 21, viz: the great time of trouble which shall be before the Lord's second coming. As such it is immediately connected with 'Behold, I come quickly,' following. The expositors have in many cases gone away from this broad and obvious meaning here, and have sought to identify 'the hour of trial' with various periods of trial and persecution of the Church; a line of interpretations carrying its own refutation with it in the very terms used in the text."

In chapter iv. verse 4, again, we note

A CALLED-FOR CORRECTION

in the translation of the Greek word thronos, which occurs in that one verse three times, uniformly throne, instead of once throne and twice seats as in the Authorized Version. The verse now reads:

"And round about the throne were four-and-twenty thrones; and upon the thrones I saw four-and-twenty elders sitting."

This removes the arbitrary and incorrect distinction between the throne of God and the thrones of the representative elders.

The same alteration is also very properly made in chap ii. 13: "I know where thou dwellest, even where Satan's throne is;" in xiii. 2: "The dragon gave him his power and his throne, and authority;" and also in xvi. 10: "The fifth poured out his bowl upon the throne of the beast."

A much more glaring blemish—we may truly say one of the most glaring of those which disfigure the Authorized Version—is now removed, in the new Revised Version by the substitution of for "beast," as the designation of the cherubic attendants on the Divine throne, in chap. iv. 6-9, and elsewhere in this book. Familiarity alone can have reconciled us—if it has reconciled us—to the latter rendering, which not only introduces a really grotesque feature into one of the most sublime visions in the whole compass of revelation, but tends to confound these obnoxious life-forms with the wild beasts subsequently spoken of in chapter xiii.

Indeed, in view of some of the unfair and fastidious objections which are taken to the wording of the Revised Version on certain places, it may safely be said that had our present revisers ventured on such a rendering as that of the Authorized Version in chap. v. 14, "And the four beasts said Amen," it would have met with a universal expression of astonishment and derision. Even living creatures, though preferable to beasts, is not an altogether satisfactory translation of the Greek zoon, inasmuch as they are not actual living animals, but rather symbolic "life-forms," which latter expression we should, like Lange, have been disposed to adopt.

The Evening Standard.

To the Editor of the Standard:

They call him a Christian. Now Christian is Christ-like, and to be Christ-like we must obey his command, "If ye love me, keep my commandments," which was said to one, and is for us as well "Follow thou me." There are communists not much considered by many professing Christians of to-day. To follow Christ is not simply to closely follow out the custom of being at your usual place in the meetings of worship, and when called upon to pray or speak with or without the promptings of the Holy Spirit; many times by a recognized leader who has a polluted soul, void of the least sense of honor, to say the least of Christianity, whose heart is rotten to the core, with all the crimes in the catalogue to be found in Rev. xxii. 15. It has become the custom now-a-days when a person visits a place of worship "To worship the Lord God," and is inspired by the Holy Spirit to sound the "woes" that were once uttered by our Savior, (and if I mistake not are a part of his commands,) to rebuke sin upon the Scribes and Pharisees, and may be rendered now, "Woe be unto you who profess to love me, and do those things that are an abomination unto me," he is at once requested to sit down, or some "charitable" brother begins to sing some words that once were "inspired" by the Holy Spirit, to edification, now used as a weapon to crush down true worship and service to the Lord; his very work to reprove sin and exhort to a holy living. And again, "Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you." 2 Cor. vi. 17. That whole chapter has a strong bearing on the professed Christians of to-day.

The question arises, Why are not people converted with so much preaching, so many places for worship? In answer, I would say, people are being converted every day to the inconsistency of the present day Christianity. It is not the religion of Jesus Christ. It is not permeated with his love, his self sacrifice, his constancy to his Father's will and commands, of which if we are his, he has said that "we would be in him and he in us." That love of the Savior for the outcast, down-trodden and perishing souls does not burn within us. His heart bled for the ragged, the ignorant, unlearned and poor, as well as the rich and the learned. And for the business man a system is in accordance with natural laws, and when he is a Christian he carries in his face, his heart, his whole soul, that love, a Savior's love, which will cause his heart to go out after those who are in his employ; his neighbor will feel his influence, the stranger will know of his power, kind words will flow from his lips and his business obligations will accord with his profession. We, in short, will worship God in business detail, and on week days, the same as the day set apart by man. Seldom do we hear the kind word from the employer to the employee, especially from one who makes the profession of a Christian. What an incentive to a set of workmen to have a word spoken kindly, especially from one known to make a profession of Christianity.

Did not the Lord say, I will smite thee in the day thou forgettest me, and is not the nation smitten surely, to-day, in the death of our beloved President? We pray; do we pray believing, are we humbled before the mighty hand of God? If it were possible, that his suffering would have been divided among those that would take it upon themselves voluntarily the nation would have arisen, I believe, and taken all upon themselves. But that could not be; he, good man, had to bear our punishment.

The professing Christians dedicate a special building to the special service of worship to the "Living God," and in the same building and upon the same floor meet for worship one day, the next have a theatrical entertainment, to amuse the world. We read in the Bible, that God is at enmity with the world: we learn that the Lord can in no degree look upon the wicked with pleasure. Let us humble ourselves before the mighty hand of God, put aside our sins and put on the breastplate of righteousness, or right doing, implore God's mercy upon us, and as a nation put aside our hypocrisy. Upon our coin is this inscription, "In God we Trust." What a lie in face of the Holy Scriptures, as I understand the Scriptures. If it is our motto let us fashion our faith and our acts accordingly; and so live, that when we die no high sounding eulogies shall be false, but the good we do shall be now, and after we are here no more, the world shall thank God and call us blessed.

ORANGE CULTURE IN SYRIA.

Some very interesting notes on this subject are given in a recent consular report from Beyrout. From this we learn that the two districts in which oranges are the most plentiful are those of Jaffa and Sidon. The orange trade began to assume considerable proportions some forty years ago, when the new government of Egypt took shape, and it is now one of the most profitable industries in the two towns above mentioned. Unfortunately the inhabitants, allured by first gains, commenced planting gardens and expending money beyond their resources, the result of which has been that, in spite of all remunerations for small outlays, their improvidence has placed most of them in the power of money-lenders, who continue to advance at interest of 15 to 20 per cent. However, a company has lately been formed in Jaffa to negotiate loans with orange cultivators, and if its negotiations be carried on fairly we may expect an extension of horticulture, with benefit alike to the company and the borrowers. At the present moment Jaffa possesses some 340 gardens, averaging from 2,000 to 2,500 trees in each. The crop of fruit from these may be put down at about 30,000,000.

A garden costs from 40,000f. to 50,000f., and brings in 4,000f. to 5,000f. per annum. For several miles round Jaffa extends a fertile plain on which water is always to be found at a depth of 40 ft. or 50 ft. With capital and enterprise much of this might be planted, and the orange trade doubled in a short time. The present system of irrigation is that of small wells, from which the water is drawn by mules; but experiments have proved that very little engineering skill would be required in order to turn the streams of the river Andjah, some four miles from the town, over the plain. The land near Jaffa would then be cheapened in proportion as the value of that freshly watered rose. At present unplanted land close to Jaffa able to support 2,000 trees is worth 2,000f. to 3,000f.; but at two or three hours' distance it will fetch only 5f. to 6f. a donnum. The export is carried on chiefly by sailing boats for Egypt and Constantinople, and by steamers for Russia, Trieste, and Marseilles. Exportation in cases is a comparatively recent introduction, which has given considerable impulse to business with Europe. The orange gardens of Sidon are cultivated on the same principle as those of Jaffa. An acre of land at Sidon is generally valued at from 6,000f. to 7,000f., and is capable of bringing in an income of about 600f. The exportation begins in September, and is at first almost exclusively directed to Russia, till the winter closes the Black Sea ports, when it is continued to Trieste and Egypt. European cargoes are packed in paper and close cases, the rest are sent in open crates. Each case contains some 300 oranges or lemons, and last year's export is reckoned at 20,000 cases, all of which fetched very high prices, especially lemons, in Russia. The average prices are for 1,000 lemons 150 to 170 piasters: while for 1,250 oranges, reckoned as a trade 1,000, the cultivator receives 70 to 80 piasters.

A FAMOUS OLD ROOM.

A degree of interest attaches to the "Jerusalem Chamber" at Westminster Abbey, from the fact that it is so often mentioned in connection with the revision of the Bible. The following description of this historic room is from the pen of Dean Stanley, recently deceased:

It was called the Jerusalem Chamber, because in those days (the time of Richard II.) it was hung with tapestry which represented the story of the siege of Jerusalem. The tapestries have long since perished, but the name has remained, and over the chimney-piece in the chamber, there are three texts written to keep up the recollection of the name: "Oh pray for the peace of Jerusalem;" "Oh, build thou the walls of Jerusalem;" and "Jerusalem which is above is free."

You may remember Shakespeare's description of how Henry IV., when seized with fears in the Abbey, was taken into this Jerusalem Chamber. They took him there because of its better fireplace. The king, when he came to himself, asked the name of the chamber. He was answered, "Your Majesty, it is called the Chamber of Jerusalem." Then he said, "I shall not recover. It was told me when I was a boy, that I should die at Jerusalem. That I always thought to mean, that I should die in the holy wars; but my end is approaching, and this is the place where my end shall be." And Shakespeare makes him say of this chamber, "In that Jerusalem shall Harry die." In that chamber, too, the dying king made the speech to his wild son, the companion of Falstaff, which converted him from his evil ways.

The excellent fireplace, which led to Henry IV.'s death in that apartment, was also the explanation of the use of the Jerusalem Chamber by the Westminster Assembly of Divines. They commenced their sittings in Henry VII.'s chapel, but as the weather grew cold, they asked if there was a place where they could be warmer, and they found the Jerusalem Chamber so warm that they kept on holding their meetings there. As with the Presbyterian divines, so with Convocation; they forsook the cold Abbey for the warm chamber, and thus in the Jerusalem Chamber the Revised Prayer-book was drawn up. And now the Jerusalem Chamber is from time to time occupied by scholars, partly of the Church of England, and partly of the different dissenting communions up and down the country, who meet there to do their best to make a more correct translation of the Old and New Testaments.

THE CAMPAIGN IN TUNIS.

PARIS, Oct. 7.—Gen. Logerot telegraphs, under date of Thursday, as follows: "I have occupied the Belvedere position with two battalions. The other forts will be occupied to-morrow. A flying column proceeding from Medjez to Testour was attacked, but its assailants were repulsed."

TUNIS, Oct. 7.—Several isolated points on the railway beyond Beja are threatened by the insurgents.

THE NIHILIST HEADQUARTERS DISCOVERED.

LONDON, Oct. 7.—The Berlin correspondent of the Morning Post says he has a communication from St. Petersburg announcing that the headquarters of the Nihilists have been discovered, and that sixty arrests have been made. The Berlin correspondent of the Times says: "Advices from St. Petersburg state that the most comprehensive measures have been taken for the safety of the Annitchkoff Palace, the Czar's favorite St. Petersburg residence. A subterranean passage has been constructed all around the palace, which can be patrolled by sentinels and immediately placed under water. The Czar is negotiating for the purchase of various houses surrounding the palace."

VIENNA, Oct. 7.—The Presse says that eight students at the Military College at Moscow and two at St. Petersburg have been arrested for Nihilism.

LONDON, Oct. 10.—All the troops in Natal have been hastened toward the frontier on the Transvaal.

CALCUTTA, Oct. 10.—The Ameer is raising three regiments at Candahar by forcible enlistment, and sending them to Cabul.

ROME, Oct. 10.—A terrible inundation has devastated the communes of Settimo and San Pietro. Fifty-four houses were destroyed and four lives lost. The losses of cattle and grain are enormous.

CONSPIRACY DISCOVERED.

LONDON, Oct. 11.—It is reported that a new conspiracy against the life of the Emperor of Russia has been discovered, the Nihilists in the telegraphic service having, on various occasions, betrayed to the conspirators news concerning the Emperor's intended journeys.

Russia continues to be the victim of a frightful diphtheria epidemic. In some districts it has carried off all the children up to fifteen years of age. In Poltowa, a province of less than 2,500,000 inhabitants, 45,543 cases have occurred, of which no fewer than 18,765 have been fatal. The disease first appeared in Bessarabia in 1872.

The Boston Traveller of Saturday says it is estimated that the damage within ten miles of that city by the recent frost was about $1,000,000. The same damaging visitation seems to have been quite general throughout the Eastern and Middle States.

The destruction by fire in September last was greater than any month for many years, except those in which the great conflagrations occurred in Chicago, Boston and St. Johns. The loss for the month is set down at $13,-250,000. The loss by forest fires alone is not less than $4,000,000, and many think that figure too low.

PERSECUTION OF WALDENSIAN CHILDREN.

The Sunday-school of the Waldensian church in Naples, under the care of Jean Pons, has been subjected to some persecution at the hands of the priests. Six girls were invited by them into the sacristy, and there questioned, first as to whether they attended the school, then as to what they learned there. They were assured by their interlocutor that they would "surely go to the devil," and he then commenced tearing up their Bibles. In deference to their sobs he desisted, and offered each a new dress and a pair of earrings if she would leave the school; but all his efforts were vain. The parents, however, finally took three of the children away and gave up their Bibles to be burned.

OBITUARY.

Fell asleep in Jesus, her elder brother, at Coldwater, Ont., Sept. 2, 1881, of heart disease, Hannah Leach, wife of Brother Walter Leach, in her 20th year.

Sister Leach was the daughter of brother and Sister Birdill. Six years ago this summer she, with brother Walter, and nine others, was immersed by the writer, and from that day to the day of her death, she honored her Redeemer.

Last May 24, she was united by marriage to Walter Leach, who holds the same faith she did, but in an hour unlooked for, the enemy death has taken from his embrace one with whom he had fondly hoped to enjoy this life until Jesus, the Life-Giver shall come as the Restorer of all things.

But she sleeps in Jesus, whilst loving parents, brothers, sisters, and the Church of God, and kind neighbors mourn over their loss. But none more so than Brother Walter. But we sorrow not as those who have no hope of a resurrection. 1 Thess. iv. 13-17.

The temperance hall was voluntarily given to us, where a large audience attended and listened attentively to a discourse delivered by the writer predicated upon Heb. vi. 17-20, in which he presented the believer's only hope of a future state; then we retired to Forest Cemetery, where we laid Sister Hannah down in the cold grave to rest until the morning of the resurrection!

Sleep on, loved one, until Jesus shall come! then he will awake thee from thy slumbers to immortal beauty, when you shall shine in Eden restored.

SONNET.

"The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."—Isaiah.

W. I. CROCKETT.

A lifeless waste scorched by the fiery breath
Of hot Simoons; century sentinel rocks
Unshaken by the tempest's fiercest shocks,
Dark, watching o'er the dread abode of death;
Gleaming while the eternal sun beneath
The heedless skull, of life forsaken mocks
The glaring sky; the grim Sahara locks
His arms around, and threatening clouds unwreath.

But lo! the desert is no more—
The welcome rain falls on a beauteous earth,
And God gives back the Paradise of yore.
His sons do walk within the heavenly light
Of his Great Presence; pure and bright,
The earth of love hath never dearth.

Letter Drawer.

HAMILTON, Ont.

Editor Restitution:

Am sorry to say that the truth does not make much progress in Hamilton at present. People will listen to what may be said about the truth, but if it cannot be mixed in with their own creeds they do not want it. They believe that they can be saved in their own church.

The prophet says that when God's judgments are abroad in the earth the people will learn righteous, but I fail to see that effect at the present time, for men seem more hardened in iniquity, and to act more like them of whom the Revelator speaks—blaspheming God for the plagues sent upon them. But thanks be to God that there are a few that love the Lord and his laws and try hard to walk as he requires.

We have ten or twelve who meet at my house every first day for worship, and who seem truly alive to the truth as it is in Jesus—longing, looking, and praying for his soon coming to change the affairs of this benighted earth, and bring the true light that will enlighten our fallen world, that they may know our God and Father, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent.

O how I long and pray for that happy time to come when our King, Jesus, shall make Jerusalem a praise in the earth—when he shall gather his elect from the four corners of the earth; when sin, sickness, sorrow, and death shall be no more; when peace and righteousness shall flow like a mighty river, and when all nations shall know, love, and serve one God.

Our Christadelphian friends are all scattered, and their synagogue sold, and turned into an organ factory. Some of them, having come from them, are now with us, two brethren and two of the sisters. These were begotten by the word of God before going with them, and they were glad to find a resting place, in the Master's fold, with his humble followers. They are anxious to learn the whole truth, and be found in Christ at his appearing and kingdom, when the dead in Christ will be raised immortal, and the living be changed in a moment and the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump.

Dear Brethren, may this be the happy lot of us all is the sincere prayer of your humble Sister in Christ.

MRS. C. LEE.

HESPERIA, Mich.

Editor Restitution:

I was ordained a Baptist minister January 1, 1865, and occupied a position with the denomination until quite recently. I learned that the Bible taught—

1. That man was a mortal being, made of the dust of the ground.

2. That Jesus Christ the Son of God came into this world to save the lost, and to do this he was made an offering for sin and died and was buried.

3. That death is an unconscious state, and oblivion would have been the final of all mankind if the Lord Jesus had not arose from the dead.

4. That the resurrection of Jesus secures a resurrection to the human family.

5. That the resurrection of the dead is the only prospect of a future.

I also learned from the Bible—

1. That Jesus is soon to return in person to this earth, and then he is to set up a kingdom over the nations of the earth, and associate the saints who are accounted worthy of a part in the first resurrection.

2. That all the rewards to the righteous and the wicked are in the future.

Being compelled to preach these views in order to be faithful to the Master, I found myself out of joint with the ministers of the denomination. Two years ago a committee was appointed by the White River Baptist Association to wait upon me, and they came immediately to me after the adjournment, and asked:—

"Do you preach as the Baptists preach?"

My reply was, "You give me a hearing, brethren, and you be the judges."

That was about the end of the matter, they never gave me a hearing, and I stopped going to their meeting.

I was surprised to find that the word Baptist was an end of all doubt with many of the Baptists. That the love of the truth may grow, very weak even with Baptists, when I supposed that God's word and his truth was the only standard.

I am in a manner alone in this part of the State, and yet not alone, for there are many good people in these parts, and the Lord is with me in preaching his word and gives me strength to do it.

I like THE RESTITUTION very much and feel that I do not want to be without it. Would be glad if some of the brethren could call this way.

It is hard to spare the money this year, in this uncertain country, but I don't know how to get along without the paper. The hot winds and chinch bugs have nearly ruined everything. I estimate corn at one bushel per acre in this part of the country, wheat five bushels, rye six; other grain and vegetables nothing worth mentioning. I give this for information.

Yours hoping for the best and that the Lord will soon come.

R. J. RICHARDS.

AUSTIN, Ill.

Editor Restitution:

I have been compelled through the generosity of one of your number, to read your excellent paper for the last year, and although I did not think much of it at first am constrained, in justice, to say I now consider it one of the best religious papers published. There is nothing so disgusts me with a professedly religious paper as to see it full of glaring advertisements, in which there is not one word of truth; but it is no worse than the course taken by the visible church all over the land, when fundants united to build churches or send missionaries to convert the heathen, or anything else. Is it not strange that ministers will stand up and insist that the world is growing better just because the church records show a larger list of names than before.

Do they take no notice of what Christ himself says in Matt. xx. 16, xxiv. 12?

But it is no way to make things better to find fault, but to do something to wake up the church.

Could not some of your able contributors write a small tract, in a few emphatic words, but right to the point, and show the churches the difference between Bible theology and modern theology—tracts that all can help distribute? Seem to me this would do good.

Respectfully,

Editor Restitution:

I have not lost my interest in THE RESTITUTION, if I am late with my subscription. It never was more interesting than for the past few months. Cannot always find time to read the long articles, but find them interesting when I do. The articles concerning the Holy Land are always read with interest by me. There never was a time when we needed to exhort one another to watchfulness more than at present. Signs continue to thicken in heaven above and earth beneath, showing the day of God near.

Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth. My desire is to be found among that class when the Master comes.

Brevities.

A snapple of water from the Sacred Well of Mecca has been analyzed and found to be polluted by sewage to an extraordinary degree of disease-breeding filthiness. In fact, Professor Frankland, who made the analysis, declares that it is nothing less than bottled cholera, and, as this water is in great demand throughout Mohammedan countries, it is manifest that it is likely to be an active agent in the dissemination of disease.

Incendiary fires in the western departments of Russia have caused the destruction of an immense amount of property this year. Up to the end of June sixteen towns and villages had been burned to the ground, including Whitebsk, with 23,000 population; Bobrinsk, 23,000; Slonim, 20,000; and Mobileff, 25,000. But the greatest conflagrations have occurred in Kores and Minsk. In Kores 1,020 houses and shops were destroyed, including eleven prayer houses and the synagogue. Thirty-nine lives were lost, and the bulk of the survivors are destitute and without shelter. At Minsk the condition of things is said to have been worse, and the loss is estimated to be three times as great.

So great has been the destruction of cedar trees in the famous Lebanon forest that they have dwindled into a mere thicket, numbering only 400 trees. Rustem Pasha, the Governor General, has taken steps to arrest the disgraceful vandalism which they suffer at the hands of travelers. He has issued a special ordinance forbidding the erection of tents or other kinds of shelter within the tree district, and the lighting of fires for cooking or other purposes is also prohibited. No one will be allowed to break off a twig, and beasts of burden will not be permitted to enter within the prescribed limits. Should oxen, sheep, goats, or other pasturage cattle be found there, they will be confiscated absolutely.

The present remarkable year may witness still another celestial wonder. The Scientific American says that a mysterious star called the Pilgrim, which was observed in 945, 1264 and 1572, is expected by astronomers to appear before long. It was described in 1572 as brighter than Jupiter, and such was its brilliancy that persons were able to detect it at noon in a clear sky, and at night when the sky was so overcast as to hide all other stars." If it appears it will probably be visible for several weeks in the constellation of Cassiopeia.

GREAT HEAT IN JERUSALEM.

Dr. Chaplin, writing from Jerusalem, August 31, 1881, says: "During the early summer, when Europe was suffering from excessively high temperatures, Palestine was even cooler than usual at that period of the year; but for several days past we have now had a most extraordinarily hot time, the thermometer in the thermometer-house on the Mission Hospital premises registering 112 deg. on three successive days. Fortunately the air was very dry, which rendered this heat less unendurable. The difference between the dry and the wet bulb thermometers was at one time as much as 40 deg. The mean maximum temperature for August is here 87 deg. During the last few days it has been 109.5 deg."

The Siberian pest that has been raging in Russia is described as an inflammation of the spleen that first attacked cattle and horses. The diseased animals, without giving any premonitory symptoms of illness, would suddenly fall in their tracks and expire. The spread of the epidemic to human beings is being attributed to the ignorance and carelessness of the populace and police authorities. Although with sufficient evidence that the pest is contagious, the owners of animals dying of it were allowed to skin them and use or sell their hides. This spread the contagion both within and beyond the confines of the province of Novgorod, in which it first manifested itself. The peasants sought to check the epidemic by forming religious processions and marching about with banners bearing the figure of the Virgin, and reciting prayers. This only helped to distribute the seeds of the disease still further. Large numbers of domestic animals have fallen a prey to it, and also many human lives. One circumstance that added to its destructiveness was the differences that existed for a time among the physicians as to the best mode of treating it, their apparent uncertainty serving to heighten the natural terror of the country populace.

KAIRWAN, THE HOLY CITY.

Kairwan, about eighty miles south of Tunis, whose destruction by the French is possible, is looked upon by the Mussulmans as the holy city of Africa. It is surrounded by a well-kept wall and lies in a large sandy plain, but is not impregnable. It is said at one time to have contained between fifty and sixty thousand inhabitants. At present the number is only about twelve thousand, but there is still a great deal of wealth owing to the constant stream of pilgrims and the fact that many rich people pass their last years here, so that they may die in a consecrated atmosphere. The city contains twenty-six mosques and many other costly and beautiful buildings erected by the various Mussulman dynasties that have reigned in North Africa. The tomb of Sidi-el-Onaib, the barber of Mohammed, in the centre of the city, which is supposed to contain three hairs from the prophet's beard, is worshipped by the Tunisians, the inhabitants of Tripoli, Algiers, Morocco, and even of Egypt. The roof of the Akbar Mosque is supported by three hundred and twelve columns of marble, granite, and porphyry. With the exception of some physicians, servants and diplomats, all infidels have hitherto been shut out from the city, all Christians and Jews who dared to enter having been either executed or obliged to change their religion.

Jacksonville (Ore.) Record.

A LAKE 2,000 FEET DEEP.

Several of our citizens returned last week from the Great Sunken Lake, situated in the Cascade Mountains, about seventy-five miles northeast from Jacksonville. This lake rivals the famous valley of Sinbad the Sailor. It is thought to average 2,000 feet down to the water all around. The depth of the water is unknown, and its surface is smooth and unruffled, as it is so far below the surface of the mountains that air currents do not effect it. Its length is estimated at twelve to fifteen miles, and its width ten or twelve. There is a mountain in the center having trees upon. It lies still, silent and mysterious in the bosom of the everlasting hills, like a huge well scooped out by the hands of the giant genii of the mountains in the unknown ages gone by, and around it the primeval forests watch and ward are keeping. The visiting party fired a rifle into the water several times at an angle of forty-five degrees, and were able to note several seconds of time from the report of the gun until the ball struck the water. Such seems incredible, but it is vouched for by our most reliable citizens. The lake is certainly a most remarkable curiosity.

Sententious.

The universe is the handwriting of God, and all objects are words in it.

Small things cease to be small when their effects are mighty.

Whatever is the matter of our rejoicing should be the matter of our thanksgiving.

Right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin.

The future may have its doubts and clouds, and anxious years may hang them with a somber drapery, but they are illuminated with the radiant bow of hope.

Men are apt to mistake the strength of their feeling for the strength of their argument. The heated mind resents the chill touch and relentless scrutiny of logic.

I want a keen observing eye,
An ever-listening ear,
That teach me right all discipline to spy
And wisdom's voice to hear.

A man who habitually makes mean remarks about the other sex is a safe man to keep habitually away from.

The manly heart with manly price will hold
A woman's equal trust to manhood given,
A sacred trust—more worth than heaps of gold—
The fairest flower that blooms this side of heaven.

While you wait, doubting and hesitating, the opportunity to do the best thing possible, your life is passing away. Give yourself a grand surprise by putting your best impulses into action at once.

When all power in heaven and in earth was given to the Son of God, so far from using that power to crush his enemies, he first instituted a mission of mercy among them.

Out of a void and formless chaos God evolved beauty and order; when all was blackness and darkness he said, "Let there be light." So out of death and decay he will educe life and incorruption, and earth's deserts, in the re-genesis, shall bloom and blossom as the rose. In his own good time the wastes of thorns and thistles shall become the gardens of God. The discords of earth will be exchanged for the melodies of heaven, and all the sorrows and heart-aches of the vale of tears for the unalloyed ecstasies of the world to come.

That is a good style, generally, in which the words are vitalized by the thought, so that if you cut them they will bleed; in which the language is so fresh and forceful as to seem to have been just created; which is so elastic that it accommodates itself unconsciously to all the sinuosities of the thought; so that the thought and the expression are never for a moment separated, but are a simultaneous creation, coined at one stroke. The perfect writer, so far from having any one ideal style, will have a hundred styles, shifting and varying with every variation of his ideas and feelings. His instrument of expression, will not be a pipe, but an organ with many banks of keys; capable of giving expression alike to thoughts that require only mellifluous cadences and gliding grace, and to those that require dispason grandeur or trumpet stop—to the complex harmonies of a Heroic Symphony, or the tumultuous movements of a Hailstone Chorus.—William Mathews.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

There will be a religious discussion held at the Christadelphian meeting-house, at Valley Springs, Texas, between Mr. W. H. Meadows, of Field Creek, and the undersigned, commencing at 10 a. m. on Thursday before the fourth Sunday in October, and continuing four consecutive days. Two propositions will be discussed, viz:—

1. "The kingdom of God, referred to in Dan. ii. 44, is a future dominion to be set up at the second coming of Christ." The undersigned affirms, Mr. Meadows denies.

2. "Jesus Christ is now a reigning King." Mr. Meadows affirms, the undersigned denies.

All friends and lovers of Bible truth are invited to attend.

JOHN BANTA.

The brethren of Kansas will meet in Conference at Severance, Doniphan county, Nov. 4, 1881, in the evening, the meeting to continue over Sunday. Brethren Adams and Pierson will be with us to preach the word. Others are invited to come and assist. All of like precious faith are cordially invited to come and participate with us, that we may have one more pleasant and joyful greeting together amid the sorrows and trials of this present life.

By order of the brethren.

LOTT CLOVER.

I will speak as follows: The first of October at Brother C. A. Saylor's, five and one-half miles northwest of Morrill, Brown Co., Kan. Next, Oct. 27, near Clifton, Nemaha Co., Neb., to continue over Sunday, where Brother Jas. Stephens may arrange. Next at Farmington, Atchison Co., Kan., on the Central Branch R. R. Those coming to Farmington will ask for Silas Goodrich. The meeting to commence November 29, and continue over Sunday.

OPINIONS OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy in most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for cost and perusal the important information that it will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 14, 1879.

"It evinces a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scripture, and uniform courtesy toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York, Nov. 22, 1881.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested merely, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are second to none in importance to us. * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and convincing way, should buy this book."—The Rural Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 17, 1879.

"I have read it diligently again and again. * * It is next in point of excellence and doctrinal truths to the Book of books."—D. M. L., Mo.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GREEK AND ENGLISH!

—ARRANGED—

THE EMPHATIC DIAGLOTT

—BY BENJAMIN WILSON.—

Contains the Original Greek text of the New Testament, with an interlinear word-for-word English translation, based on the readings of eminent critics, and on the various renderings of the Vulgate Manuscripts, together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references.

The different renderings of various passages in the New Testament are the foundations on which most of the sects of Christians have been built up; with this work each reader may judge for himself whether the words there literally translated are so arranged in the common version as to express the exact meaning of the New Testament Writers.

Now improved edition on larger paper, 984 pages, cloth $4.00, Library binding $5.00.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the Exalted "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

No. 87.

J. P. WEETHEE.

Binding under Timour the Tartar.—We have noticed the struggles made by the Turks to free themselves from the Euphratean boundaries. The western Asia and the territory of Europe, spreading out their wealth, tempted their cupidity, and inflamed their ambition. Their western conquests gave birth to the crusades; and they were driven back to the Euphrates and bound for two centuries. Partially bursting these boundaries they were again forced back and chained by Zingis Khan and his successors.

We have now arrived at their last and terrible overthrow by Timour, who was called "Emperor of the world." While Bajazet was occupied in the siege of Constantinople, Timour respected his laudable enterprise, and turned aside towards Syria; and, in the fierceness of savage cruelty, poured the vials of his wrath on the cities of Aleppo and Damascus. The deceit of Timour was unbounded. To the Greek doctors he said:—

"You see me here, a poor, lame, decrepit mortal. Yet by my arm has the Almighty been pleased to subdue the kingdoms of Iran, Touran, and the Indies. I am not a man of blood; and God is my witness, that in all my wars I have never been the aggressor, and that my enemies have always been the authors of their own calamity.' During this peaceful conversation the streets of Aleppo streamed with blood, and re-echoed with the cries of mothers and children, and with the shrieks of violated virgins."—Gibbon.

At Aleppo his savage cruelty was marked by the columns, and pyramids of heads, which he erected. His conduct at Damascus was full of treachery. After standing seven centuries that city was reduced to ashes, because a Tartar was moved by his over-zealous attachment to his religion, to avenge the blood of an Arab. On his return to the Euphrates, Timour delivered Aleppo to the devouring fires; and, on the ruins of Bagdad he erected a pyramid of ninety thousand heads.

On the banks of the Araxes he declared his intention of moving westward against the Ottoman emperor. His forces which he gathered out of all the provinces amounted to eight hundred thousand men. In his conquests of Syria he had gathered immense wealth, sufficient for seven years' pay of the soldiers. These events occupied about two years; during which time Bajazet had made immense preparation to meet the proud Mogul.

His forces amounted to four hundred thousand choice troops. Of these, forty thousand were Janizaries, and twenty thousand Cuirassiers of Europe, "clad in black and impenetrable armor." He had, also, in his army, the troops of the princes of Anatolia who had fled to his camp for protection.

Bajazet selected, as the place for the decisive battle, the vicinity of the unfortunate Sivas. Timour, in the meantime, moved from the Araxes through Armenia and Anatolia with the intention of meeting the sultan in the heart of his dominion. Avoiding Bajazet, he first occupied Cesarea; passing the salty plains and river Halys, he laid siege to Angora. The sultan, indignant that his camp was avoided, flew to the relief of Angora. On the plains of that city, the fate of the Ottoman empire was decided for fifty years. In this severely contested battle the Greek fire was again called into use, as it was then familiar to the Turks and Tartars. Had they borrowed the gunpowder and cannon of Europe, either army using it would have been victorious. Bajazet, failing to secure the affections and confidence of his army, was defeated; his army was dispersed, and he himself fell into the hands of the Mogul conqueror. All the strong holds were taken, and Asia Minor was overrun, and taken by Timour. The sea alone put an end to his forward movement.

Bajazet is said to have been confined, like a wild beast, in an iron cage, and exhibited as a show to all the countries through which the Mogul emperor passed, towards Samarcand where Timour intended to exhibit his illustrious captive. Other historians affirm that Bajazet preferred that exclusive mode of travel rather than to be exposed to the insults of Mogul enemies.

The Ottoman Empire at the Close of the Tartar Invasion.—If that empire was now reduced to that helpless state, our wise expositors would say, "The mystic Euphrates is about dry."

With such an interpretation, how many dryings up have there been since this language was recorded by John?

Three, at least:—

1. Under the crusades.
2. Under Zingis.
3. Under Tamerlane, the one we are now describing.

We prefer to express these Ottoman reverses by language used by the Deity—"BOUND at the Euphrates." The river is not the chained agent, but the angels at the river.

In this vision the river is not the agent; is it ever called an agent?

This we shall consider when we come to that passage (Rev. xvi. 12).

Timour had nearly all Asia under his control; he was saluted as "King of the world." It is said that he meditated a southern and western expedition; he proposed to march through and conquer Egypt; then subjugate north Africa; and, passing over into Europe to subdue all the Christian nations; and close his expedition by the overthrow of the Greek empire. The western nations, anticipating such an invasion, avoided it by submitting, in advance. Egypt sent presents. So with nearly all of the western nations.

Timour was satisfied with these tokens of submission; and not wishing to shed any more Mahometan blood, turned his arms towards China. After resting a few weeks at Samarcand, he entered upon his Chinese expedition. While on his march he contracted a fever which soon put an end to his life. His army was disbanded, and China saved. The Ottoman empire was also delivered from its conqueror. The conquests of Timour had wrought great changes in the Turkish empire. Before the invasion of that empire by the Tartar, Bajazet had established his dominion over all the Euphratean waters; conquered Syria and Anatolia; had subdued a large portion of southeastern Europe, and had laid siege to Constantinople. At the battle of Angora, his power was crushed, and he became a prisoner and soon expired. By his bonds the empire was contracted to its former limits and bound for half a century.

Bajazet had no son able to fill his position. When Timour evacuated Anatolia, "he left the cities without a palace, a treasure, or a king. The open country was overspread with hordes of shepherds and robbers of Tartar or Turkman origin; the recent conquests of Bajazet were restored to the emirs, one of whom, in base revenge, demolished his sepulchre; and his five sons were eager, by civil discord, to consume the remnant of their patrimony."—Gibbon.

After the departure of the Moguls, Soliman united, for a time, the thrones (sultanies) of Adrianople and Bourse; yet he was idle, and intemperate; and, by his intemperate vices, alienated the chiefs of the army and the law; he was slain by his brother Mousa, after a reign of seven years. Mousa was called the slave of the Moguls, since his kingdom of Anatolia was tributary to the Tartars. His kingdom was confined to narrow limits. He fled before the forces of Roumania. He ascended for a short time the vacant throne of Adrianople, but fell before the superior power of his brother Mahomet. He was slain by order of Mahomet, who gained Roumania and Anatolia. Mahomet spent eight years in banishing the vices of civil discord, and in restoring the Ottoman monarchy.

At his death he was succeeded by his son Amurath. During his reign the impostor Mustapha kindled a bloody war but he was killed by one of Amurath's viziers. Amurath was transported into Europe, but had not power to hold his position. He afterwards laid siege to Constantinople.

"After a siege of two months Amurath was recalled to Boursa by a domestic revolt, which had been kindled by treachery, and was soon extinguished by the death of a guiltless brother. While he led his Janizaries to the new conquests in Europe and Asia, the Byzantine empire was indulged in a servile and precarious respite of thirty years."—Gibbon.

The strength of the Ottoman empire, as well as that of the Arabian, lay in its unity. During many centuries before the taking of Constantinople, that empire had been divided among rival sultanies. In Persia was the sultan that belonged to that wing of Mahometanism, which maintained that Ali was the true successor of Mahomet. Later there were the sultanies of Damascus and Aleppo; and, in Anatolia, Erzeroum; or, as it was sometimes called, New Rome. They professed one religion, yet they ruled over rival countries. For ages, while the Greek empire sustained its eastern boundary at the Euphrates, the contests were east of the Euphrates. Now and then a Turkish raid carried their arms across that great river; but they were soon defeated and driven back.

The continued wars between Persia and Rome so weakened the Roman empire that their eastern river boundary became precarious. When Persia was finally conquered by the Turks, the river became their boundary. By the divisions of the Arabian empire, Bagdad became powerless, and fell under Turkish Rule. Henceforward the Turkish power continually struggled to establish a more extended boundary towards the setting sun. They seemed to have a presentiment of their future destiny. They extended their conquests through Syria and Egypt. Securing these ancient provinces of the Roman empire, they moved their armies towards Constantinople; conquered Armenia, and marched through Anatolia, towards the capital of the Greek empire. In the course of years they established a sultany at Nice, within one hundred miles of Constantinople.

The Greek emperor took the alarm, and sent to old Rome to ask aid from the Latin powers. At this juncture began the efforts to drive the Turks out of Jerusalem. All Europe was moved against the Turkish empire. That empire would have been totally annihilated had it not been saved through the jealousy of the emperors. This fear of the Latin powers went so far, at times, as to cause a temporary union of Greeks and Turks. Such was the state of affairs during the eight crusades which continued about two centuries.

During this long period the Turkish empire was thrown back and held (bound) at the Euphrates, or its tributaries. The crusades being terminated, the former intentions of the Turks to make Constantinople their trans-marine home, were revived. All their conquests tended to this end. It was, however, too soon to suit the plans of Jehovah, and they were driven back and again bound by the armies of Zingis, the Mogul Tartar. The Mogul empire passing away, the Ottomans put forth another effort to take Constantinople.

Bajazet had conquered nearly all southeastern Europe, and was carrying on the siege of Constantinople, when the ambassadors of Timour gave notice of the intentions of their master. They met on the plains of Angora, and the Ottoman empire was again obliged to retire towards her ancient boundaries. Three times was the Turkish power driven back and confined.

What power was working behind these human thrones?

That power that shapes national destinies, that he may accomplish his own predicted purposes.

Turkey, like other nations, ran before she was called.

The seed dies unto a new life, and so does the man.—George McDonald.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

The Tower of London.

C. C. MARSTON.

To describe the city of London in a newspaper article would be as impossible as to put the history of England into a column, for the history of London is the history of England. It will therefore be the purpose of these articles simply to call attention to some of the more important sights of the great metropolis. Our time is limited and we must of necessity omit many interesting things.

The Tower, the only fortress in London and the most important fort in the kingdom, is considered by travelers to be second only to Westminster Abbey in point of interest. It consists of towers, batteries, forts, barracks, ramparts, arsenals, drill-grounds, chapels, etc., covering an area of thirteen acres. It has been in turn a palace, a prison and a royal fortress. Henry III. was married within its walls. Lady Anne Boleyn was cruelly murdered in the same place, as was also Lady Jane Grey. The tragic story of Lady Boleyn is full of sad and tender interest. At the age of thirty-two she became the wife of Henry VIII. The Lord Mayor and his civic train arrayed in scarlet, escorted her from Greenwich to the Tower where the king received her as the queen of England, May 19, 1533, "amidst the melody of trumpets and divers instruments, and a mighty peal of guns."

May 1, 1536, in the midst of a splendid tournament at Greenwich the king suddenly retired from the royal scene, and the next day Lady Boleyn was arrested on what many historians regard an unfounded charge of infidelity.

She was taken to the Tower a prisoner. The gates of the palace in the gloomy fortress once more opened to receive Queen Anne; and she inhabited the same royal apartments, the Queen's lodgings, which were the scene of her triumph before her coronation. Anne was arraigned before her uncle, the Duke of Norfolk, in the great hall of the palace, charged with unfaithfulness to Henry. She manifested much dignity and composure in the presence of her judges. They pronounced her guilty! She heard her sentence with a serene countenance, and lifting up her hands and eyes to heaven, she exclaimed: O, Father! O, Creator! Thou who art the way, the truth, and the life! Thou knowest I have not deserved this death!

On the 19th of May a mournful procession passed over the Tower Green. Anne was on her way to the scaffold. After addressing a few calm words to those around her, she laid upon the fatal block her head, which the executioner severed from her body with one stroke of his sword.

She was thrust into an old chest, and was immediately placed in the vaults of the chapel in front of which the scaffold was erected.

Two decades later the still sadder tragedy of Lady Jane Grey was enacted. Charles Knight calls her the most charming usurper of history. She aspired to the throne through the whims of her ill advisers and after a ten days' reign became a prisoner in what had been her palace; and in process of time in company with her young husband met her fate on the Tower Green.

On the wall of the room where her husband was confined is still pointed out the rude letters of his wife's name.

In the Bloody Tower the two sons of Edward IV. were smothered by order of their uncle Richard III.

Sir Walter Raleigh spent twelve years in this royal prison.

But the time would fail to tell of all the princes and lords and royal personages who have been imprisoned and executed within these tragic walls.

Among the Towers, the Record Tower built in the reign of William Rufus 1078 A. D., and the White tower bearing about the same date, erected by William the Conqueror, are perhaps the most interesting; they are splendid specimens of Norman architecture.

The White Tower is 116 feet in diameter and 92 feet high. It is embattled, and has watch towers or turrets at each angle. The roof is covered with lead. It consists of three lofty stories besides the spacious vaults in the basement floor. The external walls are fifteen feet in thickness. Traces of a large archway on the north side seem to point out the original grand entrance.

The Armory contains an immense collection of ancient armors and implements of warfare gathered from various nations. It is said to be the largest collection in existence. Recently these have been arranged in chronological order.

St. Paul's chapel, built in 1274, in the reign of Edward I., is a plain stone structure consisting of a nave and one side aisle, and is chiefly interesting as being the burial place of many distinguished characters. Among them the "revered and beloved" Lady Jane Grey, the famous Republican Thomas Cromwell, the Duke of Somerset, the Earl of Essex, and many others. One cannot help remarking the injustice of denying such a man as Cromwell a niche in the national sepulchre at Westminster Abbey. Many less illustrious and less worthy are most honorably installed in that noted home of the dead.

In the Record Tower is a small room called the jewel room, in which are kept the crown jewels of England. There are five crowns including the imperial crown of the present queen, resplendent with diamonds and the richest gold. And the crown worn by the Prince of Wales and which is placed before the seat which he occupies in the House of Lords.

There are also nine sceptres of ancient and curious workmanship. Three of these sceptres may be called "sceptres of sentiment"—the Curtana, or Sword of Mercy, and the two Swords of Justice; temporal and ecclesiastical. These are borne before the sovereign at coronation.

There are also coronation bracelets and spurs, the anointing-vessel and spoon, and a golden salt cellar, elaborately and beautifully carved. The royal baptismal font and a beautiful service of sacramental plate, the former used for the christening of royal children, and the latter at the august ceremony of coronation.

After having spent half a day among the historic halls, cells, palaces, chapels, and courts of this ancient seat of tragedy and crime, and pleasure, I came away profoundly impressed with the tyrannical and brutal character of those dark ages out of which the polite and elegant civilization of modern England has immerged.

How Charlie Minded.

Little Charlie was playing marbles:
With his comrades in the street
When a window was thrown open,
And there came a voice so sweet:

"Charlie, dear, your father wants you!"
Charlie stopped to hear no more;
Left his playmates and his marbles,
Entered at the cottage door.

Now a merchant who was passing
Wanted soon in his employ
Such a lad as could be trusted,
And he thought of Charlie boy.

And that splendid store was Charlie's,
After years had passed away,
Just because he minded quickly
On that pleasant summer day.

Children should respect their parents
And obey them in the Lord.
'Tis the first command with promise,
Written in the Holy Word.

From the German.

A Contented Herd Boy.

In a flowery dell a herd boy kept his sheep, and because his heart was joyous he sang so loudly that the surrounding hills echoed back his song. One morning, the king who was out on a hunting expedition, spoke to him and said:

"Why are you so happy, dear little one?"

"Why shall I not be?" he answered; "our king is not richer than I."

"Indeed!" said the king, "tell me of your great possessions."

The lad answered, "The' sun in the bright blue sky shines as brightly upon me as upon the king. The flowers on the mountain and the grass in the valley grow and bloom to gladden my sight as well as his. I would not take a hundred thousand thalers for my hands; my eyes are of more value than all the precious stones in the world; I have food and clothing, too. Am I not therefore, as rich as the king?"

"You are right," said the king with a laugh; "but your greatest treasure is a contented heart. Keep it so, and you will always be happy."

"You Will Not Do."

General Conway told the following story of General Garfield the other day:

Once during the dreadful conflict, a young man came to General Garfield, proposing to do some service of a peculiarly important character. The young man was under the influence of liquor at the time. As soon as General Garfield noticed this, he said, "No, sir, you will not do."

Turning to General Sheldon, he remarked, "I can no more trust a drunkard than a liar," and added, "a fine-looking young man, but killing himself with rum. God speed the time when our young men and fathers will not be cursed by it."

Detroit Press.

She Will Need Them No More.

Some days since, a man noticed a ragged little boot-black cutting some bright blossoms from a bruised and faded bouquet that a chambermaid had thrown from a window into the alley.

"What are you doing with that bouquet, my lad?" asked the disseminator.

"Nuthin," said the lad, as he kept on at his work.

"But do you love flowers so well that you are willing to pick them out of the mud?"

"I s'pose that's my business, an' none o' yourn."

"Oh, certainly; but you surely can not expect to sell those faded flowers?"

"Sell 'em! Who wants to sell 'em? I'm goin' to take 'em to Lil."

"Oh, Oh! Lil is your sweetheart; I see."

"No, Lil is not my sweetheart; she's my sick sister," said the boy, as his eyes flashed and his dirty chin quivered. "Lil's been sick for a long time, an' lately she talks of nothin' but flowers an' birds; but mother tole me this mornin' that Lil would die b-b-before the birds and flowers came back again."

The boy burst into tears.

"Come with me to the florist's, and your sister shall have a nice bouquet."

The little fellow was soon bounding home with his treasure. Next day he appeared and said:

"I came to thank you sir, for Lil. That boquet done her so much good, and she hugged and hugged it till she set herself a-coughing again. She says she'll come bimeby and work for you, soon's she gits well."

An order was sent to the florist to give the boy every other day a bouquet for Lil.

It was only the day before yesterday that the boot-black appeared again. He stepped inside the office door, and said:

"Thank you sir, but Lil—Lil (tears streaming from his eyes) won't—need—the flowers any more."

He went quickly away, but his brief words had told the story. Lil won't need the flowers; but they will grow above her and the birds will sing just the same.

Galileo at the Church of Pisa.

One day Galileo, a young student of medicine at Pisa, saw the great bronze chandelier of the cathedral swing to and fro. He watched it carefully, and found that it moved regularly. It always came back to the same place. He thought he could imitate it, and suspended a weight to a string, and thus formed the first pendulum.

His invention has never ceased to be of use to every one. The pendulum was attached to the works of a clock, and has from that moment continued the chief means of measuring time. It rules every family, directs the business of cities, and tells when to go to school and when school is out.

The great clock in the City Hall and the clocks in all the steeples and towers are guided by Galileo's pendulum. The wooden clock we buy for two or three dollars, and the costly French clock that ticks on the mantel, owe their chief value to the invention of the young student. The pendulum, wherever it swings to and fro seems to speak of Galileo.

He was born at Pisa in 1564, the same year with Shakspeare. His father was poor, and wished to apprentice him to the wool trade. But Galileo showed a strong love for mechanics and mathematics; he professed to study medicine at the University of Pisa, but was always busy with mechanical experiments. He worked incessantly with his tools and books, and produced a great number of inventions, more, perhaps, than any other man.

From youth to extreme old age he was constantly in his workshop, and labored when others slept.

One of his inventions was the thermometer that measures the heat or cold of every land. It is used to mark the temperature of the highest mountains, and is plunged into the depths of the sea; tells the boiling point and the freezing point, and governs the house and factory.

At last, in 1609, Galileo invented the telescope. It had been thought of in Holland, but never brought to any perfection. Galileo caught up the idea and produced the remarkable instrument that brings distant things near. Until that time no one had supposed that men could see beyond a certain limit, and the sailor on the ocean and the travelers by land could look only a few miles before them.

Galileo's first telescope was made of lead, small and imperfect, but it was polished and perfected with his wonderful skill and industry. It filled all Italy and Europe with an intense excitement. Men came in crowds to look through the first telescope. At Venice, where Galileo was staying, the merchants climbed to the top of the highest tower to see their ships far off on the water two hours before they could have been seen without the telescope.

Galileo was enriched with honors and a large salary. He went to Florence, and was received with wonder and delight by great crowds of his countrymen.

Next came a still more startling discovery. Galileo turned his telescope to the skies, and saw things that had never before been witnessed my mortal eyes. The Milky Way dissolved into a bed of stars; Jupiter showed its four satellites, Saturn its rings; the moon seemed covered with mountains, seas, and rivers. The heavens seemed revealed to man, and Galileo soon after, startled by his own discoveries, published his "Message from the Stars." In this pamphlet he describes the wonders of the skies he was the first to see. It was read all over Europe, and the people and princes heard with awe the account of the new heavens. Many people denied that there was any truth in the narrative; it was looked upon as a kind of Moon hoax or Gulliver's Travels; some said only an optical delusion, and Galileo was attacked by a thousand enemies.

His health was always delicate, and he was always kept poor and in debt by a worthless son and an idle brother. His life, so prosperous, ended in misfortune. His telescope proved to him that the world moved round the sun, and he ventured to say so. Unfortunately the Inquisition and nearly every one else believed the sun moved round the earth. Galileo was forced to say that he was mistaken. He was tried at Rome, condemned, and obliged, on his knees, to confess his error; and during the last years of his life was kept a prisoner in his own house near Florence.

He passed his time in constant work studying the moon, and making instruments. At last he became blind.

Here Milton visited him, and looked upon him with veneration. He died in 1642, and was buried very privately in the church of Santa Croce, at Florence.

Galileo was of a pleasant countenance, always cheerful. His hair was of a reddish tinge, his eyes bright and sparkling until they became dimmed like Milton's. His figure was strong, and well formed.

It was said of him that no one had ever seen him idle. He was never weary of improving his telescope. The first one he made only magnified three times, the second eight, and then one that magnified thirty times. It is the persons who are never idle that help themselves and others.

THE RESTITUTION.

E. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Oct. 19, 1881.

WILD and turbulent times are the order of the day in Ireland, attended with bloodshed. A mob was dispersed at Limerick on Sunday at the point of the bayonet.

WE had written an editorial article for the present number, but when completed found it too long for this RESTITUTION. For this reason we occupy but little space this week.

THE phenomenal character of 1881 is about as marked at present as it has been during its entire course. A disastrous hurricane has swept over northeastern Europe, and incessant rains are causing floods in the Upper Mississippi and its tributaries.

GUITEAU.

Guiteau's Former Financial Reputation.

The utter worthlessness of the poor wretch who murdered the president is given below with laconic brevity. We clip the extract from the Evening Journal:

A citizen of Chicago, looking over a mercantile directory for 1872, finds on the black list the entry: "Z.—Guiteau, Charles J., lawyer." Turning to the definition of the letter "Z," he finds: "Z—Income uncertain and often pecarious. Defers indefinitely the payment of debts. Law-suits to collect claims would be useless. No credit or favors should be given."

THE LAW THAT HAS BEEN ABOLISHED.

JOEL A. SIMONDS.

The apostle Paul exhorted all the saints in every place, to speak the same thing: and to be of the same mind, and of the same judgment; and that there be no divisions among them.

The Sabbath question has caused a great deal of division throughout the land. I will, therefore, make one effort to unite all the saints in every place, on this question, and as the Sabbath depends on the perpetuity of the ten commandments, I will examine

I. The law that has been abolished, and

II. The law that will be perpetual.

1. The law that has been abolished. Some law has been abolished. 2 Cor. iii. 13. Some law has been done away. 2 Cor. iii. 7. There is a law from which we have been delivered. Rom. vii. 6. We are not now under that law. Gal. iii. 26. Some law was a shadow, to be continued only till it reached the substance. Heb. x. 1. We are to hear Christ, instead of the law that was to pass away. Matt. v. 22–44; vii. 24. We were to hear some law that was given to Moses until a prophet should be raised up, whom we were to hear in all things, whatsoever he shall say unto us. Acts iii. 22. This law was nailed to the cross. Col. ii. 14. And was ready to vanish away in Paul's time. Heb. viii. 13.

That some law has passed away, we all agree, but we are not so well agreed as to the extent of this law. I will enquire

WHAT LAW HAS PASSED AWAY?

It was the law of commandments, contained in ordinances. Eph. ii. 15. This is just such a law as was given to Moses in the wilderness. It was the law given by Moses. John i. 17. It was the law that contains one of the ten commandments—thou shalt not covet. Rom. vii. 7.

It was the law by which no man can be justified. Gal. ii. 16. It was the law that contained the Sabbath. Col. ii. 16. It was the law that contained two other of the ten commandments. Matt. v. 21, 27. It was the law, a part of which was written and engraven on tables of stone. 2 Cor. iii. 7. It was the law which was a shadow. Heb. x. 1. It was the law that was given to the children of Israel 430 years after the covenant was made with Abraham. Gal. iii. 17. It was the law that was written in the book of the law. Gal. iii. 10.

This law was our school master, until the seed should come to whom the promise was made. Gal. iii. 24. This school master was to be obeyed until a prophet should be raised up unto Israel, and then, it is said, him shall ye hear, in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you. Acts iii. 21.

The law that was written in the book of the law, is designated as—this law, these words, the law, the covenant, the law of Moses, the law of the Lord, the law of God. The book in which this law was written is called—The book of the law, the book of the law of Moses, the book of the covenant, the book of the law of the Lord, the book of the law of God.

These different descriptions refer to the same law, and to the same book.

This law, these words, the law, the covenant, the law of Moses, the law of the Lord, and the law of God, were all written in the book of the law.

From the Scriptures to which I have referred, we learn the following facts.

That the law that passed away was given to Israel 430 years after the covenant was made with Abraham. That this law with all of its commandments and all of its testimonies, and all of its statutes was written in the book of the law. That the law which was written in the book of the law, was our school master till Christ came; after that we were no longer under the school master. That after the children of Israel had been delivered from bondage the Lord commanded them to keep the Sabbath day, which was a part of this law. Deut. v. 15. That Christ came to fulfill the law that was not to pass till all be fulfilled. When he fulfilled that law it passed away. That Christ quoted from that law two of the ten commandments, and four of the commandments from other parts of the same law, and in reply to each of these quotations, he said, "But I say unto you."

If the first two of these quotations are to remain in force forever, the last four must, for they are parts of the same law. If the last four passed away, the first must, for the same reason.

That the law was a shadow cast by some substance. The shadow was to continue only till the substance was reached. The shadow was given to regulate the outward conduct. The substance will regulate the intentions of the heart. The substance which cast the shadow is shown by Christ's words, when he said, "But I say unto you, that he that hateth his brother without a cause, is a murderer: and whoso looketh on a woman to lust after her, is an adulterer."

By this illustration we can see the difference between the shadow and the substance, and the reason the shadow must pass away.

A man may be a very bad man inwardly, and yet not transgress outwardly any of the ten commandments, so as to be convicted by man of transgression.

In this respect the law was faulty, and must pass away when the substance is reached. The law is a shadow, not only in its sacrifices, but also in its commandments.

The shadow must be our school master until the Lord shall raise up that prophet, of your brethren, like unto me (Moses): him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you.

This law was given to Israel while in the wilderness, and to no other people. The covenant was made with Israel, and with no other people. The jurisdiction of this law does not extend beyond the people of Israel, as the law of the United States does not have jurisdiction beyond the people and the territory of the United States.

The New Testament always refers to this law as a unit law; and never refers to it as two laws, or as one of the laws given to Moses. The different descriptions of this law are always in harmony with the one law given to Israel. And no intimation is given anywhere that there were two laws.

Then, the law that has been abolished is the law that was written in the book of the law, with all of its commandments, and of its testimonies, and all of its statutes.

2. What law shall remain in force and be perpetual?

Not one jot or tittle of the law that was given to Israel 430 years after the covenant was made with Abraham, shall remain in force, but all the commandments of Christ will.

He that heareth these words of mine and doeth them shall be saved, and he that heareth them and doeth them not shall be destroyed.

And Christ shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

The testimony is abundant, and definite, and harmonious, that the law given to Moses has passed away, and is now of no force; and that the commandments of Christ were to supercede the law of Moses, and remain of force forever. But where is the other law that was given to Moses? Where is it written? How is it designated? As it is claimed to be more important, and more enduring than the law that has passed away, it should be plainly written out somewhere, and its outline should be well marked, that it might be distinguished from the law that is written in the book of the law. Where is such a law intimated?

Prophetic Times.

THE KINGDOM OF THE MESSIAH, AND THE GLORIOUS KING IN JERUSALEM, THE PLACE OF HIS THRONE.

S. BONHOMME.

What is the amount of prophetic teachings respecting the kingdom of the Son of David?

Do they speak of it as a kingdom existing in the days when they prophesied? or do they not rather, and invariably, represent it as one, whose establishment belonged to a far distant age?

Is that kingdom whose glories they so sublimely describe and for whose coming they so earnestly longed, one which can only be termed a kingdom in a figurative sense?

Do they mean by it simply that rule which the Redeemer now exercises at the right hand of God, by the spirit of grace in the hearts of his saints? or do they not mean to assert, that he shall exercise an absolute and visible dominion in and over this earth of mankind, in which he once actually sojourned, and for whose deliverance from the bondage of corruption, he once actually laid down his life? a visible and local kingdom, whose materials have been collecting, and whose erection has been preparing, through all those various economies which have marked the history of the church of God?

That reign of the Messiah which forms one of the two great burdens of prophecy, is almost invariably described as future. A king shall reign. Isa. xxxii. 1. Let the idea of a local and visible kingdom, says Mr. Noel, be added to the idea of a spiritual dominion, and the language of revelation becomes lucid and precise; at once accordant with all the analogies of the past, and declarative of a definite object to be reached in the momentous connection of Jesus Christ with the world. If I interpret the Old Testament prophecy aright, I learn from it, first, that the seat of the glorious kingdom, concerning which all the prophets have spoken from the beginning, in and through which the glory of the Messiah shall be manifested in this earth. This earth, which, defiled though it be by Satan, and now under the bondage of corruption, retains so many traces of its original loveliness, is the property of the Messiah: his by right of creation, his by ancient covenant, his by purchasing of it at the priceless cost of his own precious blood. Into this world he once came, and sojourned amidst its inhabitants, as a man of sorrows, as the Son of Man, who then proclaimed himself to be poorer than the fowls of heaven, and the foxes of the field. This very earth witnessed the inconceivable humiliation of him, who is essentially the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person. This very earth of ours once drank the tears and the blood of the Son of God. Here it was that he encountered the terrible hosts of darkness, and endured the curse of the law for us.

And is it to be supposed that the Son of David, according to the flesh, though now received and retained in heaven, can ever be indifferent to that spot, where being in agony, he prayed, and his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground, or the spot on which he uttered the words that filled heaven with triumphant joy: "It is finished!"

Does it not seem meet that here on the scene of his humiliation, he should come forth and appear in all that majesty and glory which belong to our incarnate Redeemer?

That here, where he once sojourned as the man of sorrows, despised of men, he should come forth, and be seen as the King of kings?

And what more palpable truth could be furnished of the complete annihilation of the tempter's triumph, than by the erection in the very world which he had originally seduced, the throne of his glorious kingdom?

Second, the head of this kingdom is Messiah incarnate. As the eternal Son of God, he rules from everlasting to everlasting. He ever rules in the hearts of his people by his blessed Spirit, but in that kingdom which is the theme of prophecy, he shall rule upon the throne of David as the Son of Man. It is upon the shoulders of the child born, and the son given, that the government is placed, Isa. ix. 6, 7, as the seed of the woman, the seed of Abraham, the seed of David. If this be not so, how are we to explain the almost invariable use of these designations which belong to the man Christ Jesus, in connection with the accounts of the coming of his kingdom and power.

Third, of the time of the erection we can give no account, if by this be meant the day or the hour. This no man knoweth, not even the angels in heaven. But in another sense, we have certain information in respect to it. We are told in what relation this grand event stands, both to the past and the present. See Dan. vii. 9–14, 26, 27. While Isaiah again describes the scenes surpassing fable which this kingdom should introduce. Isa. xl. 25; vi. 35; lxv. 16.

Fourth, the circumstances attending the introduction of this glorious kingdom, or in other words, the personal manifestation of Messiah, as King in Zion, and the results produced by it, present before us the theme of meditation, at once awe inspiring, and infinitely attractive to all those who have within them the good hope; who look, and long, and wait for the Redeemer's glorious appearing, for the coming of him who shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob.

But, there is one grand circumstance, one of great and exceeding terribleness, referred to and repeated by all the prophets, as well as the apostles. The ages of peace shall be ushered in by a day of wrath, great and dreadful, paralleled only by the day when the foundations of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened, that the myriads of earth's ungodly families might be swept into one common grave. King Messiah, whose throne is in Zion, shall dash in pieces the now proud multitude of his opposers; he shall break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel; he shall smite through kings in the day of his wrath. Upon the many formed anti-christian power which has long waged war with the Redeemer, and so often forced his saints, almost with bitterness of soul to cry out: "How long, O Lord!" all the vials of Messiah's vengeance shall be poured.

Who is it that cometh from Edom with dyed garments from Bozrah?

And who is prepared for the coming of this day of darkness?

With this glorious coming is associated the recovery of the Twelve Tribes of the Jews, and their triumphant settlement in their own land. He shall say to the North, give up, and to the South, keep not back. He upon whose bloody cross was the superscription written, not in mockery, but in truth: "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews," shall recover them, when he sets his hand the second time, to recover the remnants of his people, which shall be left, from Pathros and from Cush, and from Shinar, and the Islands of the Sea. Yea, they shall come, even as they went out of Egypt, laden with the richest treasures of many lands, Isa. lx. 9, bringing their silver and their gold with them, the children of Israel shall come they and the children of Judah, going and weeping as they shall look upon him whom they have pierced, Zech. xii. 10, the times allotted to the Gentiles shall have ended, Luke xxi. 24, when the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established upon the top of the mountains and exalted above the hills, and nations shall flow unto it, and many people shall say, "Come, let us join ourselves unto the Lord," for out of Zion shall go forth the law and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. He shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people, and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. This, then, is the kingdom of the Son of Man, in a word, the original promise made to Abraham, shall then be fulfilled, all nations shall be blessed in his seed.

ZULUS AND MORMONS.

JOSIAH TYLER.

Zulu men, as a general rule, seek for happiness in polygamy, and are not satisfied till they are in possession of large kraals, full of wives, all industriously employed for the benefit of their lords and masters. To dig, or do any kind of hard work, they are ashamed. This is woman's sphere, according to their notions.

That the happiness they look for in a plurality of helpmeets, is not always their lot, is abundantly evident. Green-eyed jealousy, an offspring of this vile custom, is sure to creep into the harem; one wife accuses another of having usurped her place in the husband's affections, or the husband suspects a wife of infidelity, and scenes occur not calculated to convince outsiders that joy and peace are elements of polygamous life.

I have seen many kraals in South Africa in which this institution is deeply rooted, but very few in which I could hazard the assertion that harmony prevailed. While polygamy with the Zulus is their idol, it is also their curse. Nothing keeps them in degradation like this. My heart has often been made to bleed by what I have seen, the direct result of barbarian polygamy, and I long for the time when Christianity, aided by the strong arm of law, will extirpate this evil in South Africa.

But while I am writing about this brutalizing practice in heathen Africa, imagine, if you can, the emotions of indignation and mortification which rise in my mind as I take up the Springfield Republican of Sept. 17, 1881, and read of a "brother Knowlton, a stable Mormon, who has seven wives, conveniently located in as many towns, so that, by little calculations, his lodgings cost him nothing as he travels about the Territory. The women are forced to support themselves," etc., etc.

I almost imagine myself in Africa again, and yet this brother Knowlton, with other Mormon brethren like himself, is allowed to go about that part of heathen America called Utah, from kraal to kraal, as uncivilized Zulus do, glorying in their shame.

But this is not all. Continuing to read, I was transported to places in Africa where, thirty years ago, I had to protect young fugitive girls who refused to marry men of seventy years, whom they hated.

Peruse the following from a correspondent of the Eureka Leader—the substance of what he saw at Ogden, a railroad town in Utah:

"A tow-headed, buxom girl was seen weeping bitterly. Two or three old women were scolding at her, and a withered old Mormon stood with his arms around her. He finally coaxed her off to the wagon, she screaming and crying that she would not marry him, and he never letting go of her till he set her down upon the wagon tongue. A girl was following them. I asked what was the trouble. She said that this girl was pledged to the old man and that he had paid the passage out, and that now she did not want to marry him because he already had a wife and seven children. I asked if she would be forced to do so. The girl replied, 'Of course she will; they have pledged her to him.' Poor thing! The last I saw of her she was struggling to get away from him, and the withered old fellow was holding on with both arms round her."

The witness added: "It is sickening to think of such doings in a civilized land. Dark as that girl's mind was, she had some grains of virtue and some delicate instincts. The utter despair pictured on her face showed this."

How this correspondent, if he had the soul of a man in him, could have refrained from saving this poor girl, even though he had to struggle most violently with the old Mormon, for the life of me, I cannot see. For hours I have contended with Zulu fathers, and never relinquished my hold of their daughters pleading for help, even though knob kerries were brandished about my head.

But the wonder is that such a scene should be tolerated in this land of liberty and light, our pride and joy wherever our lot is cast! O temporal! O mores! When will this foul blot be effaced? When will this outrage on humanity be removed? When will the American Government stamp out this crying sin of polygamy?

In Harper's Magazine for October appears an able article on the "Mormon Situation," showing the rapid increase of polygamy in America and portraying its corrupt history. If the writer of that article has truth on his side (and who can doubt it?) we may well give heed to the portentous words with which he closes:

"Little as the masses believe is now, there will come a time, if this monster in Utah is left to grow, when there will be another call for volunteers and for money, and, as before, tens of thousands of brave young men will go away, never more to return; as before, there will be an enormous debt incurred; as before, the country will be hillocked with graves and the whole land will be moistened with the rain of woman's tears."

THE SIXTH COMET.

Intelligence received at the Warner Observatory, Rochester, N. Y., from Bristol, England, states that Prof. W. F. Denning discovered a bright new comet on the 4th inst. It is located in the constellation of Leo, right ascension 9 hours 22 minutes, declination north 16 degrees, daily motion 30 minutes east. This is the sixth comet which has been seen since May 1st, five being new discoveries, all but two of which were first observed by Americans, and it is certainly a high compliment to the industry and skill of American astronomers that they have shown so fine a record. The total amount which Mr. H. H. Warner has given in comet prizes during the past year is $1,800 which shows that the interest taken in astronomical affairs in this country is greatly increasing.

THE HURRICANES.

NEW YORK, Oct. 15.—The wires in England are still down and communication with London is slow and uncertain. There is only one direct wire working from Valentia to London. Most of the land wires connecting with the cable between England and the Continent are broken.

LONDON, Oct. 15.—Details of the hurricane in England show that it has been the most disastrous for years. But few Continental or provincial telegrams have been received. There was considerable damage to the shipping in the Mersey.

LONDON, Oct. 15.—The London parks are strewn with fallen timber. Many boats are aground in the River Thames, and steamboat traffic is suspended. Very few places in England escaped damage by the storm. Four hundred trees were blown down in South wark. The shipping casualties are numerous, but no great disaster is reported.

FRIDAY'S STORM.

LONDON, Oct. 17.—The hurricane extended to France, Germany and the Netherlands, and great damage is reported from the latter.

KILLED BY A WATERSPOUT.

PARIS, Oct. 16.—A waterspout which passed over the district Mitah, Algeria, killed sixty-five persons.

PILGRIMS FELTED.

ROME, Oct. 17.—It is impossible to describe the enthusiastic cheers after the Pope gave his benediction on the occasion of receiving the Italian pilgrims at St. Peter's on Sunday. The Pope looked thin, worn and anxious. A gang of roughs pelted the pilgrims while they were leaving the Church of St. Vitale, shouting "Down with the Vatican."

THE UNHAPPY POPE.

ROME, Oct. 17.—The Pope, in his address to the Italian pilgrims at St. Peter's yesterday, stated a deplorable state of affairs placed before him the alternative of enduring continual captivity, made harder daily, or of going into exile. He therefore asked the Catholics to watch and pray for the liberty and independence of the Pope. He continued by saying he was no longer secure in his palace, that he was outraged in his person and dignity in a thousand ways. The gravity and earnestness of the Pope made a profound impression. He closed his address with his arms raised to heaven, as though imploring help.

THE TWO RECORDS.

God has kept two copies of his historic records of our race. One was written on parchment and put into the hands of man. It has been watched over with jealous care, strangely preserved, and handed down from generation to generation. The other was written on monumental records, the sculptured tablets of now extinct nations, and buried beneath the crumbling piles and moss-grown mounds of ruined cities. The wasting ravages of war have rolled over it; the foot of the ruthless barbarian has trampled it; the elements in their fury have combined for its destruction. And yet, during the long lapse of ages, his omniscient eye has watched over it, and his almighty hand has guarded it; and, lo! in his own appointed time he lifts the veil, and page after page comes up from the disentombed cities of antiquity—from Babylon, and Nineveh, and Egypt, and Syria—and the two books lay their testimony side by side, and both conspire to establish the testimony of God.—From D. A. Randall's Hand Writing of God.

OBITUARY.

Fell asleep in Jesus at his own residence in Washington Co., Md., Dr. E. T. Markey, all whose days were 65 years, 3 months, and 10 days.

Sometime before the visit of the King of Terrors, he requested of his wife that I should be present at his interment, and she telegraphed to me. The corpse was taken to Beaver Creek Meeting House, which was well filled. I discoursed upon the state of man in death.

Brother Markey first became associated with a people calling themselves the Church of God, also known as Winebrennerians, but when the light of truth regarding the kingdom of God to be set up in the earth, and yet in the future, and eternal life through Christ alone, with other kindred truths, found way to him some thirty years ago, he at once withdrew himself from them, and took an independent stand in favor of the faith once delivered to the saints.

On a tour through Pennsylvania I heard of him as a man holding peculiar views. As is my custom I at once called to see him.

He had a very intelligent daughter, well instructed in the things pertaining to the kingdom, but not so well informed regarding the name of Jesus Christ. And so it was with him. And now to show the noble spirit which characterized the old soldier of the cross, he proposed that we discuss our differences at his house, and if she should decide that I was right and should wish to be baptized by me, that he would not be absent.

Accordingly we had the discussion before a crowded house, and the result was, at the request of the daughter and by his consent, we went at once to a beautiful stream, and baptized her in the all-saving name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins. Afterwards he also became obedient to the faith in the all-saving name.

There were some who, like Elymas the sorcerer of old, tried to turn the brethren in these parts from the faith. Our dear old brother stood firm at his post. His word was that he would never go back on the Abrahamic faith being before baptism—this being the issue between them and the brotherhood in the border states, and he never did; but like Paul of old he fought the good fight, finished his course, and kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will give him at that day; and not to him only, but to all them also that love his appearing.

The Church of God, in general, present their heart-felt sympathy to Sister Markey and family, in their bereavement, and to the household of faith in the short deprivation (as he believed) they would suffer in the loss of another faithful witness for the truth as it is in Jesus.

Sweet be his sleep, no trouble now
Shall ever cross his peaceful brow;

O Gracious Father! let thy smile
Rest on his dear companion still.
O may her wants be all supplied,
And may she ever do thy will.

And may his children—now bereaved—
Still look to thee the orphan's friend.
Then will to them a father be—
Then will protect them to the end.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Quarterly Conference of the Church of God for Northern Indiana, will convene at Rensselaer, on Thursday, Nov. 3, 1881, and continue over Sunday; services to commence Thursday evening. Hope to see many present. Let no ordinary matter prevent any from attending. Aside from the transaction of business, these meetings are needful and very profitable for the mutual edification and upbuilding of the household of faith. Let all who can come.

D. T. HALSTEAD.

There will be a religious discussion held at the Christadelphian meeting-house, at Valley Springs, Texas, between Mr. W. H. Meadows, of Field Creek, and the undersigned, commencing at 10 a. m. on Thursday before the fourth Sunday in October, and continuing four consecutive days. Two propositions will be discussed, viz:—

1. "The kingdom of God, referred to in Dan. ii. 44, is a future dominion to be set up at the second coming of Christ." The undersigned affirms, Mr. Meadows denies.

2. "Jesus Christ is now a reigning King." Mr. Meadows affirms, the undersigned denies.

All friends and lovers of Bible truth are invited to attend.

JOHN BANTA.

The brethren of Kansas will meet in Conference at Severance, Doniphan county, Nov. 4, 1881, in the evening, the meeting to continue over Sunday. Brethren Adams and Pierson will be with us to preach the word. Others are invited to come and assist. All of like precious faith are cordially invited to come and participate with us, that we may have one more pleasant and joyful greeting together amid the sorrows and trials of this present life.

By order of the brethren.

LOTT CLOVER.

I will speak as follows: The first of October at Brother C. A. Saylor's, five and one-half miles northwest of Morrill, Brown Co., Kan. Next, Oct. 27, near Clifton, Nemaha Co., Neb., to continue over Sunday, where Brother Jas. Stephens may arrange. Next at Farmington, Atchison Co., Kan., on the Central Branch R. R. Those coming to Farmington will ask for Silas Goodrich. The meeting to commence November 25, and continue over Sunday.

THE MIDNIGHT HYMN.

In the mild silence of the voiceless night,
When closed by sky dreams, the slumbers low,
Whom in the darkness doth my spirit seek,
O God! but thee!

And if there be a weight upon my breast—
Some vague impression of the day forgot—
Scarce knowing what it is, I fly to thee
And lay it down.

Or if the heaviness that comes
In token of anticipated ill,
My bosom takes no heed of what it is,
Since 'tis thy will.

For Of transitu of past and present woes,
Or anything besides, how joyously
Passes that almost solitary hour,
My God, with thee.

M— all than the stillness of the night,
M— eful than the silence of that hour,
More blest than anything, my bosom lies
Beneath thy power.

For what is there on earth that I desire,
Of all that it can give or take from me?
Or whom in heaven doth my spirit seek
O God! but thee?

ON SUFFERING.

A Paper read to the Union Hall Mutual Improvement Association, at Edinburgh.

J. HILL.

A sad perplexity it is to many to find so much suffering and sorrow in a world ruled over by One who is All-Wise, All-Powerful, and All-Good. For in spite of all the improvements effected from time to time, admitting that much has been done to mitigate the severity of many of the acute diseases to which the race is subject, and to ameliorate to some extent the condition of the poor, the fact remains that man's days are full of woe and trouble, and it is as true now as it was in the apostolic age, that "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain."

"Oh," some exclaim, impressed with the thought of the world's misery, "if we had the power, we would at once banish sorrow from the earth, and make all things fair and good as at the beginning."

There are others who affect to bear all the ills that flesh is heir to with a calm stoical indifference, choaking their feelings; while to all outward appearance move on insensible to any of the thousand varieties of misery and suffering which their fellows endure. Endowed with a hard, flinty heart, they despise as weakness those manifestations of sorrow welling up from the great heart of humanity, and may sometimes be heard expressing the opinion that a man's intellect should be so highly cultivated that on its smooth surface, sorrow, despair, and woe, should make no impression.

And, again, there are others who delight to parade their personal trials before the eyes and ears of those with whom they associate. Given a patient listener and freedom from interruption, with glib monologue there will be unbosomed sorrow after sorrow, the one crowding on the other, and each rendering the other insignificant. They enlarge upon the pain they endured night and day, the operation which had to be performed, and then the sickened hearer is asked if ever any one has experienced trials like these.

The opinions of these three representative classes are the result of superficial thinking. To the first the answer is: Suffering is very frequently the penalty for sin; you cannot remove the suffering without destroying the sin.

To the second the answer is: There is an object to be gained by the right enduring of pain and sorrow which is not gained by ignoring its existence. What that object is will be seen as we proceed.

To the third the answer is: Those who have endured most, talk least of their trials; and such that imagine that none have suffered as they have suffered, have not yet learned the lesson which their trials should teach them.

But some ask, why are we, God's children, compelled to go through the dark waters of affliction? "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." If he ordains suffering for us, it is that we may be taught to rest our confidence in him alone, not to put our trust in man or his proposals. Every trial gives us time to pause to examine and measure the strength of our faith in God; and, conversely, the intensity of the power which the world and the things of the world exert over us.

Perhaps we have trusted to our own wisdom and knowledge, when something occurs to warn us that our boasted wisdom avails not. Instead of our affections being centered above, they may have been engaged with things beneath, and then God arouses us to the uncertainty of life and prosperity. We need such reminders; for how easy it is to trust God when everything is smiling on our path; when this earth seems to be the garden of the Lord, every tiny flower and waving blossom conveying to the thoughtful mind lessons of joyous gratitude.

But in seasons of adversity it is not so easy to trust God; it is not so easy to believe that he doeth all things well; and we do not see the all things working for good to us who know him.

When sailing with the stream it requires no great exercise of faith on our part to be assured that God arranges all our movements. But when the heavens become black with clouds, when rain falls in torrents, when the stream threatens to overwhelm us in its flood, when we sail against the stream, that is the time of test.

He doeth all things well? What! When he bids us drain to the bitter dregs the sufferer's cup? When from our encircling arms he snatches away our nearest and dearest? Yes, afflicted one, lying there so low, smitten with a sorrow nigh unto death, even then. And of this I am certain, that when years have rolled on and we can cast a retrospective glance over our career, we shall be led to acknowledge that our darkest hour has taught us priceless lessons, that then was engraven and stamped on our mind some great truth of which previously we had been ignorant or unheeding.

So in our troubles and difficulties we should not in peevish unfaith cry out, "Why am I afflicted thus?" Rather let us ask grace to bear our appointed burden imposed upon us by a loving Father, and thus our suffering will be profitable to us. Let us remember how extremely difficult it is to compare our circumstances with those of others; for what would sit lightly on us, might crush some more highly-tempered person, and vice versa.

It is not possible then for us to affirm truly that our trials are greater and more frequent than our neighbors'; but though it be as we imagine, we should endeavor all the more earnestly to be learning those lessons of trust and humility, patience and resignation, which those troubles should be teaching us. We each and all need patience.

Bear patiently thy cross of grief and care;
Leave to thy God to order and direct.

"Oh, rest in the Lord, wait patiently for him, and he shall give thee thy heart's desire." Some one says, "There is a road, and the name of it is Patience; the flowers that grow by it are few, but they are very sweet; and if you pluck them and weave them into a crown, the fragrance shall last forever!"

But Paul, in 2 Cor. iv., speaks of "our light affliction, which is but for a moment," working "for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." "What," exclaims one; "my light affliction! when it is prostrating me to the earth: oh, what a mockery to term it light!" And another cries out, "For a moment! when life-long has been my trouble and no end in view but death!" But observe that the apostle uses light, and but for a moment, for the purpose of comparison. Abstractly considered, they may neither be light nor momentary; but they are light when compared with the eternal weight of glory which is ours if we endure aright; and they are momentary in comparison with that eternity which we will enjoy if we faint not.

If it be ours to obtain an entrance into that everlasting kingdom of life and holiness, how small, how trivial will all our trials appear!

Are we then to continue hopeless and despondent because at some period of our pilgrimage our path was rough, our limbs wearied, and our heart sick? Nay! rather let us come unto him who is able to keep us from falling, and implore him to sanctify unto us all our trials.

Do we dare to murmur because God is not always loading us with benefits, and have we the assurance to compare our position with that of those who were; stoned, who were sawn asunder, and slain, destitute, afflicted, and tormented?

We often forget that if we had no suffering to endure, we would be deprived of much happiness. This seems paradoxical; let us see where the truth lies.

Let us suppose the case of a person who is battling with a painful disease which in some of its stages leaves the patient free from agony. What inexpressible joy fills his heart when he has no pain! Only such as have been thus situated can know the unbounded thankfulness that permeates his being, and nerves him for another struggle when the lull-cyon period is over, and his old enemy again comes to the attack. And how much severe pain can we endure bravely and cheerfully if we are assured of some coveted reward to be bestowed upon us after we have conquered.

Again, those who have suffered can sympathize with the suffering ones. The blessing of health, like all other blessings, is not fully valued by us until we have been deprived of it for a season. How much tenderness is developed by the delicate touching kindnesses manifested toward those who are in trouble—attentions we might never dream of showing if health were continually possessed; and thus the finer and more spiritual part of our nature is exercised by our being called upon to comfort and soothe those whom we love, and feelings are brought into play which otherwise would have always remained dormant and unseen.

I would guard against the idea that all suffering is hurled like a thunderbolt from on high upon our head as a punishment for sins that we have committed. We may be entirely ignorant of the nature of those particular sins which have deserved such a fearful retribution, but it is argued we must have sinned else we would not have been afflicted. Such a representation of the character of God does not harmonize with what is revealed to us in Scripture.

The Psalmist says: "It is good for me that I was afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes. Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept thy word."

I regard these troubles as the rough places of the road which the Lord will either make plain, or he will strengthen us so that we shall pursue our journey with trustful hearts, clinging all the more closely to him as we see the difficulties before us, and feeling assured that he will lead and guide us for he has trod our path.

We are not asked to suffer as he suffered; we could not. He knew beforehand what his future was: we know not ours. With unwavering trust he bore his appointed burden, ever ready to help those who were groaning under sorrows as nothing compared to his—and this because he had regard to "the great recompense of reward" lying before him.

The reward before us will be ours if we copy his example and become partakers of his holiness. No chastening for the present seemeth joyous but grievous, nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto all them that are exercised thereby.

Listen to these beautiful words: "If thou dost feel in thee and beneath thee and over thee the omnipresence of him in whom thy semblance becomes being thy agony rest, thy loneliness communion, then thou knowest to whom thou dost cry in the darkest night of life, 'Father, thy will be done; as in heaven, so on earth; as on earth, so in me.' Then all within and around thee becomes clear; the morning twilight with its cold mists vanishes, and new warmth streams through trembling nature. Thou hast found a hand which thou wilt never leave, which will hold thee when the mountains tremble and the planets are extinguished. Wherever thou art, thou art with him, and he with thee; he is the Ever-near; his is the world, with its flowers and its thorns; and his man, with his joys and sorrows. 'Not the slightest thing can happen to thee but by the will of God'."

Without doubt our duty is to be resigned under the mighty hand of God. From him all our blessings come. He removes some from us; let us bless his name that he has bestowed so many. If his purpose be to gauge our loving trust and living faith by causing us to suffer disappointment and sorrow, let us remember that the Captain of our Salvation was made perfect through suffering.

May we be endeavoring to become more perfect, also, so that every trial may make us more and more fit to share in the glories of the future; and with eyes and hearts fixed upon the time when sin and suffering and sorrow shall cease, we may use the exultant words of the apostle, "For I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

CHARACTERISTIC INCIDENTS OF THE MICHIGAN FIRE.

Fires had been burning in Sanilac, Huron, and Tuscola counties, but no one apprehended any danger. Farmers had set fire to stubbings to clear the ground for fall wheat, but this happens every fall, and the fact that not a drop of water had fallen in from fifty to seventy days was not considered by those who saw the smoke clouds and replied that there was no danger. There was danger. Behind that pall of smoke was a greater enemy than an earthquake, and it had a tornado at its back and two hundred miles of forest in the front. From noon until two o'clock a strange terror held the people in its grip; then all of a sudden the heavens took fire, or so it seemed to hundreds. In some localities it came with the sound of thunder. In others it was preceded by a terrible roaring as if a tidal wave were sweeping over the country. Almost the same minute the flames appeared in every spot over a district of country thirty miles broad by one hundred in length.

At Richmondville, ten miles above Sanilac, one hundred and fifty people had comfortable homes, stacks of hay and grain, teams, cows, pigs, sheep, and no fear of the fire which they knew was burning a mile away. At two o'clock the flames rushed out of the woods, leaped the fences, ran across the bare fields, and swallowed every house but two, and roasted alive a dozen people. It is hardly forty rods to the beach of the lake, and yet many people had no time to reach the water. Others reached it with clothing on fire and faces and hands blistered. The houses did not burn singly, but one billow of flame licked all at once and reduced them to nothing in ten minutes.

I saw many and many a spot where the billows of fire jumped a clean half mile out of the forest to clutch house or barn. The Thornton family were wiped out with the exception of a boy. Thornton had hitched up his team to drive the family to a place of safety, but when he saw that they were all surrounded by the flames he unhitched the horses in despair. Before they could be unharnessed they bolted in different directions, and the old man became so confused that he ran directly toward a big slashing, which was then a perfect mass of flame, and dropped and died with his head toward it.

Meantime the mother and children had taken refuge in the root house. This was a structure mostly sunk in the ground and the roof well covered with earth. Here they were all right for a time, but when the father failed to join them one of the sons went out to see what caused the delay. He was hardly out of the place before the door through which he had passed was in flames. In this emergency he ran to a dry creek, and by lying on his face and keeping his mouth to the ground he lived through it.

I talked with a woman who lived neighbor to the Thorntons, and who escaped by fleeing to a field of plowed ground. This was only a few rods from the root house, and she said it was fully an hour before the screams and shrieks and groans from the people inside grew quiet in death. One by one they were suffocated by heat and smoke, and their bodies presented a most horrible appearance. To one riding through the district it seems miraculous that a single soul escaped. The fire swept through the green trees the same as the dry. It ran through fields of corn at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and fields of clover were swept as bare as a floor. Dark and gloomy swamps, filled with pools of stagnant water, and the home for years of wildcats, bears, and snakes, were struck and shriveled and burned almost in a flash. Over the parched meadows the flames ran faster than a horse could gallop. Horses did gallop before it, but were overtaken and left roasting on the ground. It seemed as if every hope and avenue of escape were cut off, and yet hundreds of lives were spared. People spent ten to twenty hours in ditches and ponds, or in fields under wet blankets, having their hair singed, their limbs blistered, and their clothing burned off piece by piece.

In dozens of cases the first flames spared houses and barns, but after seeming to have passed on for miles, suddenly circled back and made a clean sweep of everything. Unless one rides over the burnt district he cannot believe the eccentricities of a forest fire. In the great swamp, between Sanilac and Sandusky, it burned everything to the roots for a mile in breadth. Then it left patches from ten feet to ten rods wide. Then again it struck in and burned lanes hardly twenty feet wide, leaving half a mile of fuel on either side. In the timber it seemed to strike the green trees harder than the dry ones. It was like a great serpent making its way across the country. It would run within three feet of a wheat stack, and then glide away to lick up a house. It would burn a stack and spare a barn ten feet off.

People felt the heat while the fire was yet miles away. It withered the leaves of trees standing two miles from the path of the fiery serpent. The very earth took fire in hundreds of places, and blazed up as if the fire were feasting on cordwood. The stoutest log buildings stood up only a few minutes. The fire seemed to catch them at every corner at once, and after a whirl and a roar nothing would be left. Seven miles off the beach, at Forester, sailors found the heat uncomfortable. Where some houses and barns were burned we could not find even a blackened stick. Every log, beam, and board was reduced to fine ashes.

Seven miles back from the lake at Forester a farmer gathered up fifteen persons in his wagon and started for the beach. The fire was close behind them as they started—so close that the dresses of some of the women and children were on fire from the sparks. It was seven miles of up hill and down, with corduroy, ruts, and roots, and the horses needed no whip to urge them into a mad run. As the wagon started the tire of a hind wheel rolled off. They could not stop for it, and yet, even on a good road the wheel would have crushed down in going twenty rods without it.

It is no actual fact that the horses pushed over that seven miles of rough road at a wild run, and the wheel stood firm. A delay of five minutes at any point of the road would have given fifteen more victims to the flames which followed on behind. I saw the wagon at the lake, and I saw the tire seven miles away on the roadside.

The people who sought the beach had still to endure much of the heat and all of the smoke. Wading up to their shoulders, they were safe from the flames, but sparks and cinders fell like a snow storm and the smoke was suffocating. The birds not caught in the woods were carried out to sea and drowned, and the waves have washed thousands of them ashore. Squirrels, rabbits, and such small animals stood no show at all, but deer and bear sought the beach and the company of human beings. In one case a man leaped from a bluff into the lake and found himself close behind a large bear. They remained in company under the bank nearly all night, and the bear seemed as humble as a dog. In another instance two of the animals came out of the forest and stood close to a well from which a farmer was drawing water to dash over his house, and they were with him for two hours before they deemed it prudent to jog along. Deer came out and sought the companionship of cattle and horses, and paid no attention to persons rushing past them.

THE JEWISH PERSECUTION AND ITS EFFECT.

The following paragraphs, which are merely a sample of many that might appear, may enable our readers to judge of the present aspect of the Jewish movement:—

RUSSIA.

The correspondent of the Jewish World continues to give horrifying details of the outrages recently perpetrated on the Russian Jews by the ignorant mob, encouraged by the apathy, if not the sympathy, of the corrupt Government officials. It is announced, however, that at length "orders have been given to the Governors and Governor-Generals of the Gubernye where disturbances may be anticipated, to take proper precautions and preventive measures, in order to stamp out the movement, and the authorities are made directly responsible to the St. Petersburg Cabinet for any recurrence of the rioting within their respective districts."

A telegram received at Vienna from St. Petersburg states that the Government have ordered that all Jews living without employment in the ports of the Black Sea and the Sea of Azov are to be expelled. Foreign Jews are to be sent across the frontier.

According to the Russki Eorei a colony of Germans settled in the province of Odessa have initiated a method of "boycotting" the local Jews. At a meeting convened by the elders of the colony, the following resolution was proposed and unanimously adopted: "That any member of the community found guilty of letting lodgings to a Jew shall be fined 50 roubles."

The disabilities under which the Jews labor in Russia could not be more strikingly illustrated than in the following extract from the Jewish World:—

"The right of the Jews to reside in St. Petersburg is limited, as our readers are aware, to the members of the learned profession, merchants of the First Guild, and duly certified handicraftsmen. As in the case of all like enactments which militate against the primary instincts of free men, various tricks are resorted to in order to escape, in cases of harsh incidence, the unequal operation of the law. The following facts, which were made public in a late issue of the Novosti, are not alone interesting, but will illustrate in a significant manner the peculiar ways of Russian police administration. A Jewish gentleman residing—and having the right to reside—in St. Petersburg had a sister living in the provinces. Bereavement and death and family arrangements necessitated that the young lady should live with her brother in the capital. Thither she accordingly started, and there she arrived in the fraternal house. She had, however, no right of residence, not coming under any one of the three categories qualified to remain in St. Petersburg. The police, accordingly, ordered her to remove. In vain were representations made to the authorities. She must go. What did the brother thereupon? He went to the police office, notified to the authorities that he had engaged his sister as cook; and as cook she is allowed to remain in a town where as a Jewish gentlewoman she would have been forcibly expelled. Another case is more noteworthy still. A well-connected young lady having just finished the gymnasium course in the provinces came to St. Petersburg in order to enter the Higher School for Women, for the purpose of undergoing university training. Permission was refused. But finding friends in the city, she determined to apply herself to private teaching, for which she had been specially educated. The law forbade. But not to be beaten, she and her name entered on the list of the demi monde—and, as an improper character, was permitted to remain in the capital. It is a sufficiently significant commentary upon the Russian laws affecting the Jews that a Jewish young lady, duly trained, should be legally disqualified from remaining in the Czar's capital, while the door is open to the vilest characters!"

GERMANY.

Intelligence recived from Stola (Pomerania) states that serious Anti-Semitic disturbances have occurred there. The rioters broke the windows of the Jewish inhabitants, and threatened even to storm their houses. The military, however, appeared on the scene, and the commander of the troops called upon the people to disperse, but the rioters replied by throwing stones. The soldiers thereupon charged the mob with drawn swords, wounding sixteen persons, several of them seriously. Numerous arrests have been made. The Berlin Anti-Semitic journals accuse the Jews of having provoked the riot, declaring that they threw bottles and other missiles from the windows of their besieged houses upon the crowd below.

JEWS EMIGRATING.

A party of 116 Russian Jews embarked on Saturday, 17th September, at Antwerp for the United States. The Israelite Alliance pays for their passage and provides for their wants. The Alliance, which has already collected in France and Belgium 400,000f. for the relief of the persecuted Russian Jews, has just received from an anonymous donor the munificent gift of 1,000,000f.

Mr. H. Guedalla, an influential London Jew, having received from the Spanish authorities an assurance that Jews settling in Spain "need have no cause for any apprehensions," intends to circulate thousands of copies of the documents containing the assurance "amongst his oppressed co-religionists in Russia and Germany, in order to induce them to emigrate where their talents, industry, and energy can be turned to good account.'

The Constantinople correspondent of the Standard telegraphed on 22nd September: "An important movement has been set on foot by influential German and English gentlemen who are interested in the welfare of the Jews, to obtain a grant of land in Syria from the Turkish Government for allotment to the Jews who may be desirous of emigrating from countries where they are now subject to persecution. The project is to be established on such a sound commercial basis as will ensure its permanent success. It is proposed to open up means of communication by constructing roads, tramways, and railways, and to form colonies on plots of land in the vicinity of the railway stations. A delegate is now here endeavoring to secure the approval of the Turkish Government to the scheme, which, I understand, is already favorably viewed by the Sultan."

The Daily News correspondent also telegraphs: "The Council of Ministers has accepted the application in principle, and the project is being examined in detail. The Sultan is reported to be favorably disposed towards the scheme, which, besides benefitting the persecuted Jews, would also be a source of new revenue to the Imperial Treasury. As the traditional policy of the Porte has been to protect the Jews, it is by no means improbable that the project will receive the Imperial sanction."

Worship can better wait than reconciliation. Apology and restitution are sweeter offerings to God than a lamb, for they are the sacrifices of a broken and contrite heart.—J. O. Dykes.

Editor Restitution:

Your valuable and thrice welcome visitation rebukes me in the fact of my not having paid my yearly subscription, but I must plead press of business and forgetfulness together with the self satisfying assurance that it would be sent you if I lived. With this apology I enclose it, also an order for a few tracts.

We have a precious little band here in the city of churches. Some twenty come to hear the truth concerning the name of Jesus Christ and the kingdom of God, and at times when our beloved brother, George R. Kramer comes to our help, we can muster from one to two hundred. It is small when compared with the immense congregations all around us; but we have the assurance from the lips of the Master that to the little flock, the Father's pleasure was to give the kingdom; and we wait with patience the coming and kingdom of Christ and the manifestations of the sons of God. May "this time" soon come so that we may "reign," even where we have suffered for him, "on the earth."

DONALDSON STATION, Ark.

Editor Restitution:

I wrote to you for books more than a year ago, which came forthwith. I was to send for more immediately, but unexpected affliction in my family has caused me to postpone until now; and a year brings about so many changes I thought best to hear from you before sending the order.

We have a small church here with myself as elder. We meet every first day of the week in commemoration of the suffering and death of our blessed Savior. Last Sunday we had four additions to the church.

We are in need of more hymn books—want the Christian Psalmodist. What do they cost single or by the dozen? Please send list of other books you have for sale. Times are hard here and the brethren all poor, but we must do something, if we expect to share in the administration of that kingdom. Several, in fact all of us, want to take THE RESTITUTION. Let us hear from you soon, as we are in need of the books.

We remain yours in hope of the early re-establishment of the kingdom and throne of David over Israel and the nations with Christ as King.

THE PATHWAYS OF THE HOLY LAND.

The pathways of the land are little changed
Since thou wert there:
The busy world through other ways has ranged,
And left them bare.

The rocky path still climbs the slow ing steep
Of Olivet;
Through tales of two millenniums bear it deep
Men tread it yet.

Still by the Garden with its book it lies,
Quiet and low:
Before his sheep the shepherd on it treads—
His voice they know.

The wild fig throws its dusky shadows o'er it still,
As once of yore:
Pure, calm as heaven it evening up that hill
To Bethany.

And as, when passing, thou didst weep o'er them,
So may be cast to-night
The white rays of descending Jerusalem
Rest on our sight.

These ways were strewn with garments once, and palm,
While [illegible]
How [illegible] the [illegible]
calm,
[illegible] thy [illegible].

The waves have washed [illegible] sands upon the shore
Of Galilee:
But chiseled on the [illegible]
The [illegible]

Man has not changed [illegible]
land,
Nor time [illegible]
Where thy feet [illegible]
All can be traced.

Yet we have learned by thy footsteps for
Truer than these:
Where'er the poor and tried and suffering are,
Thy steps [illegible].

Nor with fond, sad regret to thy paths we trace;
Thou art not dead;
Our path is onward, till we see thy face,
And be as thou art.

And now, wherever meet thy lowly band
In praise and prayer,
There in thy presence there thy Holy Land;
Thou, there art there.

CHARITY.

MARY E. SCHUYKE.

Charity or love is the crowning grace; faith, hope and charity abide, but the greatest of these is charity. It is the bond of perfectness: without this grace the eloquent tongues of men and angels are in effect in God's sight than sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. The personal sacrifice of all our means for the benefit of the poor, or the giving of our bodies to the flames, will not profit us without we have this Christian love. It beareth all things, which God permits; endureth all things which God requires: hopeth all things which God hath promised; and believeth all things which God has spoken.

If we have charity here and suffer long, we shall still be kind; we shall not envy the good fortune of others nor least of ourselves, nor behave in an unbecoming manner; we shall have no fellowship with iniquity, i. e. lawlessness and sin; but we shall rejoice in the knowledge of the truth, and with those who love it. In short, while we have charity we shall be meek and humble, tender-hearted and forgiving, generous and patient; we shall put up with personal ill-treatment without losing the spirit of Christ, for we shall follow his perfect example yet we will not sympathize with error, cover sin, nor fellowship those who are agents of Satan. As a people much fault is found with us, as the world says, for our lack of charity. What they object to is that we cannot fellowship their sects. But we do not care what the world says.

But do we have true charity? Do we love one another as we should? Are we not too selfish, too easily offended, too unforgiving? Do we not sometimes lack in patience, meekness, brotherly kindness, sympathy, and forbearance?

Another cause of complaint for our lack of charity is because there is a spirit among us to reprove sins and not tolerate them. Those finding fault have much to say about the spirit of Christ and refer to him and his apostles. Indeed there is a prevalent feeling that Christ and his apostles always talked kindly and lovingly to everybody. But perhaps no greater mistake was entertained. We cannot doubt that Christ's example was the only perfect one ever given, and that the apostles come next in excellence.

Did they always talk kindly to good and bad alike?

Our blessed Savior was full of tenderness to the poor and unfortunate. He was also very patient under abuse, and permitted himself to manifest no resentment and anger because of ill-treatment. But when he saw souls being led to ruin by the hypocrisy and deceit of professors of religion he could reprove as none else could. When he saw his professed followers being led by false principles he could startle them by reproof which must have caused deep feeling.

True charity will ever be found in harmony with God's work and with the mind of his spirit. It will deal tenderly with those who are honestly seeking for light and duty, however poor and ignorant they may be. It will bear patiently with faults and errors of judgement, while there is a desire to do right.

True charity never deals in personal resentment nor arises from any human passion; it will never delight in inflicting pain, and has no union with a spirit of egotism or revenge. It works from the holy motive of doing good and advancing the cause of God. It will never die out of the church, and it will be prized by all true believers.

Dear brethren and sisters, let us have true charity, and be faithful, stand firm, and meet on the earth made new

Your sister waiting for the dear Savior.

A COMPLAINT WITH AN UNMISTAKABLE BIBLE ANSWER.

J. B. COOK.

"I wish you would not say Amen! It is a trial to me."

Such was the complaint of an intelligent, strong-minded Christian, who professedly takes his Bible literally.

Now for the answer. "I will pray—I will sing—with the spirit and with the understanding: else—how—shall the unlearned say Amen, at the giving of thanks?" 1 Cor. xiv. 16, 16.

"All the people shall say Amen" This Amen is enforced twelve times in one passage. Deut. xxviii. 14-26.

"Ezra blessed the Lord, the Great God; and all the people answered Amen, Amen, with lifting up their Neh. viii. 5, 6. They gesticulated to enforce their double Amen.

Three of the Psalms close with a double Amen—41, 74, and 106. This form of "confirming the word," prevailed in the divinely authorized worship of Israel. Of course the language of St. Paul recognizes the custom as prolonged into the gospel age.

But as if to crown the whole, please observe, our blessed Lord employs the emphatic and emphatic double Amen twenty-five times, as reported by the beloved apostle. Nay, more, it pervades each other of the gospels in all over one hundred times.

Note. It is often rendered in our Bible. Verily; and Verily Verily.

In application we read: "A son honoureth his father, and a servant his master: if then, I be a father, where is mine honor? and if I be a master where is my fear? saith the Lord of hosts. O priest, that despise my name." Mal. i. 6.

The habit of all apostasy (which is a standing off from God's revealed mind) is to omit, and then reject what some misleading teacher thinks non-essential. Hence some omit baptism; others the second coming, and so on to the divinely honored use of this reverent word. Amen.

A word to the wise should suffice. Each one is safe to believe and obey. The word and example of Jesus and Paul are reason enough for faith. But who is there that can safely deny Mark vii. 38?

Surely every Bible Christian has the highest motive to own boldly each neglected truth, as it is opened to him. But he is also careful not to offend, by an abuse of his privilege, in the estimation of those uninstructed, at this or any other step in the path of life.

Lovingly for truth to be confessed.

THE ECLECTIC HYMN BOOK.

To Brethren Joseph Mershon, J. A. Simonds, L. G. Chase, T. E. Adams, A. Underwood, and others:

Your letters have been received, and to the inquiries made concerning setting appropriate music to the pieces of song contained in the Eclectic Hymn Book, I will reply—

1. That as a general thing, in many localities, we are, in the manner and in the execution of our worship much behind both, the times, and Bible demands. We are almost destitute of local organization and government. We are anything but uniform and punctual in attending to the breaking of bread and the fellowship. We are educating no one in the Bible to proclaim its grand truths. We are discouraging by our habits of wanting only to listen in our meetings to the most talented, young speakers from entering the field of labor. Our social meetings and Sunday schools in many instances have died out. Our prayers too frequently are formal, heartless and ineffectual. And our singing is often slower than the tortoise pace and dryer than Sahara. To remedy this in singing I have long felt the need of a good book—one that would combine in it both life and truth. With a view to this end I have endeavored to make the selections contained in the Eclectic Hymn Book. In sentiment it is as true to the great truths of the Bible as was the Old Millennial Harp; it contains in it many of the excellent pieces which were in the Harp, and then in addition to these, many of the liveliest and best pieces found elsewhere.

To have music set to these pieces would be much preferable, but the means to pay for this I have not at hand. Therefore, for the present I have thought best to publish my book containing 200 hymns, and making about 200 pages, and give it to the brotherhood for trial, for the small sum of twenty five cents each, with a view possibly to the music in the future

2. Again, I should not like to go to the expense and labor of putting music to these pieces, and then ask my brethren to purchase and adopt them for their use without their first having learned something of the character of these pieces of song. Therefore as this book in its publication is almost completed, and will be ready for distribution by Nov. 1st, let me suggest that the brethren order this book at once, inspect and try, and then say to me by letter what changes they would like in words, in selections, in additions, and to what pieces they would like music set. In this a good degree of satisfaction can be given, and a book had for all, and one in which all will feel interested, and one that will among us become a standard work.

3. Then to select the music alone, for the pieces, I would prefer, and must have the co-operation of some of the best musical talent among us. Therefore let us suggest that the conferences in Michigan, Indiana, this State, and any others that may desire to co-operate in the work appoint a man to confer and assist in the work. This will secure better satisfaction than for me to hunt these men up and to assume the whole responsibility myself.

4. This book of music should be about the size of Gospel Hymns as to length and width, and contain about 250 pieces of song, with about 200 of them set to music, and make about 250 pages.

5. The book will have to sell for $1.00 per copy, and to meet the expenses of setting the music, obtaining the plates and the first edition, 1,000 copies must be pledged in advance and the money paid in when the manuscript goes into the printer's hands.

6. But now I will make this offer—Send for the book now ready with twenty-five cents and your name for the second edition—with music—and when 1,000 names are obtained we will notify when you can send in seventy-five cents and we will have the manuscript in the printer's hands. A prompt response to this offer will secure the book at an early date.

Hoping to secure the names. I am yours, hoping ere long to be united to sing the song of the redeemed.

G. M. MYERS.

Brevities.

The fire losses in the United States for the seven months ending August 31, are estimated at $50,000,000.

LONDON, Sept. 3.—The census of India has been completed, and shows a population of 252,000,000.

GRASS FIRED BY A METEORITE.

A fire ball was seen to fall at Springfield, Ill., about 10 o'clock of the night of September 21. It resembled in appearance an electric light, and it fell with a rushing sound like that of a sky rocket. The dry grass was set on fire where it struck, and the grass burned to a wooden sidewalk connecting with fences and wooden buildings, before the fire could be extinguished with water.

EXPECTANCY OF LIFE.

Insurance companies are aware of the credulous weakness of those whose lives they assure, and have therefore compiled numerous tables of expectancy of life for their own guidance, which are carefully referred to before a policy is granted. These tables have been the result of careful calculation, and seldom prove misleading. Of course, sudden and premature deaths, as well as lives unusually extended, occasionally occur; but the average expectancy of life of an ordinary man is as follows: A person 1 year old may expect to live 39 years longer; of 10 years, 51; of 20 years, 41; of 30 years, 34; of 40 years, 28; of 50 years, 21; of 60 years, 14; of 70 years, 9; of 80 years, 4.

In the village of Noebdenitz, Saxony, is an oak whose aged and infirm branches are propped up all around by beams. Its trunk has been used many years as a burial vault. Its lower part, which measures fourteen ells in circumference, is hollow and the aperture to this great cave is closed by a lattice-work of iron bars. Through this sort of window the unsuspecting stranger who is first led up to take a peep, perceives with amazement the skeleton of a man seated in the middle of the hollow. It is the skeleton of the Lord of Winterskirm, who died about a century ago, and whose choice of this singular mode of sepulture is very minutely described by the inevitable guide who shows the place.

An Italian naturalist has been studying the eucalyptus tree, and finds it as valuable for destroying miasma as the most sanguine Californians have ever claimed it to be. It has extraordinary powers of absorption, the trunk of a full-grown tree taking up ten times its own weight of water from the soil in which it stands. This alone is often enough to purify a fever district, the superfluous miasma-breeding moisture in the earth being all sucked by the trees. Experiments with eucalyptus planting in miasmatic regions have given surprising results. The vicinity of the Convent Delle tre Fontane, near Rome, was one of the most pestilential spots in Italy, but monks sent there in 1868 to plant groves of these trees made it a healthful region within five years. On a farm near the Algerian borders where previously no human being could live for any length of time, 1,500 eucalyptus plants set in 1867 have counteracted every tendency to fever. Similar experiments have been successful also in Alsace and Lorraine. The home of the tree is in Australia and Tasmania. It composes in great measure the forests of Australia. In California all varieties of the tree are to be found. It is planted there chiefly on account of its rapid growth, to obtain shade and woodland on some of the otherwise treeless plains. So quickly does the eucalyptus grow that a plant three feet high, set in the ground near Mentone in 1869, had attained in 1874 a height of over fifty feet and a diameter of forty inches three feet from the ground.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and SIGNS of OUR TIMES.

A remarkable natural phenomenon was witnessed at Elmira, N. Y., on Sunday, September 26th. At half-past four o'clock in the afternoon, without a moment's warning, a terrible hurricane struck the city. Two minutes later it had passed, leaving as evidence of its visit overthrown buildings, uprooted trees, and immense piles of bricks and debris of buildings scattered on the streets. Entire roofs with heavy timbers were carried away hundreds of feet. The Rathbun House was unroofed, the spire of the Redding Methodist Church was blown across the street into a yard, about two tons of brick were deposited in the organ of the First Presbyterian Church, and holes were blown through the walls of several brick buildings, and the brick was scattered in all directions. Immense oak, elm, and maple trees were snapped at the roots like pipe-stems. The spire of a negro church was blown upon a house adjoining and crushed it, but injured no one. The roof of the palace car shops was blown over the freight office, a distance of several hundred feet. It is believed that no lives were lost. Many of the citizens declare that before the tornado came they distinctly heard a shock of earthquake. After the storm there was a perfect calm, and rain fell heavily. Those who witnessed the strange scene say that the suddenness of the visitation and the extent of havoc worked in so short a time render it wholly unprecedented in their experience.

THE HOLY WELL AT MECCA.

When Mohammed captured Mecca, which had been regarded for ages by his countrymen as a place of peculiar sanctity, he interfered with the worship of the Black Stone (probably a meteorite) which the angels had brought from heaven, and of the Zemzem, or Holy Well of Hagar, only so far as to suppress the ancient polytheistic rites. This well is close beside the Caaba or Square House, the chief sanctuary of the Mohammedan world. The princes of Islam maintain at Mecca keepers of the Holy Well, who annually supply them with water to be used on great occasions and in great emergencies, as when stricken with disease. Every pilgrim to Mecca—and thousands came thither from all countries—visits the well and is purified by drinking the water or pouring it on his person, or both. The water is described as unpleasant in taste and cathartic in effect—qualities which are now to be accounted for without recourse to miracle. With Occidental irreverence the British Consul-General at Jeddah has sent a bottle to the Royal College of Chemistry at South Kensington to be analyzed. Dr. E. Frankland, in his report of the analysis, says that the water is of the most abominable character: "In fact, it is sewage more than seven times as concentrated as London sewage, and it contains no less than 579 grains of solid matters per gallon. Knowing the composition of this water, and the mode of propagation of Asiatic cholera by excrementitious matters, it is not to be wondered at that outbreaks of this disease should often occur among pilgrims to Mecca, while it would scarcely be possible to provide a more effective means for the distribution of cholera poison throughout Mohammedan countries." It would be interesting to know the composition of the waters of other holy wells of which Islam has by no means the monopoly

The GOSPEL of the KINGDOM

Advocated in a series of Ten Discourses
—By Willy Jones.—

SUMMARY OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy in most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for careful perusal in the important information that it will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 14, 1879.

"It evinces a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scripture, and uniform courtesy toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York, Nov. 29, 1881.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested merely, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are second to none in importance to us. * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and convincing way, should buy this book."—The Rural Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 17, 1879.

"I have read it diligently again and again, * * It is next in point of excellence and doctrinal truths to the Book of books."—D. M. L., Mo.

"I do not know that I have ever seen from the pen of any modern writer, a plainer exhibit of the gospel of the kingdom and at the same time one better suited to general instruction on that subject, than that which brother Jones gives us in his book, 'The Gospel of the Kingdom, advocated in a series of Ten Discourses.'"—E. E. B., Va.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GREEK AND ENGLISH!
—REVISED—
THE EMPHATIC DIAGLOTT

—By Benjamin Wilson.—

Contains the Original Greek text of the New Testament, with an interlinear word-for-word English translation, based on the readings of common critics, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscripts, together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references.

The different renderings of various passages in the New Testament are the foundations on which most of the sects of Christians have been built up; with this work each reader may judge for himself whether the words there literally translated are so arranged in the common version as to express the exact meaning of the New Testament writers.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXX. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, OCTOBER 26, 1881. NO. 40.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and remission as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Loose the Four Angels.—Whence issues the command?

From the horns of the golden altar before God.

Whose voice utters the command?

It is the voice of one—of an angel, commissioned to order this work.

Angels are messengers that move at the command of the Deity. They are interested in national affairs, as we learn from the book of Daniel.

Daniel, at the age of about 93 years, "was mourning three full weeks. This mourning brought an extraordinary personage from heaven. His body like the beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, and his arms and his feet like in color to polished brass, and the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude." Dan. x. 6.

The great vision deprived Daniel of his strength, as he lay prostrate with his face towards the ground. A hand touched him, and set him on his hands and knees. He was commanded to stand upright. He was then told to fear not; that he was greatly beloved; and that he started from the throne on the day that he (Daniel) began to pray, and would have reached him much sooner, but (said he) "the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days: but, lo, Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me; and I remained there with the kings of [illegible]. Now I am [illegible] make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days." Verses 13, 14.

"Then, said he, Knowest thou wherefore I am come unto thee? and now will I return with the prince of Persia: and when I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come (forth). But I will show thee that which is noted in the Scripture of truth: and (there is) none that holdeth with me in these things but Michael your prince." Verses 20, 21.

These passages are sufficient to show the interest then taken in the affairs of those nations connected with God's people.

Why should there be less interest in the gospel dispensation?

The visions of John establish the fact, that a superintending Providence is still exercised.

"Loose." Give freedom. For centuries the Turkish power had been thrown back, and confined at the Euphrates. The same power that in those centuries drew back and bound, now commands to loose. The terms are antithetical. The great apostacy matured more slowly in the eastern than in the western empire. Its overthrow was therefore delayed. But the Turks were a restless people. They moved too soon. Three times were they bound. The eastern cup fills, and the command goes forth:—

"Loose the four angels."

Why four?

The four is supposed to include the four cardinal points, north, south, east, and west; and by it is intended all the forces of the Ottoman empire. Others understand the four sultanies. History shows such a division. Such were its usual divisions. They each include the same idea, and consequently do not vary the general exposition. We are inclined to the opinion that the four sultanies are primarily intended; and in them were combined the entire strength of the empire. The loosing implies the removal of all checks and hindrances of any nation, and all nations.

History of the Events.—We now call attention to the historic fulfillment of the loosing. The first step towards loosing is exhibited in the material by which the empire was bound. The band was composed of Mogul Tartars. Their conquests were not permanent. Like a terrible storm, the Mogul army passed over the Ottoman empire. Yielding to the relentless tempest, it bent down to the earth, and the cyclone passed over.

Its strength not being wasted, it soon began to show signs of recovering vitality. The long cherished idea of the conquest of the Greek empire began to revive as the effects of the eastern storm passed away.

The second step in the loosing process consisted in the weakness and corruption of the Greek empire itself. The power of that empire had usually been exercised in strengthening the hands which held the Turkish power. They had finally become so defenceless that they were unable to put forth any powerful effort in their own defence. It was their weakness rather than the strength of their enemy that caused their overthrow. This element must be kept in view. This will be fully shown in the following sketch.

The third step of loosing was the union of the empire. A union was in progress when Bajazet was overthrown by Timour. The sons of Bajazet were too feeble minded to carry out the plans of of their father. They courted the favor of the Grecian emperors. One-half a century was drawing to a close before the Ottoman empire was prepared to assume the offensive against the eastern Roman empire. It was then aided by European arms.

The sultan Amurath was a tyrant, yet devoted to the religion of the prophet. He was alarmed at the apparent friendship of the Greek and Latin churches, since, by their union, the western nations would be brought to the defence of Constantinople, which he designed to attack. Laboring to produce divisions among the Christian nations, he used all his efforts to combine and strengthen all the elements of his own dominions. Since war was the profession of his Janizaries he kept them constantly occupied. He labored to propagate the Moslem faith by the cimeter, the chief instrument of conversion.

Amurath, after a reign of thirty and one-half years, and having conquered nearly the entire southeastern Europe, sparing Constantinople, resigned all power to his son and quietly went into religious retirement, which, with one short interruption, continued to his death (four years).

The fall of Constantinople was again delayed by another crusade which defeated the Turks in two battles; taking thirteen bashaws, nine standards, and four thousand captives. But these triumphs were in Europe, as the sultans had secured a safe lodgment beyond the sea. This triumph, however, was quite brief, for the time had come to loose the four angels, and they were making ready to enter upon the work of their mission. In the battle of Warna the Hungarian crusaders were totally defeated and their king slain. This was accomplished through the jealous treachery of the Greek emperor.

As the siege and fall of Constantinople may be considered the act of fully loosing the Ottoman power, a brief sketch of that event will now be in place. The first and last of the Greek emperors were named Constantine; and it is remarkable, also, that the downfall of their empire should be accomplished by a sultan called Mahomet (Mahomet the second).

Mahomet the second was the son of Amurath the second. His mother was said to be a Christian, which would account for her son's skepticism; for, though outwardly a zealous defender of the Koran, yet, in private, it is said that he called the prophet of Mecca a robber, and an imposter. Mahomet the second was well educated for his days, understanding the Arabian, the Persian, the Hebrew, the Latin, and the Greek languages. History and geography were familiar. He was also skilled in astrology and mathematics. It is said that he conquered two empires, twelve kingdoms, and two hundred cities.

He ascended the throne at the age of twenty-one years. He soon entertained the ambassadors of Europe and Asia. To all he seemed to breathe the spirit of peace and friendship.

Mahomet sealed a treaty with the Greek emperor, with solemn oaths and fair promises; visited his Asiatic dominions, and introduced many reforms; yet, he allowed nothing to divert him from the execution of his chief work, the overthrow of the Greek empire by the fall of Constantinople.

"Peace was on his lips, but war was in his heart."

The Koran held that even an oath was not binding, where the interests of their religion were involved. Amurath, his father, scorned to exercise this privilege; yet his son was ready to violate his oath with the Greek emperor. So soon as his plans were fully matured, "He incessantly sighed for the possession of Constantinople; and the Greeks, by their own indiscretion, afforded the first pretence of the fatal rupture. Instead of laboring to be forgotten, their ambassadors pursued his camp, to demand the payment, and even the increase, of their annual stipend; the divan was importuned by their complaints, and the vizier, a secret friend of the Christians, was constrained to deliver the sense of his brethren. 'Ye foolish and miserable Romans,' said Cali, 'we know your devices, and ye are ignorant of your own danger! The scrupulous Amurath is no more; his throne is occupied by a young conqueror, whom no laws can bind, and no obstacles can resist: and if you escape from his hands, give praise to the divine clemency, which yet delays the chastisement of your sins. Why do ye seek to affright us by vain and indirect menaces. Release the fugitive Orchan, crown him sultan of Roumania; call the Hungarians from beyond the Danube; arm against us the nations of the west; and be assured that you will only provoke and precipitate your ruin.' Yet Mahomet promised that he would consult the true interests of the Greeks."—Gibbon.

During the early spring of the following year (March 26, A. D. 1452,) Mahomet laid siege to Constantinople by sea and land. On a spot called Asomaton, near the narrow part of the Bosphorus, within five miles of Constantinople, Mahomet, with one thousand masons, built a formidable castle. To this the Greeks objected. Mahomet's reply was:—

"I form no enterprise against the city; but the empire of Constantinople is measured by her walls."

In this fortress he placed his cannon to batter down the walls of the city. This fortress commanded the commerce of the Bosphorus. Preparations were in active progress during the winter, on both sides; the one, for the attack; the other to defend.

A cannon of immense size was cast, by a Dane or Hungarian, at Adrianople, and conveyed, at immense cost, to its position near the doomed city. In the meantime Constantine besought heaven and earth to deliver him from the impending calamity. The invisible powers were deaf to his prayers. and Christendom paid but little attention to his calls for aid. The sulton's army collected from the four quarters of the earth, and gathered around the city. The sound of the holy trumpet gathered multitudes to the scene of action. The Crescent and the Cross were now seen on opposing standards. Constantinople, though of such vast dimensions, (it was supposed once to contain 2,000,000) was now defended by an army of about 7,000 men.

The siege continued fifty-eight days. The first assault failed. The second was successful. On the 29th of May, A. D. 1453, Constantinople, with all its treasures, fell into the hands of the Turks, and the eastern Roman empire, with its seven-hilled city—like that on the Tiber—came to an end. It had corrupted pure Christianity wherever its dominion was acknowledged till its cup was full. Since that siege she has been suffering the just punishment of her iniquities.

This is the date of the completion of the loosing and preparation for its work. The Greek empire was slain—overthrown, and the mission of the Ottoman empire commences.

There never was a man or woman converted, from one end of the world to the other, who did not love the revealed will of God. Just as a child born into the world desires naturally the milk provided for its nourishment, so does a soul born again desire the sincere milk of the Word. There is a common mark of all the children of God: they "delight in the law of the Lord."—J. C. Byle.

JESSIE.

ELLA W. RICKER.

Dancing along, prancing along,
Singing a sweet little comical song
To a queer little tune, full of quavers and trills,
While the spirit of mischief her whole being fills,
Comes our Jessie, our pet and our pride.

Singing away, springing away,
Seeking the barn now to hide in the hay,
Soon the sweet voice is hushed—"Now what is she about?
If she's quiet ten minutes, we're sure to find out
That some mischief she's trying to hide."

Looking so wise, cooking mud-pies,
Behind of merriment are her black eyes,
As she throws in a handful of meal from the chest,
Then adding some flour to flavor it best,
Leaves a plentiful track on the floor.

Spying the flour, eyeing it over,
Think that some pauper must be in store,
She dips the new broom in the bucket, that stands
Left carelessly down within reach of her hands,
And sweeps up the flour with a will.

Hearing a sound, peering around,
In the door stands mamma. Now the wee culprit's found.
"O Jessie, how naughty! Just look at this floor.
With flour and water 'tis pasted all o'er.
'Tis this that has kept you so still."

Brimming with tears, swimming with tears,
Are her black eyes as this sentence she hears,
In pitiful tones, as of causing a crime,
"Is any one ever good all of the time?"
Thus the sweet voice as mamma draws near.

Grasping the sprite, clasping her tight,
Soothing her fears, as she mourns her sad plight,
Mamma thinks: "Ah! how oft must our sins be forgiven
By him who once said of the Kingdom of Heaven
Are such as this little one here."

Advice to Little Ones.

I would not say "I don't care," so much, if I were you. Just think how many times you say it, and you generally say it when you are angry, and do not think what you are saying. When your mamma says, "I am sorry my little one is so naughty," you did care, but you were angry, and so you said you did not.

Never say "I don't care," unless you are very sure you do not. After you have thought a little while, instead of not caring, you will want to say, "I will try not to be naughty any more, mamma."

If the scholars laugh when you make mistakes in your Sunday School lesson, don't get angry and say, "I don't care." That would not be exactly true. If you really did not care you would not get angry.

The Infant Class.

A mother, tired and weak with the fatigues of the day, sat by the fire in the twilight with her three little ones gathered around her, the youngest an infant in her arms, the oldest about six years. Weak physically, pressed down with her weight of care and responsibility, tears would force their way. She wiped them quietly away, hoping they were not seen in the dim light of the room.

After dinner, Eddie, the oldest son, asked, "Mamma, why were you crying when we sat by the fire?"

Always truthful, she told him she wasn't strong, and feared she had been fretful and cross to her dear little boys she loved so well. Then Eddie said in his childish simplicity—he had just commenced to attend Sunday School, and let teachers of primary classes take heart from such stories—"Mamma, don't you remember the hymn,

"Oh, do not be discouraged,
For Jesus is your friend?"

The dear little fellow had caught the spirit, though the word was too much for his tender memory. That mother felt "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast ordained praise." The little boy had noted her tears, and tried to comfort her with the sure consolation he had just learned in the Sunday School. Go on, dear teachers!

He will give you grace to conquer,
And triumph in the end.

Mortimer Collins' Little Friend.

Collins loved to notice and make friends with the birds and "small deer" that lived around him, and often a pleasant intercourse was carried on between them. Like Thoreau, though in a lesser degree, he knew how to make friends with the feathered folk that built their nests in his trees; and the intimacy seems to have proved agreeable on both sides. Here is a bit of cheerful gossip about a winter guest:—

"I have made a very pleasant acquaintance—a young and vivacious person, musical and garrulous, grateful for small kindnesses, and never a bore. He is, to avoid the mysterious, a robin red-breast—a young cock, whose waistcoat has not yet attained its fullest scarlet nor his song its complete music. There are lots of them on my lawn, in various stages of adolescence; but this little beauty got into my book room one morning, and flew in a fright against the window when I entered, and fell on the floor half stunned. I took him up, and got him to drink a little water, and put him on the grass. He soon recovered, and now he follows me all over the place. He waits to welcome me the first thing in the morning. He perches on my knee as I sit writing on the lawn, and twitters out a sweet low song. He is very inquisitive about everything now that comes out when we encamp under the trees, examining work-baskets, writing-baskets, straw hats, with an evident thirst for knowledge. He comes on my writing-table to pick up crumbs; then suddenly darts away in a hurry to seize something more enticing—a fat spider, or a daddy-longlegs, or a butterfly. There is something curious in the friendship of this feathered atom born out of gratitude."

Mrs. Collins adds in a note:—"He continued to be friendly until the spring of the following year, and spent the greater part of the winter in the house, thereby causing great jealousy to two other robins, who were great favorites, who used to wait for him to come out of the house and attack him.

Lessons in Words.

An explanation of the derivation of words will give a pupil an insight into their history, and he will comprehend their use and power.

"Sierra" means a "saw;" hence the use of the terms Sierra Nevada, Sierra Morena, for the mountains look like great saws turned up to the heavens.

"Frank" comes from a nation that possessed Gaul. They were distinguished from the Gauls by their love of freedom, their scorn of a lie. So marked was this national trait that it was applied to denote moral distinctions.

"Slave" was once a noble word, meaning "glory." It was significant of freedom. But the slaves (or Sclaves, as once spelled) became captives to the Teutonic race, and so a "Slave" was synonymous with one who was subject to another.

"Turkey" is applied to a fowl that originated in this country, but it was supposed by the common people to have come from Turkey.

"Daisy," Chaucer tells us, means "day's eye"—eye of day. The sun had this title first, but those who saw the daisy saw a likeness to the sun—the white flowerets resembling the rays—hence the name.

"Knave" meant originally only "lad" and it now means that in Germany, but so many lads were bad that it got to have a bad significance.

"Villain" meant a bad man who worked on a villa or farm; but so many of them had rough, hard natures that it took a low signification.

"Silly" in the old English means "blessed." Our early poets use the word to show harmlessness. The "silly sheep" is very common. But how the word has changed!

The Frankness and Truthfulness of Washington.

ISAAC TORD.

Washington was but ten years of age at the time his father died. The whole of the training of the boy then devolved upon his mother, and well did she perform the work.

In the pasture belonging to Mrs. Washington was a high-spirited colt. This animal was valued very highly by her on account of its great beauty. Notwithstanding the colt was of sufficient age, he had never been used. As yet not one had made the attempt to break the animal. George was desirous of doing his mother a favor by accomplishing this task. He thought best to say nothing to her about it until the work was accomplished. He, however, made known to some of his youthful companions what he intended to do. He informed them what day he should make the attempt. When the time arrived, his companions made their appearance early in the morning. Soon after the sun had arisen, the youthful band drove the colt into a small enclosure. At length George succeeded in bridling the animal, though with great difficulty. He then, in a twinkling, sprang upon the colt's back. The very next moment the animal was seen bounding forth in the open field, rearing, running and plunging. At the same time George was seen grinding his teeth, clenching firmly the bridle and clinging to his seat. He seemed as determined to subdue the colt as the colt was not to be subdued. The struggle seemed to be mutually desperate. The youthful companions looked on with terror and amazement; and these increased every passing moment. At length the colt obtained the advantage and then, bounding forward with the speed of an arrow, made a misstep, and, in his fall, broke a blood-vessel and died on the spot. George came down unhurt. But when he saw the gasping of the noble animal, and thought of his mother's high regard for it, he was greatly troubled. His companions hastened to the spot and heard George express his bitter regret. They anxiously inquired:—

"What will you say?—who will tell your mother?"

At that moment they were summoned to breakfast. After they were seated at the table Mrs. Washington, not knowing what had taken place, said:—

"Have you seen, in your rambles this morning, my fine sorrel colt?"

No answer was given. The question was then repeated. George then, with perfect frankness, replied:—

"Mother, your colt is dead."

He then gave a full account of what had taken place. As the agitated narrator passed along in his story, a flush of displeasure was seen rising on his mother's cheek, but it soon passed away, and she kindly and calmly said:—

"While I must regret the loss of my favorite colt, I greatly rejoice in my son who always tells the truth."

Boy Inventors.

Some of the most important inventions have been the work of mere boys. The invention of the valve-motion to the steam engine was made by a boy. Watts left the engine in a very incomplete condition, from the fact that he had no way to open or close the valves, except by means of levers operated by hand. He set up a large engine at one of the mines, and a boy was hired to work these valve levers; although this was not hard work, yet it required his constant attention. As he worked these levers, he saw that part of the engine moved in the right direction, and at the same time he had to open or close the valves. He procured a strong cord and made one end fast to the upper part of the engine, and the other end to the valve of the lever; the boy had the satisfaction of seeing it move off with perfect regularity of motion. A short time after the foreman came around and found the boys playing marbles at the door. Looking at the engine he soon saw the ingenuity of the boy, and also the advantage of such an invention. Mr. Watts then carried out the boy's inventive genius in a practical form, and made the steam engine a perfect automatic working machine.

The power loom is the invention of a farmer's boy who had never seen or heard of such a thing. He whittled one out with his jackknife, and after he had got it all done, he, with great enthusiasm, showed it to his father, who at once kicked it all to pieces, saying he would have no boy about him that would spend his time on such foolish things. The boy gathered up the pieces and laid them away. Soon after this his father bound him out as an apprentice to a blacksmith, about twelve miles from home. The boy was delighted at the idea of learning a trade, and he soon found out that his master was kind and took a lively interest in him. He had made a loom of what was left of the one his father had broken up, which he showed to his master. The blacksmith saw he had no common boy as an apprentice, and that the invention was a valuable one. He immediately had a loom constructed under the supervision of the boy. It worked to their perfect satisfaction, and the blacksmith furnished the means to manufacture the looms, the boy to receive one-half the profit. In about a year the blacksmith wrote to the boy's father that he should be at his house at a given time, and should bring with him a wealthy gentleman who was the inventor of the celebrated power loom. You may be able to judge of the astonishment at the old home when his son was presented to him as the inventor, who told him that the loom was the same as the model that he had kicked to pieces but a year before.

Chosen.

S. ROXANA WINCE.

Dear Young Friends:

Do you want to be chosen from all the youth of your own age around you to fill an exalted place in the coming kingdom of glory?

God has a great and noble purpose in view for you, if you will but choose him, and walk in his ways. To be chosen, you must first know what he would have you do, and then faithfully keep his commands.

If you would have a part in the kingdom of God you must know all that you can know, of that kingdom, and prepare yourself by a life of purity, for the duties that will devolve upon you there.

To know what it is that God requires of you, must be found out by the Bible. You must study it every day that you live, and coming to believe in the kingdom, you must live for the kingdom.

They who are to be with Christ in the last great battles that are to end in "blessing all the nations of earth," are "called and chosen and faithful."

You are already "called." Come to Jesus that you may be "chosen," and walk aright that you may be found "faithful" in the day of his coming.

The Kabyles of North Africa are said to form about half the population of Algeria, living in small villages among the mountains, mainly on the slopes toward the Sahara desert. In the two provinces of Algeria and Constantine they number some 3,000,000. They have hitherto withstood all efforts to induce them to become Mohammedans, though little seems to be known of their own religion. Mr. Pearse speaks of their mountain scenery as having "a peculiar charm, and the views from the villages perched on the hill-tops are exceedingly beautiful." The climate is temperate and healthful. Mr. Pearse tells of a young man suspected of inclining to Christianity, and when charged with it he frankly declared he was a Christian. Thereupon the Kaid of the village rebuked him and offered him a large sum of money to induce him to recant and be a Mohammedan. The reply was: "If you were to fill up my house with money I should not give up Jesus." The missionary's darkest picture is of the women. He writes: "How my heart has bled in contemplating the position of the Kabyle women! Whenever we came to a village the women hide themselves; the young girls, some remarkably beautiful, fly like gazelles. A large part of the work in the fields falls upon women. A wife is purchased for about $100—the price of a good mule. * * * Not only the husband, but the sons, often tyrannise over the mother. I saw the sister of my Kabyle guide—a beautiful young woman of eighteen, who on her marriage went to live under the roof of her father-in-law. But she had been divorced and sent home to her mother because a step-mother disliked her, and compelled her husband to send her away." Mr. Pearse is translating portions of Scripture into the Kabyle language, and hoped to establish a permanent mission among this interesting people.

THE RESTITUTION.

Stockholders Meeting.

As per Amendment to the Constitution, the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, will be held on the second Saturday in November (12th), 1881, in Plymouth, Indiana.

E. K. BARNHILL, Sec'y.

We give our readers a somewhat lengthy account of events connected with the earliest discoveries made in the Great West, which we hope will be acceptable to the most of our readers.

As the year nears its close will our patrons make an effort to increase our subscription list, so that the paper may be self-sustaining without extra relief. We express our thanks to all who have kindly extended aid for the paper's support.

AMONG pamphlets received which we have not found time to read are—The Lost Tribes of Israel in England and America.—The Last Sickness and Death of Elder James White—and No. 1, of The New Life Series. Absence from home lately has taken our leisure time.

WE call attention to the new childs' paper—"The Youths' Examiner"—an advertisement of which appears in another column. It promises to be worthy of the patronage of all.

OUR VISIT TO LANARK.

With the hope of gratifying some general readers, as well as interesting the brotherhood, we will give a more detailed and miscellaneous narrative than merely noticing the incidents more intimately connected with the Conference held at Lanark. It has been our habit, in writing for different papers from time to time, to interweave some account of places and events connected with the country in general through which it may have been our lot to journey, and we will venture to take the same course in writing our present communication.

We left Plymouth early in the morning, Friday, Sept. 30, over the Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne & Chicago R. W., for the Queen City of the west. It is well known to all, who have ever passed through the part of Indiana traversed by this road, that it enters the great Kankakee Marshes not very many miles west of Plymouth, and that these marshes take their name from a river, by which they are intersected, and which rises not far from South Bend and empties into the Illinois River near the line between Will and Grandy Counties, giving its name to Kankakee County, in the State of Illinois, through which county it flows. It is not generally known, at least to a majority of our readers, that the very first trace that we can find of the white man's footsteps in either Indiana, Illinois, or Ohio, was in the very part of the country through which we took our morning ride.

In a volume of Historical Notes of the discovery and settlement of the United States northwest of the Ohio River, we find the statement that, in 1672, two French Missionaries, Allouez and Dablon, explored the eastern part of Wisconsin, the northeastern part of Illinois, and that part of Indiana that lies north of the Kankakee.

There is a far more romantic history connected with these rivers that our space will only permit us to outline. It was on the first of November, 1679, that LaSalle and his adventurous party landed at the mouth of the St. Joseph River that empties into Lake Michigan on the opposite side from Chicago, after numerous adventures in the long voyage round the Lakes, from Fort Frontenac at the outlet of Lake Ontario. After spending a month in building a fort at the mouth of this river, LaSalle with a company of thirty-three men started up the river on a voyage of discovery, and coming to the place where the distance across to the Kankakee was not very far, they carried their sight canoes overland and started down the latter river, following this stream to its confluence with the Illinois, and then down this river below the lower end of Lake Peoria, where they erected a fort, giving it the name of Crevecoeur—Broken Heart—as significant of the distress the party suffered in consequence of the desertion of six of their men, and the great privations they were compelled to endure in traversing the unexplored west.

This is as far as our present narrative calls upon us to follow these early explorers of southwestern Michigan, northwestern Indiana, and that portion of Illinois that lies along the Kankakee and Illinois Rivers.

When we crossed the sluggish Kankakee, as it wind through the extensive marshes to which we have already alluded, we suffered our imagination to wander back over the two hundred years that had passed, to contemplate this little fleet of eight canoes, making its way to explore the more mighty rivers and the boundless prairies of the Great West.

Taking our leave of LaSalle, Hennepin, the incidents of two hundred years ago, and the almost interminable Kankakee marshes, our train finally came to a stop in the heart of a city unrivaled in its growth by any city ever founded by human hands. Long before the site of Chicago was visited by any white man it was a favorite rendezvous for various Indian tribes in succession. The first Indians who possessed the territory now covered by the city and the adjacent country surrounding, were the Tamarcas one of the most powerful tribes of the Illini confederacy. The name of the city is derived from the Indian word Checaqua, which is defined as meaning Strong, and was applied to a long line of chiefs, who were thus honored with the epithet of Mighty Ones. This word was also applied to a wild onion that grew plentifully along the banks of the river. It is far more probable from an analogy that we shall subsequently allude to that the Checaqua was the river of the Mighty Men rather than of the pungent vegetable. It is stated in a work of good authority that the first white man that visited the place was a Frenchman named Perrot who was there in 1671. The next white man's name that we find connected with the history of this part of Illinois is that of the celebrated Marquette who, in company with Joliette and five other Frenchmen, in 1673, crossed the present state of Wisconsin by way of Fox and Wisconsin rivers to the Mississippi, which they entered on the 17th of June, and, spreading their light sails they continued their course down the Father of Waters till they reached a point below the mouth of the Arkansas, where they found a tribe of sun-worshippers. After having satisfied themselves about the course of the Mississippi, Marquette turned the prow of his canoe northward, and when the party reached the mouth of the Illinois river, which stream they entered, they found a country without a paragon for beauty and fertility in the lovely prairies that bordered that river. The tribe of Kaskaskia Indians requested Marquette to come back and reside among them. One of their chiefs conducted the party to Chicago, and, late in September, the explorers arrived safely at Green Bay after an absence of about four months.

In 1674, he set out with two white men, and a number of Indians for the village of Kaskaskia, but was stopped by a severe cold, and other infirmities, at the portage on the Chicago, where he stayed through the winter. On March 30, 1675, he resumed his journey to Kaskaskia, which place he reached April 8, and began his mission, by raising the cross and celebrating Easter in the presence of the assembled tribe whose numbers were reckoned at two thousand. His health rapidly declining he returned to the vicinity of Chicago, from whence he crossed to the eastern shore of Lake Michigan, designing to reach Mackinaw. Suffering from mortal sickness while they were rowing along the coast northward, they entered a small river in Michigan, to which his name was given, and which is still known as the Pere Marquette River, where they took him ashore, and laid him upon the leaves under the shadow of the primeval forest.

Here he soon breathed his last. On the highest bank of the stream his companions dug his grave in the sand, and erected a large cross as his monument.

Thus passed away one of the two noted discoverers of the Upper Mississippi. We have already noticed La Salle's first expedition into Illinois by way of the Kankakee through Indiana in 1679. In 1681 we find him making another expedition into the unknown west. On the 21st of December he left Fort Miami, and soon afterwards reached the Chicago River, which he ascended on his tour to explore the Mississippi to its mouth.

We thus connect the history of this great city, Chicago, with the travels of these early explorers. It is said with probability that the first fort here was built by the French, and abandoned when Canada was ceded to Great Britain. In the text of the treaty made at Greenville Aug. 3, 1795, between General Wayne and the representatives of several Indian tribes we find this as the 14th section of article 3, of that treaty in which the Indians ceded quite a number of isolated tracts of land to the United States. This section reads:

"One piece of land six miles square, at the mouth of Chikago river, emptying into the southwest end of Lake Michigan, where a fort formerly stood."

The United States built a stockade fort here near the mouth of the river in 1804, and named it Fort Dearborn. In the war of 1812, the government ordered the fortress to be abandoned. On Aug. 15, Capt. Heald marched out of the fort with the garrison and others, and when he had retreated only one mile and a half on the route toward Ft. Wayne he was attacked by the Pottawattamie Indians, who killed thirty-eight soldiers, two women, and twelve children. We have read a full account of this tragic scene in a volume not now at hand, but we recollect that the celebrated chief, Little Turtle, did what he could to avert the massacre of the whites. The fort was destroyed after the massacre, but was rebuilt by Capt. Bradley in 1816, and finally abandoned in 1837. In 1856 it was demolished with the exception of one of the out-buildings, which remained till the great fire.

In 1830, James Thompson surveyed the town of Chicago, and it was incorporated as a city March 4, 1837. At the first census taken July 1, of the same year the number of inhabitants was 4,170. In the great fire Oct. 8, 1871, 2,100 acres of the best part of the city was burned over, destroying 17,450 buildings and rendering 98,500 persons homeless, after entailing a pecuniary loss of $200,000,000. The burnt district was however rapidly rebuilt with elegant and costly structures, and one could hardly realize that the city had been the scene of so terrible a catastrophe only ten years ago.

To resume our own narrative. We left the Union Depot about 10 a. m. on the cars of the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul R. R. This was our first journey across any considerable portion of the state. The country is mostly prairie. There is but one locality on the way that we learned was fraught with any tragic interest. One beautiful valley, which is scarcely more than a depression between slight undulations, is connected with a massacre of some men in the Black Hawk war. In 1832, this disappointed chief crossed the Mississippi, with a band of warriors, who were attacked by the militia, and put to flight. The Indians then scattered themselves into squads, and began indiscriminately to slaughter the whites.

It was at this time, as I was verbally informed, that a lone Indian showed himself on a rising ground bordering on this beautiful vale, when a small number of mounted men gave pursuit, were drawn into ambush, and all or nearly all killed.

We finally arrived at Lanark about 3 p. m., and were met at the train by Brother G. M. Myers, and other brethren, and assigned to the hospitalities of Brother D. Gans, whose house became our home for a large part of the time while at Lanark, although we made some day visits to the friendly homes of several of our esteemed brethren whose acquaintance we were very happy to make.

Brother Glotfelty has written a particular account of the different meetings, so that we need not repeat in detail.

Among brethren and sisters from abroad we were happy to greet two of our old Indiana acquaintances, who have been for several years residing in Illinois, Brother R. F. Shirley and his wife Sister Shirley. We here met Brother Vanhorn, from Traer, Iowa, and Sister Dresser, from California. Brother Jacobs was there from Adeline, who took part in the preaching. Sister Koontz was also present from the same place. Brother Button from West Northfield was also one of the preachers from abroad whom we met here for the first time.

The meeting was one of much interest to ourself, and all present seemed to enjoy the association of Christian friendship and brotherly love. On Monday, Oct. 3, we had the privilege of going to one of the prairie streams and seeing Brother Myers baptize a brother in the faith into the Savior's name.

On Tuesday we returned home. The train on which we came to Chicago was the first through train from Sioux City, and was three or four hours behind time, which made our arrival at Chicago so late that we missed seeing Brother H. V. Reed—much to our disappointment. We, however, met Brother J. P. Wilcox, with whom we had some pleasant conversation. He seems anxious to enter the great gospel field from which, through circumstances, he has been for awhile retired to a great extent. We ardently hope that the way will soon be opened for him to engage anew in the work for which he is so eminently qualified both from his large experience and his close acquaintance with the word of God.

We arrived at our own hired home about 9:30 p. m. The day we went to Lanark was rainy, and also the day we came home; which detracted somewhat from the pleasure of the trip so far as viewing the scenery was concerned.

We were pleased however with what we saw of the State of Illinois. This State derives its name from the river, Illinois, to which we have already called attention. The river derives its name from the Indian word Illini, which means pre-eminently men, as contrasted with anything pusillanimous. The cognate term is found in the language of the Delawares in a compound expression by which name they called themselves—Lenni Lenape—which means the original men, i. e., an unmixed race who had never changed their character since the creation. This proud spirit of race is well illustrated in an Indian woman who was the last of the Lenapes that lingered about Philadelphia, who died in 1803, about 100 years old. Watson says, speaking of her in his annals as old Hannah—"She had a proud and lofty spirit to the last—hated the blacks, and scarcely brooked the lower orders of the whites."

It was this pride of caste and name that makes us prefer to interpret the Indian term Checaque, from which Chicago has derived its name as meaning the mighty, or chiefs.

We have been thus lengthy, in interweaving some incidents of the past with our narrative, in order to draw some important deductions in setting forth the providential government of the world. One of the important lessons of history is, that nations, like individuals, have a life time. Our limits will not permit an illustration from the general history of the past, but we may moralize a little on the almost complete extinction of the aborigines of the Western Continent.

What a melancholy history is that of the Red Men. By some mysterious law of national being, they seem destined to a sure and final extinction. Like the fate of Amalek of old, they seem doomed to perish forever. Before the onward approach of the white man they have been constantly fading away since the first advent of the "pale face." Once the smoke of the wigwam and of the council fires rose throughout every part of the land from ocean to ocean, and from the Arctic ice boundaries under the circumpolar stars of the north, to where the Royal Oak and the Southern Cross gleam down in stellar sheen, over the eternal snows of the Antarctic desolations. Here the wild hunter threaded the pathless forests and roamed over the boundless plains with unerring certainty, and the warrior stood forth in all the glory of savage ornamentations. The young listened to the deeds of daring, and to songs that told of victory and of conquest. Here mothers dandled helpless infancy, and taught prattlers to lisp in languages that are forever dead. Men of greater bravery, sagacity, and perseverance, perhaps never lived. They loved sweet country and home, as dearly as ever human heart loved the fatherland of revered race and kindred. If injuries so rankled in their hearts that, like the furies of old, they never knew to pardon, still acts of kindness were remembered to the dying day. In their vengeance they were terrible, but, at the same time, most noble in their generosity. Their love and their detestation ended only in the grave—

"Faithful alike to friendship or to hate."

They were as is well said—

"A swarthy tribe—
Slipped from the secret hand of Providence,
They come, we are not how, nor know we whence—
They seemed created on the spot—though born
In trans-Atlantic climes, and hither brought
By paths as covert as the birth of thought."

But where now the race that lived and loved, and that, in successive generations, occupied the world's west half during the centuries that the moon, their great chronometer, measured in its ten thousand waxing and waning changes?

The doomed race has nearly "vanished from the things that be!"

While the summer harvests wave in golden billows over the crumbled dust in hidden graves beneath which the forefathers of this fast vanishing race are sleeping, the thinned out remnant has taken the last look of ancestral homes, and retired, in blank despair, to make the graves of the last household of once mighty tribes in the lands of the sunset.

But there is one lesson more that grows out of the events of the long ago to which we have been directing attention. Those Jesuit Missionaries designed that the canoe on the Father of Waters should antagonize the Mayflower that anchored at Plymouth Rock on the Atlantic.

It was their design to make the mighty west a part of the empire of the successor of the "Eldest Son of the Church" as an appanage to the home estates of Catholic France, and set up the wooden cross throughout every part of the mighty realm as a symbol of the triumph of Papal power in North America. The Puritans came with the school and the Bible. O history from what mustard seed grains have been thy enormous developments. The Mayflower of the Puritan and the bark canoe of the Jesuit stand back of the mighty struggles of England and France for supremacy in the Western World. In the course of empire the Bible and England won the day, and the liberty to worship God as his word teaches came down, in the further ordinations of Divine Providence as the inalienable right of all in the Great Republic of the West. Under these rights we now meet in Conference and otherwise from time to time. And as we close our lengthy narrative, and our moralizing and philosophizing on the lessons of history.

DIVORCE AND POLYGAMY.

The Lord God of Israel saith, that he hateth putting away. Mal. ii. 16.

And I say unto you, Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and whosoever marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery. Matt. xix. 9.

Marriage is honorable in all, and the bed undefiled; but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge. Heb. xiii. 4.

To these clear, explicit, and solemn asseverations of God's holy word but little attention is given in this age of apostacy from the obligations of Christianity and of criminal delinquency as respects the social obligations that are binding upon all when contemplated only in a moral point of view.

Too many, alas, have imbibed the mistaken idea that a divorce granted by the laws of the land is as decisive a termination of wedded obligations as death itself; and that a marriage contract is as valid and sanctified when entered into with some one who has dissolved the bonds of a former solemn compact on account of some incompatibility of temper, or for some other cause, as it would be between single persons, or between those whom bereavements by death have set free from former companions to marry again or not as might seem best. Whatever men and women may think of their responsibility, and however they may determine to act, when, for some unhappy reason, they have abandoned a former companion, the law of heaven, as most expressly enunciated by the great Lawgiver and Head of the Church himself, is that Whosoever puts away a former companion except for fornication—embracing the crime of adultery of course—and is married to another commits adultery.

This is the Divine Law that no human law can abrogate, annul, or set aside. In every crisis of human history, it has been true that before destruction came, there was a complete disregard of everything of Divine and moral obligation, and the sure word of prophecy declares most emphatically that the blackest crimes of history will repeat themselves in the days immediately before the second advent of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Occupying the responsible position we do, a sense of duty impels us to utter a word of warning in a manner so forcible that none can claim that we fail to make the subject understood, or that we from some motive of sinful policy fail to do our duty. Let all that have never made an irretrievable mistake in this direction beware. It is for such that we now write. For all that is eternally dear in having a part in God's kingdom, do not wilfully and willingly close and bolt its doors against yourselves. In conclusion there are conditions in the married life where it would be best for both parties to live apart, but many reasons that would warrant this step give no right whatever to marry again.

Below we append an article from the Rainbow to which we design what we have written as an introduction. Let all give it a careful perusal:—

POLYGAMY AND THE OLD TESTAMENT.

Among the internal evidences for the Divine origin of the Old Testament Scriptures may be reckoned, we fully think, the aspect in which those Scriptures stand towards the question of Polygamy. The rise within our time of the great Mormon delusion which has sought to establish a system of marriage which Christianity has plainly forbidden, makes the subject of peculiar interest to us.

Monogamy was the original institution of God. When the Creator looked upon Adam's state at the first, and pronounced that he was yet without an "help meet for him," God's reply to his own thought was the creation of Eve. One wife for one man was in the judgment of God that which was required. There was here no occasion or place for any ordinance of monogamy or any prohibition for polygamy. Polygamy was out of Adam's power. Monogamy was pronounced by his Maker sufficient for him. Gen. ii. 24.

That such was the original institution of God may also be seen from the primitive practice of mankind. Moses very plainly relates the departure from previous habit in the case of Lamech. Gen. iv. 19. His having "two wives" is as plainly noted as a new thing as the tent life, the invention of musical instruments, and the workmanship in brass and iron, are noted as new things in the history of human life and progress. Gen. iv. 20–22.

In such a wonderfully brief sketch as is given of mankind in the opening of the book of Genesis, where six brief chapters are all that is devoted to the history of our race for a period of some fifteen hundred years, the sacred writer would not have noticed the taking to himself of two wives by Lamech unless that had been a departure from the hitherto practice of mankind. Lamech married two wives, and only two, and this was reckoned by all an extraordinary event, and by most, probably, condemned as wrong. Such was the commencement of a social system which led in Jewish history to Solomon and his seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines; which led to the Seraglio of Abdalrahman, Caliph of Bagdad, of six thousand three hundred wives, concubines, and eunuchs; which displayed to the astonished minds of the Spanish invaders of South America in the 16th century the court of the Inca of Peru, whose concubines were numbered not by hundreds, but by thousands.*

With the gospel of Jesus Christ came back the old institution of monogamy in even more than its primitive force. Matt. xix. 4–9. As first instituted by God there was no direct prohibition of polygamy. There was the simple institution of a state of monogamy pronounced by God suitable and adequate for the welfare of the human race. That was enough for the time. Departure from this established rule of God was plainly wrong. But where practice had established a different state of things; when polygamy had long been in use in different nations of the world; when, in particular, polygamy had been practiced without rebuke among God's chosen nation by men who stood high in God's favor and the estimation of the people, it was then no longer sufficient, if a change in this system were intended by Christ, to lay before men the simple and original institution of God. This must be accompanied by a comment which would put it out of the power of any one either to argue that the original institution of marriage was not incompatible with polygamy, or that, at least, Christianity permitted polygamy as Judaism had done.

Our Lord has done all this plainly and beyond any doubt. He took occasion to do so from a question put to him by his subtle enemies. Matt. xix. 3. Polygamy was at this time all but extinct among the Jews, but divorce was extremely common, and rendered polygamy a matter undesirable by almost every one. About to prohibit divorce from the marriage tie in every case whatsoever save only one, our Lord knew that this prohibition of divorce would send men back upon that practice of polygamy which had to a very considerable extent been laid aside, and that accordingly when he had uttered his mind fully and plainly upon the matter of divorce, he must do so as plainly and unequivocally upon the kindred subject of polygamy. He has accordingly done so in his reply to the Pharisee's question:—

"Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?"

He first lays before them the original law of marriage, and from its nature pronounces divorce to be unlawful. When to this it is objected that Moses commanded a writing of divorcement to be given to the woman who was put away, our Lord explains that this was permitted by reason of the hardness of heart of the people, but that it was a departure from the original institution. And then he lays down his decision that in every case whatever, save one only, where a man put away his wife and married another, he was guilty of adultery. Now, if it was lawful to have two wives, i. e., if polygamy was permitted, the fact of one wife being divorced before a second was married could not possibly make it adultery, to take the second. It could only be because polygamy was absolutely wrong that marriage after divorce was unlawful, because divorce was not judged by Christ to break the marital bond. If a man might take two or more wives under any circumstances, his having divorced the first, whether divorce was valid or invalid, could not possibly make it sin in him to take another. The whole force of our Lord's argument in Matt. xix. 9, arises from the strict prohibition under his dispensation of that polygamy which was tolerated, not approved of, under the Mosaic dispensation and that of previous times. While one wife is living, Christ pronounces it adultery to marry another. Such is the Christian law of marriage.

That such was the view taken from the earliest period of our Lord's utterances upon this question there can be no doubt. How those who were polygamists before their conversion to Christianity were to be treated, has come up from time to time before the judgment of the Church; but it was never, that we know of, made a serious matter of inquiry in the Churches of Christ whether polygamy was lawful or not. There have been individual cases, as that of the Elector of Saxony in the sixteenth century, where an effort has been made to vindicate the practice in those instances, but the extreme rarity of the cases in which such attempts were made does but establish the general view of Christian men that polygamy is condemned by the religion of Christ.

But between the first institution of marriage, as we find it in Gen. ii. 24, and the promulgation of this by Christ in its original meaning, there came a great, and long-continued, and widespread divergence of practice. Lamech, the sixth in descent from Cain, introduces the practice of polygamy, not going, however, beyond taking a second wife. Gen. iv. 19. There can be little doubt that the practice rapidly grew in the wicked generations before the flood. No doubt it was continued in the early generations after the deluge. We find it established in the court of Pharaoh, King of Egypt. Gen. xii. 15. We find Abraham conforming to it. Use, doubtless, made it appear to be good, though monogamy might still be reckoned the better way. But, at all events, it grew into use wherever it was judged advisable.

It is needless to say that in this interval all the books of the Old Testament were written. Moses begins a series of writings which end with Malachi. To the period from Abraham to Malachi I would particularly refer. The history of this period is the fullest, and specially refers to the Israelites, from whom every one of the sacred writers, with the possible exception of the writer of the book of Job, was taken. During this period polygamy was permitted, so far as never having been forbidden. During this period some of the most honored names of Scripture practiced it without rebuke. Abraham, the father of the faithful, was a polygamist. Jacob, who gave the name of Israel to the chosen people, was one also. So was David, the hero of the Jewish people, the root from whence their Christ was to spring. So was Solomon, the wisest of [illegible] kingdom, [illegible] river of Egypt to the Euphrates was a type of the reign of their Messiah.

And it is also to be remembered that not only were the writers of the Holy Scriptures themselves Jews, and writing at a time when polygamy was permitted, but that also some of the writers of Scripture were polygamists themselves. It has been thought by some that Moses was a polygamist, but of that I see no proof in Scripture. But David and Solomon were polygamists, and wrote between them no inconsiderable proportion of Holy Scripture. To Solomon in particular we would refer. With his magnificent court, including a thousand wives and concubines, he has, especially in his book of Proverbs, passed in review every condition of human life. The relation of man to woman, the question of marriage, often occupied his thoughts and his pen.

We must also remember that this question of polygamy must in all countries engage notice. If it was practiced and justified in some nations, it was disused and condemned in others. If by some it was supposed to have its advantages, by others it was judged to be attended by inconveniences which far outbalanced them. Tacitus, in his History of Germany, remarks of the Germans, that while all other barbarous people practiced polygamy, they alone married only one wife. By the laws of Cecrops polygamy was forbid, in the State of Athens, the most civilized community of those times. Rawlinson tells us that it was not only forbidden in Athens, but also in the ancient and civilized kingdom of Egypt. Sallust, living in the most dissolute age of the Roman Commonwealth, judges that polygamy had the evil effect of causing the marriage tie to be lightly thought of. David Hume, in one of his ingenious essays, has presented in one view the various arguments for and against polygamy which have from time to time presented themselves to the human mind.†

Is not then the attitude of the Old Testament towards the great question of polygamy so very extraordinary that it may without any strain be reckoned among the internal evidences of its Divine inspiration?

A state perpetually discussed for or against among men—a state practiced throughout the entire period during which the Old Testament Scriptures were written—practiced, too, by many of those men whom those Scriptures held up to our veneration, and by some of whom those Scriptures were written—a state which must have been constantly brought before the attention of all sacred writers—it is yet a fact that not one text, not one chance or designed expression, can be found in favor of polygamy from Genesis to Malachi! More than this, indeed, is true. It is true that wherever the subject of marriage is spoken of or alluded to, while polygamy is not formally condemned, yet marriage to a single wife is spoken of in terms which imply God's approval of it, and this by persons from whom we might expect the very opposite.

Let us take a case in point. In our time has risen up the abominable system of Mormonism, which has sought as one of its main objects to establish polygamy. In a very remarkable book lately written to expose it, "The Englishwoman in Utah," by Mrs. Stenhouse, we have brought before us the treatment of this question by the apostles and prophets of Mormonism. They are not contented with advancing the example of Abraham and others in the Old Testament. They adduce also every plea by which it may be shown to be not only lawful, but also far the preferable way, and, indeed, a duty incumbent upon all saints. How different the Old Testament! It narrates many examples of polygamy among its most lauded men. It never praises it. It sometimes implies the very opposite, and this where we should least of all expect it.

Let us take the case of Solomon. In Prov. v. 15–19, he speaks of marriage. In reading it we should never suppose it to have been written by a polygamist. It breathes throughout the spirit of one who lived after Christ had propounded his law of marriage. "Rejoice with the wife of thy youth," is not the language of a man whose affections and thoughts were divided among many, but of one who only loved one woman, whom he loved in youth and continued to love in age. We would scarcely suppose these verses were written by the man who "loved many strange women," in whose gorgeous harem were brought together "seven hundred wives, princesses, and three hundred concubines." 1 Kings xi. 1–3.

Where among them was "the wife of youth?"

And so it came to pass that when Christ came on earth, and restored marriage to its original condition, and quoted the description [illegible]n. ii. 24, as descriptive of [illegible] which alone obtained his permission and sanction, not one text written during ages when polygamy reigned in full force, was, or could be counted in opposition to his teaching. Scripture was throughout the dispensations and the ages true to truth, because holy men of old spake throughout it as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

CORRECTION.

In my article, in speaking of a portion of John viii., "they have left out," etc., should read, "they have not left out," etc. The omission is probably my own. In another paragraph, it reads, "burning under the curse," etc.; I did not write "burning." I wrote, "living under the curse," etc.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

The days of old were days of might
In forms of greatness moulded,
And flowers of heaven grew on the earth
Within the church unfolded:
For grace fell fast on summer dew,
And saints to giant stature grew.

But, one by one, the gifts are gone
That in the church resided,
And gone the spirit's living light
That on her walls abided.
When by our shrines he came to dwell
In power and presence visible.

A blight hath passed upon the church,
Her summer bath departed,
The chill of age is on her sons,
The cold, and fearful heartied;
And sad, amid neglect and scorn,
Our mother sits and weeps forlorn.

Narrow and narrower still each year
The holy circle groweth,
And what the end of all shall be
No man nor angel knoweth:
And so we wait and watch and fear:
Believing that the Lord is near.

WHAT NEW HEAVENS AND EARTH ARE WE LOOKING FOR?

E. HOYT.

This important question is propounded by a brother in THE RESTITUTION of Oct. 5, and in connection he has given his answer.

If the question is put to me, as one of the readers of the paper, my answer is quite different. The new heavens and earth are as literal as the old spoken of in the same connection, and they are the same that God created in the beginning.

The scoffers of the personal advent, Peter says, are willingly ignorant, that the heavens were of old and the earth by the word of God, whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water perished. But the heavens and earth which are now by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire, against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.

Now, if the heavens and earth that were created in the beginning by the word of God, are literal, as the brother admits, and if the deluge, by which the earth was overflowed was literal water, then the heavens and earth which are now, are reserved unto literal fire, and are themselves literal, being kept in store by the same word that created them—that caused that deluge, and that will create new heavens and earth, or make all things new.

Because the translators rendered the original word "burned up" in the phrase "the earth and the works that are therein shall be burned up," it is supposed the earth must be annihilated or made a great ash heap. The Greek word here used is much oftener translated "burned" simply.

The Psalmist says, "Thou wilt renew the face of the earth." The face of the earth may be so burned that a remnant of the tribes of earth may be spared as subjects of the kingdom. The greatest change may be, according to the order in the book of Revelation, after the one thousand years, when the new heavens and earth are spoken of.

Let us compare this with other Scriptures. Paul quotes the words of David, Heb. i. 10, "And thou Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth and the heavens are the works of thy hands; they shall perish; and they all shall wax old as doth a garment, and as a vesture shalt thou fold them up and they shall be changed."

The same heavens and the same earth that God laid the foundation of in the beginning, are to perish, be folded up, but not so that they will not be changed. The change will result in new heavens and earth wherein dwelleth righteousness.

The righteousness or the kingdom constitution of the new earth should not be confounded with the new earth itself. The heavens and earth are never used in the Bible as figures to represent something else. The literal heavens and earth are often addressed as if they were persons and could hear and see, as in Isa. i. 2, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; for the Lord hath spoken. I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me."

The literal heavens and earth are spoken to by the figure of personification, as if they were intelligent witnesses. Wherever it is said that the heavens and earth shall pass away, or flee away, it is the real heavens and earth, not figurative, that are said to pass away.

The passing away is figurative. The change is so great from old to new, that it will be as if they passed away or fled before the face of their great Creator. The figure of hyperbole is often used in the symbolic portions of the Scriptures.

Some say that the heavens and earth of Peter's day is the "Mosaic constitution of things," that passed away soon after. Then the new heavens and earth must be the "Christian constitution of things," now existing, and we have no new earth to look for in the future "wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Others talk of "Judean heavens" that passed away 1800 years ago at the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. The fact is we are living on the same old earth that Peter lived on and under the same heavens. Our brother expects the Gentile heavens will flee away from the face of him who sits on the great white throne, the great capitals of governments shall melt by the means of the soldier's torch; the tabernacle will be equal to the kingdom of God; new made orders and constitutions of things. Surely Bible believers look for a new order of things and a kingdom, but they look for a kingdom under the whole heavens—which means over the whole earth—therefore the heavens and kingdom are not the same. The redeemed will reign on the earth—the reign and the place where they reign should be kept distinct.

God has sworn with an oath that all the earth shall be filled with his glory; his will be done on earth as in heaven. Then shall the meek inherit the earth. It seems extremely absurd that those who can find no promise in the Bible of going to heaven at death or any other time, should spiritualize the new earth, and thus turn our only hope into a figure. Is the everlasting kingdom to be on the old earth in its sin-cursed state, and beneath the old heavens? Is the groaning creation to groan forever? If so the saint's inheritance must be corruptible. But the promise is that it shall be incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading.

Shall we spiritualize the "habitable earth to come" (Heb. i.) and cast away the hope of the new earth—heavenly country—the foundation of all we hope for?

Jesus assured his apostles that they should have thrones and rule the tribes of Israel, at the time of regeneration, when he also would sit upon the throne of his glory. The Diaglott translates palingenesia, the original word—renovation,—or "new birth day,"—creation. Here is a renewal, not of things on the earth, but of the earth itself. The thrones on the earth, express the new constitution of things. Let us not, then, take away from the book of Divine revelation, lest our part be taken from the Book of Life and Holy City.

Editor Restitution:

Since my last report I spent a week with a few believers near Kingston, Pa.; gave nine discourses to the people, who listened with interest to the grand truths concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus. Baptized one who became anxious to obey from the heart the form of doctrine, thus becoming free from sin, passing from death unto a hope of life by resurrection. The brethren and sisters were much interested in Bible truth, and were liberal in furnishing the necessary means to defray expenses.

May the Lord reward them liberally in the kingdom of glory.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Editor Restitution:

It has been quite a while since I have written anything for the paper, not that we have lost our interest in the great and glorious truths and principles it advocates and puts forth to a perishing world and an apostate church, we take great pleasure in reading the good sound wholesome lessons of instruction contained in its weekly issues. For sound Bible doctrine, for intelligence, and for ability it not surpassed if equalled in the land, if in the world; and we say with all our heart, and with a full soul, God bless THE RESTITUTION, and its mission, its editor and publishers, its contributors and readers.

This is not intended for a puff; not by any manner of means, but to show our appreciation of a paper that has the noble godly manliness to stand forth in the last days of Gentileism, and the apostasy of a fallen church, and publish the truth, openly alleging and affirming there is one God the Eternal Father; and one Lord Jesus the Christ, the Son of the Living God; that the words of God as uttered by prophets, Christ and his holy apostles, are true being inspired, being the utterances of the Holy Spirit, which proceeds and comes forth from God the Eternal Father, that all in Adam are under the penalty of the law—death; that all in Christ will come forth from the sleep of death to immortality and eternal life.

Sublimely great and glorious are these sayings, doctrines, and principles, recorded in the Scriptures of truth—the word of God, and tenaciously held and advocated in our beloved RESTITUTION, and while I write my prayer ascends to the God of heaven that they may never be tampered with, nor the standard lowered to suit the theories of designing men.

What we most need is holy godly living and doing; what a power of strength would even the little flock be able to wield, if we were as devoted and as self-sacrificing as the apostolic or primitive churches! If we are to be judged by our works how little do we realize the injunction of being holy, harmless, undefiled and separate from sinners, to deal justly, to love mercy and to walk humbly with God. Did you ever read that none but the pure in heart will ever see God—that he that putteth out his money on usury will not enter into the hill of the Lord; that he that hath this world's goods, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion, the love of God does not dwell in such a heart; that no covetous man which is an idolator can enter the kingdom of God; that they that will be rich fall into a snare, and many hurtful lusts, which drown men's souls in perdition.

My dear brethren, we have fallen on evil times; the tendency is to apostacy, to Gentileism, to worldly-mindedness and luke-warmness, it will be of God's infinite mercy if he does not spew us out of his mouth. Contrast the great light we have, our calling and our works. He is coming and will reward every man as his works shall be.

Behold I come as a thief.

NEWELL BOND.

Editor Restitution:

It has been some time since I have written anything for THE RESTITUTION, thinking it were better to fill the space from abler hands than mine. But I often think of that beautiful little piece of poetry that should be a lesson to us all:

What if a little ray of light
Should in its fountain stay,
Because its little light alone
Could not create a day.

What if a little rain should say,
So small a drop as I
Can ne'er refresh those thirsty fields,
I'll tarry in the sky.

Doth not each raindrop help to form
Those cool refreshing showers,
And every ray of light to warm
And beautify the flowers?

So let every one that names the name of Christ, depart from all iniquity, and not enclose their light under a bushel, but let it so shine that others seeing our good works, may glorify our Father in heaven.

The time to work in the Master's vineyard is short. The signs are ominous, and soon the waiting and ready Church of God will be caught away, to meet their Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

Oh happy thought! Oh glorious day! when all the saints of God shall arise from their dusty beds, clad in the habiliments of glory and immortality, forever freed from sickness, sorrow, pain, and death, and forever glow with the eternal youth, and enjoy the rapturous vision of our blessed Jesus seated upon his jasper throne in all the glory of his Father and the holy angels. And the glory of God, like a moulten sea, shall bathe that immortal company.

Then there shall be no more curse, but the whole groaning creation shall be brought back to its pristine beauty and loveliness, and all presided over by the risen and glorified Son of our God.

May the writer and reader so order our lives that we may be among that happy number that shall be redeemed out of every nation, kindred, tongue and people, and have the honor to tread the golden streets of the New Jerusalem, and forever bask in the sunlight of eternal glory!

EUREKA, Wis.

Editor Restitution:

In nearly every paper we see death notices of loved ones gone to long rest, loved ones that we have been obliged to say a last long farewell to.

We are apt to take but little heed of them when we have not been afflicted in the same way. But when we have recently been called to part with a loved one, it awakens a sympathising chord of sorrow!

It is my painful duty to record the death of our sister, Mary A. Frank, aged 35 years, wife of F. G. Frank, and eldest daughter of J. P. and M. M. Jaeger, of Eureka, Wis.

She died Aug. 28, 1881, at her home in Columbus, O., (where she had resided since April, 1879,) of typhoid malarial fever, after a short illness of one week. She leaves a husband and three children, one a babe of four months, father, mother, brothers, sisters, to mourn her loss, besides many friends.

We can truly say, those that knew her best loved her most. She was united with the Church of God in her twentieth year, since which time she has lived a happy Christian life, and died in hope of soon meeting with us all. We laid her to rest in the Green Lawn Cemetery of Columbus, Ohio.

May heavenly angels guard well the spot
Where our dear Mary lies;
And in the resurrection morn
God grant that she may rise.

TERRIFIC WEATHER ON THE ATLANTIC.

QUEENSTOWN, Oct. 21.—The American line steamer Lord Gough, Capt. Hughes, from Philadelphia Oct. 9 for Liverpool, has arrived here short of coal. She reports terrific weather on the Atlantic.

Much damage is being done by the prevailing gale on the Irish coast.

Peace is reported to have been restored in Ireland by the Government's proclamation against the Land League, but it is probably a smothered volcano.

THE WAR IN TUNIS.

TUNIS, Oct. 21.—The Bey on the 18th inst. received a letter from the Cadi, the Mufti, and principal inhabitants of Kairwan, declaring their willingness to surrender the town, but solemnly protesting against its bombardment on account of any resistance offered by Arabs outside the walls. The Bey immediately sent the letter to M. Roustan, the French Minister. Meanwhile the resistance of the Arabs to the advancing columns is unabated. The Bey has again declared his intention of abdicating if Premier Mustapha is not reinstated. He has sent an emissary to Paris in connection with the same subject.

A party of insurgents plundered a caravan proceeding from Kairwan to Sfax, and obtained an enormous amount of booty.

TUNIS, Oct. 20.—The insurgents have carried off 4,000 sheep around Susa. Medina is threatened. Ali Bey has been ordered to march from Mestour to Zaghouan. Two of the principal inhabitants of Kairwan have arrived here and had a prolonged interview with Gen. Etienne.

FORTY NIHILISTS TO BE TRIED.

ST. PETERSBURG, Oct. 20.—Another great political trial is expected to take place here in November, when forty Nihilists will be arraigned.

The Mississippi river at some points above and below St. Louis, being overflowed on both the Illinois and Missouri sides, is at present all the way from five to ten miles wide. Much damage is being done to farm property, and serious delays are caused on some of the railroads.

Selections.

THE following is from an old paper. Does it, to some extent, explain that fiery condition of the atmosphere that was such a marked feature of the great fires in Chicago and Peshtigo ten years ago, and that was again so destructibly noticeable in the late terrible conflagration that raged in Michigan? See in this connection the account of that dreadful fire, as taken from the Detroit Free Press, which was published in our last paper. These fires are warnings of impending doom:—

INFLAMMABLE ELEMENTS.

Some people suppose that a time will come when "the heavens will be on fire," while others ridicule the idea of such an event, supposing it to be inconsistent with the established laws of nature; yet there is one view of the subject which makes it appear miraculous that such an event has not occurred long ago. The fact has already become familiar with people of ordinary intelligence, that a mixture of hyrogen gas, with common atmospheric air, is highly inflammable, and will burn with a greater or less degree of violence, according to the quantity of hydrogen in the compound. It is also well known, that there is a constant emission of hydrogen from vegetation, and from the decomposition of various substances; and that this gas, being extremely light and buoyant, has a tendency to rise to the surface of the atmosphere. There is therefore no reason to doubt that immense quantities of this inflammable compound abound in the upper regions of the air, and that nothing more than a spark of electric fire would be required to envelope the world in flames. The only circumstance which has hitherto prevented such conflagration, is that the region of concentrative and excitable electricity is several miles below that of the inflammable air. Yet there are no defined laws or theory to show any security against the occurrence of an aerial conflagration at any moment.

COMMIT THY WAYS TO GOD.

Reflection will teach a man that he should trust himself to the guidance of some superior being; and reason unites with revelation to tell us to commit thy ways to the Lord. Human life is such a journey that man needs a guide and provider. It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps.

Men are entirely ignorant of the future; hence, since we know not what our circumstances will be, ourselves cannot form the plans which shall be best to be adopted. Every man may say in verity, thus far in life hath the Lord helped me. Our own present condition and that of all others, is utterly and entirely a way that was unknown to ourselves. The great and blessed God has been our conductor, though unseen, and it may be, unacknowledged. Ought we not then, to acknowledge him, and commit our ways to him?

Time is an ocean, and each person's life a voyage. Its tossings and hearings, its tempests and innumerable perils, should plainly tell to each voyager that himself cannot steer his frail and tempest-tossed bark. He needs a pilot, if he would make the port of safety; he needs a helmsman other than himself. Let him commit his ways to God.

The world is a wilderness—a dark and thorny desert. Shall the traveler attempt to tread it its wilds alone? Let him remember, it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. He has not been that way before, and does he not need a guide? Fellow-traveler, the only proper guide is God; to him let us commit our ways. It is rational and safe.

Voyager, traveler, by prayer commit thy ways to God. Venture not alone upon such an ocean, through such a wilderness. Thou canst not guide thine own bark—thou canst not direct thine own steps; every morning and evening ask wisdom of God.

Brevities.

Among the manuscripts lately acquired by the library of the Athenian Chambers is a roll of thick paper about a finger in width and a thousand feet long, on which the various anagrams of the name Constantinople are written. These different anagrams are arranged in alphabetical order and amount to no less than 49,135. This roll was written apparently in England in the last century.

The cholera is spreading in the East and advancing toward Europe. It has already made considerable ravages at Aden, and has reached Mecca, where the Mussulmans are imploring their Prophet. Two other epidemics attract serious attention. The first is the yellow fever in Senegal, where the number of victims has been great, and the second diphtheria, which has killed more people in the south of Russia than any other epidemic, not excepting the plague. It has prevailed there since 1872. In Bessarabia, 15,000 out of 36,000 persons who were attacked have succumbed to it. Out of 46,000 cases, 19,000 ended fatally, and in Kharkoff, out of 29,000 cases there have been 17,000 deaths.

The disasters to life and property wrought in the interior of China by typhoons have been very great. A village named Shetoshe, in the Kew district, was completely swept away by the floods, and all of the inhabitants drowned. A steam launch was dispatched to the locality, and upward of two hundred bodies recovered. The typhoon passed over Foochow, doing great damage to the foreign town and the native shipping. The German bark Caroline Behn was completely wrecked, and the British steamer Castello, from Shanghai to Yokohama, put back with her cargo on fire.

A CITY RUINED.

Damascus has been ruined by the opening of the Suez Canal. The overland trade, both Oriental and European, by caravan with Bagdad and Persian Gulf has been diverted to the water-way. The competition of India and China in silk and sesame seed through the canal has sensibly affected the value of these products; the late discovery of alizarine has rendered valueless the cultivation of madder for export, and the diversion of large numbers of Moslem pilgrims from all parts of the East, who had hitherto made Damascus their point of arrival and departure, with much profit to the city, to the sea route by the canal, has contributed in no small degree to its downward progress. House rent has declined 30 to 50 per cent., and large numbers of empty houses in every part of the city indicate the general decline. The streets are filled with beggars, both Moslem and Christian, and that, too, in a city where eighteen months before a beggar was a rarity. The more elevated districts of Lebanon, which formerly contributed the principal portion of mendicants during the winter months, have this year sent double the number to swell the amount of local indigence. The far-famed eye of the East is now dull and fruitless.

According to a writer in Nature, the small migratory birds that are unable to perform the flight of 350 miles across the Mediterranean Sea are carried over on the backs of cranes. In the autumn many flocks of cranes may be seen coming from the north with the first cold blast from that quarter, flying low and uttering a peculiar cry, as if of alarm, as they circle over the cultivated plains. Little birds of every species may be seen flying up to them, while the twittering songs of those already comfortably settled upon their backs may be distinctly heard. But for this kind of provision for nature, numerous varieties of small birds would become extinct in northern countries, as the cold winters would kill them.

A great conflagration is believed to have raged more than three hundred years ago in the coal-beds near Pictou, Nova Scotia. Pictou is an Indian word for fire; and besides a tradition of the conflagration preserved among the Indians, there are abundant evidences of it in the vitrified minerals and ashes discovered near the surface. One of these beds of ashes, which was under large, old trees, was found on opening a pit, at the depth of thirty feet, to have retained a heat of 80 degrees, while the surface varied from 45 to 66 degrees. Soon after the air was let in the ashes cooled. It is well known that the earth retains heat well and long, and this quality is of great importance to both animal and vegetable life; but for a bed of ashes, surrounded by earth and covered by vegetation, to have retained heat upwards of three hundred years is something marvellous.

A ROPE OF HUMAN HAIR.

In his detail of Indian horrors that came under his notice Markley, the New Mexico Indian killer, stated that in 1867 he gave an Indian a half a dollar for a rope ten feet in length and about the size of his little finger. He untwisted the end and found that it was made of red, auburn and black hair, which, from the length of each hair, was evidently that of women. He questioned the Indian, who told him that the rope was made from the hair of the women and girls slain in the Mountain Meadow massacre, for complicity with which murder John D. Lee, the Mormon, was tried and shot a few years ago. The place where he purchased the rope was at Paleronsgote, sixty-five miles from Mountain Meadow, where the most harrowing and brutal massacre of modern times occurred.

OLIVE CULTURE IN GEORGIA.

We have in our office three olive twigs, each bearing an olive of the genus Olea. They are of the veritable commercial olive of oriental celebrity, and were imported from the Mount of Olives, a mountain of Palestine celebrated in Biblical history, and a few hundred yards east of Jerusalem. These olives were grown on Mr. F. D. Thornton's place from trees originally imported by Mr. John Mulford, the horticulturist. In the Atlantic States the olive was introduced before the Revolution and at several times since, and is perfectly hardy and fruitful in South Carolina. The chief obstacle to its cultivation seems to be the fact that its crop matures just at the time when all the labor is needed to secure the cotton. It has lanceolate or lance-oblong leaves, which are pale green above and rather whitish beneath. The fruit is used for various purposes, but principally as a fruit for oil. The fruit is too bitter to be eaten unless pickled, and varies in size from an acorn to a large plum. The specimen sent us is of the genus Olea and of the fruit Europea.

THE BABY ARTHUR.

To Mr. and Mrs. Bridge.

S. ROXANA WINGE.

Ah fairest thing of things all fair
Is this wee miniature of man:
A bud of hope that promise gives
Of blessed fruitage in the years to be
When childhood's days are gone.
And all the battles fought that lie
Between the time of play, and hour of victory.

The months are few
That count above his head,
And naught of all their clouds or rain
Are seen upon his sunny brow,
No passion there has left a trace;
Nothing but joy and light serene
Look out from his soft eyes. A guest
He seems, from some angelic sphere,
With precious gifts of love and grace
To us ertan our dull lives and make Us better men and women. Well
May we from full hearts bless the day
That brought him here, and better still
Return in thanks and praise
Our gratitude to God. His hand
It was that sent the child. His hand
It was that fashioned it so fair;
He willed it free from common faults
Of falsehood, placing within
The joyous spirit that o'erleaps
The pain of loneliness, and fear
At mother's absence. The sweet content,
The patient study of the curious toy
That dainty fingers seek to find
The uses for, by turning round and round;
The impulse nature warm and kind
That sparkles in tender kisses on our cheeks,
The gifts that make our baby good
And fair, are gifts from him.
This being so, we prize the child
The more, and strive together that it be
The worthier for his sake who gave.
And oh, we pray no deed or word
Of ours may ever mar, or lead
To sin, but looking on our lives,
May it find pattern just, whereby
To fashion all its being true
For three: that pleasing thee in all,
At last it come to walk the courts,
And dwell within the walls of city fair
Where never sorrow nor decay shall come!

Westminster Abbey--Continued.

O. O. MARSTON.

The coronation of all the kings and queens of England have taken place in the Abbey; and even when a monarch had been crowned previously in another place, as in the case of Henry III., whose coronation took place at Gloucester, it was thought proper to have the ceremony again gone through at Westminster, in the presence of the nobles, and the chief ecclesiastical dignitaries of the land; the archbishop always officiating in the august ceremonial.

The solemn offices of crowning and enthroning the sovereigns of England take place in the center of the sacrarium, and beneath the lantern is erected the throne at which the peers do homage.

When the crowns are put on, the peers and peeresses put on their coronets, and a signal is given from the top of the Abbey for the Tower guns to fire at the same instant.

The "coronation chair" in which the sovereigns of England have been crowned for several centuries is a rude, substantial, hard wood, piece of furniture which shows no signs of decay, and will doubtless be good for service many centuries more.

The dimensions of the Abbey are, length 531 feet, breadth 203, height of the tower 225 feet, height of ceiling 102 feet.

Let us take a stroll through this magnificent room. The main building as every one knows is in the form of a Roman cross. The transverse piece is what is called the transept. The upright piece corresponds with what is called the nave, and the upper projection with the choir. The choir of a cathedral is not the portion allotted to the singers and musicians, but is a portion of the building separated from the rest by an iron fence and appointed for the use of the officiating clergyman, from which through an iron gate he enters his "stall" or pulpit, which stands usually at the juncture of the choir and one wing of the transept. It was my privilege to occupy a seat in the choir in Westminster during the afternoon service June 26, 1881. The Abbey was packed, hundreds of people standing in the aisles during the entire service. Dr. Jowett Master of Baliol College, Oxford, preached from the simple text, "God is love," one of the most profound and learned sermons I ever heard, during the delivery of which certainly one-half of his vast audience were most profoundly sleeping. But who could be blamed for sleeping in such a sepulchre. The music and the responsive exercises were exquisite.

The most interesting and curious thing about the choir is the iron screen which separates it from the nave. It is said to be "one of the most remarkable specimens of ancient art that now remains."

This elaborate performance is constructed in the pointed style of architecture; and, independently of its highly enriched niches and architraves, its possesses a sculptured frieze on which the principal events, both real and imaginary, of Edward the Confessor's life, are represented in alto-relievo. These are displayed in fourteen compartments, separated from each other by an equal number of irregularly shaped quatrefoils. The designs for these singular sculptures have been chiefly deduced from Ailred's account of the Life and Miracles of King Edward, which was written in the time of Henry III., and presented to that monarch by Abbot Laurence on the very day (A. D. 1163) when, in honor of his recent canonization, the Confessor's remains were removed into a new shrine.

In the south aisle of the nave is a monument to John Andre, the British spy who was executed in 1780. It is a sarcophagus. The bass relief represents the flag of truce being borne to General Washington.

In the baptistry is a beautiful statue of the poet laureate William Wordsworth, he died in 1850. The statue represents the poet in a thoughtful mood sitting on a hillock. The following lines suitably describe the churchly surroundings of this marble representation of the great poet.

"Blest be the Church, that watching o'er the seeds
Of infancy, provides a timely shower,
Whose virtue changes to a Christian flower,
A growth from sinful Nature's bed of weeds!
Fittest beneath the sacred roof proceeds
The inhibitation—while parental love
Looks on, and Grace descends the front above,
As the high service quickens now, now pleads.
There should rebellious thoughts unpress their wings
And fly
To covert the coming hours of frolal mirth.
The tombs which hear and answer that brief cry,
The instant notice of the second birth,
Recall the wandering soul to sympathy
With what man hopes from heaven, but fears earth."

In the west end of the nave is a beautiful monument to one of England's greatest Prime Ministers, the Rt. Hon. Wm. Pitt. The Great Commoner is represented robed as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the act of addressing the House, while History personified as a female catching his portrait, is seated on one side; and Anarchy personified as a man, naked, and bound with chains on the other. The monument was erected at government expense costing many thousands of dollars.

In the north aisle of the nave are many striking monuments, among them should be noticed the statue and sarcophagus of Sir Isaac Newton, where death occurred 185 years ago. The statue is surrounded by books; above is a figure of astronomy sitting on a celestial globe; the reliefs emblematize Newton's various discoveries.

The finest external view of the Abbey is from Victoria Road looking eastward. The massive gothic towers that adorn the west end of the Abbey give this end of the building an imposing appearance. Seen from the north side or east end it has more the appearance of a vast pile of buildings than of a single structure.

The Dean of Westminster Abbey is the most influential and responsible officer in the English Church. He is required to be a man of wide learning, and extensive experience. And yet, aside from conducting a weekly afternoon service in the Abbey, his duties consist almost wholly in deciding who shall, and who shall not, be accorded the honorable distinction of a burial niche in this royal old sepulchre.

I cannot better close this brief sketch than with the following lines from Waller:

"That antique pile behold,
Where royal heads receive the sacred gold;
It gives them crowns, and does their ashes keep.
There made like gods, like mortals there they sleep.
Making the circle of their reign complete.
These sons of empire, where they rise, they set!"

CALIFORNIA CONFERENCE REPORT.

Pursuant to notice, the annual Conference of the Church of God of California, met this 26th day of September, 1881. Brother William Wishart called the Conference to order, briefly stating the object of our meeting, and nominating for chairman, O. Stone, who was duly elected.

The method of raising funds to defray expenses incurred by the Conference, namely, by voluntary subscription, was approved; and it was ordered that the necessary blanks be made out by the secretary and sent as follows:—To Bangor, Stockton, O. Stone, Healdsburg, and Willow Slough.

At the second convening of the Conference, Brother Stone was absent, and Brother H. H. Spott was called to the chair.

The treasurer reported a balance of forty-six dollars in the Conference fund.

R. Corbaley reported that asthma had considerably interfered with his evangelical labors; that "during the year quite a number have become interested in hearing the gospel, and some have become obedient." He also recommended that when a meeting is progressing, it should be continued as long as the interest manifested indicated that good results may be achieved.

The following officers were elected for the incoming year:—

Treasurer, C. M. Hiddleson; Financial Secretary, W. H. Ludden; Evangelist, R. Corbaley.

Wm. N. Gladden, of Healdsburg, and O. Stone, of Sacramento, were appointed as a committee to select the time and place, and to make other necessary arrangements for the next annual Conference.

During the meeting, several able discourses were delivered by R. Corbaley on various Scriptural themes; one, also, by B. Wilson, on "The Past, Present, and Future Dispensations." On Thursday evening a masterly paraphrase of Psa. lxxii, was given by William Dresser.

The fruit of our labors is not yet manifest, except in the edification and instruction of all the brethren present, and in their encouragement to continue the proclamation of the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, in joyful anticipation of the soon-coming One. But the seed is sown: "God gives the increase," the harvest is sure.

Respectfully submitted,

A. E. HUDDLESON, Sec'y.

Give the man such a heart as the Son of Man described in the beatitudes and a whole universe of sorrow cannot rob him of his blessedness.

There is a sort of economy in the ways of Providence, that one shall excel where another is defective, in order to make men more useful to each other, and mix them in society.—Addison.

A Christian is a Christ-man; just change the i to an m. Paul's idea of man was three-fold: out of Christ, or in a state of nature; in Christ, a state of grace, and with Christ, a state of glory.—Chas. S. Robinson.

Has thy night been dark and dreary?—
Has no ray of light appeared?
Has thy way been long and weary?—
Has no hope thy bosom cheered?
Trust in Jesus' saving power—
Then shalt have thy triumph hour.

Remember that Truth commonly goes in russet and Error in purple. The sober judgment which cannot be seduced by the glitter of false ideas, hides itself in by-ways among low, humdrum people, while Error envelops itself in alluring sophistries that captivate brilliant men and women. Do not deny this until you have well thought of it, and then you will not deny it.—O. B. Bunce

Revenge is a momentary triumph, in which the satisfaction dies at once, and is succeeded by remorse; whereas forgiveness, which is the noblest of all revenge, entails a perpetual pleasure.

Quiet as a peaceful river,
Quiet as when tempests crash,
In Jehovah trusting ever,
We are kept in perfect peace:
I'll not ask Him what thou doest,
Whatsoe'er it be, 'tis right!
Thou our Friend, of friends the truest,
Will sustain 'midst storm and night.

Revelation, like nature, is larger than our largest knowledge of it; and whenever one finishes his system of thought, and closes up all its definitions he is sure to have left some truth out.—Newman Smyth.

O, tears and sorrow are plenty enough,
Storms may be bitter and paths be rough,
But our tears should fall like the dear earth's showers,
That help to ripen the fruits and flowers.
—Wide Awake.

The human soul, as it exists, can be made perfect only through struggle and suffering. Nowhere else have these elements so beneficent an office as in the case of man. The higher manifestations of character spring almost entirely from the soil of sorrow. If we should strike out from human history the heroic and saintly characters that have been born from suffering, all that is noble and reverent in it would depart. If we should strike from literature all to which sorrow has given birth, its inspiration would perish forever. Even the presence of death has brought a solemn tenderness and dignity into human affection, which had otherwise been impossible. Virtue, too, acquires sturdiness only from resisted temptations; and even mind itself grows only through obstacle and resistance.—R. P. Bowne.

Truth will never die; stars will grow dim, the sun will pale his glory, but truth will be forever young. Integrity, uprightness, honesty, love, goodness—these are all imperishable. No grave can ever entomb these immortal principles. They have been in prison, but they have been free than before; those who have enshrined them in their hearts have burned at the stake, but out of their ashes other witnesses have arisen. No sea can drown, no storm can wreck, no abyss can swallow up, the ever-living truth of God. You cannot kill goodness, and truth, and integrity, and faith, and holiness; the way that is consistent with these must be a way everlasting.—Spurgeon.

THE BIBLE.

People, open that book, turn—and a single leaf,
Nor on its pages look with an eye or indolent;
Close my fore father's stay in an hour of agony;
People, go thy way, and let that old book be.

That good old book of life, for centuries has stood,
Unharmed amid the strife, when the earth was drunk with blood:
And wouldst thou harm it now, and have its truths forgot?
Sceptic, forbear thy hand, thy hand shall harm it not!

A lonely dove wings its flight over the waste of waters that sweep round and round a deluged world, finding no rest anywhere for the sole of its feet. How its circles about that one solitary ark of shelter which floats on a shoreless ocean, wearied and beaten with the winds, rain and tempest, ready to perish, until at last the window is opened and the hand of Noah is put forth, and the bird is taken in! Thou art like that dove, if thou hast not yet come to Christ, and been taken into the heart of his love.—Canon Bell.

HOLD ON.

If your hand's on the plow, hold on, hold on;
Though the soil may be sterile and hard,
The plowshare will make
The fallow ground break,
And the plowman will have his reward.

Earth's bosom will sparkle with emerald green,
And its grain will be golden kings!
The reapers will come
With loud "Harvest Home,"
And the gleaners will joyfully sing.

It would be an idle task for one, standing beside his strawberry bed in June, to try to determine how much of its matchless flavor the scarlet fruit owed to a congenial soil, how much to moist mulchings, how much to timely showers how much to the kissing of the sunshine. Yet that would be an easier task than to determine the relative potency of the multitude of influences that have a hand in shaping personal character. We are apt to think that sermons and lectures and newspapers and Bible-classes and mass-meetings and magistrates must do most of the work of making men and women what they ought to be. We have great faith nowadays in machinery. But if it were possible to pick out all the interwoven influences that have given form and color to the fabric of personal character, probably every one of us would be surprised to see how much, in his own case, is due to the life and character of the men and women whom he has known—men and women, too, who have never exhorted him or elbowed him, but simply lived their faithful lives before him.—Good Company.

A NEW PAPER FOR OUR CHILDREN

The YOUTHS' EXAMINER

C. H. JONES, Publisher, Chicago, Ill.

MONTHLY. - - EIGHT PAGES.

SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER YEAR.

Give your children meat for reading matter, then they will be satisfied and not be anxious to read trash. The publisher of "The Youths' Examiner" will use every endeavor to make for the children and youth an interesting paper—not one they will partially read from a sense of duty,—but something they will read because they are interested.

EVERY NUMBER ILLUSTRATED

And printed on heavy book paper, and gotten up in an artistic manner. The following is placed at the head of the Editorial columns:

The Youths' Examiner will be devoted to the instruction of our children, in those branches that will not only enlarge their intellectual faculties but strengthen and build up their moral and religious natures. Its exposition of Bible topics will be based upon what is known as the literal view of the prophecies. The mortal nature of man, the reign of Christ and his saints on the earth, etc., etc. The doctrine of the stone-cut, and life only through Christ will be plainly set forth, and every effort be made to bring these great Bible truths before them in a language both simple and truthful. Easy lessons in chaos and other important branches will from time to time be given, accompanied with suitable illustrations.

It contains some stories, but only those that contain practical truth and information.

We send the paper to every subscriber from the time of receiving the order until January 1st, 1883.

The GOSPEL of the KINGDOM

Advocated in a series of Ten Discourses

—BY WILEY JONES.—

OPINIONS OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy in most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for cost and perusal in the important information that it will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 14, 1879.

"It evinces a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scripture, and uniform courtesy toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York, Nov. 29, 1881.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested merely, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are second to none in importance to us. * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and convincing way, should buy this book."—The Rural Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 17, 1879.

"I have read it diligently again and again, * * It is next in point of excellence and doctrinal truths to the Book of books."—D. M. L., Mo.

"I do not know that I have ever seen from the pen of any modern writer, a plainer exhibit of the gospel of the kingdom and at the same time one better suited to general instruction on that subject, than that which brother Jones gives us in his book, 'The Gospel of the Kingdom, advocated in a series of Ten Discourses.'"—R. "THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXX. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, NOVEMBER 2, 1881. NO. 41.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final annihilation of all the wicked, which God has spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." It is a mistake to think otherwise. The establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal restoration of the land; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked (both) life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE.

Its Proximity. Sixth, or Second Woe Trumpet, Continued. Four Angels. Their Mission. Horsemen. History of the Ottoman Empire, Continued.

No. 89.

J. P. WEETHER.

Four Angels—Their Armies, Mission and Duration.—We have explained the four sultanics to be the usual divisions of the Mahometan empire. The loosing is the removal of all national restrictions, and their union under one chief. These characteristics we have considered; also the fact that the Turkish armies were usually horsemen. We have likewise considered the uniforms of these noted warriors, especially their three national colors, scarlet, blue, and yellow. The horses have been described, and their agency. There seems to be quite a resemblance between the locusts and these horsemen; so likewise is there an analogy between the Arab and the Turk, personally and officially. The Arabian empire was raised to do a preliminary work against the Greek empire, to hurt apostates five months (150 years). To the Turkish empire was given an advanced agency, to slay the third of men (the Greek division of the Roman empire), for an hour, a day, and a month, and a year (391 years and 15 days). Both agents were prepared to execute their commissions. How the Arabian did his work we have already seen. We have also traced the Turk through his centuries of restriction; and have followed him through his terrible struggles for freedom; and have traced him in his preparations for the great work of his mission, the national overthrow of the Greek empire, and his terrible warfare against the Eastern or Greek apostasy. We have traced the history of the Ottoman empire till it is seated on the imperial throne of Constantinople, the Eastern seven-hilled city; and have seen the Crescent triumph over the Cross.

Before we commence the onward history, allow us to notice some views of the second woe, advanced by distinguished expositors.

All of the great interpreters have agreed that this prediction refers to the Turks; but they vary as to its chronology. Some say that the time 391 years and 15 days, or an hour, a day, a month, and a year, simply means an appointed time; but as it (time) is heard in vision, and measures certain acts of an empire, we are inclined to the year-day view. No other interpretation can cover the appointed agency of that empire. How absurd to select only thirteen and one-half months and one literal hour from the history of the Turkish empire, and leave centuries, equally bloody, without notice!

We must keep in view that John's visions are a chart of history (prophetic) from his banishment to the return of Christ, and subjugation of the earth to its rightful heir; and, if any part of the Apocalyptic visions extend to the second advent, that line will be found in the trumpets. The trumpets are war symbols, and extend to that period when national wars shall come to an end. On the chronology of the sixth trumpet, (its commencement and termination), wise men may differ; the language is, perhaps, not sufficiently explicit.

"Which are prepared for an hour, a day, a month, and a year, to slay the third part of men."

Is this death national?

If so, it must commence at the fall of the Greek empire, when Constantinople was taken by Mahomet the second, May 29, 1453. If it means personal death, it could have had a beginning as early as A. D. 1281. Bagster and others have the following:—

"It is wonderfully remarkable that the first conquest mentioned in history, of the Othmans over the Christians, was in the year of Christ, 1281; and in 1672, Mohammed IV. took Camenise from the Poles, with 48 towns and villages, which were delivered up to the sultan upon the treaty of peace."

We are inclined to the opinion that national death is included in the expression, and that the killing begins with the fall of the Greek empire, A. D. May 29, 1453. The prophetic time (391 years and 15 days) would extend to the summer of 1844.

Did the Turkish empire lose its supremacy about that time?

By supremacy we understand, supreme control, within itself, over all the provinces of its own dominions; the power to put down all domestic rebellion.

Between A. D. 1832 and A. D. 1842, an event took place in the Ottoman empire, which compelled that power to call to her aid the powers of Europe:—a rebellion in Egypt under Mehemet Ali. The following are some of the facts:—

In 1811, Mehemet Ali massacred all the Mamelukes, who had governed Egypt for 400 years. Mehemet Ali ruled Egypt with more prudence and wisdom. Under his government, Egypt grew in wealth and civilization.

"Though nominally subject to the Porte, he made wide conquests and rendered himself virtually independent. The sultan watched his growing power with increasing jealousy, and in 1832 sent a powerful army against him. The Turks were unsuccessful, and Ibrahim Pacha, Mehemet's son and victorious general, was on the march for Constantinople, when the European powers interfered and forced a peace. In 1840, the sultan thinking himself strong enough, resumed hostilities. Again the Egyptians annihilated his armies, and again the powers of Europe came to his rescue. By a treaty signed July 15, 1841, Mehemet Ali was stripped of all his conquests in Asia, but the government of Egypt was insured to him as a tributary to Turkey, and made hereditary in his descendants."—Cottage Cyclopedia of History and Biography.

Every national struggle of the Turkish empire since that day develops the same great fact, that her supremacy in Europe, at least, has departed. In the Crimean war the Ottoman empire would have been annihilated had not England and France interposed the most powerful armies. This was too soon for its overthrow and Russia was driven back.

The late Turko-Russian war would have driven the Turkish power across the Hellespont, had not the English navy prevented it. The Mohametan empire takes a part in the final struggle; and, therefore, cannot fall before that day. The protectorate of England prevents such a result.

The history of the Ottoman empire from the fall of Constantinople, A. D. May 29, 1453, to 1841–4, induces us to believe that the sixth trumpet does not date back of the sultany of Mahomet II. That being granted, we are to look for the death work of the Ottoman empire in the four centuries following the fall of the Greek capital.

One remark is worthy of special notice, without entering into particulars:—

From the time that the seat of the Turkish empire was fixed at Constantinople to the present time, the wars of the Turks have been principally with those nations professing Christianity, either such as belong to the apostate Greek or Latin church. Principally Poland, Germany, and Russia.

The events of 391 years are exceedingly interesting; but, for the present we shall not trouble the reader with anything further than the concluding language of the trumpet.

"And the rest of mankind, which were not killed with these plagues, repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils (demons) and the idols of gold, and of silver, and of brass, and of stone, and of wood; which can neither hear, nor see, nor walk; and they repented not of their murders, nor of their sorceries, nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts."—Revised Version.

The calamities which were inflicted upon the Latin and Greek churches by the Mahometan empire, under the Saracen and the Turk, produced no reformation, as to idol worship. The Mohametan was a unitarian empire—"One God." Had they omitted the false claims of Mahomet, that empire would have been founded upon the first commandment, which the apostate Christians had violated by the multitude of their graven images.

We think that it is perfectly clear, that the first and second woes were inflicted by God, through the agency of the Mahometan empire; and that they were God's judgments inflicted upon the apostacy, which consisted principally in image-worship. This apostate practice produced one of the first divisions among the Christians. They were divided into image-makers and image-breakers—Iconoclastae.

The materials used by image-makers were gold, silver, brass, stone, and wood; and it is very certain that they could neither see, hear, nor walk. That apostate Christians were guilty of the sins here named is equally certain. The history of the apostacy from 1453 to 1844 will establish their idolatry, and their corrupt morals, and, therefore, identifies that people as the body seen by the prophet.

Improvement.—In the conclusion of our remarks on the first two woe trumpets, a few thoughts suggest themselves, which in all sincerity and kindness we shall take the liberty of naming:—

1. Is the Apocalypse a book of practical Christianity? or, is it theoretical?

2. Are the prophecies, in their nature and aim, calculated to elevate, or lower the standard of vital, practical Christianity?

3. What were the characters of the true prophets of God, compared with their cotemporaries?

4. Was Daniel theoretically, or practically occupied, when searching Jeremiah's book relative to the close of the captivity in Babylon? and was his prayer in place?

5. Did Daniel exhibit practical piety in being the recipient of dreams and visions?

6. Would not God have made Daniel a more practical, and a better man by delivering short practical discourses on the proper mode of living, rather than by filling his mind with ocean tempests, wild beasts, and empires?

7. Did the Savior understand practical Christianity, when he occupied the precious moments of his disciples in giving a historical narration of coming events, instead of repeating the moral precepts of his sermon on the Mount?

8. Did he not mistake in what he called "Meat in due season?"

9. Was it the reading of well written, practical sermons on how we are to live, that called out the virgins?

10. Were the churches correct when they said that "we read and talked so much about the Lord's coming as to loose our religion?"

11. Can a wife think and talk so much of her absent husband as to forget his coming, and, therefore, fail to make the necessary preparation?

12. Is it true, the more we talk and write upon what is called practical Christianity, the more our thoughts are occupied with the absorbing theme of Christ's blessed return?

13. Can we look for "that blessed hope" without increasing our knowledge relative to the evidences of his near approach?

14. Can we love his appearing, and dislike to hear and read of that coming?

15. Is it not that the most practical subject that produces the best practice?

16. Was Peter correct in ascribing to the advent such a high practical nature as in 2 Peter iii. 7–18?

17. Was not John mistaken when he said, "And every man that hath this hope (of Christ's return, of seeing him as he is and being with him) in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure" (1 John iii. 4)?

18. Was Christ correct when he said, "Blessed (is) he that readeth and they that hear the words of this prophesy, and keep those things which are written therein; (keep them in our memory and affections) for the time is at hand" (Rev. i. 3)?

19. Would not the Savior have done John a greater favor to have talked to him about practical Christianity, rather than to have filled his mind with such singular visions?

20. Is there anything more practical and useful to the captain of a vessel on unknown and dangerous seas, than a chart on which are delineated every danger, and the way to shun them?

APPROACHING JUDGMENT.

S. BONHOTE.

For behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her dead, and shall no longer cover her slain. Isa. xxvi. 21.

In unfolding the dark pictures of the prophet of God, sad and mournful are the tidings which are announced of the future scene which the earth's populace must realize before that good time which is to follow shall come. It will be a time of trouble and such as never was before, nor ever shall be (Dan. xii. 1; Matt. xxiv. 21); which the inspired prophets foretell with the certainty of a Divine foreknowledge. The epoch is alluded to by nearly all the prophets of God from Moses to Malachi, and by our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles in the New Testament, and which is presented by the prophet Jeremiah (xxi. 15–33) under an image of maddening rage and fury which has scarcely a parallel in the past history of God's terrible judgments upon an ungodly and wicked world.

From time immemorial it has been the practice when men of violence and blood would excite themselves to the commission of desperate deeds of lawlessness, first to resort to the intoxicating cup, and there drown reason and excite passion, until, regardless of every consideration of justice, or mercy, or humanity, they plunged headlong into their career of cruelty, and perpetrated the most horrible barbarities. In allusion to such practice Jeremiah received the following message from the Most High:—

"Thus saith the Lord God of Israel unto me, Take the wine cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations to whom I send thee to drink it, and they shall drink and be moved, and be mad because of the sword that I will send among them."

War in all its horrors is sent as a scourge of God upon the wicked, a judgment for sin; and not only war, but pestilence, famine, inundations, insurrections, cyclones, etc.

"Shall there be evil in the city, i. e., righteous retribution, and the Lord hath not done it?" Amos iii. 6.

Behold I make peace and create evil, saith the Lord. Isa. xlv. 7.

All the elements are but his messengers and ministers, and go and come at his word.

Therefore drink ye, and be ye drunken, and spue, and fall and rise no more, because of the sword which I will send among you. Jer. xxv. 27.

The fact of Jerusalem's overthrow is, therefore, the proof and standing witness of the like retribution which hangs over all the other cities and nations of the world. Obed. v. 16.

The dreadful prophecy which, as an unfulfilled one (Jer. xxv. 31–33) conducts us, in its exposition, into a very chamber of horrors and presents us with sights calculated to sicken the heart; yet as the original of the picture is drawn by inspiration, it was intended for us not merely to look at, but take warning and not hesitate to give the alarm.

The calamities and distresses which shall befall the nations of the earth, immediately preceding the termination of the existing dispensation, are to be divided into several classes.

The word of God teaches us that at the close of this dispensational era of God's government there shall be a total dissolution of the social compact, and an entire rending asunder of all those moral ties which hold society together, and bind man by a common interest to respect each one his neighbor's rights. Undoubtedly the general corruption of society begins always first in the social circle. Insubordination and self-will tolerated in the child, as is to a large extent the case at present, prepare the way for a disregard of law and order in mature age. Bad tempers and a spirit of contradiction in youth, unchecked, produce quarrelsomeness in riper years. The seeds of social disorders are sown in the domestic circle.

The apostle Paul, when first inaugurating the gospel among the Gentiles, tells us (2 Tim. iii.) what will be the final state of this dispensation. Here, then, is a group of moral, or rather immoral, attributes, embracing nineteen particulars, and which are declared to be the common characteristics of these last days; and what must be the social condition when nineteen virtues have been eradicated from the heart, and as many opposing vices installed in power?

Such a total annihilation of all the social virtues will soon prepare the way for the fall of the moral virtues. Accordingly, we find that the lower forms of sensuality such as gluttony, and wantonness, and drunkenness, become general. Brewers in the United States have manufactured in 1880 twelve million barrels of beer. The use of intoxicating drinks in this land, exclusive of beer, cost in twelve months the round sum of more than twelve hundred millions of dollars. Hence, our Lord compares the period just previous to his second coming to that preceding the flood and the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, which were times of astounding sensuality, moral pollution, and debauchery. Luke xvii. 26–30. Sad prospect, surely, for believers in human progress, and the perfectibility of man!

Then we have religious feuds. Deceivers shall inspire their followers with a religious fanaticism which shall know no toleration. Such as have already laid waste and destroyed those who would not embrace their delusions. Mohammed who put to sword those who would not submit to his imposture is an example. And the Roman Pontiffs, who ordered fifty millions of Protestants to be tortured, slain, and burnt. Lest one should say these things belong to the past, look at Mormonism in our own day, and in the very midst of civilization on both sides of the Atlantic; can any one doubt that power is all that is wanting for this false prophet to violently subjugate mankind to his imposture. Be not deceived: Satan is the ruling spirit of every great deceiver.

Take the political disturbances. Despotism is seeking to overthrow democracies, and democracy to uproot despotism. The uprising of all nations, distracted by religious feuds and embittered by political antagonisms, shall proceed from that judicial infatuation which God shall send upon them as a punishment for their sins. From the cup of his indignation which he makes them to drink, they shall be mad as the Prophet says, (Jer. xxv.) because of the sword which he will send among them. Out of that state of, first social disorganization, and secondly, religious strife, horrid war will naturally arise. The passions being let loose and Divine restraint withdrawn, men will rush to arms and lay waste each other's lands. In connection with the scourge of war and political distractions all over the earth, comes an immediate succession of ills, in the form of pestilence, famine and earthquake. It is a remarkable fact in the history of the nations that all great political convulsions and subversion of empires have been attended with physical disasters and temporal catastrophes.

Gibbon informs us that about the time of the overthrow of the Roman empire, a plague which arose on the borders of the Nile, spread over the whole of Europe and parts of Asia, swept away nearly two-thirds of the population of those regions, and that so great was the mortality that the order of funerals and sepulture was confounded; that the dead lay unburied in the streets; that at Constantinople for three months five, and at length ten thousand persons died each day; that many cities were left without an inhabitant; that the decrease of the human species in some of the fairest regions of the globe has never been repaired, and while this desolating scourge was spreading, some of the most destructive earthquakes of which history gives any record took place; that Constantinople was shaken above forty days; that two hundred and fifty thousand persons perished at Antioch; that Beyrout, with its whole teeming population, was destroyed, and multitudes in various lands were slain; and that to add to the judgments and miseries of that time, famine followed with all its horrors.

Such were the calamities which took place when the fourth beast of Daniel was about being dismembered and divided into ten kingdoms.

Chio in the Grecian Archipelago, the birthplace of Homer, was on April 4, 1881, visited by a terrible earthquake. Nearly the whole of the principal town, containing sixteen thousand inhabitants was destroyed, only fifty houses being left standing; and no less than thirty villages reduced to mere heaps of ruins. Between six and seven hundred persons were killed, and twenty-five per cent of the survivors injured. The population of Chessane, on the Island, amounted to seventy thousand, of whom forty thousand were reduced to a homeless and starving condition.

The Spectator, in a remarkable article on the great catastrophe, says:—

"The outbreak of the new earthquake, first at Agrum, then in Ischia, and now in Chio, the last the most destructive of all and costing thousands of lives, seems to show that a period of earthquake shocks must be regarded as a judgment that may affect, to an extent by no means inconsiderable, the history of life in this era. To the student of prophecy the commencement of a great cycle of earthquakes has a peculiar significance; inasmuch as the occurrence of earthquakes in divers places is especially mentioned by our Lord as among the beginnings of the travail pangs which are to usher in the coming dispensation. Matt. xxiv. 7. The misery of the people is intense, and despair is painted on their countenances."

A violent shock of earthquake was felt on April 10th throughout the centre of California; also one at the naval port of Pola, in Istres, on the 12th of April.

There is another agent of destruction which in the approaching period under consideration, God shall employ to execute judgments on his foes, i. e., a great whirlwind, which shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth (Jer xxx. 23, and xxiii. 19–20,) a continuous whirlwind; to be in the latter days. We have read of hurricanes, how trees are uprooted, dwellings laid prostrate, ships driven from their moorings and stranded on the shore, and desolation spread over the land; these are but rehearsals as it were, of that great whirlwind of these latter days, when the displeasure of the Lord shall be upon all nations. Another prophecy is a voice, which shall come even unto the ends of the earth. No doubt the earthquake shall be one of the most terrific agents which the Divine Omnipotence will employ. Isaiah 24th, describing the desolation says:—

"The earth shall reel to and fro like a drunkard, and be moved exceedingly."

Imagine, if we can, the three hundred volcanoes which are spread over the earth's surface to be put simultaneously into active operation and the many extinct ones coming to burst out anew, would not the globe be moved exceedingly, and its motion be like the reeling of a drunkard?

Finally. Now let us group together all these calamities, and see, at one view, what is the picture they present of the state of the world and society, in that appalling period in the very near future. Social disorganization produced by the suppression of all the virtues, and wild rage of all the passions; religious strife, embittered by the fiercest fanaticism, or grossest superstition; political convulsions, growing out of the antagonism of opposite principles, and the undying hatred of the oppressor and the oppressed. Horrid war dragging her death-dealing artillery through every land; fearful pestilence, spreading her dread pall through every city and country, mountain top and vale; squalid famine imprinting her ghastly features upon famished multitudes; terrible earthquakes opening their deep abysses, and swallowing their thousands and tens of thousands; whirlwinds, hurricanes, and tempests, roaring through plain and forest, spreading devastation in their track, and bringing multitudes under the ruins they create; bodily diseases, loathsome and painful, (like Job,) and epidemical. The heat of the earth so intensified by the solar rays that breathing will become oppressive and fevers and sunstrokes of frequent occurrence.

But some will say this is too horrible to be truth, that God's mercy is too great ever to allow such an outburst of fury and wrath, or the accumulation upon the creatures of his power of such an exterminating mass of ills, which would all but annihilate the race.

We answer, where have you learned of the magnitude of God's mercy? Is it not from the Holy Scripture? And does not that teach us that he once destroyed the earth, eight persons only excepted, with the waters of a flood; that he overthrew five cities together with all their inhabitants, except Lot and his two daughters, by a storm of fire and brimstone; that he desolated the fairest part of the globe with the ten plagues, and afterwards overwhelmed a whole army in the Red Sea; later did he not overwhelm Jerusalem and its inhabitants, its beautiful and magnificent temple of Solomon, not one stone left upon another, leaving the whole land one waste? and were not Nineveh and Babylon destroyed? Was this the work of mercy or of wrath?

The history of the world demonstrates that God has at times pleaded against the human race since the fall with fire, and water, and pestilence, and earthquakes, and famine, and sword, and every variety of ills that flesh is heir to. The greatest manifestation of his love that God has ever made to our sin blighted world is the gift of his Son to be our Savior and Redeemer from eternal damnation.

The whole heathen and Mahometan world, comprising at least seven or eight hundred millions of the human family, are to this day enemies of the gospel; and of the nominal Christianity which remains, how much is virtually hostile to it?

The world of mankind has had already eighteen and a half centuries to make up its mind whether it will have Jesus as the only medium to be saved or not, and by an overwhelming majority it has decided against him, and this decision, from a great and overwhelming majority, is rapidly approaching an unanimity, so that at the second coming of the Son of Man he will scarce find faith on the earth.

The justice of such a series of devastating judgments as we have shown is clearly seen after a serious contemplation of the social and moral condition of mankind at the time they are inflicted. Even now has not iniquity arisen to such a magnitude that it is wonderful that even Divine forbearance still holds out?

Could we be placed upon some high eminence for a single twenty-four hours, and a panorama be made to pass before us, which would exhibit to our vision the interior life of all the great cities on the globe, could we see, as God sees, all the crimes which are committed in secret as well as public, the assassinations and murders, and robberies, and rapes, the fraud, and violence, and oppression, and cruelty, and all the multiplied forms of iniquity which the deep depravity of the human heart has invented, could we see them in all that hideous deformity in which they appear to the eyes of infinite purity, we should wonder more that the earth has not long ago been desolated by these impending judgments, than that they shall be poured out shortly when iniquity shall have increased an hundred fold. But the way of escape is still open and offered to man through the love and mercy of God, through his Son Jesus Christ. Amen.

Plymouth, Indiana, Nov. 2, 1881.

Stockholders Meeting.

As per Amendment to the Constitution, the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, will be held on the second Saturday in November (12th), 1881, in Plymouth, Indiana.

E. K. BARNHILL, Sec'y.

ON account of the Conference our paper may be one day late next week.

IT will be seen that the Conference at Rensselaer commences on Thursday evening, Nov. 3, of the present week. As we expect to attend, if not disappointed in some way, we must defer some articles for future consideration. We also shall have to make preparation in arranging our books for the meeting of the Stockholders on Saturday, Nov. 12, of next week. The business of this meeting will be to select and elect the persons who are to have management of THE RESTITUTION for the year to come.

WE hope all who are now on our list as subscribers will continue their patronage. We also would request that a persistent effort be made during the remaining two months of the current year to so far increase the number on our list as to make the paper absolutely self-sustaining. A very few hundred names more would now place THE RESTITUTION in this position. Papers heralding the near approach of a coming dispensation, the now impending ing rapture of the church to meet the Messiah in the air preparatory to his descent to take possession of his throne and establish his kingdom, and withal carefully noting the signs of the times, are the very last papers that should be dispensed with. The passing year has been phenomenal indeed; but the finger of destiny points more ominously to next year, and the remaining years of this truly important decade of the eighties. The dark clouds of the time of trouble skirt the entire horizon destined to envelop the whole heavens at no very distant day.

WE take the selection below from the Scientific American of Oct. 8. The cause of the wonderful phenomena is most probably extra-terrestrial as suggested toward the close of the article. The year 1881 has been phenomenal indeed. Should November and December be as prolific in electrical disturbances as the past months of the year have been, 1881 will pass into history as one of the most remarkable for extraordinary prodigies. We think it quite likely that the transition from the remarkable summer to winter will be attended with some unusual disturbances in the atmosphere, if nothing more. An era of greater wonders is just before us. Truly—

"We are living, we are dwelling
In a grand and awful time."

HEAT, SUN STORMS, AND YELLOW LIGHT.

The first week in September was characterized by a number of days of extremely hot weather, the temperature in this city rising above 100 deg. Fah. During the days of greatest heat the sun appeared to be greatly disturbed by storms. Whether the terrestrial high temperature was due to the direct action of solar disturbances, or to the forest fires then raging in Michigan, or to the indirect effect upon our atmosphere of the volumes of smoke which darkened the sky over many thousands of square miles, it is impossible to decide. The phenomena apparently connected with the smoky condition of the air were sufficiently marked to make the week a memorable one. On the 5th and 6th a peculiar yellow haze overspread the land from Canada to the Atlantic coast, deepening in many places to brown and black, so that lamps had to be lighted at midday. In this city the yellow haze was noticeable, but not so dense as elsewhere. At Saratoga the ghastly yellow appearance of the atmosphere increased to the positive shade of an orange lily, and it was next to impossible to recognise a person at no greater distance than the width of Broadway (125 feet). Between 8 and 9 a. m. it grew still darker, and many predicted another "dark day" similar to the one chronicled in the early part of the century. The hotels and stores were lighted just as at night, and the peculiarity of the jets was that they resembled the cold, silver color of electric lamps, but of much less power. Another effect produced by the inexplicable state of the atmosphere was the extremely bright green appearance of the lawns and foliage. This was especially noticeable from the fact that shades of everything else were of a decidedly subdued color. During the early forenoon, outside of the regular routine, business and pleasure were practically suspended. So dark was it at 9 o'clock that when the American Social Science Association met in Putnam Hall every gas jet had to be lighted, and it bore the appearance of an evening entertainment. The extreme humidity of the atmosphere was the subject of general remark, and several who had taken an early drive into the country stated that their clothing was as damp as if they had passed through a shower. The darkness lifted about noon.

At Toronto the darkness continued all day, though as the day advanced the yellow of the sky was brightened to a rich orange hue. In northern New York the atmosphere was of a greenish yellow hue. At Lake Placid, in the Adirondacks, a greenish fog covered the country; the grass seemed artificially colored, the animals had a sea-green color, the mountains disappeared, and in their place were wreaths of green vapor; the clouds were yellowish green; the sun appeared a ball of golden fire through the mist, and all nature seemed to have a strange and mysterious hue. Some people when they rose in the morning feared that their eyes were jaundiced; others thought that some strange calamity was at hand, some great convulsion of nature; people in many places were in a state of anxiety and dread.

The Boston Journal of the 7th compared the previous day with the famous Black Friday of 1780. No fog or haze was perceptible, except when looking off toward the horizon from an elevated position, but the sun was thoroughly obscured, and the atmosphere was pervaded with a yellowish light which lent a strange appearance to every object. There was a weird luster to the surface of the streets and the fronts of the buildings. This aspect of the sky was such that some timorous people's minds were directed by it to the Scriptural prophecy concerning the brassy appearance of the sky which is to be one of the features of the "last day." The interiors of buildings grew dark as the day advanced, and the outer air as viewed through a window seemed to be pervaded with the reflected light from some vast conflagration. It became necessary to light the gas in the stores and offices, and the jets emitted a white flame that strongly resembled the electric light. The faces of people in the street were of a deep saffron color, as if jaundice had begun to show its work in complexions tanned by a summer of exposure to wind and sun, and some skins even displayed the tint of those yellow beach shoes which have of late come into fashion. A few buff dresses seemed as yellow as dull gold, and the grass took on a rank and metallic hue like verdigris. The phenomenon became more marked in the afternoon than it was during the forenoon. As late as 1 o'clock it was possible for a person sitting near a window to see to read or write without the aid of artificial light, but after that hour the gloom deepened rapidly, the sky grew still more brazen in appearance, and the gloom was that of late twilight. The front windows of stores on Washington street were illuminated as at night, and there was not a single usual aspect of the daytime to be seen in any direction. There was something terrible in the scene, and it is not to be wondered at if some weak minds allowed themselves to be tormented by fears of what the extraordinary event might presage. The climax was reached at about 3 o'clock, and after that light began gradually to return, although perfect daylight was not restored. At 5 o'clock the ruddy glare had disappeared from the sky, and the light, such as it was, seemed more natural than during the day. Before 8 o'clock the moon had come out, the clouds had disappeared, and the atmosphere had resumed its normal condition.

As already remarked, this peculiar disturbance of the atmosphere prevailed throughout New York, the Eastern States, and Canada. The forest fires of Michigan and Canada were most commonly thought to be the immediate cause. Professor Emerson, of Dartmouth College, suggested as an additional agent the pollen from northern fir and pine trees. Others suspected that the excessive moisture of the lower atmosphere might have had something to do with the phenomenon. It is possible, however, that some extra-terrestrial cause may have had a controlling influence; something, for instance, like the band of yellow light which spanned the sky on the night of the 12th. As described by the observer above named at Hanover, N. H., the yellow luminous band was from 5 deg. to 10 deg. in width, quite uniform throughout, and extended from about 20 deg. north of west to 30 deg. south of west, dividing the heavens into northern and southern divisions of about three-fifths and two-fifths respectively. Its direction was about at right angles with the Milky Way. A very distinctive feature was the regular and definitely marked northern boundary. From 8 p. m. to 8:15 a. m. it remained comparatively fixed. At 8:30 o'clock it swept off toward the south, gradually disappearing. Just south and east of the crossing of the streamer with the Milky Way were ten or twelve lines of light, and at right angles with the streamer, but separated 3 deg. or 4 deg. from it, and nearly parallel to each other. These bands were 5 deg. or 6 deg. in length. During this time there were faint northern lights streaming up at right angles to the band.

By some it was thought that a nebulous belt had touched the earth's atmosphere. Had such a contact occurred in the daytime, penetrating the atmosphere more deeply, the effect might have been like that of the 6th.

During the auroral display, and for some hours after, the Atlantic cables were greatly obstructed by a magnetic storm, and the land lines also as far west as Chicago. The storm neutralized the force of the batteries, but the atmospheric currents of electricity were not strong enough to telegraph with, as was the case during the memorable electric storm of October, 1872.

THE INCORRUPTIBLE CROWN.

To those who have started in the race to win a "crown of glory that fadeth not away" we commend the perusal of the following letter which we have taken from one of our exchanges. As the prize is now just before us it does not matter anything to us as to the value of the weights we divested ourselves of when we entered the lists to run for the crown of life. Worldly honor or church preferment are among the weights that we were well rid of, when we started, and they would be fatal incumbrances now that our remaining strength is no more than sufficient to enable us to successfully hold our own in the race. And in laying aside other incumbrances let us be careful to lay aside the worst of all—besetting sins.

ZION'S WATCH TOWER.

Dear Brethren and Sisters:

I was lately passing along the streets of a large city, when my attention was attracted to a fine large engraving hanging in one of the shop windows. (It was in Fleet street, London.) It represented a scene in one of the ancient Isthmian games. Two persons nearly divested of apparel, with distended muscles, occupied the course, stretching every nerve, while around evidently excited with deep interest, was the "great cloud of witnesses."

They were well along in the course but the attention of the one somewhat in advance of the other is diverted for a moment by a flower or some shining object that has been thrown into the arena by some one of the many witnesses, by which they are "compassed about."

An effort is made to grasp it, evidently the prize for which they are running is lost by this one, and no trace of sympathy is noticeable on the countenances of the spectators, but great rejoicing is apparent among the multitude, and the persistency with which the victor has reached the goal, ignoring every thing else, keeping the prize only in view and finally won it. I thought, that is a true picture of the Christian race which Paul has so faithfully and vividly painted in words, and which we are noted upon the stage of life. But how appropriately and timely the emphasising of the thought just now. How faithfully that little shining object, whatever it may be, represents the hasetments in the path of the one who is running for the prize of our high calling.

How insignificant compared with the prize and the honor at the end of the course. But unless watchful we shall hesitate; one moment may cost all, and may make delay sufficient to reach the judge's stand too late.

What's that in your path? A little worldly praise?

Disdain to notice it, it is of no value whatever; you are worse off with it than without it.

At another point do you see an avenue to wealth?

Never mind; it would not be abiding if you had it. Press on.

Again; do you begin to think of some of the "weights" of value (?) left behind, fearing you will never see them again?

Don't think of them only to hope you will never be incumbered with them more.

Do you say or think: "I fear this race will be the ruination of of all my worldly prospects?"

Of course it will so far as having any pleasure is concerned.

You will be a very foolish man to divide your energies now, or thoughts either. Press on.

But do you say: "Why, there's my reputation right there in the dust." Poor fellow! how sorry I am you noticed it; but its only the reputation you once had. Don't you know that none of those who are noted racers on this course have any reputation. The greatest racer who ever stepped on it is "made himself of no reputation."

But do you say: "This awful run will be the death of me?"

Yes; of course it will; but you are a poor culprit under sentence of death anyway, and if you undertake to save your life you will loose it, but run yourself to death and you'll have a life that is life everlasting, and more—immortal. Don't be foolish now. Press on.

"A heavenly race demands thy zeal
And an immortal crown."

MARRIAGE.

AUGUSTA MOORE.

"To think that you should marry after so many years of 'cutting heads off;' and after all you've said! What does it mean?"

The speaker sat amid the rich confusion of silk, satin and lace that filled her friend's chamber. Her friend, with a dressmaker or two, was very happy. She was a lady thirty-five or forty years of age, but youthful in appearance and uncommonly attractive still.

Seeing the solemn and dazed expression of her visitor's face, she burst out laughing and replied:

"Why Alice, it means that times have changed, and so my resolution has changed. But what have I said?"

"You always declared, ever since we grew up, that you would never marry unless you could have a man you preferred to all the rest of the world, and for whose sake you felt you could endure any lot in life. You surely cannot—"

The speaker colored and paused. She saw that she was in rather deep water. The man to whom her friend was about to give her hand was by no means the person to inspire devotion in such a woman as Marion Walton.

"I dared not say yes to any of them, since not one of them 'filled out my order.'"

"How is it that you now dare?"

"As I said, times have changed."

"O, Marion! what do you mean?"

The really-determined look on Miss Austin's face sobered the bride-elect, and she answered, gravely:—"My dear Alice, marriage used to be a life affair; but you surely have not failed to see, by the daily prints, that this is not now the case. Divorces are so much the fashion that no one loses caste by being divorced, or by having a divorce; therefore, my dear, as I have the chance to marry a man with an excellent house and a fair property, and one who is not disagreeable to me, I have concluded to try it. If I do not like the change; I shall obtain a divorce."

And she married, and it was not long before she concluded that she cared more for a young man than for her husband, whom she coolly deserted for that younger man. As she said, she did not lose caste, not even in her church. And her minister married her to her new husband.

Her excuse for leaving her real husband was that he had become intensely disagreeable to her. Her friends did not blame her. Nobody blamed her except a few old fogies who were so stupid as to remember what Christ said of such a performance; and who would mind such croakers as those?

Thus, in our day, is marriage degraded and trodden under foot; its sanctity outraged, and its bonds puffed at and rent. The union that is a type of Christ's union with his church—a most holy ministry—decreed by God to stand inviolate till death, is regarded as a compact to be at any time undone. What if the heavenly Bridegroom were to act with his wife as men and women act with their married mates? What if, when she became cold, wayward, troublesome, distressing to him, he were to cast her off—where would be the hope of heaven for any human soul? Nothing short of her deliberate embrace of Satan can ever make him give her up. There is but one "unpardonable sin," and there is but one sin that can break wedlock. Look to yourselves, all ye who, for any other cause than that named by our Lord and Judge, have "put away" one mate and married another; for every one of you is a breaker of the seventh commandment; and whoever married you, knowing your case, is a partaker of your crime; and ye must all repent of and forsake your sin, and the partner of it, or ye can never enter the kingdom of God.

SEVEN SPOTS ON THE SUN.

Seven large spots variegated the disk of the sun yesterday. They were not widely scattered, and might be considered as one group. These spots form the most striking view yet presented during this season of maximum sun spots. Scattered among the large spots are innumerable small ones that appear no larger than a pin's head. An eighth large spot is forming. This wonderful display of solar forces can be easily observed by all possessing telescopes, without danger. Even a spy-glass fixed so that it can be turned to the sun without using the eye, will throw an image of the sun on a white screen. This image can be brought into focus by sliding the tube or moving the screen to and from the eye-piece until the edge of the sun appears sharp and the spots become visible. The spots can be easily seen on an image three-quarters of an inch in diameter. But the eye must be kept from the instrument; or serious injury will result. The earth's storms seems to respond to the great storms in the sun with remarkable precision. It is to be hoped that the sun observations during the Summer, in connection with the meteorological records, will throw some light on the exact nature of the influence of sun storms upon the earth.

THE COMING STORM.

You may rely upon it that a dreadful storm is coming upon the world, and it may not be at a great distance. It may be very near. If we are not mistaken there are some signs that it is nigh at hand. The flood of water in the days of Noah and the deluge of fire in the days of Lot are not to be compared with the tempest of wrath which threatens to break in upon the world of the ungodly. The wise will receive the caution, will give heed to the warning, and get prepared for the awful day.

How sad will be the condition of those who when the Lord comes, are not ready to meet him. All warning to be ready, and all exhortation to prepare for the great event, have been lost upon them. The tribulation and anguish and wrath which will come upon such souls will be dreadful—too dreadful for us to describe. God forbid that you should be unprepared when Christ comes. Tell me if you are getting ready to meet him in the clouds.

Does this day and this hour find you as you would like that day and that hour to find you?

Are you performing a work that will abide?

Are you making a mark that will be lasting? or are you writing on the sand?

Anything written on the sand is effaced by the first flowing tide. So your life-work, if its end is selfish, will be washed away with the stream of time. It is only what is done from a right principle that will live on through the ages of the future. It is only what is good that will be immortal. It is only truth, holiness, love, that will stand the test of that day, and claim, through Christ, for their possessor the crown of life.—Rev. Silas Henn, in "The Blessed Future."

Sententious.

Publish your joys, but conceal your sorrows.

A joyful evening may follow a sorrowful morn.

Hope is the only good which is common to all.

Peoples intentions can only be decided by their conduct.

One day is worth three to him who does everything in order.

The earth is sunk in pain and tears,
And closer draws the gloom;
And light or balm there can be none
Till Christ the Lord shall come.

The best way to apologize is to do such a kindness to the offended one that he will forget that you attempted to injure him.

There is no better test of purity and true goodness than reluctance to think evil of one's neighbor, and absolute incapacity to believe an evil report about good men.

The hills of lofty endeavor and high achievement lie all around us, and if we never catch a glimpse of the views they afford, we need not complain that it is because of the insurperable limitation of our surroundings.

Give us a man, young or old, high or low, on whom we know we can thoroughly depend—who will stand firm when others fail—the friend faithful and true, the adviser honest and fearless, the adversary just and chivalrous; in such an one there is a fragment of the "Rock of Ages."—Dean Stanley.

While the earth remains, crime and vice will continue. When the Lord comes he will find on the earth men and women who are violating law—human and divine; but this fact should not discourage the friends of "righteousness, temperance and justice."

For a few brief days the orchards are white with blossoms. They soon turn to fruit, or else float away, useless and wasted, upon the idle breeze. So will it be with pleasant feelings. They must be deepened into decision or be entirely dissipated by delay.—Theodore L. Cuyler.

Pride is like the beautiful acacia that lifts its head proudly above its neighboring plants, forgetting that it, too, like them, has its roots in the dirt.

The head of the king that the sceptre has borne,
The brow of the priest that the mitre hath worn,
The eye of the sage, and the heart of the brave,
Are hidden and lost in the depths of the grave.

'Tis the twink of an eye, 'tis the draught of a breath,
From the blossom of health to the paleness of death,
From the gilded saloon to the bier and the shroud,
Oh, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

No man ever served God by doing things to-morrow; if we honor Christ and are blest, it is by the things we do to-day. Whatever you do for Christ throw your whole soul into it.

Every miracle that Christ did was an act of mercy, and designed to cure as well as to convince. "He went about doing good;" he conversed among men like a walking balm, breathing health and recovery wheresoever he came.

When, in the o'erhanging heavens of fate,
The threatening clouds of darkness dwell,
Then let us humbly watch and wait
It shall be well, it shall be well.

And when the storm has passed away,
And sunshine smiles on flood and fell,
How sweet to think, how sweet to say,
It has been well, it has been well.

THE INFALLIBLE SIGN.

There is one mark of Christian character, which, above every other, cannot be mistaken, and that is the true spirit of Christ, which the true Christian will always manifest. A religion that does not change a man's spirit and bring it into harmony with the spirit of Christ, is worthless. It matters not what profession a man may make, or what position he may occupy, or what duties he may perform, unless he have the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. Judged by this rule, which the inspired apostle has given us, we fear many professing Christians would be found wanting. Instead of the spirit of meekness, gentleness, humility, forbearance and love, manifested by Christ, they are imperious, proud and selfish, full of envy, jealousy, hatred and strife. Instead of self-foregetfulness, there is ... assertion. Instead of ... the house of the Master, they are constantly seeking their own glory. And yet such persons, filled with the spirit of the world, vainly imagine that they are Christians. Nothing can be a greater delusion than this. True religion gives a man a new heart and a right spirit. It stamps on his nature the image of the heavenly. It makes him a new creature in Christ Jesus. It sweetens his temper, it inspires his heart, and brings every thought into obedience to the law of Christ.

Editor Restitution:

The corn crop here failed. Some had good wheat, and some had none. I am among the latter. I have feed, provisions, and clothing, all to buy, and very little to buy with.

Some dear brother is sending me THE RESTITUTION, for which I am very thankful, and hope the Lord will reward them with rulership in his kingdom for the age of ages. My health is still bad, sometimes a little better, and then not so well. I am gradually nearing the end of my mortal life. I have not earned more than twenty dollars this year. We have to economize.

I am waiting for the Lord to come for his Bride, and I want to be ready. I think the fig tree is beginning to bud. I say to the lovers ones who read THE RESTITUTION, hold up your heads, for your redemption draweth near.

Brother P. Finn, of Carthage, Mo., come here and preached four discourses to attentive audiences. He is a good workman. May the Lord give him rulership in his kingdom, when he comes to make up his jewels for the neverending ages.

Tell Sister Wince that her articles are balm of Gilead to the weary fainting pilgrim on the road to the highlands of glory and immortality in the kingdom of God.

Yours for the age of ages.

Editor Restitution:

In a late issue of your paper I read a letter from J. O. Barnaby, of Brooklyn, N. Y. He says: "We have a precious little band here in the City of Churches. Some twenty come to hear the truth."

Twenty persons, out of a half a million people, and in a City of Churches! where thousands attend church every Sunday, and listen to the gospel as preached by some of the best educated men in the world! Can we doubt the honesty of these noted preachers? No; and yet why should they not be able to see and teach the "Gospel of the Kingdom," as taught by the Christ and his apostles. I tell you these things are enough to stagger the faith of the weak ones. Only twenty out of five hundred thousand. I am one of the weak ones, yet I do believe in, and cling to the One Faith.

Sincerely Yours,

CHAS. ROBLEE.

God's word blossoms with assurance. He will take care of his own. He will give strength, and hope, and courage, and victory. The black storm-cloud of summer contains golden harvests for the granary, and purpling grapes for the winepress. The storm-wave but sweeps on faster the homeward bound vessel. God controls. He holds the forces of sea, air, earth, and man in his hollow hand. To doubt were wrong. And though our path of duty lie up the mountain-side of difficulty, God shall sandal our feet with never-falling grace, and cheer us with strength to scale rocky steeps and wild, jutting crags, till the angels shall bear us up, up, up to the gates of pearl and streets of gold, and the harmonic thunder strains of redemption's welcome song.

Periodicals and Books.

The first number of a new paper entitled, The Ages to Come, has been received. It is designed to be a successor to the "Bible Examiner" edited and published by George Storrs previous to his death. Its object is sufficiently indicated in its title. The first number is sent out nearly three months in advance of the date of publication.

THE CARPENTER'S SON.

ELEANOR A. HUNTER.

Bathed in the sunshine, and the silver light
Of Eastern stars, the little village lay;
And people turned them to their toil by day
And laid them down to longed-for rest at night;
And common life pressed on them in its might,
Its joys and sorrows, and its care had they;
They smiled and wept as in this poor world's way
Since Eden vanished from our longing sight
And there among them sharing cares and rights,
And daily toil, and home so poor and mean,
Was one who lived before their heedless eyes
For years a life benignant and serene,—
The angels called him "Lord of Paradise,"
And earth—a mortal's but "the Nazarene."

Age to Come Herald.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

Some months ago Mrs. Alice E. Davis started for Palestine intending to make Jerusalem her home for the remainder of her days. Her former letters, in which she gave an account of her voyage across the Atlantic, as well as incidents connected with her stay in London, were given at length in the Age to Come Herald. The communication below commences with her leaving London for her destination in the Orient, and is sent from Jaffa where she was stopping for a short time before going to Jerusalem. We have to divide her first letter into two parts, one of which we give below, reserving the concluding part with some further remarks till next week.

Leaves from My Journal.

On board the noble steamship Siam, one of the ships of Tarshish, Aug. 22, 1881.

Many thanks to the Lord Mayor of London, who advised and opened the way for me to go on my journey to the promised land by this superior line of steamers. Everything is just splendid. The captain and all the officers are very kind to me. As much as I desire to reach the land of my hopes, I shall regret to leave this ship's company. They tell me that a residence in the eastern countries has a wonderfully refining influence upon the manners of the people, and I should judge so. They are the most refined and elegant people I have ever met.

I have made the acquaintance of a Spanish Jew and his beautiful wife: but to my regret I cannot talk with them without an interpreter, which we employ every evening. They reside in Morocco and are very wealthy. They are much interested in my visit to Jerusalem, which I find they love as well as myself.

Our East Indians eat rice and curry, which I like very much, and could live on it. This is the way they eat it. They take a pan of rice on deck, where it is spotlessly clean, and about ten squat around it. Then they pour the curry over the rice and wash their hands, and with the right hand roll up a lump of rice and pop it into their mouths. They are pleasant, and seem to delight to have me come and see them eat; and they are so clean that I could not object to share their meal with them. Our cooks are all Indians and I think they are the very best cooks in the world.

This great ship moves so steadily that it seems like sitting in a hotel by the side of the ocean. I pray God that you may all have as pleasant a journey when you come over the deep waters. The future will be a new era in my life. My faith grows stronger and my hopes brighter; and I can by faith begin to see the commencement of an age of glory. My destiny has changed, my associations are all new. My vocation is new and agreeable, and has been ever since I landed in England.

We have in our ship's company men who are going to the river Ganges to start mills for the manufacture of cloth from jute, which grows in that country. They have a manufactory in Chicago. In conversation with one of them, he told me the river Anjek, north of Jaffa, he thought, would be a splendid locality for jute, and advised me to make a trial of it. The cloth is made into bags of all kinds, and also horse blankets. It is a very profitable business, and the company has immense wealth. If this business could be carried on in Palestine, assistance could be obtained from this company. I am daily becoming acquainted with men of means and influence. I take their addresses, and shall communicate with them as I learn what can be done in Palestine, and what is most needed there.

We are now sailing down by the coast of Portugal, and the scenery is beautiful. The water is a charming blue tint, and altogether this is a lovely place. The ship, the crew and passengers, are all well suited to the delightful surroundings.

I have distributed copies of the Age to Come Herald, which the passengers have read, apparently with interest; and I shall send them to Bombay, Calcutta, and other places. Thus, by taking this route I have the pleasure of sending the news of the coming kingdom by and to intelligent persons of many countries which otherwise I should not.

We shall call at Gibraltar to-morrow, the 21st, where I shall mail this and other letters.

Aug. 25.—Steamer Siam. We arrived at Gibraltar Sunday evening. As we came in sight of the town, all lighted up on the hillside, the view was magnificent. Here the passengers for Morocco, on the opposite shore, left the ship. The Spaniards brought us the finest grapes I have ever seen. I bought four pounds for six-pence. Tobacco was not sold so cheap, but the native Indians bought an abundance of it. We only remained here about six hours, and consequently I did not go ashore.

We have been sailing in sight of Africa for three days. It appears from the ship to be an unbroken chain of mountains, some of which are very beautiful.

Last night we passed Tunis, but as it was dark, we did not see the war-steamers as we had hoped. We have been in sight of land nearly all the way from Southampton, which has made the voyage thus far most delightful.

There is on board a gentleman from Cincinnati, Ohio, who has been travelling all through Europe and parts of Asia, and is now on his way to Australia, selling improved implements of agriculture, made in America. He believes in the near fulfillment of the prophecies, and appears to be much interested in my plans in Palestine. He has given me many hints in regard to dealing with Eastern people, which I have no doubt will be of service to me. He says a hotel at Jerusalem will be sure to succeed, and gives many reasons why.

The Indians live on rice and curry, and drink no liquor of any kind. Thus they can stand any amount of heat. I eat nothing but rice and curry now, with a vegetable that grows in India, and I find that while others complain of heat I am only comfortable. It is foolish to eat much meat in this climate. I was never in better health or spirits.

We shall call at the famous Island of Malta to-morrow, where I shall go ashore if possible.

Aug. 27.—We went ashore at Malta yesterday. The crops there are a failure, on account of a great drought. The Maltese are a fine race, very clean and industrious. We visited the Armory, the best in the world. I noticed manuscripts which were brought from Jerusalem in A. D. 1600, also a great clock from the same place. I saw the armor of a giant, the helmet of which weighed twenty-three pounds. The tapestry is the finest in the world. It was wrought many hundred years ago, but the colors are quite fresh and gorgeous.

Malta is a place of great interest to the traveler. Here the apostle Paul was shipwrecked, when a prisoner on his way to Rome, and remained three months. It was here that the venomous viper fastened upon his hand, which he shook off and received no harm. The island is nearly twenty miles long and some ten miles broad. I regret I could not remain longer upon it.

Port Said, Aug. 31.—We arrived at this port yesterday morning, where the noble Siam takes in coal. The captain left me in the care of his agent, who took me to the hotel after calling on the Consul, who visited me at ten o'clock. He is interested in my mission, says a hotel is needed at Jerusalem, gave me a plan on which to commence a school, and urged me to take charge of two children under his care to be educated in Palestine.

I have made the acquaintance of the Austrian Consul, and the commander of the Turkish man-of-war at this port, who is a French general. I had interesting conversations with these gentlemen about my plans, and they gave me encouragement as to the hotel and school. The General believes "the events of the next five years will involve a revolution of the world." He is evidently a commander of great military ability and an intelligent statesman.

Jaffa, Palestine, Sept. 8, 1881.—I arrived at this port on the 5th inst., at six o'clock, A. M., where I found a messenger waiting for me—in fact, several—who were expecting me. I was cordially welcomed to Palestine by all. Mr. and Mrs. Floyd had a room specially prepared for my use, and sent the following note to the steamer to advise me of their wishes:

JAFFA, Sept. 5, 1881.

MRS. A. E. DAVIS:—Dear Madam, Our object in addressing you this note is to invite you to our home, where you will be welcome until you can make arrangements as may please you. The bearer of this, Mr. Albert Markus, will conduct you to our home.

Yours, with respect,
MR. & MRS. ROLLA FLOYD.

I accepted this kind invitation, and my reception by Mr. and Mrs. Floyd could not have been more cordial.

Their house is situated in a most romantic and interesting locality, overlooking the harbor and the town; the view is one of the most charming in the world. I have been here three days, and it seems that I have scarcely begun to comprehend the situation, and realize the beauty of the surrounding country.

There is in front of my window one of the most beautiful gardens I ever saw. I have visited all the gardens in and about London, Boston, New York, and other places, and I can say in truth that all I have seen fades into insignificance when compared with this glorious scene. The garden, hospital and public baths are owned by a Russian Baron, who I am told came here to fulfil a vow. He has an income of ten thousand dollars a year, which he will use for the benefit of this town. Three years ago there was not a tree standing upon the land where the garden now is. Now there are very many which to me appear to be full-grown trees. I cannot express to you my astonishment at this work of magic, as it appears to me to be. The gravelled walks are all artistically laid out, well seated, and adorned with all sorts of antiques. The rarest flowers of a tropical clime are profuse, the odor of which is almost overpowering.

When I think how much labor and treasure is expended in the London Botanical Gardens to keep alive a few specimens of these rare plants, and see how they grow here during the entire year, with scarcely any labor or expense, except one or two men to water the exotic kinds certain seasons of the year, I say to myself, the contrast fitly represents the poor Gentile religions, compared with the pure spiritual religion of Jesus Christ, which is soon to be experienced according to the promises, in this Beautiful Land of Rest.

But while the foreign plants need watering in the dry season, the indigenous, those natural to the soil and climate, need no water except that which falls through the rainy season. [If this is true of grains and vegetables, it will not be so desirable to carry much seed there from other lands. Will Mrs. Davis inform us how this is, and if there is any difference tell us what varieties will do best, and need the least care and labor?]

There was no spot in Palestine more barren and unpromising ten years ago, than where this lovely garden now sends forth its sweet fragrance. When I open my door in the morning, the odor fills my room, and I quite forget where I am, and imagine that I have been transported into Paradise already. But I am aware that Palestine is not all like this. It has required, however, but a few years of industry and a little money, with willing hearts and hands and contented minds, to make this barren spot blossom with roses, and it shows what may be done with little effort.

The houses where I am are built after the American style, and are pleasant and cool. I never slept so soundly, or felt more refreshed by rest. We have all necessary comforts and many luxuries. I am enjoying the best society, people of intelligence, culture and kindness. Mr. Wilson, the American consul at Jerusalem, to whom I have letters of introduction, and Dr. Lee, a lawyer from Ohio, are now stopping with Mr. Floyd. Then at the hotel there are gentlemen and ladies who come in to spend the evening with us, and I see no difference between society here and in New York or Boston. The people all dress in the height of fashion, and churches and schools claim to be in a very prosperous condition. On the whole, the prospect is so much more promising than I had dared to hope for, that I am more than encouraged.

The crops are all good here this year, while in Europe there has been considerable failure. The products of the soil have increased very much in quality, quantity and price. They are simply immense. This makes business lively. I can now look from my window and see two large steamers engaged in discharging and loading cargoes. I am satisfied that people abroad do not realize what progress is now being made here.

One important feature of progress may be seen in the wells that are being dug all over the town, where it was supposed no water could be found. They have to dig only from thirteen to twenty feet to find living water. I have examined some wells and know this to be true.

I have had to receive considerable company and find myself very weary. It seems that almost everybody has been to see the Americans that has just arrived. One pretty Arab woman brought me a rare flower, and said through the interpreter that she wished to welcome me with a kiss. This being the custom of the place, and she a sweet woman, her request was readily granted. The people all tell me that the Arabs love the European race, and only need a little kindness shown them to become good citizens and faithful laborers.

I shall never leave this "heavenly country"—no, never! Dr. Lee, who has been here two or three weeks, is as much charmed with the place as I am, and I can see that his interest in it is growing daily. Neither can he leave; except to return again.

Well, thank God; who put it in my heart to start, even alone, for this haven of rest. I can now say in earnest. Hallelujah! When I think of the poor desolate land I have left, and compare it with this paradise, I can only weep in silence and pray for the dear ones who are still there, with the fond hope that they will soon join me. Come, for all things are now ready. Your welcome will be most cordial by all true hearts. May God hasten your coming, is the prayer of my heart.

I should like to stay at Jaffa; but perhaps that is not best. I could support myself here, but must go where the Lord directs and do his bidding.

Notwithstanding the very great kindness of many friends, the journey has been quite expensive. I was obliged to stay five days at Port Said, at a French hotel. They charged me twelve dollars, which would have been fifteen, but for the kind offices of our consul there. He was truly a friend to me. He took me in his boat to the steamer, introduced me to the captain, purchased my ticket, and secured for me a good room. He will visit us this winter at Jerusalem.

I think the prospect is grand. We shall need considerable help to carry out our plans, which must succeed; and I doubt not the money will be readily handed in by the Lord's treasurers, who are praying for the prosperity and peace of Jerusalem. We shall show our faith in what we pray for by our works.

THE MICHIGAN FIRE.

The burning of the village of Bad Ax, the seat of Huron county, illustrates the awful suddenness of the assault of wild fire on most of the fated settlements and the completeness of the destruction wrought. A correspondent of an Eastern paper says:

It began to grow dark in the forenoon from smoke, and in a few hours the pitchy blackness was like that of a close cellar, so that it was impossible to see a foot. It was known that there were fires three miles south, but there was no thought of danger until suddenly there came a lurid glare, the flame and wind immediately followed, and in thirty minutes fifty-three of the fifty-five buildings in the place were in ashes. The court house was of brick, covered with slate, and there people went for protection. The building escaped destruction, and those within were saved, although they suffered badly from heat. There were no lives lost here, but this was exceptional good fortune. Reports from some places are too horrible to read. Numbers of people flying from danger were overtaken and died in the roads, some perished miserably in wells and other places where they had sought safety, and in the terrible time a few women were taken with the pains of childbirth. Everywhere it is a sickening story of suffering and of roasting human flesh in every conceivable way. In some places the heat was almost incredibly intense, and the smoke was everywhere unendurable and caused many deaths by suffocation.

The work of destruction was very uneven. Some towns in the district escaped with a loss which seems trifling, while in others, apparently no more exposed, there are but a few scattering buildings left. The same was true of the villages, some strangely escaping, while others were strangely destroyed. In some field the grass roots, and, it is said, the soil itself are burned so that it is impossible to tell whether the land was plowed or not, while in others near at hand crops of grain are left in the shock untouched.

A remarkable thing in the story of the calamity is the presence of mind that was everywhere shown. The people were accustomed to danger from fire, many of them had been through the similar experience of 1872, and there were fewer lives lost than might have been expected. There seems to have been but little panic and few threw their lives away. Nearly all sought to preserve themselves and property intelligently, to have done about the best that was possible and very much better than could have been expected. Domestic animals and fowls nearly all perished, and it is noted that they died in groups, each with its kind; rarely did cows, horses, or chickens die alone, but all sought the companionship of their kind. Great numbers of birds and insects took their way to the lake, and, overcome by the smoke no doubt, died and were found floating on the surface.

STRENGTH IN PRAYER.

Woe to that man that trusteth in his own wisdom and strength to overcome the enemy of his soul. While a man must use his own resources to work out his salvation, he must also look to him whence all our help must come. While he must be watching, the Christian must also be praying. Having to fight with the powers of darkness, we need divine strength. The dragon must be met sometime in our life, and woe is it to us if we have to meet him alone. We are in an evil world, with a nature susceptible and responsive to evil suggestions and influences. Hence the necessity of leading a life of prayer, that we be kept near God. Honest prayer will draw us away from the power of temptation. While a little boat fastened to a larger one will not draw the larger one to itself, but will itself be drawn toward the larger boat; so prayer will lift a man near to God. He who spends much time in prayer and communion with his God, will be dying constantly to the world, but made more alive to Christ and righteousness. Therefore watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation and fall. How sad a fall that is when a man falls away from grace into sin! Rather loose everything than the heavenly inheritance. For "what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul."

Brevities.

Mr. David Gill, the Astronomer Royal at the Cape of Good Hope, has published his calculations of the solar parallax made for observations of the planet Mars, in the island of Ascension, in 1877. He makes the parallax 8.78, which will give as the mean distance of the earth from the sun 93,080,000 miles.

A RAILWAY INJURED BY AN EARTHQUAKE.

A severe earthquake was lately felt in the southern part of the North Island, New Zealand. No lives were lost, but in some of the townships in the Manawater district scarcely a chimney was left standing. In Foxton, for instance, no less than 250 were thrown down. Fissures extending for many miles are reported to have been made, and the railway line was rendered unsafe in that neighborhood, owing to the undulations of the earth alternately raising and depressing the rails. Since the large shock a good many of a slight nature have occurred.

Among the objects found in one of the old tombs near the village of Seworsk, in the Sakuban district of Southern Russia, were two elaborately ornamented glass vessels, hooped with gold rings, set with rubies, supporting chains which had at the ends heart-shaped pearls. Besides these relics were discovered a golden cup-holder, with two griffins in bas-relief, and a golden plate with a historical representation, also in bas-relief. It is thought by M. Felizen that these finds belong to the time of Persiad II., who began to reign in the year 284 B. C., and that the grave in which they had been deposited was that of some great personage.

Ancient manuscripts of the complete Hebrew Bible are now owned by the British Museum. Two parts of the Hebrew Scriptures have long been in the possession of the Museum. The Hagiographa, exhibiting a recension of the Hebrew text, which makes the set complete, was found among fifteen manuscripts of portions of these Scriptures, recently purchased in Southern Arabia. Two of these manuscripts are said to be the oldest that have yet come to light.

A mysterious personage has appeared in Kairwan, the holy city of North Africa. He calls himself Si Ahmed el Hadi, and is a revered Marabout; but it seems that he has been also a Mormon at the Salt Lake, and has passed through both the Trappist and the Carthusian novitiates. He speaks many languages, has a dignified presence, and a sympathetic face which bears a marked expression of mysticism. He says he has realized his ideal, and attained in Islam the interior peace he sought so long elsewhere in vain. Holding a professorship with a pay of $6 a month, he lives the life of an anchorite, is totally devoid of fanaticism, and maintains that Islamism in no way precludes political or material progress. He resorts to the cafes and arraigns the public and private conduct of high dignitaries, contrasting it with the morality of the Koran and of the early doctors of the faith, and is loud about the embezzlement of the extensive funds of the Pious Trusts, which is, indeed, a universal scandal of Mohammedanism. He has a high reputation for sanctity, and has recently shown his wide influence by protecting Europeans, and it seems as if his position called him to play an important part in the present juncture in Tunis.

MICHIGAN'S LOSS.

The total money loss by the fires in Michigan is estimated at $2,346,413, with an insurance of $638,032, leaving a dead loss of $1,222,781. The burned district extends into the counties of Huron, Sanilac, Manistee, Ottawa and Allegan. It is estimated that about 1,800 square miles were borned over. A careful canvass by the Relief Committee shows that 1,147 dwellings, 23 school houses, 8 churches, 130 stores, 12 hotels, 34 grist and saw mills and 20 decks were burned.

TERRIBLE HURRICANE IN MEXICO.

A violent hurricane raged at Mazatlan, Mexico, from noon to sunset of September 29th. Several vessels in the harbor were damaged and a German bark was totally wrecked. Three hundred houses were demolished, and it is reported that five hundred people were drowned by freshets in the neighboring towns.

A RECENT HURRICANE.

As we came up the narrow and tortuous channel of the Savannah river, the marks of the great storm of August 28 were visible in abundance. There are rice fields on either side of the stream, and on these once stood many cabins and small houses, with barns and other buildings. On the night when the hurricane swept down upon this region, the tide came pouring up the river in a mighty flood. It swept in upon the rice fields until it reached a point fourteen feet above the ordinary high water, and there it stayed until the tempest passed. When it receded, every cabin, house, barn and rice-stack had disappeared. The fields were left forlorn and desolate, and the fruits of the season's toil were gone. For days afterwards dead bodies, the bodies of the drowned, were fished from the pools and the lagoons, until the number of them were counted by scores. The revenue cutter Boutwell lay in the channel with both anchors down and her propeller working; but the inrushing wave lifted her, hurled her clear across the rice fields and left her helpless in the marsh, half a mile away from the river. Other vessels went to the bottom; others still were strained and injured. The loss of life in this immediate vicinity was as great as 300 or 400. The people of the North obtained no adequate notion of the destructive fury of a storm which has had no parallel hereabouts for nearly seventy years.

A writer in the Journal of Science has an article on the sanitary legislation of the Pentateuch, in which he examines the laws of health set forth by Moses, not from the position of the archæologist, the orientalist, or the divine, but simply from that of one interested in sanitary science. He finds that the Hebrew law-giver long ago anticipated the oracles of to-day. "So peculiar," he concludes, "is human progress that it has taken three thousands of years to bring the civilized world to a point less advanced than that occupied by Moses. Less advanced, we say emphatically, because if we now admit the value of personal cleanliness, the importance of avoiding putrescent and loathsome matters, and of expelling them rapidly from our cities, and if we are theoretically aware of the disinfecting and deodorizing power of earth, we are far from embodying this, our knowledge, in the practice of actual life. As to the avoidance of blood of the flesh of foul-feeding animals, and of such as are liable to introduce entozoa into our systems, we do not recognize even verbally the importance of the Mosaic teachings. We eat 'blood puddings,' we feed swine with blood and with foul-smelling offal, and then we eat the animals which have been gorged on this revolting diet. And we pay the price of this uncleanness in shortened lives and in waning vigor. We again call attention to the remarkable physiological insight displayed in the sanitary code of the ancient Israelites, and we repeat the question: Whence did it spring?"

Sow good services; sweet remembrances will grow from them.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GREEK AND ENGLISH!

REVISED

THE EMPHATIC DIAGLOTT

—BY BENJAMIN WILSON.—

Contains the Original Greek text of the New Testament, with an interlinear word-for-word English translation, based on the renderings of eminent critics, and on the various readings of the Vatican Manuscripts, together with Illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references.

The different renderings of various passages in the New Testament are the foundations on which most of the sects of Christians have been built up; with this work each reader may judge for himself whether the words there literally translated are so arranged in the common version as to express the exact meaning of the New Testament writers.

New improved edition on larger paper, 893 pages, cloth $4.00, Library binding $5.00.

THE TREES BY THE RIVER.

MARY ROWLES.

"For he shall be as a tree planted by the waters, and that spreadeth out her roots by the river."—Jer. xvii. 8.

"And he showed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb."—Rev. xxii. 1.

A mighty river journeys on unwasted,
Through all the ages to a shoreless sea;
From far-off heights the rivulets have hasted
To swell its fullness, measureless and free.
No summer drought can touch its springs unfailing,
Or harm the flowers that on its borders grow,
No winter storm its surface peace assailing,
Can reach the depths below.

Beside its banks the Husbandman hath planted
His favored trees, the cedar and the palm,
Whose beauty fades not, for to these are granted
Deep roots that spread, alike in storm and calm,
Beneath the waters, whence they draw with gladness
All elements of sustenance and grace.
The desert heath may fade away in sadness,
Parched in a barren place;

But ever green and beautiful by reason
Of those clear waters edging around,
The trees abide, still bringing forth in season
The clustering fruits with which their life is crowned.
And birds lodge in their branches, some molesting,
And the worn pilgrim to the boundary glare
Pauses awhile beneath their shadow, resting
In grateful coolness there.

That river is the word of God eternal
Still flowing on in changeless purity;
And like tree stately cedar ever vernal,
Or the unbending palm, that soul shall be
Whose secret roots are in its waters growing,
Drawing from sacred springs those rich supplies
Which blossom upward, leaf and bud endowing
With beauty toward the skies.

Far in another realm there is a river
Whose streams make glad the city of our God.
No tolling oars disturb its calm forever,
No weary feet its shining banks have trod.
From the dread presence of the Throne proceeding
Across the sapphire pavement, clear and bright,
It flows forever, where the Lamb is leading
The victors clothed in white.

The water-brooks for which their souls had panted
In desert lands, are all unheeded there,
On either side the river God hath planted
The Tree of Life, whose spreading branches bear
Rich leaves that grow for healing of the nations,
When faint from conflict with the last dark foe,
They reach, at length, their quiet habitations
And rest from pain and woe.

No flaming sword, or watchful angel-warden,
Shall guard the pathways of that happy place,
For God himself, who fashioned all the garden,
There dwells with his redeemed ones face to face,
O better country, through whose stainless portal
No sound may pass of earthly care or strife:
O river flowing on in light immortal!
O wondrous Tree of Life!

SOME THOUGHTS ON CHRISTIANITY AND THE PRACTICE OF ITS GRACES.

J. P. GELLETLY.

When the gospel was first preached by the apostles it was preached in its purity. The objects for which it was preached were manifold, as has been written and as the sequence has shown, but one of the principal objects, and we might say the primary object was to cultivate in a certain class of persons a spirit that was in accord with the spirit of God our Father and his Christ. This spirit on the one hand is a spirit of faith (including trust as well as credence) to God, and on the other a spirit of gentleness, kindness, and charity to our fellow-men.

But even in the days of the apostles and ever since, the doctrines of Christianity have been rendered impure in divers manners. The apostles in their epistles and the revelations to John attest to this, and history has since recorded it, so that in fact we might conclude that at no time in the world's history, apart from the direct teaching of inspired men, has an absolutely pure gospel been promulgated, and that wherever the finger of man touched, it stained as it were.

But must we conclude from this that the objects in general, or this object of which we speak in particular for which the gospel was sent, have not been attained? that God's word returns void to him, not accomplishing that for which he sent it?

Not at all. The frailties of human nature have all been reckoned for and bridged, and where is the man that dare affirm that at any time in the world's history the lamp of faith and love was extinguished? that the earth was without salt, and the salt without savor?

No, hidden for ages beneath the growth of ignorance, fanaticism, and bigotry, there cannot be a doubt that some, even in the darkest times, cultivated Christianity and its graces.

Now, indeed, if it had been necessary that every Christian had to understand all the truths of the gospel, that would darkness have covered the earth, and gross darkness every soul of man, but in the mercy of God his gospel has been so poised that to whom much is given only of such is much required.

I write these remarks for the benefit of those who, it would seem, would have us believe that except the whole purpose of God is understood even as they themselves profess to understand, then a man cannot be a Christian; and some even go so far as to call such apostates. That men who in former times have lived, as far as human ken can pierce, pure and spotless lives, full of faith and love, but ignorant, to a great extent, of the purpose of God in the creation or constitution of man; men who have suffered to the death for Jesus' sake, and even in our own day, men who have penetrated far beyond the confines of civilization; who have dared the savage beast and still more savage man—men shall I say, nay gentle women—ladies—who have left gentle homes for tumult and for war—for what? To teach the story of the cross, or what they know of it, and they are not Christians? Yes, some would have us believe that their blood was shed for dogs to lap, and their lives were spent in vain; and yet it is written that whosoever shall give a "cup of cold water" in his name shall in no wise lose his reward; that whoso loseth his life for Jesus' sake shall find it without qualification or reserve.

The test of Christianity has been put into our hands, and it is in few words—"By their works shall ye know them." I do not disparage mouth preaching, it is well, and the purer the doctrine the better, for "faith cometh by hearing." But there is other preaching that tells even better; it speaks to the heart, and wins its way where arms and force fail; it proves a better guard than soldiery; it commands the respect of Hindoos and Hottentots; such preaching as made old David Livingston loved and respected by the black savages who never understood his speech. "Yet the trail of the serpent is over all" and imperfection and nonsense attached to the best of them all. Let's leave them to their generous God, and remember that their rule of judgment will never be used against us; our position is different from theirs.

Considering these things, what is our duty towards our fellows who are evidently striving after God? To tell them that they are without God and without hope, or here them with their errors, so that they shun our society?

No; first secure their friendship, and last secure their friendship, converse with them on those topics on which we can agree, discern what truth your neighbor holds, and encourage him in it. When occasion offers, flash across accidentally as it were, a beam of those truths we fondly hold and advocate—"Be wise as serpents and harmless as doves.

I wish it particularly understood that this paper is not written in any way to exonerate those who know their Lord's will and fail to comply with the requirements either in ceremonies or morals. I have shown, or endeavored to show, the Scriptural ground for apology in the case of the unenlightened.

Watch Your Words.

BY PANSY.

Keep a watch on your words, my darlings,
For words are wonderful things;
They are sweet, like the bees' fresh honey—
Like the bees, they have terrible stings.
They can bless like the warm, glad sunshine,
And brighten a lonely life;
They can cut, in the fierce of anger,
Like an open two-edged knife.

Let them pass through the lips unchallenged,
If their errand is true and kind—
If they come to support the weary,
To comfort and help the blind;
If a bitter, revengeful spirit
Prompt the words, let them be unsaid;
They may flash through a brain like lightning
Or fall on a heart like lead.

Keep them back, if they're cold and cruel,
Under bar and lock and seal!
The wounds they make, my darlings,
Are always slow to heal.
May peace guard your lives, and ever,
From the time of your early youth,
May the words that you daily utter
Be the words of beautiful truth.

Little Gypsy.

The Thimble.

The name of this little instrument is said to have been derived from "thumbell," being at first thumble, and afterwards thimble. It is a Dutch invention, and was brought to England about the year 1695, by John Lofting. Formerly iron and brass were used, but lately steel, silver, and gold have taken their places.

In the ordinary manufacture, thin plates of metal are introduced into a die, and punched into shape.

In Paris gold thimbles are manufactured to a large extent. Thin sheets of sheet iron are cut into dies of about two inches in diameter. These, being heated red-hot, are struck with a punch into a number of holes, gradually increasing in depth, to give them proper shape. The thimble is then trimmed, polished and indented about its outer surface with a number of little holes, by means of a small wheel. It is then converted into steel by the cementation process, tempered, scoured and brought to a blue color.

A thin sheet of gold is then introduced into the interior and fastened to the steel by means of a polished steel mandrill. Gold leaf is then applied to the outside and attached to it by pressure, the edges being fastened to a small groove made to receive them. The thimble is then ready for use.

Watch Tower.

Look Out for Rocks.

A lad was taking his first trip by water, and, as most boys do, rambled up and down the vessel, watching all about him with eager curiosity.

By and by he stood beside the helmsman. Here and there over the water were scattered floating sticks of painted timber, and now he noticed that the vessel turned aside here and there to avoid them.

"Why do you turn aside for those little sticks?" said the boy. "I should ride right over them."

The gruff old helmsman gave him a glance from under his shaggy brows, and one word which seemed wrenched from the depth of his chest—one word, but it spoke a whole volume:—"Rocks!"

The boy could see no danger. The water looked as fair about the buoys as any other place. He thought in his childish wisdom, that the old man was over particular, so he answered again:

"I wouldn't turn out; I'd go straight ahead."

The old man did not reply, only by a glance such as the boy has not forgotten even in his manhood. It seemed to say, "Poor foolish child, how little you know of rocks!"

That boy has long been a faithful pastor, and he often tells the lambs of his flock about the hidden rocks in their course, rocks that have wrecked a great many bright hopes and precious souls.

The theater is one of these rocks. It may look very innocent and pleasant, but there are fatal rocks there that may sink you in everlasting despair. Don't sip a little wine. Don't go into the company of boys who sometimes utter an oath. You had better turn out when you come to such rocks. There are buoys enough to warn you, good counselors to tell you of your danger. Do not neglect their caution. When an old helmsman says "Rocks," there is danger.

Your Bible is your only true chart. Here you will find the buoys and lighthouses marked down, telling where the rocks are hid.

"Enter not into the path of the wicked and go not in the way of evil men. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away." Prov. iv. 14, 15.

The Christian.

Politeness and Piety.

There is an intimate connection between piety and politeness. The second great command is, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." He who loves his neighbor as himself, is careful not to trample on his rights in any way, and is prompt to apologize for and correct any wrongs which he has done. This innate principle of justice and fairness, is the foundation of true politeness. Then Scripture expressly commands us to "be courteous;" and requires of us not only to love our neighbors, but also to love our enemies, and to pray for those who despitefully use us.

The exercise of a tender and Christian affection, necessarily makes saved men courteous and polite. They do not wish to wrong, insult, or abuse each other. Wrongs, abuses, and quarrels spring from selfishness and a disregard of other's rights.

True Christians are sometimes wronged, insulted, and abused by their brethren in whom the old man seems stronger than the new; and some who are really disposed to be just and honest, yet allow themselves to be uncourteous and impolite. Most of the church quarrels of the day are the result of the impoliteness of ill bred men and women who may have been converted but have never had good breeding. Church members insult each other; they do not treat each other with common courtesy, and the result is a quarrel.

In most instances religion has nothing to do with these difficulties; it is a sad lack of religion, and a lack of good breeding and common sense. Ill-bred and ignorant Christians become meanly jealous of each other, and act in a spiteful, abusive manner, and so destroy fellowship and harmony.

A few lessons upon good manners, administered in childhood and thoroughly enforced, would do more toward keeping peace in the church than is accomplished by many of the homilies and exhortations to which we listen.

The Little Scotch Boy who Became a Great Traveler.

All the children who are fond of reading books of travel, I am sure, have read the stories of Paul du Chailu and his wonderful adventures in Africa, which he wrote specially for young people; but about the great Dr. Livingstone, whose travels were for a different object, and who wrote books for the grown-up people, the children may not know so much.

The story of his life is a very interesting and instructive one, and shows how perseverance, industry and honesty can conquer all obstacles and make of an obscure little country boy a great and noble man.

Like many of the famous men of our own country, who have been born in remote country towns, and whose early life has been that of a farmer's boy or a factory hand, so David Livingstone, or Davie, as his companions called him, was born at Blantyre, in Scotland, a small village near Glasgow, and at ten years of age was put to work in the cotton mill of the town, where he stayed until he was about twenty years old.

From the time when he was a little boy he had a strong love for learning, and would sit up late at night to read and study, and even carry his book into the mill with him, reading a sentence from it whenever his work permitted him to glance at the open page. Think of this as an example of industry and diligence, boys and girls, who find it so hard to study, and "hate" books and school. You have luxurious, comfortable homes; Livingstone's home was poor and unpretending; many of you have servants to do everything for you, and know nothing of what it is to work; he, when a little boy, began the hard, monotonous toil of a factory hand, and did everything for himself; many of you grow cross and fretful when asked to do the slightest service; he bore the most irksome toil in patience, and learned to profit by the discipline.

He continued in the factory until he was quite a young man, having gained an advanced position by his diligence and perseverance.

When he was about twenty-one years old he one day read a paper appealing to the churches of England and America for missionaries to China. This moved his heart very strongly, and he decided to become a missionary, although he could not then tell to what country he would go.

His life thus far had been spent among the poor people of the mills, whose sorrows and wants and burdens he was thoroughly acquainted with, so that his generous, sympathetic heart went out to the poor benighted people of distant lands who had not the opportunities for growing better and becoming good men and women that even the mill people had, and he determined to prepare himself to go to these poor, ignorant barbarians, and try to benefit them.

So he left his home and studied medicine at first, as useful in his work among the people, who knew nothing of doctors and medicine, as you do; and after that he studied theology, which was to help him in preaching and instructing those to whom he was going.

Thus he spent four or five years in preparing for his journeys, working hard and paying his way as he went. At last he felt himself prepared to go, and after saying farewell to home and friends and country he set sail for Africa, and after a voyage of three months landed at Cape Town. He made but a brief stay here, hastening on to begin his work among the savage tribes in the interior.

Indeed, it was a strange country to which he had come; a land of rocky ravines, of tangled forests, of desolate wastes, of thick jungles; unlike the land you know, of cultivated fields and pleasant homes, and beautiful rivers with boats upon them and railways along their banks.

The people, too, were strange, and lived under different laws and customs from ours. Their tribes were named after different animals, which they worshipped superstitiously, and which they feared to kill or eat; part of their religious service was a weird, wild dance, which varied with each tribe, so that when two strangers would meet they would ask, "What do you dance?" just as when you sometimes hear your father, perhaps, ask a strange gentleman, "What city do you come from?"

All kinds of wild animals inhabited this country, and were the terror of the people. Fierce lions, hyenas, jackals and wild dogs or dingoes roamed about at night, and preyed upon the harmless zebras and antelopes, and on one occasion Dr. Livingstone was attacked and very nearly killed by a lion which he and a party of natives were hunting.

In so wonderful a country you may be sure he met with many strange and thrilling adventures, that sound like those of the beautiful young prince in your book of fairy tales, but are better than those because they show the perils a noble and heroic man encountered for the sake of doing good and benefiting mankind.

If I should undertake to tell you all of the wonderful things that happened him, how he traveled into the heart of that great unknown country of Africa; how he discovered new lands, new rivers and new lakes; how he was often near being left alone in the wilderness by his faithless followers; how he went for months or years without letters or news of any sort from home; how he was once reported by some deserting servants to have been killed, and was discovered by one of our countrymen, Mr. Stanley, who tells of all his adventures in finding Dr. Livingstone; how at last he was overcome by the hardships and sickness of his wandering life, and died in the forest alone, with no friends near but his native servants, who found him on his knees by his bed with his head bowed in prayer—to tell you of all these things, and how they brought the body of this great and good man home to London, and gave him a grand tomb in beautiful Westminster Abbey, would take too long a time; and besides, children, I think you would rather ask your father and mother to read it to you, or else read it yourself out of a book that tells it better than I can.

A NEW

PAPER FOR OUR CHILDREN

The YOUTHS' EXAMINER

C. H. JONES, Publisher, Chicago, Ill.

MONTHLY. - - EIGHT PAGES.

SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER YEAR.

Give your children most for reading matter, then they will be satisfied and not be anxious to read trash. The publisher of "The Youths' Examiner" will use every endeavor to make for the children and youth an interesting paper—not one they will partially read from a sense of duty,—but something they will read because they are interested.

EVERY NUMBER ILLUSTRATED

And printed on heavy book paper, and gotten up in an artistic manner. The following is placed at the head of the Editorial columns:

The Youths' Examiner will be devoted to the instruction of our children, in those branches that will not only enlarge their intellectual faculties but strengthen and build up their moral and religious natures. Its exposition of Bible topics will be based upon what is known as the literal view of the prophecies. The mortal nature of man, the reign of Christ and his saints on the earth, etc., etc. The doctrine of the atonement, and life only through Christ will be plainly set forth, and every effort be made to bring these great Bible truths before them in a language both simple and truthful. Easy lessons in science and other important branches will from time to time be given, accompanied with suitable illustrations.

It contains some stories, but only those that contain practical truth and information.

The GOSPEL of the KINGDOM

Advocated in a series of Ten Discourses

—BY WILEY JONES.—

OPINIONS OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy in most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for cost and perusal in the important information it gives. It will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 24, 1879.

"It evinces a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scriptures, and uniform courtesy toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York, Nov. 29, 1881.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested merely, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed. For some of the topics are second to none in importance to us. * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear, and convincing way, should buy this book."—The Rural Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 17, 1879.

"I have read it diligently again and again, * * It is next in point of excellence and doctrinal truths to the Book of books."—D. M. L., Mo.

"I do not know that I have ever seen from the pen of any modern writer, a plainer exhibit of the gospel of the kingdom and at the same time one better suited to general instruction on that subject, than that which Brother Jones gives us in his book, 'The Gospel of the Kingdom, advocated in a series of Ten Discourses.'"—E. E. B, Va.

THE RESTITUTION,
Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:
THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." And as means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a heavy blow at the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE.

Its Proximity. Quickly. Its Location. Duration. Voice of the Seventh Angel.

No. 90.

J. P. WEETHER.

Our Location on the Apocalyptic Chart.—This we learn from the following:—

"The second woe is past; behold, the third woe cometh quickly." Rev. xi. 14.

We have traced the history of the trumpets. The first four marked God's judgments in the overthrow of the Roman empire of the West, or Latin empire; the fifth and sixth, or the first and second woe trumpets, were the war signals for the attack and overthrow of the Eastern, or Greek empire. The sixth trumpet closed about A. D. 1844. The first six trumpets have no interval between their soundings. Between the close of the sixth trumpet, and the sounding of the seventh, a space of time intervenes called quickly. It has other names; voice of the seventh angel; and, also, delay, (of the sounding of the seventh trumpet). These features will be noticed—"quickly," because the time will be short; "voice of the seventh angel," because the events of its seventh are proclaimed in advance; "delay," because the trumpet delays to sound, in order to give time for a special work; but is about to sound—short delay.

All admit that we are living in an extraordinary period. It is our purpose to show that extraordinary agents make it such. Extraordinary agents stamp their features upon the time. It being upon the eve of a great conflict, agents are to be sent forth to prepare and gather the opposing elements. In this period the "Mystery of God is finished." We often hear it said:—

"We are living in a grand and awful time."

What make it such?

The agents and their work.

Six remarkable agents belong to this period: three for Christ and three for Satan. It is the eve and the vestibule of that great day of God Almighty. The elements are being prepared, and are gathering. All nations will take part in the struggle, either under the banner of the wild beast, or under that of the dragon, or under that of the false prophet; while the soldiers of the cross will marshal under the standard of the Son of God.

It is impossible to enter into the spirit of these times without excitement. We are fully convinced that we are already in the age of national judgment: the great day of God's preparation. During that period an extraordinary work is to be accomplished, requiring extraordinary workers. The contest is for universal dominion. The great rival contestants are now, and will be the same that contended for the possession of the first Eden, the seed of the woman (Christ), and the seed of the serpent (Satan). When Christ comes he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet.

If we can show that we are now located between the sixth and seventh trumpets, we shall establish the fact of the proximity of Messiah's age.

We have traced the historical chain through six trumpets. We now desire to demonstrate our position by describing the period, its agents and work, and comparing the elements of the predicted and present ages.

1. The predicted age, its names, and elements.

That John saw the world in that space, called "Quickly," will not be questioned. Let us examine his delineations. We shall then be prepared to compare that period with the times we now occupy.

I. That period is a delay—ὅταν μέλλῃ σαλπίζειν —when he is about to sound (Revised Version), sounding in the future μέλλω (mello) has the following meanings:—

To be about; on the point of; to design; intend; be bent upon; to linger; delay; loiter; procrastinate; defer; hesitate.

In every one of the 110 passages in the New Testament where "Mello" (Mello) is used, it denotes something to transpire in the near future, but delayed. In Acts xvii. 16, it is rendered "tarriest." There is a delay, but it is short, very properly expressed, "about to," "about to sound the trumpet." In the Revised Version on Rev. x. 7, in the margin, the angel's oath is rendered "There shall be delay no longer," — ουκ χρονος ουκ εσται : that time is not yet—the time to finish the mystery of God is not yet; and under the seven thunders; but it shall be finished under the voice of the seventh trumpet while he shall delay to sound. Such appears to be the proper construction of the language.

2. It is a short delay—the third woe cometh quickly: and the seventh angel sounded. A short work is to be made. The delay is only of sufficient duration to allow the six agents to accomplish their work.

3. This period is called the voice of the seventh angel evidently for the reason that the events that were to transpire during the continuance of said trumpet were to be uttered in advance. Their nature demanded preparation in those interested, and as knowledge precedes guilt, God gave these events a voice and a tongue. That voice was required to dwell on the elements of the seventh trumpet.

1. Anger of the nations.
2. God's wrath.
3. Judgment, resurrection of the dead (righteous).
4. Rewards.
5. Overthrow of the wicked nations; in a word, the coming reign of subjugation was to be proclaimed in advance, like the flood; the overthrow of the five cities; the seventy years' captivity, and the fall of Babylon, and Jerusalem by Titus.

This body of messengers is a seventh agent belonging to this period of delay. Its office is more general than either of the other six.

4. The finishing of the mystery of God belongs to this period. This mystery will be fully explained in its order; it is now only named as one of the phenomena of the delay period. The gospel has its mysteries. The kingdom of Christ has its mysteries. All nations are now veiled. That covering will be removed.

5. It is the day of God's preparation. By the expression, "God's preparation," we do not wish to be understood as endorsing the common interpretation of Nahum ii. 3–5, that the prophet was directing his prophetic glass to the picture of our times particularly; or that the events represented did not suit Nineveh; but we are willing to say, that his description would equally apply to our days; and there is a striking analogy between the condition of the people of God in Nineveh and their state in our times. Especially are they alike as to the points named. We call it, more particularly, the day of God's preparation from the many special agents God has in the field.

Against the capital of the Assyrian empire, one minister (angel) was sent with a special message. Against the fourth monarchy of the Gentile domination, during the period of delay, four special messengers are executing their commissions.

6. How long is this period of delay? How many years will it occupy?

This question we shall not attempt to answer. A very considerable portion is already a matter of history. The seven plagues of agents are at their work, and will continue until the seventh trumpet marks the beginning of the final conflict.

7. This period is marked, in its commencement, by great judgments on the harlot; and, also, by the slaying of the witnesses. These events will claim our attention in their proper order. The surroundings of this period are quite complicated, and will, therefore, require special attention. Between the close of John's record of the events of the second woe, and his narration of the events of the third woe (seventh trumpet) he has described some remarkable transactions:—

1. The mission of the rainbow angel.
2. The seven thunders (sealed).
3. His oath.
4. The prophesying, and death, and the resurrection of the two witnesses.

Are these events recorded in their chronological order? or are they parenthetical?

It will be admitted that the author of the revelations to John knew their order of sequence; and that he could have presented such an order to the prophet.

Did he follow that order?

We answer:—Many chains of events begin back centuries before the final consummation, and extend to that period. Of these John had distinct visions. The trumpets constituted such a series; the witnesses formed another chain of events; the sun-clad woman another; the beasts another; the harlot another. These all follow different times of prophetic events; yet they appear to terminate in the same great catastrophe.

So far we have traced one chain to the vicinity of the great conflict. This One (the trumpets) we propose still to follow through the delay.

1. This delay begins with a noted judgment. Daniel has a view of this judgment in its national aspect; John in its religious. Daniel, in a vision, is introduced to a court session of the Ancient of days. He sees, and describes the presiding judge with his court retinue when about to sit in judgment on the little horn. His garments snow white; his hair like pure wool. His throne of judgment, a fiery flame, was upon wheels of burning fire.

A river of fire rolled before him. Countless myriads were waiting upon his throne, and ten thousand thousands stood before him; the judgment was set, and the books (of charges and testimony) were opened. This judgment, in its various sessions, continues till the beast (fourth, or Roman) was slain (still future) and his body consumed. The session of that judgment which now interests us was occupied with the trial of one of the beast's family, the youngest of eleven children (horns) called another little horn. This horn was an enemy of the ten horns (as he subdued three); and, more remarkably hostile to the Son of Man and his family. Daniel is informed that this Son of Man, the Son of the Presiding Judge, is to have universal dominion for himself and family, judgment being rendered against the little horn and in favor of the saints.

The charges against this little horn were:—

1. Speaking great words against the Most High (Presiding Judge).
2. Wearing out the saints of the Most High.
3. Changing times and laws for three and a half times.

He was found guilty of all these specifications, with others of a similar nature; was deposed and stripped of his dominion (civil). Following this judgment the saints came into the possession of a universal kingdom.

No one, familiar with history, can fail to identify the papal hierarchy of the little horn; the horn itself symbolizes civil power; its eyes (Roman see) and mouth denoting ecclesiastical power.

The Ancient of days was the judge; the ten horns were the executors of the judgment. The following fact will be admitted:—

(1.) The civil dominion of that power is taken away; (2.) therefore a sentence has been executed, since the execution was to succeed the sentence; (3.) but the sentence must follow the trial; consequently the trial is also a matter of history; (4.) and if the trial is in the past, the sessions of that trial are past also; consequently, Dan. vii. 9–28 is fulfilled, except the destruction of the beast, and the reign of the saints.

We are therefore now living in the hour of God's national executive judgment. The fall of papal civil power (dominion of the little horn) will certainly not be questioned, and that its dominion came to a full end a few years since, is a matter of history.

John is shown another phase of this judgment. Its apostate phase; its ecclesiastical character. The crimes of this horn are ecclesiastical as well as civil. He plucked up three horns; he also made war on the saints and prevailed against them to such an extent that the Most High was obliged to interfere by his terrible judgment.

John is called by an angel to view that judgment:—

"Come hither; I will show unto thee the judgment of the great harlot that sitteth upon many waters; with whom the kings of the earth committed fornication." * * * "And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus." * * * "These (the ten horns of the fourth beast) shall war against the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them, for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings." * * * "And the ten horns which thou sawest, and the beast, these shall hate the harlot, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and shall burn her utterly with fire, for God did put it into their hearts to do his mind, and to come to one mind, and to give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God be accomplished." Rev. xvii. 1, 2, 6, 14, 16, 17.

The civil power of the same agent appears in Rev. xiii. 5–7. The time and character of this judgment are determined. This national decision is about 1798, and was fully executed about 1868–72.

Selections.

THE ROMAN SHOT.

I have just landed in this country, and have not seen the accounts that may have been published of the disturbances which took place in Rome on the night of July 12, on the occasion of the removal of the remains of Pope Pius IX. from St. Peter's to their appointed resting place in the Church of St. Lorenzo. From the editorials, however, and paragraphic items which have met my eye I am satisfied that the accounts that have reached this country have been very partial ones, and neither gave due prominence to the great provocations by which the Roman populace were goaded to the unseemly acts of which they were guilty nor laid the responsibility of the first desecration of the dead at the doors where it properly belonged.

I have no hesitation in saying (and I speak with the experience of one who was whirled back from the front to help quell the riots which disgraced our Northern cities in the days when Gettysburg was fought)—I have not the least hesitation in saying that, had the mob that dominated the city of Rome on the night of July 12 been a New York mob, with anything like the same provocation that the Roman one had, not only would the body of the late pope been flung into the Tiber, but few of the ecclesiastics in attendance would have been left to tell the tale of the outrage. As an actual fact, nobody was seriously hurt; though the Roman populace were strong enough to have done what they listed to the body or its attendant cortege. There were, undoubtedly a few men who, goaded by the memory of cruel wrongs, of imprisonment, tortures, banishment, suffered for their country's sake under the government of Pius IX., might have been ready to go to the length of actual bloodshed or of laying hands on the remains of their dead persecutor; but such were repressed by the mass of the populace, who wished to do no real injury, but simply to make a counter-demonstration to the one which those whom they believe to be the deadliest enemies of the nation had craftily sprung upon them.

I was not in Rome myself on the night of the disturbance, but returned there three days later, while the city was still in a state of ferment and at white heat against the government for punishing only the Liberals among those arrested on the night in question, and letting the clericals, who seemed, from the evidence, to have given more blows than they received, go free. I may add here that the sentences against the Liberals, given at the moment by the lower tribunals, were later set aside, on appeal to the supreme court. I can not speak, therefore, as an eye witness; but the account which I shall give was furnished me entirely from the Roman Catholic side, by ecclesiastics who were personally cognizant of all the details in the arrangement for the removal of the pope's remains.

The two parties who had any right to take order for the removal were, first, the actual pope, Leo XIII., and, secondly, the three cardinals appointed by the late pope as the executors of his will. They conjointly charged the Chapter of St. Peter's with the arrangements for the removal, instructing them, however, that it was to be done at the dead of night and with absolute privacy. The chapter accepted the charge, and, as a first step, resolved that the whole chapter should accompany the remains to the Church of St. Lorenzo. The chapter numbers thirty canons. Word of this having reached the pope, he forbade it on the ground that it would make too much of a public demonstration, and directed the chapter that four only of their number should go in one carriage, as representative of the whole body. A second carriage should convoy the ministering ecclesiastics and those whose duty it was to attest the seals and deposit the coffin.

The day before the removal was to take place the chapter found that they had no hearse heavy enough to carry the body, which, with its enclosing coffins, weighed several tons. They have lately been governed by a great spirit of economy, in order to invest all the money they can lay by in English funds, with a weather eye to storms ahead. They bethought themselves of the high skeleton car used for hauling heavy blocks of stone for the repairs of St. Peter's. This was made to do duty as a funeral car, and, draped with the purple hanging which in past days was wont to do duty on the balcony of St. Peter's, when the pope gave the benediction at Eastertide, and, drawn by four black horses, it presented an imposing and somewhat gorgeous appearance. This, with the two carriages above referred to, constituted the whole funeral cortege, as authorized by the pope and arranged by the Chapter of St. Peter's. For the moving of this the chapter, through their architect, Count Vespignani, asked the permission of the government, which was unquestioningly accorded.

The party, however, to whom Padre Curci has given the name of the "old zealots," were not satisfied with these unobtrusive arrangements. They saw in the occasion an opportunity to make a telling political demonstration against united Italy, and, to a certain extent, also, against Leo XIII., whom not a few of them (the new neglected favorites of the late pope) hate and others mistrust, as weakly inclined to the more astute and far-seeing policy which Padre Curci has so strongly advocated, as the only hopeful means of re-enslaving the world to the Papacy. To this end they determined to organise secretly a great demonstration of their adherents, through the agency of what are called the Catholic societies—really well-drilled political clubs, organised for the maintenance and propagation of the most extreme Papal claims. Every effort was made, by means of confidential circulars and personal persuasions, to gather to the piazza of St. Peter's, without regard to age or sex, such as could be induced to join in the funeral procession, and also to persuade as many as possible of the residents along the route to illuminate their apartments, out of respect to the illustrious and fallen dead. They utterly refused to respect the instructions of the pope in the matter, and, when his wishes were conveyed to them, answered that they were bound to obey him in points of faith and worship, even to the changing of the sacraments, if he so decreed; but not in regard to the respect that they chose to pay to the memory of his predecessor. They actually, thus, while protesting for the return of the temporal power to the Papacy, took advantage of its now being in the hands of the Italians to defy the pope to his face and utterly refuse obedience to his wishes.

The Church of St. Peter's was closed at 7 p. m., and the long operation of getting down the coffin from its vault in the wall and loading it on the improvised hearse in one of the adjacent courtyards proceeded with, in the presence of the Chapter of St. Peter's and a few privileged spectators, with all due ceremony. This lasted until midnight. Meanwhile, outside of the church had been gathered a great number of carriages and a body of four thousand priests, monks, students and zealots (both men and women), anxiously awaiting the coming out of the authorized cortege, which they proposed to accompany, with lighted torches, to the Church of St. Lorenzo, which is situated about a mile outside of the walls, on the opposite side of the city from St. Peter's. The total distance by the route chosen is, I should think, nearly five miles. Now appeared the first yielding of Leo XIII. to the coercion that the "old zealots" had brought to bear upon him. When he saw how imposing was the demonstration that was gathering he became alarmed, lest he should be accused of a want of respect to his predecessor. He, therefore, at the eleventh hour, ordered out two of his own carriages, to accompany the remains, with certain of his personal attendants, as his representatives. The authorized procession, therefore, that finally, after midnight, issued from the enclosure of St. Peter's, consisted simply of the hearse and four carriages, filled with representative ecclesiastics. It was immediately taken possession of by the wholly unauthorized clerical mob which was waiting outside, who, surrounding it, moved forward with it, bearing their lighted torches and chanting the funeral psalms.

The populace, meanwhile, had had some inkling of what was preparing for them, and had time enough before the procession moved to see what proportions the anti-national demonstration was taking, and to make up their minds in some way to defeat it. They were quick-witted enough to see that, if they allowed it to pass in silence, they would become in a way partakers in it, or, at least, would be represented as such in the carefully prepared accounts which would be distributed the next morning all through the country and over the world. I may note here, in this connection, that the leading Papal paper in Rome had unwisely set up an article in this sense before the removal took place, which, in the confusion of the night, appeared in the next morning's issue. It described how all Rome had reverently turned out to honor, in silence, with uncovered head, on bended knee, the remains of their deeply-lamented and regretted pontiff and sovereign.

As the evening wore on, and the populace saw that the government was unready to interfere and, by prohibiting the removal under its changed conditions, save them from the trap that had been so cunningly laid for them, they determined to stand for themselves and make such a counter-demonstration as should effectually scotch the Clerical demonstration and prevent the occasion serving the purposes of their nation's enemies. I think that many intended to go no farther than to greet it with cheers for Italy, the king and Garibaldi; but, as the long procession approached the bridge of St. Angelo, a group of well-known Radicals of the lower class began to sing a Garibaldian marching song—"Addio, mia bella!" ("Good-bye, Sweet-heart!") — whose ringing refrain well nigh drowned the funeral chants. The justly-enraged monks and students sang more lustily, and presently were provoked into trying to stop the profane mouths of their mockers with blows from their torches, and, what was infinitely more dangerous, answered the cheers for Italy and Humbert I. with their most agressive war-cry: "Viva il Papa-Re!" ("Long Live the Pope-King!")

The American people have never known any cry of treason or threatening, in any period of our history, so hateful as this cry to Italian ears. It embodies the memories of generations of hopeless slavery and oppression. It means to them the extinction of their newly-gained national life and of their individual liberty. My only wonder is that when this cry was raised, those who had uttered it were not pitched headlong into the Tiber. That's what would have happened had the offence been committed against a people like those who the other day, in one of our Western States, so promptly endorsed the citizen who knocked down the coward who dared to wish that our wounded president would die.

A single voice, indeed, raised the cry in regard to the pope's body, "Fling it into the Tiber;" but it met with no support from the populace. From that moment, however, all was disorder. At every possible opening the populace broke in upon the procession, delaying it, obstructing it at every step, singing their most revolutionary songs around the hearse, reviling the ecclesiastics in the carriages, spitting at them, and casting at them garbage and whatever small missiles came to hand, until, at last, the funeral cortege reached the gate of the city in perfect rout, with not a tithe of those who started out with it, and the authorities closed the gates, to screen its flight from the following mob. But through it all nobody was hurt.

"It was brutal! It was horrible!" said one ecclesiastic to me. "But we provoked it. We brought it upon ourselves."

I think it will appear from what I have said that the first to profane the dead were the Catholic societies of Rome—the priests and others—who, under the pretense of honoring a departed pontiff, deliberately desecrated what ought to have been a purely religious ceremony, by turning it into a political demonstration. Their sin in this matter was greater than that of the ignorant and much-provoked populace.

The incident also furnishes a curiously striking illustration of the real relation of the pope to the Papal system. He is apparently the most absolute head, whose will no one may gainsay. As a matter of fact, he has not the power of free action against his surroundings that our president has. He is simply the chief crank in a great machine, which must work with the machine or break.

In this case he was disobeyed and defied openly by his own party. He was most indignant, but could not help himself, and was cowed into a partial yielding before the procession started. Since that time he has been simply coerced into taking the open position he has done (that it would be dangerous for him to go out after these disturbances) by representations like those of the cardinal-archbishop of Paris, which have been poured upon him from all quarters. He knows perfectly well that the Italian insults and outrages to his predecessor's remains were wilfully provoked; that their animus was purely that of a political counter-demonstration; and that, if he went out to-day and quietly fulfilled the duties which he owes to the people of Rome as a Christian Bishop, he would not only be perfectly safe from insult or injury, but be greeted on all sides with the respect due to his high office and personal character. The Romans would never associate him with the temporal power he has never held. He would be received as a Christian bishop. All this he knows and has felt the force of; but he has been mastered by those whom he ought to guide himself, and has had to yield his convictions to the over-powering show of opinion and prejudice against him.—Robert J. Nevin, D. D., American Chaplain in Rome, Italy.

HOPE THAT EVIL WILL HAVE AN END.

We must not, indeed, venture to conclude at once, from our conviction of the divine goodness and power, that evil will ever cease to exist, since we know not how to explain the existence of evil at all. We can only say there is some unknown cause for it; and that it is a foolish presumption to think of assigning a limit to the effects of the unknown cause, except revelation guides us. But when we are told that Christ is to "reign till he shall have put all things under his feet," and "that the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death; this does afford some ground for expecting the ultimate extinction of evil and of suffering, by the total destruction of such as are incapable of good and of happiness. If "eternal death" means final death—death without any revival—we can understand what is meant by "Death being the last enemy destroyed," viz., that none henceforth can be subjected to it. But if "Death" be understood to mean everlasting life in misery, then it would appear that Death is never to be destroyed at all; since although no one should henceforth be sentenced to it, it would still be going on as a continual infliction forever.—Whately's Scripture Revelations of a Future State.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CRAFLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Nov. 9, 1881.

Stockholders Meeting.

As per Amendment to the Constitution, the Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Christian Publishing Association, will be held on the second Saturday in November (12th), 1881, in Plymouth, Indiana.

E. K. BARNHILL, Sec'y.

BROTHER MAGRUDER has been compelled to defer his articles on account of inability to write or read from an inflammation affecting his eyes.

As we were absent at the Conference at Rensselaer during its continuance, we have not the time to write a contemplated editorial or two, without delaying the paper. The Conference passed off very pleasantly. We will write a more particular account hereafter. As the meeting of Stockholders convenes on Saturday of this week to arrange for the management of THE RESTITUTION for the coming year we shall have to get our report in readiness, and so waive writing on any subject till after the meeting.

THE CAUSE OF BARON ROTHSCHILD'S DEATH.

LONDON, Nov. 2.—Truth says the late Baron James Rothschild incurred losses on the Bourse in October that amounted to 80,000,000 francs, and his anxiety caused the bursting of an aneurism.

AN ARABIAN REVOLT AGAINST THE SULTAN.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 3.—There is much anxiety here about affairs in Arabia. Rumors, probably exaggerated, are current that the Sheriff of Mecca has declared himself Khalif, and has liberated Midhat Pasha. It appears true, however, that certain tribes in the vicinity of Mecca are in revolt. The Sheriff is suspected of connivance at the movement. The Turkish commander is instructed to arrest him, if necessary.

PERUVIAN ANARCHY TO BE ENDED.

LONDON, Nov. 3.—Advices from Buenos Ayres of the 8th ult. state that the government of Chili has sent a special mission to Peru to conclude a treaty of peace or to provide for the complete military occupation of Peru.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Nov. 6.—Advices from Mecca to the end of October are to the effect that the number of cases of cholera averaged fifteen daily. The number of pilgrims in the city however is 1000,000.

LONDON, Nov. 6.—The government will appoint four additional sub-commissions in Ireland to meet the block of the applications now before the Land Court. The applications number 16,000.

Arrests continue to be made in all parts of Ireland. The number of suspects now in prison is two hundred and forty.

The correspondent of the News says the Pope has expressed himself strongly in condemnation of the proceeding of the Irish Land League.

VIENNA, Nov. 6.—With a view to prevent any misunderstanding in regard to King Humbert's visit here, Austria has issued a circular note to her representatives abroad, explaining the meaning of the visit, which is still causing excitement in Russia.

ONE MAN STRUCK SPEECHLESS AND ANOTHER DEAD AFTER CURSING THE ALMIGHTY.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., Nov. 1.—People in this vicinity are much excited over two remarkable events which have just been reported. Robert Nelson, aged seventy, has suffered heavily by reason of the long continued drought, and one day began cursing the Lord for permitting such an affliction. While thus engaged he suddenly fell backward, having been stricken with paralysis. He has not spoken since. A similar occurrence is reported in Union County, where a young man named John Freeman, who had spoken blasphemously of the Lord for not sending rain, was struck by lightning and killed. These incidents were the topics of several preachers Sunday.

ROME, Nov. 3.—At a secret consistory Monday the Pope spoke with unwonted violence. He strongly blamed the Emperor Francis Joseph for receiving King Humbert. He said something must be done to shake off the yoke from the church.

THE PHENOMENA OF DEATH.

It is our purpose to discuss, as briefly as possible, some of the most important aspects of dissolution. Addison said there was nothing in history more imposing than, nothing so pleasing and affecting as, the accounts of the behavior of eminent persons in their dying hours; and Montaigne remarks, while speculating on death, that, of all the passages in the annals of mankind, those which attracted and delighted him most were the words and gestures of dying men.

"If I were a maker of books," he continues, "I would compile a register with comments of various deaths, for he who should teach men to die would teach them to live."

There are three elements presented in this fear of death:

First, the extinction of life's pleasures, interests and hopes, to which the mind looks forward with a degree of apprehension proportionate to the amount of happiness they are capable of affording. With the young and vigorous the loss of these animal enjoyments is contemplated with extreme misery; hence the custom among the early Greeks of bearing the lifeless body of youth to the funeral pyre at the break of morn, "lest the sun should behold so sad a sight as the young dead."

Second, the dread of the unknown future, also depending upon the nervous temperament.

And lastly comes a fear more powerful than either, which is the dread of pain, inherent in nature. From time immemorial the actual moment of dissolution has been supposed to be accompanied by a throe of anguish, known as the "death agony." This is believed to occur at that moment when the spiritual and physical forces that have been so intimately blended for so many years are torn asunder—the one to molder and decay, the other to take upon itself that new life beyond the ken of man.

This last element properly belongs to the physiologist; and as such we propose to consider it. Sir Francis Bacon, in one of his essays, published for the first time in the year 1577, gave to the world the following profound thought:

"It is as natural to die as to be born; and to the little infant, perhaps, the one is as painful as the other."

In profundity of thought and depth of research Bacon stepped in advance of his cotemporaries, and lived in the future. Thus we find that, contrary to the generally received opinion of even this latter day, nature evidently designed that the end of man should be as painless as his beginning.

At birth the babe undergoes an ordeal that, were he conscious, would be more trying than a most painful death. Yet he feels it not. Born in an unconscious state, the brain incapable of receiving conscious impressions, his entrance into this hitherto unknown world is accomplished during a state of oblivion, known as nature's anæsthesia:

> Painless we come; whence we know not—
> Painless we go, whither we know not!

From the earliest period of human history death has been considered as necessarily accompanied by pain: so general is this belief that the terms "death agony," "last struggle," "pangs of death," etc., have been in almost universal use in every age and under all conditions of society.

Nothing could be more erroneous; the truth is, pain and death seldom go together—we mean the last moments of life. Of course, death may be preceded by weeks and even months of extreme suffering, as occurs in certain incurable diseases.

So exaggerated has been this notion that it has been considered an act of humanity to anticipate the "death struggle" by violence; for ages it was customary among the lower classes of Europe to hasten death by suddenly jerking the pillow from beneath the head of the dying, thus throwing the head backward, straining the pharyngeal and thoracic muscles, rendering the respiration, already difficult, shortly impossible. A Venetian Ambassador, in the time of Queen Mary, asserted that it was a common custom among the country people to smother the dying by means of a pillow placed over the face, upon which leaned or sat the nearest relative. This was founded upon the pious belief that the short road was the best one. This custom was handed down from generation to generation, parents performing it for their children and vice versa. But perhaps the saddest privilege ever allowed the friends of a dying man occurred occasionally during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when through executive clemency—executions by hanging—they were permitted to grasp the feet of the suspended criminal and, by clenching to the extremities, precipitate their additional weight on the body, thereby hastening strangulation. It is needless to say that these theories are false in both conception and practice. Death is a physiological process, and, like all other animal functions, should be painless.

When the fiat of death went forth, nature kindly provided an anæsthetic for the body. As the end of life draws near, the respiration becomes slow and shallow, interrupted now and then by a deep, sighing inspiration, as though the lungs were vainly endeavoring to throw off the palsy slowly creeping over them. As the intervals between the inspirations grow longer the blood becomes saturated with carbonic-acid gas—the same which is formed from burning charcoal, whose deadly fumes have so often aided the suicide painlessly to destroy life.

While the power of breathing is gradually failing, the heart, which is in close sympathy with the lungs, begins to contract with less force, propelling the blood only a short distance through its arterial channels, thus causing the extremities to grow cold.

The blood sent to the brain is not only diminished in quantity, but it is laden with carbonic-acid gas, which, acting on the nerve centers, produces a gradual benumbing of the cerebral ganglia, thereby destroying both consciousness and sensation. The patient gradually sinks into a deep stupor, the lips become purple, the face cold and livid, cold perspiration (death damp) collects on the forehead, a film creeps over the cornea, and, with or without convulsions, the dying man sinks into his last sleep. As the power of revolving conscious impressions is gone, the death struggle must be automatic. Even in those cases where the senses are retained to the last, the mind is usually calm and collected, and the body free from pain.

"If I had strength to hold a pen, I would write how easy and delightful it is to die!" were the last words of the celebrated surgeon, William Hunter; and Louis XIV. is recorded as saying with his last breath: "I thought dying had been more difficult."

That the painlessness of death is due to some benumbing influence acting on the sensory nerves may be inferred from the fact that untoward external surroundings rarely trouble the dying.

On the day that Lord Collingwood breathed his last the Mediterranean was tumultuous; those elements which had been the scene of his past glories rose and fell in swelling undulations, and seemed as if rocking him asleep. Capt. Thomas ventured to ask if he was disturbed by the tossing of the ship. "No, Thomas," he answered, "I am in a state that nothing can disturb me more—I am dying; and I am sure it must be consolatory to you and all who love me to see how comfortably I am coming to my end."

In the Quarterly Review there is related an instance of a criminal who escaped death from hanging by the breaking of the rope. Henry IV., of France, sent his physician to examine him, who reported that after a moment's suffering the man saw an appearance like fire, across which appeared a beautiful avenue of trees. When a pardon was mentioned the prisoner coolly replied that it was not worth asking for.

Those who have been near death from drowning, and afterward restored to consciousness, assert that the dying suffer but little pain. Capt. Marryatt states that his sensations at the time, when nearly drowned, were rather pleasant than otherwise:

"The first struggle for life once over, the water closing around me assumed the appearance of waving green fields. * * * It is not a feeling of pain, but seems like sinking down, overpowered by sleep, in the long, soft grass of the cool meadow."

Now, this is precisely the condition presented in death from disease. Insensibility soon comes on, the mind loses consciousness of external objects, and death rapidly and placidly ensues from asphyxia.

In spite of the natural antagonism to death, a moment's reflection will show that it is as much a physiological process as life; the two terms are correlative, the degree of vital activity depending on the extent of molecular death occurring at the same time. Strange as the paradox may seem, without death we can not live; every thought emanating from the brain, every blow struck by the arm, is accompanied by destruction of nervous or muscular tissue. The bioplasmatic or living matter which enters into the formation of every animal tissue is constantly germinating into cells (the origin of all life), and as constantly passing into decay, their places being taken by other protoplasts, thus keeping up the "active dance of life."

This dissassimilation, or interstitial death, occurs to such an extent that nature, in her wisdom, has provided excrementory organs for the purpose of removing from the system the effete material thus produced. Every living structure, after passing through certain stages of development, maturity and, finally, retrogression, must come to an end. This may be but the ephemeral existence of some of the lower forms of fungi which, born in the cool of the morning, die as the sun goes down; or, like the famous dragon-tree of Tenerife, may outlast the pyramids that keep watch by the Nile.

The last topic for consideration is the pseudopia of death, or visions of the dying. This subject, coming under the realm of mental science, properly belongs to metaphysics rather than physiology. Various theories have been advanced to explain these phenomena, but they must remain as hypotheses at best, for they are not susceptible of demonstration. It is not an uncommon occurrence for the dying, after living some hours in a semi-conscious condition, to start up suddenly, and, with glowing face, point eagerly to some object invisible to the bystanders, and, with animated voice and gesture, state that they behold the glories of heaven or the familiar countenance of some friend long since dead.

The question naturally arises as to whether these conditions are merely the fantasies of a disordered and fast-disorganizing brain, or are the dying actually permitted a momentary view of those mysteries hitherto unknown.

The traditions and superstitions of the past have led to a popular belief in the latter theory. Shakespeare expressed the sentiment of his day when he placed in the mouth of the dying Queen Katharine these words:

> Saw you not even now a blessed troop
> Invite me to a banquet; those bright faces
> Cast thousand beams upon me like the sun?

Science, with its iconoclastic hand, has swept away these pleasing fancies, and in their places has constructed a fabric founded on analogy. In the anæsthesia induced by chloroform a condition is produced closely resembling that immediately preceding death (caused by the carbonic-acid poisoning) in which visions are constantly presented to the mind, the character of which depends upon the natural temperament of the individual. Thus it often occurs that a patient, when under the influence of chloroform, has beatific visions similar to those of the dying. It is my fortune to have at present a patient who invariably when under the influence of chloroform asserts that she sees angels hovering around her bed. The impression is so strong that she becomes much annoyed if the reality of these visions is disputed. The asphyxia produced by burning charcoal is oftimes accompanied by disturbed fancies similar to those preceding death.

THE JEWS AND PALESTINE.

The interest with which prominent representatives of the Jewish race are regarding the movement to establish large settlements of their ill-faring brethren of Europe in Palestine continues to grow, and is assuming a practical shape. The project of the removal of a part of the race to its old home in the East finds favor, entirely apart from any religious considerations, because it promises to be a means of relief from ill usage. Religious sentiment and belief would alone win the favor of orthodox Jews for it, but very many look upon it with approval now who on principle would be opposed to colonization in Palestine as a religious movement.

Influential Hebrew journals, the old and learned Hammagid, the Berlin Judische Presse, and the Habasaleth of Jerusalem, have been especially earnest in advocating the idea. Strong appeals to the Jews of Russia, Roumania, and Germany are also made by the "Meljasde Hayeschow," an association which has purchased a large plot of ground near Jaffa, and which represents the climate of the country as healthy, the land fertile, and the Arabs not so troublesome as have been reported. A successful colony of Protestant Christians from Wurtemberg, that is settled there, is pointed to as proof of the truth of these representations.

Nor do we hear only of argument and advice. Practical steps appear to have been taken by wealthy and influential citizens of Germany and England, who have applied to the Sultan for a grant of land in Syria, and who propose to construct roads and railways and to establish colonies around the stations. Any profits which may be realized beyond what are necessary to the success of the project are to be paid to the Turkish Government. This proposal is said to be viewed favorably by the Sultan's Ministers. The Jews of Constantinople are also said to have drawn up a memorial to the Porte on the subject.

The fact cannot be disguised that this project is encompassed by difficulties. An unruly surrounding population, a scanty water supply, the lack of an orderly government and of wise and well-executed laws, must be faced; yet, with the influence that the prominent Hebrews of the world can command, the resources and facilities that they can supply, and possibly with some form of foreign protectorate, these obstacles can be overcome, and the land that once was described as flowing with milk and honey can be made to bloom and prosper again. At all events, it is certain that no other field is open to colonization on a large scale that offers better conditions.

The efforts of the Alliance Israelite Universelle in sending refugees from Russia to the United States have necessarily been confined to very restricted limits. A few hundred families, and those not the more distressed and needy ones, are all that are likely to arrive here this year. Practically this is no relief at all to the two or three million Jewish inhabitants of the Russian empire. Something on a much larger scale is needed. Some of the Russian refugees are said to have gone to Switzerland, but there is neither room nor cheap land there for any large number. The Argentine Republic is said to have invited Jewish immigrants to its broad and fine territory; but that is too far away, and the transportation of a large number of settlers would be too expensive and troublesome; nor is it likely that many would be willing to go there.

Syria, where land can be obtained free or at a trifling cost, where a large part of the Jewish race would settle willingly, and to which they can be removed in large numbers easily and at no great expense, is unquestionably the best land that can be selected by them. If the Alliance Israelite Universelle should decide, as it is perhaps not unlikely to do, in favor of making the experiment there, the movement would receive an impetus that would at once carry it far on the way to practical realization.

JEWISH REFUGEES.

The Terrible Experience Hebrew Emigrants Had in Their Russian Home.

To-day thirteen Russian Jews will arrive in this city from New York in charge of a representative of the United Hebrew Charities. These men form a small portion of the great body of unfortunates who have been driven from Russia within the last six months.

Seven of these refugees came to this city last week in the expectation of finding employment. Through the efforts of the Hebrew society a few of them have been provided with work. Three of their less fortunate brethren were found by a press reporter in a lodging house, on New street, last evening. They are very intelligent looking, their whole appearance indicating a position in their native country at least in the middle classes of society. They all spoke German fluently, and in that language John Schiller, seemingly the most intelligent of the trio, gave an account of the causes which forced him to flee from his native country.

"I was born," he said, "in the city of Kiev, on the right bank of the Dnieper. My father was a railroad contractor, and, previous to the time our troubles came upon us, was considered one of the wealthiest men in the city. I was brought up carefully and received an excellent education, and all went well with me until shortly after the beginning of this year. During the months of February and March rumors of an uprising among the peasantry against our race were carried to our ears, but we paid no attention to them until we were suddenly and rudely convinced of their truth. On the 26th of last April the ordinary quiet of our city was broken by the cries and curses of a howling rabble, which poured in Kiev from the country round about, and was every minute increased by additions from the slums and alleys of the city itself. On every side you heard fierce cries of 'Down with the Jews,' 'Don't let a Christ-killer escape,' and oaths and curses too horrible to speak about. I think there must have been fully 20,000 persons in that mob, and when they entered the Jewish quarter of the city they divided into four companies, that they might more effectually accomplish the terrible work they had undertaken. They drove us from our houses, destroyed our furniture, tore up our carpets, and broke into a thousand pieces our most valued ornaments. Our stores and workshops were robbed of all they contained, and when the fury of the mob had been spent there was scarcely a Jew in the city who had money sufficient to buy himself food. They drove us from our homes, and for a whole month we were obliged to live in tents and shelters erected outside of the city. My sister was robbed of everything she possessed, not even a dress being left her to cover her nakedness. Many of our people attempted to resist the destruction of the property, and some were killed—stoned to death while doing so. Altogether, twenty-eight persons met their death in this manner. One bruised old man was dragged into church and commanded to kiss the crucifix. Upon his refusal so do so he was so terribly beaten that he died before he could be taken into the street. Eight young girls and one wealthy Jewish lady were seized by a band of about sixty of the most debased class of the peasantry, and so brutally outraged that only four remained to tell the horrible tale. The Government did not interfere with the proceedings of the mob in any manner excepting that after that riot was over a guard of Russian soldiers was placed around our encampment. Indeed, we have good reason to believe that Government officials instigated the uprisal, for on many passports issued to persons coming to Kiev prior to the riot was written an order that they should leave that city within twenty-four hours at peril of their liberty. The Governor of the province, who was at Kiev at the time, attended by his guard, witnessed the whole affair, and only interfered when he found that there promised to be a terrible destruction of life."

When asked whether the Nihilistic sentiment was prevalent among his class in Russia, Schiller said smilingly:

"Why, we are all Nihilists there—that is, we all want more liberty than we can possibly have under the Government as it now is. But we, by no means, believe in dynamite bombs as a remedy against existing evils, and you will find that such sentiments are confined to a few fanatical students."

RESURRECTION OF THE BODY.

This is the great event most closely connected with the return of the Lord. It cannot be questioned, we think, that our own time is especially marked by the denial of this doctrine. Those who have not watched the trend of opinion on this point have little idea of the extent to which, even in orthodox ranks, the Swedenborgian notion of the elimination has supplanted the primitive doctrine of resurrection. Instead of holding that at the sound of the last trump God will "quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you," it is becoming very common to maintain that at death a spiritual, incorporeal substance is evolved from the body.

Thus one's death is his resurrection, since in that event an imprisoned spiritual body breaks its shell and comes forth, like the butterfly from a chrysalis.

It is not, therefore, the angel's calling the dead from the grave that ushers in the resurrection, but the sexton's bell tolling the dead to the grave. This notion seems to result largely from that ultra spiritualism which would rule the body out of all recognition in the work of redemption. There is a kind of Manichean contempt for flesh and bones and a feeling that it is gross materialism to assign them any place in the glorified life.

Those thus holding will miss, in the new version, the words "our vile body." Thank God there is no such designation of that which has been exalted into a temple of the Holy Spirit.

When Archbishop Whately lay on his death-bed his chaplain was reading to him, from the common version, the passage in which the words occur,—"Who shall change our vile body,"—Phil. iii. 21.

"Read it in the original," said the dying Archbishop.

The chaplain read it in the Greek, rendering the words, "Who shall change the body of our humiliation."

"Ah, that is it," said Dr. Whately. "Nothing that God made is vile."

Nothing in all the Revision is more welcome to us than the beautiful and balanced phrase, "Who shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory."

Christ in the garden, on the cross, in the sepulchre, was in the body of his humiliation. Christ risen, ascended and seated at God's right hand, is in the body of his glory. And yet it is the same body—"flesh and bones" still; wearing the authenticating nail-prints still; only transfigured and glorified. So we are taught that our bodies shall be changed—not sloughed off, as too ignoble to share in Christ's redemption but "fashioned anew"—all traces of sin and deformity and disease banished—the mortal body made immortal and "conformed to the body of his glory." How vast the change! and yet not to be discredited because so vast.

Put the dull, black and lusterless bit of charcoal side by side with the bright and sparkling diamond. How utterly unlike! And yet science tells us that these two are the same in substance. Charcoal is carbon in its humiliation; diamond is carbon in its glory. The wise do not mock at chemistry for asserting its identity. "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"

Christianity.

A religion based on a history of the criminal execution and subsequent resurrection of its Founder, was not a natural product of either human weakness or human strength, of abstract thought or vulgar deception. The invincible steadiness of the witnesses of this event; their unanimous and steadfast confidence in preaching a revelation of God's truth and mercy to mankind by Christ's cross and passion; their own unextinguishable faith and hope, triumphing over a lifetime of hostility and a death of violence; their success in kindling a like spirit of belief in men of every country under heaven by their inspiring message; and above all, the never-dying power of their word, after eighteen centuries, to kindle the like faith and hope in life and death in the hearts of men of every kindred and every tongue; all point to one conclusion, that we, too, have what is professed solid certainty, and the assurance of immortal life in God. —Edward White.

BETTER THEOLOGY.

We have been accustomed to approach God with hearts mistrustful of the kindness of his feeling toward us; if our religion has been poisoned by fear, and the wings of our affections clipped by suspicion, and the understanding fettered by unworthy thoughts of his character and will; if, after the dictates of a cruel tradition, we have pictured him as an unjust despot, who brings myriads into being in order to consign them to utter darkness and despair—if this be the idol of our own imaginations we have professed to worship, let us go back in all simplicity of heart to the life of Christ, and bring our belief into accordance with what we learn from it. There will be no need, then, for us to say with Philip, "Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us." We will see him in the face of Jesus Christ; and our hearts will respond to the Savior's answer, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."—Rev. D. J. Ferguson.

The Jewish Chronicle says: "The prosperous Jews form but a small portion of our brethren. Those who are comfortable and content are comparatively few. These, perhaps, would be loth to leave their assured and luxurious homes to find a new country and a new civilization. But those who are oppressed and unhappy, long for the advantages which reconsolidated nationality would give them. Oppression and persecution has kept our people, as a body, alive and homogeneous. The more the Jew is downtrodden the more he clings to the faith of his fathers and its observances. Liberated, and anxious to compete, socially, with his fellow countrymen, he throws over the restrictions which are deeply respected by those whom he would conciliate by their abandonment, with the simple result of making himself appear contemptible and sycophantic. It is oppression, and not prosperity, which will lead us back to our proper place in the Holy Land."

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The Lord willing I will be at Lovi Fogle's Nov. 9, and hold meetings over the second Sunday. The third Sunday in Michigan, near Brother Keaner's, southeast of Three Oaks, meeting to commence Thursday night. Fourth Sunday near Bremen at brother Roose may appoint, meeting to commence on Friday night. First Sunday in December at Macy, to commence Friday night before.

Never Out of Sight.

I know a little saying
That is altogether true,
My little boy, my little girl,
This saying is for you.
'Tis this, O blue and black eyes,
And gray—so deep and bright—
No child in all this careless world
Is ever out of sight.

No matter whether field or glen,
Or city's crowded way,
Or pleasure's laugh or labor's hum,
Either your feet to stay;
Some one is always watching you,
And whether wrong or right,
No child in all this busy world
Is ever out of sight.

Some one is always watching you,
And marking what you do,
To see if all your childhood acts
Are honest, brave and true;
And watchful more than mortal kind
God's angels pure and white,
In gladness or in sorrowing
Are keeping you in sight.

O, bear in mind, my little one,
And let your mark be high
You do whatever thing you do,
Beneath some seeing eye;
O, bear in mind, my little one,
And keep your good name bright,
No child upon this round, round earth
Is ever out of sight.

"He Loved Little Girls."

An English lady, writing from Syria, says that the Mohammedan girls there are continually singing our beautiful hymns in Arabic. "Safe in the arms of Jesus" is a great favorite. A little Moslem girl accounted for her preference for the Christian religion by saying, "I like your Jesus because he loved little girls. Our Mohammed did not love little girls."

She had been led to alone upon at least one of the great differences between Mohammedanism and Christianity. The reason for her preference is well understood, for "We love him because he first loved us."

The late President's idea of the highest blessing it was possible to invoke on the head of a beloved friend is expressed in the following lines, which, when he was a young professor, he inscribed in the album of a young lady acquaintance:

If the treasures of ocean were laid at my feet,
And its depths were all robbed of its coral and pearl,
And the diamonds were brought from the mountain's retreat,
And with them were placed all the wealth of the world—
Not silver, nor gold, nor the spoils of the sea,
Nor the garlands of fame that the world can bestow,
But a purified heart that from sin has made free,
I would ask for thee, friend, on thy journey below.

A Happy Home.

What is sweeter on this earth than a happy home—a home where love is law, and discord is unknown? Such a place is a retreat from trouble and care—a resting-place for the weary, a fountain of joy where thirsting hearts may find all they crave, a blessed spot where memory loves to dwell. If you have such a home, prize it as you prize the noblest of treasures. If your home is not happy, try by forbearance and gentleness and affection, to make it so. The happy home is the noblest product of earth, and the vestibule of heaven.

Stephen's City (Va.) Star.

Died on the 5th inst., of diptheria, in this town, Charles E. Robinson, in the 7th year of his age, son of R. S. Robinson.

The sad death of this noble little boy deserves more than a passing notice. Little Charlie, as he was familiarly called, was a boy of extraordinary promise. He was bright, amiable, obliging and affectionate. Few children possessed a more endearing disposition. The quickness of his mind, his vivacity and ready wit in conversation, united to the manly frankness of his character, made him a boy of note above his years.

He was beloved by his schoolmates and was deservedly a favorite with his teacher. He was indeed a premium boy—in gentleness, intelligence, and innocence. He seemed willingly to adapt himself to every condition in which he might be placed. Almost the last words he said were eminently characteristic of the innocence, simplicity and fearlessness of his nature. Not long before his death his father said tenderly, "Charlie, my son, I fear you are dying."

Turning his face upward with a bright smile he answered: "All right father, let mother lie by me that I may put my arms around her neck. Good bye," and thus he died.

Our whole community lament his death, and our sympathies go out to his bereaved and stricken family. We may truly say of such an event, "An enemy hath done this," but God, who permits the present ravages of the destroyer to serve his wise purposes, is always good and gracious, and we are assured he doth not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men. He sees all things from the beginning, we do see, "Here we see through a glass darkly," but hereafter face to face.

Dear little Charlie was surely one of the Holy Innocents, and like the little martyrs of Jesus, in Ramah of Galilee, whom Herod the king slew,—he will come again let us hope from the land of the enemy—and in the resurrection fill out the brief career so suddenly cut off in the present life.

It is consolation to be assured in the words of Jesus, "In my Father's house are many mansions; I go to prepare a place for you, and when I have prepared a place for you I will come again and receive you unto my self, that where I am there ye may be also; wherefore, let us comfort one another with these words." An Affecting Incident.

EMMA JANES.

If the phenomenal outflow of human sympathy, whose tide has not yet fairly ebbed, shall tend to make us who helped to swell it kinder and better toward other hearts that bleed, well and good. But if we substitute our share in it for those nearer but equally sacred duties; if we say to the afflicted poor around us, "It is Corban, a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me," then we are a wretched set of frauds in God's sight.

I call to mind a noble nature with whom it is far otherwise. On a dark day in our President's fate, the first day on which we heard discouraging news from Elboron, General Walker, Superintendent of the Census, was passing homeward, heavy hearted, from his office duties, for he loved General Garfield tenderly. By chance he saw within an open doorway a tiny coffin, the coffin of a three year old octeroon child whom he sometimes had stopped to speak a kind word to as she played upon the street. The little maid soon knew his cordial voice, and but a few days before her sudden death she had rushed out from her basement home to show him her new doll, her modest contribution to the census.

He passed in silently where the coffin lay and stood beside her little waxen body. I met him there, for the child was a pet of mine, my lowly little neighbor. I held her in some such regard as one might hold a neighbor's kitten, little thinking how soon death would endow her image with his own majesty.

The General spoke softly and reverently of the little one, and then told me a few words of a daughter of the same age whom he had buried, and as he named her I noticed the quick tears spring to his eyes. Soon he bowed and passed out as quietly as he entered.

An hour later a servant brought to the house of mourning, with a card addressed in his handwriting, a rich and costly floral wreath, an offering as elegant as if made to the child of his nearest friend. They laid it on the plain little coffin, and it rested there with tender grace—as royal a gift in its way as was the Queen's wreath I later saw on the stately coffin of the president.

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me;" and in the kingdom in that day I think Christ will wear upon his sacred vestments the perfume of those flowers of charity.

A Beautiful Home.

MARY E. HAWLEY.

Dear Children:

Do you ever think of the beautiful home you are going to have, if you try to be good, and obey your heavenly Father? God has given this beautiful earth to his obedient and willing children to be their home forever, and he is going to have Jesus live with them. But before Jesus can come here to live, the earth must be cleansed from sin, and all who are God's children must be cleansed too, for the pure and holy Son of God could not enjoy the society of those who are filled with sin.

God is cleansing the hearts of his true people, and soon he will have them all ready to meet their King, who is coming to them, and when they see him coming in the clouds of heaven, they will rise to meet him in the air, and stay with him until the wicked people who did not love and obey God are destroyed, and the earth made new again.

Then the blessed Savior with his children will come back to the earth and live here forever, as we are told in the word of God, we shall build cities and inhabit them, make gardens, and plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them.

We shall live with our precious Savior in perfect peace and love forever. O how pleasant it will be to live then. We shall all know one another, and roam through the groves of our beautiful home or across the bright fields in search of flowers, while the beautiful birds will flit around us without the least fear, for all in that sweet land of rest shall be gentle and good. We then shall see all the good men and women that we read about in the Bible, for they had the same blessed hope we have, and fell asleep knowing that God would awaken them again in his own good time.

But the face we shall love to look upon most will be that of our precious Savior, and as we realise what he suffered to gain for us this beautiful home we shall love and worship him better than we ever can in this life. It was for the joy of having us with him in the kingdom that Jesus endured the cross, not minding the shame. And now, dear children, let us for the joy he has set before us endure all things, and strive to do God's will and please him, so that we may be sure of a home in sweet Eden restored.

Don't Snub the Younger One.

There is much in the social training of a young girl for which mother and elder sisters are directly responsible. While it is true that children should not be unpleasantly forward in conversation, it is just as true they have a right to be heard, and that among kindly hearted people their speech is welcome if put forth properly.

The person who snubs the younger sister and crowds her out of sight while others are present does her a sad injustice. This child is to be a woman, and is rapidly becoming one. She needs kind and pleasant culture in everything that tends to make her womanly. A lift on her way helps her to that mental growth which nobody can enjoy if held down under pressure. Her mind needs to be quickened and strengthened by converse and contact with the minds of others. With this lifting and helping and quickening, she has a chance to grow in every proper and worthy direction. Without it, she retires out of sight and shrivels into a melancholy existence.

The Chinese bind and cramp the feet of their girl children. We call it unreasonable; but to bandage a child's mind and to withhold from her the chance to attain that for which God has made her, is as undesirable and as culpable as anything the Chinese do in crippling their girls.

MRS. DAVIS AND HER MISSION.

[Below we give the concluding part of Mrs. A. E. Davis' letter of which we gave the first part last week. There is one sad event that has transpired since she left for the East—the death of her daughter, Miss Roberta M. Davis, which occurred Oct. 17. This will be a great bereavement to the mother, as she not only loses a most beloved and affectionate child, but one who was expected to help and solace her in her mission in the Orient. Soon the time will come when the dead in Christ will be raised from the grave to be ever with the Lord. As we send a copy of our paper to Mrs. Davis at Jerusalem, we express our heart-felt sympathies to her in this sorrowful affliction. She is now near the tomb from which One rose to live forever more. Because he lives her daughter will live also.—ED.]

Leaves from My Journal.

SECOND PART.

I found my boxes here on my arrival. It cost fifty cents to pass them through the custom-house; then boating, camels and all amounted to three dollars. I am satisfied. [The boxes of which Mrs. Davis speaks, measured forty cubic feet, and were called one ton. They were billed direct to Jaffa, and left Boston by the Anchor line of steamers. The whole expense from Boston to Jaffa, prepaid here, was fifteen dollars and seventy-six cents, the lowest freight for any amount, however small. Five feet would have cost the same. Heavy articles are weighed instead of measured, and the freight is about three dollars per ton higher. By this the friends can see about what the expense of freighting goods to Palestine will be at present. When they can be sent direct through the Straits of Gibraltar, without transhipment in Europe, the fare, both on passengers and freight, will be less.]

All I have seen are much interested to have the Age to Come Herald published in Palestine. They tell me here and at Port Said they will support it. So come.

I never had so much courage. It seems as though I had just begun to live. As Mrs. Floyd says, everybody grows younger here.

Sept. 13.—The hotel accommodations I find are insufficient, and not up with the times. Last year eighty thousand pounds were brought here by tourists, whose numbers will be greatly increased in the future. Somebody will surely build a hotel with suitable accommodations for first class people from America and Europe; and I pray God that our Americans may take in the situation, realize their opportunity and "rise and build."

Such an enterprise carried out will help our paper more than any other one thing, at this time. I can already see the germs of the greatest work ever commenced by mortals. Let us, by the help of God, labor while we can to carry it forward. Every day increases my faith in the movement and my love for the work.

The educated natives flock to see me, as though I could do something important for them. They are splendid specimens of humanity, and are anxious to see some change for the better in this country.

For the present I can only read to them the prophecies, in which they appear to be more interested than any class of persons I have yet seen. Is the Lord moving on the hearts of this people? If so, "where are the reapers?"

There are farms to be leased for one-half of the crops, about eight miles from here, where a colony could settle. There have been lately discovered on them twenty-three wells, which were dug thousands of years ago; and there are three hundred and sixty-five in all, where the water is of the best quality. Does not this appearance of an abundance of water mean the fulfillment of prophecy? Dr. Lee says the land is full of water everywhere, waiting to be brought forth. I shall go with the others to see these farms next week.

In speaking of the restitution of this land, the prophet says: "In the wilderness shall waters break out and streams in the desert. And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water." Isa. xxxiii. 6, 7.

All the prophecies have a new interest to me. I read every night with Mrs. Floyd, and we enjoy it. Mr. and Mrs. Floyd, and also Dr. Lee, take the same view that I do of the prophecies, the Sonship of Christ, and predestination.

The weather is delightful now, just cool enough for comfort. It is very healthy; no sickness at all. My appetite is good, and I am gaining in flesh. We have for breakfast eggs, toast, tomatoes, nice butter and cheese, tea and coffee. For dinner we have roast chicken and mutton, potatoes the very best, rice puddings, custards, all kinds of vegetables and fruit, native wine, tea, etc. They also have native beer and brandy.

I did not suppose such excellent potatoes could be raised here. The Germans raise those I have seen, and also make the butter and cheese that we eat. Butter can be made of the finest quality, and it will command a high price. There will be sale for all that can be produced; and there is now, to my surprise, a large importation of buttor, canned meats and fruit, which might be put up here at a great profit. Some one should come and engage in this business.

Sugar cane is raised and sold to the natives for four cents a stick. They carry it about with them and eat it. I shall sow the amber cane seed that Brother Ellsworth gave me last winter. There is a fine field open for him here; and I hope he will come soon and improve it.

Tourists are beginning to come already. The rainy season will soon commence, and everything will be refreshed.

We now have two mails per week, and I can receive and send letters regularly. I can send a telegram to you for three dollars.

After I am settled at Jerusalem, I shall give more attention to writing. I write enough now, but you will say it is not to the point. Mr. and Mrs. Floyd will probably go to Jerusalem with me, take a house, and remain one month or more. It will be a great help. We shall live together, and so you can see I shall get along nicely. The way opens, and the Lord will provide.

I intend now to open a school and a shop for dress-making; then when my dear Bertie comes, a place will be ready for her. Perhaps I will have a class in the morning and dress-making in the afternoon. Whatever help is needed in either branch, can easily be secured.

I do hope some of the friends will come soon, to buy land and commence farming upon right principles. If they could only see how everything grows here, they would not hesitate.

This is indeed a land of promise. It has been very desolate, and still is desolate. But Israel's God has said, "The desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that pass by. And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become like the Garden of Eden; and the waste and desolate and ruined cities are become fenced, and are inhabited." Ezek. xxxvi. 34, 35.

Why not believe what the Lord says? This will be accomplished by labor, and I am confident there is no land in the world where the same labor will produce so great and lasting results.

I find the Arabic language easy to learn, and shall soon give it more attention. But I consider it more important to teach the natives the English language, than for us Americans to learn Arabic. It will be necessary, however, for some to understand Arabic for a time.

We have a Baron for a neighbor, and he sends us sweet roses, which are now in full bloom and truly very fragrant. The perfume from his garden fills my room constantly. He keeps a mule drawing water from an inexhaustible fountain, night and day. You can plant a seed in this garden, and in three years you have a large tree, with loaves eight inches long and six broad. I have just been out measuring them. Who would think of leaving a country where such great results can so soon be realized with so little labor? This is the land to "seek," and not to leave, except by those who do not wish Mount Zion well. So let them go.

All that is wanting here is a class of people with wills to do God's will; and with proper industry and perseverance and the blessing of the Lord, this whole country will become a Paradise. I could pick up my living on the beach, because I could turn the things found to account.

Mrs. Floyd said last night, as we were walking by the sea, "Mrs. Davis, how I wish the people in Boston could see us." We had our arms filled with flowers, gathered right on the beach. Beautiful lilies, as large as our callas, are growing everywhere. Grape vines are filled with the most luscious fruit, which becomes raisins on the vines, the finest raisins, too, that I ever saw. Figs also become dry upon the trees. I always supposed it required considerable labor to prepare them for market, but find my mistake. Nature kindly prepares all these things without any labor.

Mr. Howard, the gentleman who visited America last summer, and with the Russian ladies from New York dined at my house, called with friends yesterday to see me. You see I am in a strange land, surrounded by friends.

Jaffa, Sept. 18.—Travel to this country is steadily increasing, and the price of almost everything is gradually rising. Still, one can live here quite cheap. The price of land, I think, increases faster than anything else. It is an object for any one who thinks of buying land here to secure it as soon as possible.

Mr. Floyd has just returned from Jerusalem. He says they have had seven days of heat there, greater than was ever known before. And yet, no one has been cut down by sunstroke, and there is no sickness in the city. From what I have been able to learn, I am satisfied Jerusalem is the healthiest city in the world, notwithstanding its filth.

I can readily believe, that even before the city and people are perfected in eternal holiness and beauty, the prophecy of Zech. viii. 4-8, will receive an accomplishment; and though this should, and does, appear marvellous in the eyes of the people, "Should it also be marvellous in my eyes? saith the Lord of hosts."

Sept. 20.—To-day, in company with my kind friend, Mrs. Floyd, I called on our friend Mr. Murad, a native Syrian, and now a teacher in the missionary school conducted by the Rev. Mr. Hall. He is a gentleman by nature, pleasant and agreeable, and altogether a fine specimen of the cultivated Syrian.

I have also made the acquaintance of a Mr. Haddad, chaplain and teacher in the English Church Mission. At his residence I had the first glimpse of the mountains of Judea. Oh, the beauty and grandeur of the scene! I will not attempt to describe my feelings. It is enough now to say I was never before thus affected. I was looking upon the very hills that Jesus had looked upon, and which had been pressed by his beautiful feet, as he walked over and among them, and where I am expecting ere long to see him reigning, King of kings and Lord of lords. It would be almost satisfactory evidence of one's incorrigibility, if after having read the history of Jesus, they could gaze upon the places where he preached his mission of salvation to sinners, and suffered and died, without being affected.

I shall have much to write about these hills when I have had the privilege of traveling over them. In gazing upon the barren rocks, with a knowledge of God's promises concerning them, I see beauty while others discover nothing but sterility.

THE END OF THE TURK.

WM. WELLS.

All signs indicate the approaching dissolution of the Turk, and he himself is hastening the fatal denouement. His inevitable decline and ruin may seem strange in the face of hundreds of years of victorious career on European soil; but times have changed, and the Turk has not. Two hundred years ago the Ottomans were a mighty people; and while they were laying siege to Vienna, all Europe trembled at the probability of the success of their possible inroad into Europe proper. The very prayers of the pulpit contained a clause begging a kind God to save them from the barbarous Turk.

Now why have the once mighty people thus fallen? Because they have steadily been their own worst enemy, and have kept themselves in the most direct antagonism toward all the other nationalities around them. They have regarded the land as theirs, and have refused to learn any other tongue than their own. A few of the upper class learn French in order to enter the higher posts of the administration, where they are forced to have intercourse with foreign officials verbally or by letter.

But the very men who in Paris have learned the language, as well as the elements of European statecraft, have absorbed and brought home the vices of their neighbors rather than their virtues. The most dissolute and vicious of the Turkish officers are the young men who have learned their evil ways in the French capital, and think the best thing to bring back with them is the French ballet.

This disinclination to learn other languages, so necessary in all the Levant, is very marked in all the large cities. Of the 25,000 Turks in Smyrna, for example, among about 200,000 who talk the Greek but few Turks learn the language, although it is that of trade and commerce.

Thus the Turk isolates himself by the language that he clings to with obstinacy.

As long as the Turk remains a simple peasant or citizen, he is an honest man compared with the Greeks or Armenians with whom he associates. The moment the Turk becomes an officer of the government, he turns into a cunning and heartless ruler whose only object is gain through corruption or tyranny. As a dealer the Turk is not cunning enough for his Greek competitors, for a common proverb says that a Greek at a bargain is equal to two Jews.

For this reason the common Turk is ordinarily poor, and his usual occupation is agriculture or cattle raising. They were once renowned industrials, but these occupations gradually slipped out of their hands for want of energy and enterprise. Rugs and carpets are now about all they manufacture, and half of these now sold in foreign markets are counterfeit. The English and Germans long ago drove them out of the manufacture of cloths, and now the Swiss have conquered them in the line of silks. These and the cotton goods now found in the Orient, are largely from Swiss houses. The Turks cannot compete with European machines; and about all they have left of a general character are the saddle and harness for their horses, copper and iron ware, boxes, boots, and wooden shoes.

The weak point of the Turk is that he is no sailor. There the Greeks drive him entirely to the wall. His delight is to be slowly roaming over the caravan route, squatted dreamily on his camel, indifferent to sunshine or rain, indifferent to the food or shelter of the morrow, if he can lazily his wants for to-day. Thus the Turk is ever poor, and though not actually indolent, he is totally destitute of all spirit of innovation; any new thing is always sure to leave him in the rear.

His great curse is his religion. He is devoted to his creed, and his very consciousness in this respect shackles him to the past, and introduces into his family and social life its greatest element of weakness, namely, the isolation of women. There is virtually no female influence in family life, and nowhere, indeed, one may say, except in political intrigues and palace conspiracies.

The Turkish woman may be seen unveiled by no man except her own husband and very nearest relatives, and than for the outer world she does not exist. One half of the house, therefore, is the harem, devoted to the women and children; and in small houses in the country the entire structure is a harem—that is, no man dare enter it. In this way women can in no way be useful to their husbands in their occupations as with other nationalities, and within this seclusion they remain shallow and ignorant; they know nothing, as a rule, and teach their children nothing, and very few of them can read or write their own language; they seem to be dead weights on society, in an era when elsewhere woman is coming out into fields of influence and usefulness.

In the matter of military duty the Turks are the only ones who are drafted into the army. Other nationalities are not accepted. This takes away a large mass of able-bodied Turks from their homes. Most of these men marry at about eighteen, and enter the army at twenty-one for seven years. They thus leave their wives for this long period, and the respective parties can know nothing of each other because neither can read or write.

In case of war the most of them never return, and the wife has but little means of knowing, for a long time, whether her husband is dead or alive. This is said to lead to a great deal of immorality on the one hand, and childless homes on the other.

Thus the Turks are dying out as a people, and nothing in the country is more common than to meet half-depopulated cities and villages. The last war was so fatal to the Mohammedan population that a dead and heavy despair has taken possession of them, notwithstanding the enthusiasm with which they entered the contest. Every intelligent Turk now sees the beginning of the end, and knows that Turkish rule in Europe must soon cease, while the ruling classes are trying to make the most of what is yet left. God speed the departure of the unwelcome intruder!

Brevities.

Another grove of mammoth trees has been discovered in California. It is about eighty miles north of the big trees in the Yosemite, and numbers ninety-three trees, many of them over 100 feet in circumference.

The ruins of the Temple of Solomon in Jerusalem are to be restored, by special order of the Sultan, without further delay. They have long been in an extremely neglected condition, and almost buried from sight beneath all manner of debris and refuse. Directions to put them in an presentable a shape as practicable were given by the Abdul Aziz, at the time of the Austrian Emperor's visit, and the work was actually begun; but it was soon abandoned again. The immediate cause for its renewal at the present time is the recent visit of the Austrian Crown Prince.

Several cinerary urns, sunbaked and of great antiquarian interest, have been unearthed at Hampton Wick, England. They were found at a depth of from eighteen inches to two feet. Some persons who had examined the fragments of the urns, which were unfortunately broken by the pickaxes of the laborers who accidentally discovered them, are of the opinion that the vessels were made before the Romans occupied the country.

The life period of the olive tree is not certainly known. The tree above ground will, of course, die out. In fact, in the long course of years it becomes a mere shell, for it begins to die at the core, but the root does not perish. Out of this springs the new tree. In the very old olive groves about Palma, near Lisbon, in Portugal, I have noted this circumstance more than once. Travelers most competent to judge are agreed that the present olive trees on Mount Olivet, near Jerusalem, are the same that Christ prayed under and his disciples fell asleep under 1900 years ago, and they are still yielding their annual crop of fruit.

That the sun's varying conditions cause meteorological changes upon the earth has long been suspected, and observations are now being made in various parts of the earth to determine the fact. Two curious coincidences happened last summer. On June 26, Piazzi Smyth, the astronomer, observed that the sudden formation of an enormous and alarming mass of clouds in the sky of Madeira, which caused much astonishment among the inhabitants of that island, was coincident with the breaking out of a group of sun spots. One month later another extraordinary cloud was seen in Madeira, following the sudden appearance of of a second group of sun spots, which were carefully photographed at an astronomical observatory in India. Prof. Smyth ascribes the formation of these clouds to electric action respondive to the outbursts in the sun.

MESSICHA-MALKA.

M. G. WANSEN.

Messicha-Malka! Messiah-King!
Let the gladdest saints unceasingly bring
To thee the tribute of fondest praise,
As on thy regal form they gaze.
Majestic art thou upon the throne!
The sovereign power is thine alone;
Before thee who wearest the princely crown,
Thy worshiping subjects, we cast us down.

Messicha-Malka! Messiah-King!
Under the shadow of thy blest wing
Seeking our refuge, we talk to abide
At morn, at noon, and at even-tide—
Shield us against the tempter's power,
Comfort us in affliction's hour,
Strengthen us, Lord, when weak and faint
We come to thy throne with our sad complaint.

Messicha-Malka! Messiah-King!
Thou hast taken from death its sting,
From sin its strength, from the grave its prey;
The night of our fears thou hast turned into day—
Helper-efficient in all the woes
Wrought for from these tremendous foes.
How should we conquer in that fierce strife
But in thee, with whom are the words of life?

Messicha-Malka! Messiah-King!
To thee our souls by faith shall cling,
For thou hast the power and thine is the will
To minister to us in every ill;
Heavily laden, we look to thee,
And then from our burdens dost set us free!
Weary, perplexed, from a laboring breast
We call upon thee—thou givest us rest!

Messicha-Malka! Messiah-King!
Great prophet and high-priest! Thy praises we sing.
We have not beheld thee, yet thou hast our love;
How blest we shall be when we see thee above!
While still we are here, we delight to proclaim
The glory befitting thy royal name—
Oh, grant that our voices hereafter may blend
With those of the glorified, world without end!

JESUS THE CHRIST OUR EXAMPLE.

J. J. WARNER.

Herein is love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so are we in this world. 1 John iv. 17.

For even hereunto were ye called (in suffering): because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps. 1 Peter ii. 21.

Men are imitative beings, and have to learn all they know either from precept or example, or both combined. It was not enough in the wisdom of God, to tell his great love, and teach his holiness and purity through a messenger in human form; but his great love to us must be demonstrated and his pure and holy precepts must be accomplished; that we may love him "because he first loved us," and then that great love received into our hearts must lead us to obey him with reverence and godly fear, by walking in the steps of him who loved us and gave himself for us.

Christ is the way, the truth, and the life. "He of God is made unto us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption." "He is the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." He is the sun of the moral universe; reflecting the light borrowed from him, we become the light of the world, and by our saving influence are the salt of the earth.

The great soul stirring truths taught and practiced by him, shine into our hearts, and we are full of light. "And walking in the light, as he is in the light we have fellowship one with another; and his blood cleanses us from all sin."

The children of this world may boast of their great men; but we will glory only in our Lord Jesus Christ. We hold him up as "the chiefest among ten thousand," the one altogether worthy and lovely. The only one in the likeness of man that never sinned. Dark spots may be seen upon the crowns of all earthy potentates, and we may well say if all their sins were written upon them, their loyal subjects, if possible, would snatch them from their heads, and with shame cast them away, and replace them with the spotless crown of the meek and lowly Jesus. The voice of God is heard through one of his faithful servants, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." Yes, put him on characteristically; be like him; live with him; suffer with him; die with him; and then reign with him. O that we may be like him, that "we may have boldness in the day of judgment," and that he may not be ashamed of us, when he comes in the "glory of his Father, with all the holy angels." In him God dwelt; in him God was manifested. The love, mercy, wisdom, and power of God shone forth in him, and who saw him, saw the Father. In him dwells all the fulness of God.

We can think of nothing pure, great, or glorious that did not dwell in him. To be like him here, is the sum of our faith, and the height of our ambition, and to see him as he is, and bear his heavenly image when he comes, is our great hope that leads us to purify ourselves, even as he is pure. 1 John iii. 23.

When adversity overtakes us, may his lovely voice be heard, "Fear not; I am with you. Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tried he shall receive the crown of life which the Lord hath promised them that love him, "Our light afflictions work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

We must watch and pray for grace, strength and wisdom, to do as he did. When we are about to engage in any thing, how important to stop and ask, Would the Lord do it?

How often we say things hastily, that we mourn over afterwards. How many fly into a passion and betray a bad spirit so unlike the mild and gentle pattern, and by repeatedly doing so lose sight of the holy one. Let us glory in Christ our example and hold him up, in word and deed. Let us be able to say with the apostle Paul, "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." Constantly let us pray, Lord make us pure and holy like thee. The church is the body of Christ, the fulness of him that filleth all in all, "the pillar and support of the truth," "the holy temple of God," and if any man defile the temple, him will God destroy. May Christ be able to present us to his Father, not having spot or wrinkle but holy and without blemish. Let it be our great delight to tell what Jesus has said and done, and let no great men hide him from us; they killed him, but he lives forevermore, and has the keys of death and hades, and can deliver us. When he is presented, every mouth is stopped and all the world becomes guilty before God. How strange that men will not follow Jesus and live. God has given his Son, without spot and blameless, and yet they will not have him to reign over them, but cling to mortals like themselves, full of imperfection with no power to give eternal life.

If we are Christ's, we are Abraham's seed and heirs to all the promises, and these should cheer our hearts, animate our spirits, and strengthen our hope, and make us partakers of the Divine nature.

In conclusion let us say, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing."

These seven great heavenly gifts are the everlasting wealth of God, bestowed upon his Son, with whom we are joint heirs, and shall be partakers of Christ if we hold the beginning of our confidence steadfast to the end."

May the Lord give us an abundant entrance into his everlasting kingdom.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Oct. 20, 1881.

Editor Restitution:

I stood to-day by the ruins of one of the finest churches in the south—"The Warren Memorial Presbyterian Church," that was destroyed by fire last night. A building that cost $185,000, and conceded to be a model of architectural elegance and comfort was consumed by the flames in three or four hours.

The edifice was an interesting one, principally because one man,—L. L. Warren—of this city, gave $90,000 to complete it.

I was present last summer at the "Dedicatory Service," when amid the fragrance of floral decorations, and the melody of anthems and hymns of praise, the building was formally dedicated to the service of God.

The exercises on that occasion were grand and impressive. Yet one great essential was lacking — the truth. Wealth feasted the eye with the beauty of architecture, and filled the ear with sublime symphonies, but wealth could not buy the costly treasures, the refined gold of Truth.

I sat and listened to the scholarly addresses, but alas, my ear was not greeted with that which is able to make us wise unto salvation. Mr. Warren's munificence was lauded, and through his generous donation it was hoped others would be constrained to do likewise. The building, they trusted, would stand a monument of a princely generous heart.

This was about three months ago. To-day their boast, their pride, their monument of wealth is a smouldering heap. I regret very much that so costly and splendid a building should so soon be reduced to crumbling stone and ashes; but I cannot help seeing a lesson that perhaps we all take to heart. There is no stability in this order of things. The palace of to-day may be the ruins of to-morrow. God alone is great, and his truth alone durable.

Wealth cannot conciliate the one, nor purchase the other. May we be wise, and place our trust in him alone. May we dedicate our lives to him, and so whatever our trials, whatever our losses, whatever our sorrows, we may through God strengthening us, rise Phœnix-like from the ashes of this world's desolation, to the eternity and glory of that which is to come.

Wishing you health and strength in the work set before us, I am, dear brother, affectionately in Jesus.

W. I. CROCKETT.

TOUCH GOD'S WORD REVERENTLY.

SARAH R. PURDY.

This is emphatically an age of criticism. Everybody has turned critic, and closely criticises everybody, and every one's practice, and knocks away at this and that structure, and tries the foundation of another, to learn where the weak parts are. This is all right; it knocks off the rubbish of error, and makes the gems of truth gleam more brightly.

As an object of the deepest closest criticism by both enemies and friends—the eyesore of all eyes, and the target of every conceivable weapon—the word of God stands forth unrivalled—glowing with a brighter lustre from every thrust it receives from its enemies. To wound God's word in the house of its friends is indeed sad, and yet I fear it is often done by the same spirits of criticism.

In searching that mine of truth we find our priceless pearls, and so anxious are we to disclose its beauties we heedlessly run over others of just as true a lustre; others pick them up, and each one is so loud in the praise of the one he has in his possession, that all others are valueless in comparison, and the looker-on infers they are all right and none of much value.

The words of the Lord are pure words, and of the greatest value to us. If we have child-like love and obedience we will follow wherever we see the imprint of the Master's footsteps—wherever we find "Thus it is written"—or hear the dear Lord, in loving accents say: "Ye ought to do it," let us not refuse to obey because it is not reiterated in thunder tones from Sinai's awful mount—"Do this or die." Let us not cut the critics and guess what the Lord ought to have said, or what he means; let us gather up every pearl, give heed to every requirement, believe the dear Lord says what he means, and means what he says. The Storehouse of God's word is full to overflowing of priceless jewels; let us not ignore or lightly esteem one of them, else his word is not abiding in us.

If we be truly in the Lord Jesus, walking in harmony with the word of God in all things, then we are growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, and we are adding to our faith all the Christian graces, and going on to perfection, and purifying ourselves as he is pure, and are manifesting the fruits of the Spirit in our daily lives—all his sayings appear in our lives.

Alden, Iowa.

"THAT YE MIGHT BE FILLED."

S. ROXANA WIKOF.

As it was Paul's prayer for his Ephesian brethren "that they might be filled with all the fulness of God," so is it my prayer for the scattered household of faith in these last evil days, and, that this blessedness may be attained, by each one of us, Christ must dwell in our hearts by faith.

There must be no inviting of this blessed personage for a transitory stay—no calls for his presence for an hour and then the barring of all the doors of the heart against him, he must dwell with those who would "be filled with all the fulness of God," and, this dwelling of Christ within, can only come by faith. We must first be filled with the knowledge of his will. We can have no conception of the love of Christ toward us, until we know what he has done, and what God still purposes to accomplish for us through him. Having learned by whom we have been brought nigh to God, through whom it is that we can have boldness and confidence in coming to him, we begin to comprehend the length and breadth and depth and height of his love, and fastening every sense, every affection to him, become like the great tree, firmly rooted, in the rich soil. The storms cannot move us, if we are grounded in love.

What a blessed filling it is! "Filled with the knowledge of his will;" "filled with the fruits of righteousness;" "filled with comfort;" "filled with joy;" "filled with all the fulness of God!"

And this is just what our experience ought to be. I had not thought so much about this, until a young disciple came to me the other day to talk of the hope and the work, and of our own individual interest in the matter.

I had been all the time striving to do something for the Master, but just in this emergency I found myself "wanting." I had not been to the fountain daily, drawing sweet waters that would quench my own and another's thirst. No texts of gold would come readily into memory, the Book had not been handled to keep the lamp burning. I was away from God. Frightened, I resolved not again to neglect the constant study of the will of my Master, because there must be the consciousness that the things we have heard are ours, that the watchfulness and prayer are ours, or our words will have no power and will fall on the icy walls of indifferent ears.

Oh, I want to be always filled, and it seems to me that this must be, if we are to be found among the wise virgins—our vessels must be full. The cares of this world must not keep us away from the living stream.

Let the word of God work in us effectually. Let it work mightily. Do not oppose it, nor disobey it, for it is God's power, whereby we are to be "made partakers of his holiness," and "filled with his fulness."

RELIGION.

Religion is not a name. It is not a matter of form. It is not a trifle. It is the richest, best gift of God to man. It ennobles our nature. It more clearly teaches us our true dignity than all the profound discoveries which man can make in science; for none of them will ever fill us with the fulness of God. Religion is spiritual, elevating, pure, Godlike. We dwell with God; walk with God; live with God; commune with God; are like God. We become partakers of the Divine nature (2 Peter i. 4); in rank we are associated with angels; in happiness and purity we are associated with God.—Barnes.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

I will speak as follows: The first of October at Brother S. A. Saylor's, five and one-half miles northwest of Morrill, Brown Co., Kan. Next, Oct. 27, near Clifton, Nemaha Co., Neb., to continue over Sunday, where Brother Jas. Stephens may arrange. Next at Farmington, Atchison Co., Kan., on the Central Branch R. R. Those coming to Farmington will ask for Silas Goodrich. The meeting to commence November 25, and continue over Sunday.

LOTT CLOPTON.

Benjamin Woodward, of Hammond, Mich., State Evangelist for Michigan, is expected to visit Hesperia, Nov. 12, and 13, 1881, to attend a meeting of the First Gospel Church of that place. Those of the Abrahamic faith are invited, and all Christians that are interested in a knowledge of the truth and of the coming kingdom of our Lord and Master.

W. C. WELLS, Pastor.

DEFERRED.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Church of God, advertised to be held near Brownstown, Warren Co., Va., commencing Friday, Oct. 7, has been postponed to Nov. 11.

A NEW PAPER FOR OUR CHILDREN

The YOUTHS' EXAMINER

C. H. JONES, Publisher, Chicago, Ill.

MONTHLY. - - EIGHT PAGES.

SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER YEAR.

Give your children neat for reading matter, then they will be satisfied and not be anxious to read trash. The publisher of "The Youths' Examiner" will use every endeavor to make for the children and youth an interesting paper—not one they will partially read from a sense of duty,—but something they will read because they are interested.

EVERY NUMBER ILLUSTRATED

And printed on heavy book paper, and gotten up in an artistic manner. The following is placed at the head of the Editorial columns:

The Youths' Examiner will be devoted to the instruction of our children, in those branches that will not only enlarge their intellectual faculties but strengthen and build up their moral and religious natures. The exposition of Bible topics will be based upon what is known as the literal view of the prophecies. The mortal nature of man, the reign of Christ and his saints on the earth, etc., etc. The doctrine of the atonement, and life only through Christ will be plainly set forth, and every effort be made to bring these great Bible truths before them in a language both simple and truthful. Easy lessons in science and other important branches will from time to time be given, accompanied with suitable illustrations.

It contains some stories, but only those that contain practical truth and information.

We send the paper to every subscriber from the time of receiving the order until

The GOSPEL of the KINGDOM

Advocated in a series of Ten Discourses

—BY WILEY JONES.—

OPINIONS OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy to most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for cost and perusal in the important information that it will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 24, 1878.

"It evinces a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scripture, and uniform courtesy toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York, Nov. 30, 1881.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested mainly, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are covered to such a length as to say, * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and convincing way, should buy this book."—The Rural Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 17, 1879.

"I have read it diligently again and again, * * It is pure in point of excellence and doctrinal truths to the Book of books."—D. L., Mo.

"I do not know that I have ever seen from the pen of any modern writer, a plainer exhibit of the gospel of the kingdom and at the same time one better suited to general instruction on that subject, than that which brother Jones gives us in his book, "The Gospel of the Kingdom, advocated in a series of Ten Discourses."—E. M. B., Va.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXX. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, NOVEMBER 16, 1881. NO. 43.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

COMING AGE (MESSIAH'S).

Its Proximity. The Delay. Commences With National Judgment on the Papacy. This is followed by the Slaying of the Two Witnesses. History of the Witnesses. Who Are They? Their Lives. Their Power. How Slain. Their Resurrection. Ascension. Review and Reflections.

No. 91.

J. P. WEETHEE.

The Delay—We are now describing the period of delay between the sixth and seventh trumpets, called quickly, and voice of the seventh angel. We have shown that this eventful period is introduced by a great national judgment on the little horn: that this judgment rendered by the Ancient of days against the Papacy and in favor of the saints of the Most High, and resulted in taking away the papal civil dominion; also, that the ten kingdoms were the executors of God's wrath on the great apostacy. We now propose to show how the delegated power was abused in its execution. In our history of this abuse the lives, character and fate of the two witnesses must be considered.

The Two Witnesses.—Who were they? or, perhaps, it would be more proper to ask, Who are they? (being still alive).

Of these two witnesses, John's history is as follows:

"And there was given me a reed like unto a rod, saying, Rise, and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein. And the court which is without the temple leave without, and measure it not; for it hath been given unto the nations: and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months. And I will give unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and three score days, clothed in sackcloth. These are the two olive trees and the two candlesticks (lamp stands) standing before the Lord of the earth. And if any man desireth to hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies: and if any man shall desire to hurt them in this manner must he be killed. These have power to shut the heaven, that it rain not during the days of their prophecy: and they have power over the waters to turn them into blood, and to smite the earth with every plague, as often as they shall desire. And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that cometh up out of the abyss shall make war with them, and overcome them, and kill them. And their dead bodies (lie) in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also their Lord was crucified. And from among the peoples and tribes and tongues and nations do (men) look upon their dead bodies three days and a half, and suffer not their dead bodies to be laid in a tomb. And they that dwell on the earth rejoice over them, and make merry; and they shall send gifts one to another; because these two prophets tormented them that dwell on the earth. And after three days and a half the breath of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet; and great fear fell upon them which beheld them. And they heard a great voice from heaven saying unto them, Come up hither. And they went up into heaven in a cloud; and their enemies beheld them. And in that hour there was a great earthquake, and the tenth part of the city fell; and there were killed in the earthquake seven thousand persons (Mar. Gr. names of men, seven thousand); and the rest were affrighted, and gave glory to the God of heaven."—Revised Version.

My Two Witnesses.—Whose witnesses?

Christ's witnesses since he is the speaker. They testified to the truths uttered by Christ and his inspired apostles.

"And ye shall be my witnesses both in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." Acts i. 8.

Why two?

"At the mouth of two witnesses or three (two or more) every word may be established." Matt. xviii. 16.

Jesus took Peter, James and John;—three, but two was a legal number. In order to identify these two witnesses it will be necessary to compare what the Spirit says in Zech. iii. and iv., with John's record in Rev. xi. The reader will please follow us as we trace the type and the anti-type in those prophecies.

We assume (what we shall not stop to prove) that the remnant nation, established under Joshua and Zerubbabel, was, in many features, a typical nation, with its anti-type still in the future. Joshua was evidently a type of Christ. So, also, was Zerubbabel; the one a priestly type; the other a regal type. In establishing the remnant nation, Joshua was high priest, and Zerubbabel was king. When two crowns were placed upon the head of Joshua, it was said, Behold the man, the BRANCH. Zech. vi. 12. See chap. iii. 8. Let us examine those passages more critically. See, also, chap. vi.

Zechariah has described to him the typical remnant nation, (Zech. viii. 6) and the anti-typical remnant nation, verses 8, 8; see, also, chap. xiv. That the symbols and types of Zechariah may be clearly seen, it will be necessary to outline the entire chart of the visions of that prophet. This we shall attempt for two reasons:

a. The book is thought to abound in obscurities, so great, that, by many, the writings of Zechariah are passed over as among the secrets, unrevealed, of Jehovah.

b. The key to the meaning of the olive tree is found in Zechariah.

Zechariah was among the first that returned from the Babylonian captivity, and began to prophesy soon after Haggai; he uttered his predictions in the sixth and seventh months of the second year of Darius Hystaspes; while Zechariah began in the eighth month of the same year to reign (A. D. 510).

The seventy years predicted by Jeremiah (Jer. xxvii, 12; xxix. 10) were terminated. Some few had returned to their native land. Still, their return progressed slowly, owing to many obstacles at home and abroad. As in our days, so then many had become wealthy in Babylon'l and in the lands of their captivity. Others were too poor to bear expenses of so long a journey; while a third class were too valuable to their masters to be surrendered. Those that had returned uttered complaints against God and his prophets, as if the Almighty was about to fail in his promises. These revelations were, therefore, designed to inspire their sinking hopes, by lifting the veil from the future of that people. The first six verses are introductory, and designed to show the complainers that their tardy return was, in part, their own fault; that they were not in any manner desirous of returning, while others were prevented from returning by the heathen. He assured them that as he always had accomplished his promises, so would he in the future.

Chapter i. 7, begins Zechariah's ecstacies and visions. The vision of the Rider among the Myrtle Trees, seems to be an ecstasy rather than a dream. The first vision is dated, second year of Darius, 24th day of the 7th month. It is a night scene; a valley of myrtles fills the landscape of the prophet. He sees in the grove a man on a red horse; and behind him were horsemen on red, speckled (dun), and white horses. Zechariah asked an angel who these were. Promising the information, he goes to the angel on the red horse, and having received from that noted angel the desired interpretation, returns to the prophet. "These (are) they whom the Lord hath sent to walk to and fro through the earth" (the land of Judah's captivity).

Two of these angels are distinguished officials, viz., the "angel of the Lord," and the messenger that talked with Zechariah.

Some expositors have contended for their identity. They are, however, distinct. One is always called, "The angel who spake with me;" the other, "The angel of the Lord." One seems to be like Moses, the source of knowledge and authority; the other fills the office of Aaron (Angelus interpres—the interpreting angel)—the Paul and Mercurius of the heathen. They occupy the positions of Gabriel and Michael, in Dan. viii. 10, ix. 21, x. 13, 21, xii. 1, and these angels we presume, they are. The angel of the Lord appears to be the Commander, and to have a lively interest in the Captive Jews.

The Myrtle grove is a deep valley representing the Jews under the Theocracy.

"Not a proud cedar on a high mountain, but a modest, yet lovely myrtle in a deep valley."—Hengstenberg's Christology.

The Theocracy is, in a similar manner, compared to the quiet waters of Siloa, while the surrounding nations are symbolized by the rushing, overwhelming floods of the Euphrates. Isa. viii. 1–8.

This angel of the Lord tarrying in the Myrtle grove represents the presence of Jehovah among his people. The color of the horse denotes the character of his agency; the horse itself represents the rapidity of his conquests. See Isa. lxiii. 1–6.

While the angel of the Lord tarries in the Myrtle grove his scouts, on red, dun, and white horses are abroad through the countries of the captivity, noting the state of the heathen. They return this report to the angel of the Lord:

"We have walked (rode) to and fro through the earth (land) and, behold, all the earth (land) sitteth still, and is at rest." Verse 11.

The heathen are prospering; Babylon that was taken by Cyrus (A. D. 538) is recovering, and continues to be a royal city; the Persian empire flourishes; many of the Jews are prosperous, contented and happy, having forgotten their ancient lands, while others labor in poverty. No movement to restore them to their native homes.

This report moves the angel of the Lord, the special friend of the Jews, who thus speaks to Jehovah:

"O Lord of hosts, how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem, and on the cities of Judah, against which thou hast had indignation these three score and ten years?"

The answer comes from God to the interpreting angel, whose office is to make it known to the prophet, and through him to the people:

"And the Lord answered the angel that talked with me (with) good words (and) comfortable words. So the angel that communed with me said unto me, Cry thou, saying, Thus saith the Lord of hosts; I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with a great jealousy. And I am very sore displeased with the heathen (that are) at ease: for I was but a little displeased, and they helped forward the affliction. I am inflamed (red horse), with great wrath against the secure and quiet nations." See Isa. xlvii. 6.

"Therefore thus saith the Lord (of hosts); I am returned to Jerusalem with mercies: my house shall be built in it, saith the Lord of hosts, and a line shall be stretched forth upon Jerusalem. Cry yet, saying, Thus saith the Lord of hosts: My cities through prosperity shall yet be spread abroad; and the Lord shall yet comfort Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem."

These red, dun, and white horses represent the character and speed of their missions in delivering the people from their captivity and their triumph (white horse) over their enemies.

The accomplishment of this prophecy was confined to the near future, under Ezra, Nehemiah, Joshua and Zerubbabel. In this interpretation all expositors agree. So far the prophet has no intimation of any distant future, return to Canaan. This prophecy was designed to raise up the desponding; hence the great care that these were the words of God:

"Thus saith the Lord of hosts," "Thus saith the Lord," "Saith the Lord of hosts."

When this promise was made such was the condition of the Jews, nothing seemed so improbable. A few poor Jews were living among the old ruins of Jerusalem; unable to build the city, or the temple. Despised by the heathen, they clung to the remains of the once beautiful city, and its temple, in hopeless despair. The prophet, therefore to have his messages believed, required a Thus saith the Lord. We are to keep in view the fact that Zechariah, leaving out the past, sees the entire future of the Jewish nation.

Youths' Column.

The Kansas City Journal reproduces the subjoined beautiful poem, which is no doubt familiar to many of our readers, with the information that the author, Mrs. D. N. Utter, formerly Rebecca N. Palfrey, is a resident of that city. Whittier admired this gem so much that he gave it a place under his "Songs of Three Centuries."

WHITE UNDERNEATH.

Into a city street,
Narrow and noisome, chance had led my feet,
Forbearance to secure, and the sun's rays
Loved not the unclean place.

It seemed that no pure thing
Its whiteness there would ever dare to bring;
Yet even into this dark place and low,
God had sent down his snow.

Here, too, a little child
Stood by the drift, now blackened and defiled;
And with his rosy hands, in earnest play,
Scraped the dark crust away.

Checking my hurried pace,
To watch the busy hands and earnest face,
I heard him laugh in pure delight,
That underneath 'twas white.

Then, through a broken pane,
A woman's voice summoned him in again,
With softened mother tones, that half excused
The unclean words she used.

And as I lingered near,
His baby accents fell upon my ear,
"See, I can make the snow again for you,
All clean, and white, and new!"

Ah! surely, God knows best.
Our sight is short: faith trusts to him the rest.
Sometimes, we know, he gives to human hands,
To work out his commands.

Perhaps he holds apart,
My baby fingers in that mother's heart
One fair, clean spot, that may yet spread and grow
Till all will be white as snow.

Youth's Companion.

Some Poor Children.

We owe more to poor children than we think. Columbus was a poor boy, often needing more food than he could get. Luther sang ballads in the street to get money for an education. Franklin used to buy a roll for a penny and eat it alone. Lincoln and Garfield were poorly clad and worked very hard. Dr. Livingstone learned Latin from a book on his loom while at work. Emily C. Judson used to rise at two in the morning and to do the washing for the family. Gambetta was poor and slept in an attic. Lucy Larcom was a factory girl. Dr. Holland was poor and a school teacher. Captain Eads was barefoot and penniless at nine years old. None of these people have been idle or whiled away their time on street corners, or in games of cards or billiards. They were too busy.

Christian Helper.

Boys, Read and Heed This.

Many people seem to forget that character grows; that is not something to put on ready-made with womanhood and manhood; but day by day, here a little and there a little grows with the growth, and strengthens with the strength, until, good or bad, it becomes almost a coat of mail.

Look at a man of business—prompt, reliable, conscientious, yet clear-headed, and energetic. When do you suppose he developed all those admirable qualities? When he was a boy? Let us see how a boy of ten years gets up in the morning, works, plays, studies, and we will tell you just what kind of a man he will make. The boy that is too late at breakfast, late at school, stands a poor chance to be a prompt man. The boy who neglects his duties, be they ever so small, and then excuses himself by saying, "I forgot! I don't think!" will never be a reliable man, and the boy who finds pleasure in the sufferings of weaker things, will never be a noble, generous, kind man—a gentleman.

Whittier's Boyhood Days.

The Oxford (Pa.) Press prints the following interesting letter from Mr. John G. Whittier, written to a young girl in that town in response to an inquiry as to how he spent his boyhood days:

AMESBURY, Mass. 9th mo. 17, 1881.

My Dear Young Friend:

I think at the age at which thy note inquires, I found about equal satisfaction in our old rural home, with the shifting panorama of the seasons, in reading the few books within my reach, and dreaming of something wonderful and grand in the future. Neither change nor loss had then made me realize the uncertainty of all earthly things. I felt secure in my mother's love, and dreamed of losing nothing and gaining much. Looking back now, my chief satisfaction is that I loved and obeyed my parents, and tried to make them happy by seeking to be good. That I did not succeed in all respects, that I fell very far short of my good intentions, was a frequent cause of sorrow.

I had at that time a very great thirst for knowledge and little means to gratify it. The beauty of outward nature early impressed me; and the moral and spiritual beauty of the holy lives I read of in the Bible and other good books also affected me with a sense of my own falling short and longing for a better state.

With every good wish for thee, I am thy sincere friend.

Birdie.—A True Story.

MRS. LUCY R. SANFORD.

Harry, with a face aglow with pleasure, came to his friend Mrs. S——, tugging a square box with slats across the top, and on the bare, cold board bottom was a tiny birdling, with a few little going-to-be feathers, and a wide-open bill, out of which came a most doleful sound.

"Why, Harry! what can you do with that poor little hungry, cold birdling?"

"Make it love me!" and he took it out gently and held it against his own warm cheek, then begged Mrs. S—— to hold it while he made a nest of his chubby hands by crossing the thumbs and fingers. Mrs. S—— put the birdling in it, and, then with much fear, she dropped a bit of a crumb of wet bread into the open bill. That was swallowed, and another, and another, and then birdie gave the most musical of little notes, and Harry, who had watched intently, coiled in the sweetest voice:

"My birdie! my birdie!"

Soon birdie knew that loving call, and would chirp back, hop into Harry's hands and cuddle down. If put down it would hop all about the room after him. And if Mrs. S—— was in a rocker, it would hop into her lap, and curl its head under its wing, and be rocked.

From hopping it grew to flutter, and its first little fly and fall made as great a sensation as a baby's first step. But his wings grew strong, and one day he dashed off on an excursion to the nearest tree.

"Poor Harry!" cried Mrs. S——.

"Poor Harry!" was echoed by all in the house. And we dreaded to see him come in, for we felt his sunny face would cloud quickly and many a raindrop fall.

"Your birdie flew away," his father said, kindly,

"Did it? Where to?"

"Into that tree."

Harry flew out and peered up into the tree, but could see nothing amid the dense leaves, but called, "Birdie! birdie! birdie!!!" and birdie flew down into his hands.

Its lungs grew strong as its wings. Its song was very sweet, but its matin song was discord to our sleepy ears.

Mrs. S——, (not liking to keep the air confined all night) would at the first note in the morning throw a heavy cloth over the cage, and leave it until Harry called, "Birdie!" After four mornings it would not even chirp till it heard Harry's voice, and then its pent-up love and music would burst forth gleefully. Often it would sit on the window-ledge and have nice chats with birds in the trees, but its heart beat too true to Harry to be wooed back to its wildwood.

Mrs. S—— went away for a time, and birdie was taken to Harry's mamma's room on the floor below. Though free to fly out, it kept very quiet a while, then spread its wings and dashed out of the window. For more than two hours they searched in vain for it. Then Harry went to the upper hall and said to a lady there: "My birdie is lost!"

A merry chirp answered him. He rushed into Mrs. S——'s room, and there was birdie.

Now, Harry's home is a hotel, and there are fourteen windows in the line of Mrs. S——'s room. How did he know that room?

Rose Leaves.

ERNEST GILMORE.

Some one has beautifully said: "Kindness is stowed away in the heart like rose-leaves in a drawer, to sweeten every object around."

A little girl of about nine years old was walking along a muddy street in Chicago; her father held her hand, and seemed very tender in his care of her. The quality and style of their garments hinted strongly of wealth, while the strong, good face of the father, and the loving, sweet one of his child, told of something better than wealth—even of depth of hearts.

Just as they reached a crossing, where the mud was thicker and the wind blew stronger, and vehicles of all descriptions passed each other in tiresome confusion, they noticed a poorly clad old woman, on whose trembling arm rested a large basket heavily laden, standing on the corner, as if fearful of crossing over. She looked anxiously at the whirling carts, and depreeatingly at the passers-by. No one seemed to heed her as the well-dressed throng hurried by.

"Come, Edith," said the father; "this is a dangerous crossing, papa will carry you over."

He put out his strong arms, as he spoke lovingly. But the child only whispered:

"Papa, I have rubbers; I'm not afraid of the mud. Papa, see the poor old woman—she seems afraid of something. see how she trembles. Couldn't you help her, papa, while I run on ahead?"

For answer, the gentleman approached the old woman, saying, in a low voice:

"This is a tiresome crossing, madam, let me lead you across; give me the basket please."

Could you have seen the rested, and thankful look on that weary old face, as the woman found herself on the other side, all safe, I think you have echoed her fervent cry:

"God bless that man, and the blessed child, too!"

Of course there were annoying smiles on some countenances which witnessed the quiet act of helpfulness, but it mattered not as long as one knew that around the great white throne there were smiles of joy because two of his followers had not in selfishness neglected doing a favor to even the "least of these."

Into a very elegant palace car entered a weary-faced, poorly dressed woman with three little children, one a babe in arms. A look of joy crept into her face as she sat down in one of the luxurious chairs. But it was quickly dispelled as she was asked to "start her brats."

A smile of amusement was seen on several faces as the frightened group hurried out to enter one of the common cars. Upon one young face, however, there was a look which shamed the countenances of the others.

"Auntie," said the boy to the lady beside him, "I'm going to carry my basket of fruit and this box of sandwiches to the poor woman in the next car. You are willing, of course."

He spoke eagerly, but she answered: "Don't be foolish, dear; you may need them yourself, and that woman may be an imposter."

"No, I'll not need them," he answered decidedly, but in a very low tone. "You know I had a hearty breakfast, and don't need a lunch. The woman looks hungry, auntie, and so tired, too, with those three little babies clinging to her. I'll be back in a minute, auntie. I know mother wouldn't like it if I didn't speak a kind word to the 'least of these' whenever I meet them."

The worldly aunt brushed a tear from her eye after the boy left her, and said audibly, "Just like his mother!"

About five minutes later, as a lady passed the mother and the three children, she saw a pretty sight—the family feasting as perhaps they never had before. The dainty sandwiches were eagerly devoured, the tempting fruit-basket stood open.

The oldest child, with her mouth filled with bread and butter, said, "Was the pretty boy an angel, mamma?"

"No," answered the mother, as a grateful look brightened her faded eyes, "not now, but he will be on the other side, God bless his dear little heart."

And we too said: "Bless his heart."

ORDER.

God is not the author of confusion, but of peace or order, as in all the churches of the saints. Some have great fears of order and sobriety, and so, to escape the Scylla of formality, they rush on the Charybdis of fanaticism and anarchy. Such, to be consistent, should takes out the mainspring of their watches, and the pendulum of their clocks, that none of the wheels may have any control. But God is a God of perfect order, as all his works testify.

Work, for the night is coming,
Work through the sunny noon;
Fill brightest hours with labor;
Rest comes sure and soon.
Give every flying moment
Something to keep in store;
Work, for the night is coming,
When man works no more.

Does the Christian's path lie all the way through Beulah? Nay, be in forewarned it is to be one of "much tribulation." He has his Marahs as well as his Elims, his valleys of Baca as well as his grapes of Eshcol. Often he is left unbefriended to bear the brunt of the storm, his gourds fading when most needed, his sun going down while it is yet day, his happy heart darkened by sorrows with which a stranger cannot intermeddle. But there is one Brother "born for adversity," who can comfort us.

Reality—reality,
Lord Jesus Christ, thou art to me!
From the spectral mists and driving clouds,
From the shifting shadows and phantom crowds;
From unreal words and unreal lives,
Where truth with which falsehood fondly strives;
From the passings away, the chance and change,
Flickerings, unbeings, swift and strange,
I turn to my glorious rest on thee,
Who art the grand reality.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Nov. 16, 1881.

No change was made in the Board of Directors at the last meeting of the Stockholders. Friday, Nov. 25, is set as the day to arrange for the printing of THE RESTITUTION for another year

We find the following notice of Br. Magruder's book in the November number of the Messenger published at Glasgow, Scotland. The notice of the work is very favorable but by no means unmerited:—"Brother A. B. Magruder, of Stephen's City, U. S., has just published an excellent treatise in reply to the American champion of unbelief—Ingersoll—which will repay perusal. He wisely protests against the habit which Ingersoll has of confounding Scripture doctrine with human systems of theology, and takes occasion, while pointing out the infidel's blunders, to set forth clearly the true Scripture doctrine on immortality and the kingdom of God."

EDITORIAL MISCELLANIES.

Messrs. D. Appleton & Co., are certainly right in declining to aid, by their influence, the circulation of a journal that so abets the cause of infidelity as the Review does in giving such willing reception in its columns to the vile utterances of a man whose admirers, in the main, are the basest and most profligate of the human race. More especially, as we learn that Judge Black was refused room for a second reply. "The North American Review which has heretofore borne the imprint of D. Appleton & Co., will do so no more, the Appletons objecting—so it is said—to the publication of Col. R. G. Ingersoll's article which appeared in the last number."

On the subject of divorce and remarriage the law, as announced by our Lord, is too plain to admit of any controversy. Hence ministers should be very careful not to violate the unmistakable legislation of the One Great Lawgiver. Every minister of the gospel should be in perfect accord with the decision of those in California whose agreement we give in a clipping below from one of our exchanges:—"The ministers of the California town of Los Angeles have signed an agreement that they will in no case perform the marriage ceremony for divorced persons, 'except the divorce be obtained on Scriptural grounds, and then for the innocent party only.'"

The following shows that when the devotees of Rome break from the shackels of the papacy they are more likely to take to infidelity than to embrace the truths of Christianity. The history of the French Revolution shows what fallen humanity can become when loosed from the fetters of falsehood. Unrestrained license is far more welcome to minds benumbed by cold dark superstition than the holy restraining influences of Divine revelation. Hence the statements of a writer in Paris are what might naturally be expected. He says:—"The people are throwing off the bondage of Roman superstition, but they are ignorant of and indifferent to the religion of Christ. Here, as elsewhere, it is more difficult to convert the victims of Roman Catholic barbarism, than it is to convert the votaries of other forms of idolatry and superstition, to Christianity. Those who have the mark of the beast on their foreheads and in their hands were prophetically designated as the most incorrigible of men."

THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM.

It was the opinion of Origin and some others that the star that led the wise men from the east to seek for the new-born King, whose advent into the world it was supposed to herald, was a comet. To a supposition of this kind it is a sufficient reply that the appearance of a comet was regarded among the ancients as the harbinger of the death of some great sovereign rather than of the birth of a new heir to royal honors.

Another opinion that originated with the distinguished astronomer, Kepler, has received the indorsement of some quite noted commentators. We can best show the nature and grounds of this latter opinion by making a few quotations.

"At the close of 1603, the very time that a violent controversy was raging among theologians as to the year of the Lord's birth, a phenomenon appeared in the starry heavens, which drew this celebrated astronomer into the ranks of the combatants.

On the 17th of December of that year, there occurred a conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn. In the spring of 1604, Mars also came to the same place, and in the autumn an entirely new body, resembling a fixed star, appeared in the neighborhood of these two planets at the east part of Serpentarius, shining at first like a star of the first magnitude, and very bright, but becoming gradually dimmer, until in October, 1605, it was scarcely visible, and at last, in March 1606, had totally disappeared. Kepler well aware that the astrologers of all times, and therefore certainly also the Magi mentioned by Matthew, attached great importance to the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, which occurs about every twenty years, and knowing that for that very reason they had divided the Zodiac, which its traverses in about 800 years, into four trigons, he calculated whether such a conjunction took place shortly before the commencement of the era at which, according to historical data, the birth of our Lord must be placed. He arrived at the remarkable result, that this conjunction happened three times in 747 U. C., B. C. 7, and that in the last half of Pisces, the first point of Aries, while in the spring of the following year the planet Mars also came to the same spot. He therefore argued, that the star seen by the Magi from the east, at the birth of Christ, was identical with the conjunction of those three superior planets, and that probably an extraordinary star like that which had blazed forth in the foot of Serpentarius in his own time, and was added to the group. Accordingly he placed the birth of Jesus in the year 748 A. U. C., B. C. 6."

From another work we quote the following, partly to the same purport, and partly as containing some further information concerning the appearance of a remarkable star in connection with the conjunction of the great planets.

"The famous astronomer Kepler, has shown that, in the year 747 from the building of Rome, a very remarkable three-fold conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the sign Pisces occurred; and that in the following year the planet Mars likewise appeared in this constellation. He regarded it as probable that an extraordinary star was conjoined with these three planets, as was the case in the year 1603. Kepler was of opinion that this conjunction formed the star of the Magi. This view has been further explained and defended by Ideler in his Chronological Researches. Weisoler mentions, that, according to the statement of Munter, the Chinese astronomical tables record the appearance of a new star at a time which coincides with the fourth year before the birth of Christ. All chronological statements relating to the birth of Christ lead, according to Weisoler's calculations, to the conclusion that Christ was born in the year 750 from the building of Rome, (four years earlier than the birth of Christ according to the usual chronology), and most probably in the month of February. The above mentioned conjunction took place two years sooner, that is, in the year 747 and 748. The circumstance that Herod caused all the male children in Bethlehem, of two years old and under, to be put to death, is a strong argument in favor of the supposition, that the principal star in the constellation was that which directed the Magi in their search."

We will now direct the attention of our readers to an entirely different star that has appeared at nearly equal intervals, and which has therefore better claims for supposing it to be the star recorded in the Chinese tables as appearing B. C. 4, though some three years later than the one referred to by Kepler as possibly having appeared at the conjunction of the great planets B. C. 7.

We give the account of its appearance and observation: "The most remarkable instance of a new star is that which appeared in 1572 and was observed by Tycho Brahe. It suddenly shone forth in the constellation Cassiopeia with a splendor exceeding that of stars of the first magnitude, or even Jupiter and Venus at their brightest, and could be seen with the naked eye on the meridian at noon-day. Its brilliancy gradually diminished from the time of its first appearance, and at the end of sixteen months it entirely disappeared, and has never been seen since. During the whole time of its apparition, its place in the heavens remained unaltered, and it had no parallax; so that its distance was of the same order as that of the fixed stars. Its color, however, underwent considerable variations. Tycho described it as having been at first of a bright white; afterward of a reddish yellow, like Mars or Aldebaran; and lastly of a leaden white like Saturn."

Now we learn also that in the years 945 and 1264, brilliant stars appeared in the region of the heavens between Cepheus and Cassiopeia; and as the accounts recorded of the places of these two earlier stars, as well as of the length of time they were visible, was imperfect compared with the star of 1572-4, which was well determined, and as the intervals between their appearance approximate closely, we may reasonably suppose them, as others have, to be one and the same star.

Allowing that the star was visible for two or three years about 945, and 1264, as it was in 1572-4, the interval between appearances would not vary much from the average of 315 years. Reckoning backward through six intervals we are brought indefinitely near to B. C. 4, for the first appearance of this star, as noted by the Chinese records.

To this star the names Pilgrim and Star of Bethlehem have been given. According to average times its re-appearance is due sometime in this decade of the eighties when the remarkable perihelion and other phenomena of the great planets is taking place. The re-appearance of the Pilgrim about these times would demonstrate that the star of B. C. 4, A. D. 945, 1264, and 1572 were one and the same celestial visitant.

THE RENSSELAER CONFERENCE.

The Conference at Rensselaer was held according to appointment commencing Thursday evening, Nov. 3, and continuing over the following Sunday. The attendance from abroad was not large. Still some were present from Remington, Goodland, and Argos. Brother James Eshelman and wife stopped off on their journey to Washington Territory, where they intend to make their future home, to attend this meeting.

The preaching brethren were Brother Hatch from Crawfordsville, Brother Barnhill from Argos, and Brothers Babb and Oppy from Remington. Instructive discourses were delivered by Brethren Barnhill, Hatch and Oppy. Brother Eshelman also addressed the people detailing his experience in the west.

A social meeting was held on Sunday morning in which quite a number of brethren and sisters took a part.

On the whole the meeting was productive of good in bringing the scattered household once more in Christian association together to encourage one another in the journey toward the heavenly kingdom. In those social gatherings we notice one good indication, which is, that all seem to feel the importance of more devotion to practical Christianity, as it bears on individual character, and of more earnest effort in disseminating a knowledge of divine truth in these closing days of this Gospel dispensation. We do hope that all our little churches will strive to meet together for mutual edification, and that the public preaching of the word will be kept up for the instruction of those who have not embraced the gospel hope. The time for taking out a people for God's name from among the Gentiles near its close, and all opportunity for winning a crown of glory will soon have passed away forever. As the duty of the church is "to hold forth the word of life" we hope all will engage anew in the work of promoting the cause of the dear Redeemer.

We will now give some additional notes on the place where the Conference was held. The County, Jasper, was named in honor of William Jasper, an American Revolutionary soldier, who was born in South Carolina, about 1750, and killed at an assault on Savannah, Oct. 9, 1779. Two particular acts of bravery have rendered his name distinguished. When Fort Moultrie was attacked by a British fleet, June 28, 1776, he leaped through an embrasure to the ground, under a shower of cannon balls, to recover the flag of South Carolina, which had been shot off. For this daring act Gov. Rutlege presented him his own sword, and also proffered him promotion to a higher military official position, which latter honor he declined.

His subsequent achievements in surprising and capturing detached parties of the enemy were almost unparalled in revolutionary annals. He met his death while fastening the standard to the parapet of a redoubt which had been presented to his regiment by Mrs. Elliott. Though mortally wounded he never relaxed his hold, but bore the colors to a place of safety before he died. His last words were: "Tell Mrs. Elliott I lost my life supporting the colors she gave to our regiment."

The County has the Kankakee river on its northern boundary. It was this river that LaSalle and Hennepin descended in December, 1679, with a company of thirty-three men in eight canoes till they reached the confluence of this stream with the Illinois, as we narrated in our account of our visit to Lanark in October.

Another river, the Iroquois, on which Rensselaer is located is remarkable mostly from the league of Indians from which it has received its name. This name was given in early times to a powerful confederacy composed at first of five Indian tribes who occupied a large part of what is now known as the Province of Ontario on the north of lakes Erie and Ontario, as well as on the south of these lakes and the river St. Lawrence, of a country extending from lake Champlain to the west end of lake Erie and inland south to the Ohio river in the southwest, and eastward to the Allegheny mountains. The original five nations were named Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas; to this confederacy the Tuscaroras were added, and subsequently the confederation was known as the Six Nations.

By conquest other tribes of the Huron and Algonquins were absorbed into the Iroquois confederacy. To this powerful confederacy the English gave the name Mingoes. As a league they called themselves Hodenonnauee— a compound Indian term which is said to mean they-form-a-cabin. The central cabin fire was at Onondaga in the state of New York. The term given them by the English was derived directly from a name Mengwe applied to themselves in their own tongue. They had a tradition that originally they came from the westward of the Mississippi, which means Father of Waters, but to which these Indians gave the name of Namesi Sipu, or River of Fish. It was by conquering and expelling other Indian tribes that they obtained the large district or country above described. In the wars attending the colonization of America by the French, Dutch, and English the Iroquois at times bore a very prominent part. It was however in wars with other tribes that they become identified with the history of the west. While the French missionaries were endeavoring to convert them they made wars on the Eriguas, living on the south of lake Erie, and thus named from them, whom they exterminated. They nearly annihilated another powerful tribe south of this lake, known as Andastes or Andastes. They drove back the Hurons and Ottawas among the Sioux of the Upper Mississippi, and extended their conquests into the territory of the present state of Illinois by subduing the Illinois Indians who occupied a large district of country and from whom the Illinois river and state take their name.

From these conquerors the river Iroquois on which Rensselaer is situated has derived its name as also a large county in Illinois, through which it flows in its course to empty into the Kankakee, of which it is a tributary.

Our limits will prevent us from detailing any further the history of this confederacy. In earliest times the Kickapoos were settled in that part of Indiana occupied by Jasper County and much of the western part of the state, and they also possessed a large district extending westward into Illinois. The Pottawatomies finally became the possessors of this part of the country who sold it to the United States about 1832.

So late as the Black Hawk war 300 Indians of this tribe came into Jasper County and made their home there for awhile from their fear of the Sacs.

The river along the town runs over a bed of limestone rock, and is, here, a beautiful stream. An artesian well has been sunk near the river to the depth of 855 feet, and a copious stream of sulphurated water is constantly flowing in a crystal stream from a tube placed over the well. A stratum of marble was perforated in sinking this well, and some quite promising indications of kerozene were developed.

The town received its name from James Van Rensselaer who was its original proprietor, and who was a descendent from the celebrated Patroon family so much distinguished in the history of the state of New York. It is well known to those acquainted with Colonial History, that Killian Van Rensselaer, a rich pearl merchant, became possessed of a large tract of land on the Hudson in 1630-7, 48 miles by 24 miles in extent, and embracing the greater part of the counties of Albany, Rensselaer, and Columbia in the state of New York, to which the name of "Colonie of Rensselaerswyck" was originally given.

In our boyhood days, while living in Washington County in New York, Stephen Van Rensselaer, the fifth in descent from the original Patroon, filled a conspicuous place in the history of the state, and his name was as familiar to us at that time as the name of O. P. Morton has become to us here in Indiana.

On the stone which marks the place of the final rest of the original proprietor of the present town of Rensselaer we read: "James Van Rensselaer—born at Claverack, Columbia Co., N. Y., Dec. 1, 1784—died at Rensselaer, March 12, 1847—removed to this County in 1837, and was the founder of this town. Erected by his son. Enterprising and virtuous in life. Peaceful and happy in death. His widow and children cherish his memory as husband and father."

A little grave is made side by side on the marble of which we read only this simple memento—"Infant son, died May 7, 1812."

These are the only two graves in the inclosure around the Presbyterian Meeting House.

As we stood by these graves we thought how the fashion of this world passes away." Here far away from kindred and connection sleeps a descendant of honored lineage.—But—

"How heed a homeless grave while thou art,
To whom it owes, or by whom begot;
A heap of dust alone remains of thee:
'Tis all thou art, and all the proud shall be."

The almost princely possessions in the east, and the broad acres in the west availed not to save the members of a renowned family from death.

We found kind homes and true Christian greeting among our loved brethren at Rensselaer. It had not fallen to our lot to visit them for some years in the past. They have some home talent of a superior order. Br. Halstead, the resident minister, who has faithfully labored with the church there, and in surrounding parts, is highly esteemed. He has, to some extent, ceased to labor as much as formerly in the ministry, but we hope his way will be made clear to once more enter the now whitening fields. He is well qualified to preach, and we hope the brethren will urge him to the work and hold up his hands by supplying the needful.

MORTALITY IN INDIA.

LONDON, Nov. 7.—The correspondent of the Times at Durgeeling, India, says that the deaths from epidemic cholaraic fever at Cuttair amount to 9,000, or ten times the normal rate of mortality.

A report from China announces that the Western Tungan district of that country, in which the work of the Christian missionaries has been extensive and successful, was literally ruined by a terrible typhoon recently; 2,000 houses of Christians and 200 churches were destroyed, and 6,000 persons are rendered destitute.

THE VILLAGE OF CHIOS SINKING.

VIENNA, Nov. 11.—There have been serious earthquakes at Chios, and the village is sinking into the earth. The inhabitants have fled.

THE CHOLERA AT MECCA.

ALEXANDRIA, Nov. 12.—A telegram dated Djiddah, Nov. 6, announces that the cholera at Mecca is increasing. The mortality on the 3rd, 4th and 5th instants was 55, 215 and 614 respectively. Caravans, comprising 5,000 pilgrims, left Mecca on the 6th instant, and it is feared the Egyptian troops stationed at El-Wadj will be unwilling or unable to prevent them from entering the town.

The $750,000 revenue of the Mosque of Omar in Jerusalem is to be devoted, it is said, to the preservation of the ruins of Solomon's temple and clearing away the rubbish surrounding it.

ROME, Nov. 13.—Forty persons were killed and forty-one wounded by an explosion of gas in a sulphur mine at Gesaolungo, near Catanicetta.

A TRAIN ABANDONED IN SNOW.

OMAHA, Neb., Nov. 11.—Owing to a snow-storm and heavy drifts at Sherman, W. T., the overland train from Ogden, due here this evening, has been abandoned. Two days' trains will arrive to-morrow.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Nov. 12.—Reports from Kansas City say the Santa Fe trains are delayed by a snow-storm. For nearly thirty-six hours it has been snowing hard in Western Kansas, Colorado and New Mexico. From Lakin west to Pueblo there are from six to eight inches of snow, while from La Junta west there are from eighteen to twenty inches. The cuts are full, and a strong wind is drifting it badly. This is the heaviest snow-storm in New Mexico and Colorado that the Santa Fe railroad ever encountered.

EARTHQUAKE SHOCKS.

Astronomical Distances—Recorded Forty and a Half Centuries Ago in British Measures.

Whence did our arithmetical table of linear measure originate? And how old is the Copernican system of astronomy?

In a letter from the astronomer Royal of Scotland to the chief engineer of the N. Y. P. & O. R. R., he calls attention to a recent discovery of Joseph Baxendell, B. E. R., A. S., of Manchester, England, respecting the diameters and distances of the sun, moon, and earth, in a manner (which Smyth says, is) infinitely above the human knowledge of the pyramid day .... viz., miles containing the same number of inches (63,360) as the British mile, but the inches are earth-incommensurable inches of the Great Pyramid.

This astronomer, Mr. Baxendell, from the Observatory Birkdale, Southport, August 12, 1881, writes as follows:

The interest excited by a perusal of the fourth edition of Prof. C. Piazzi Smyth's very important work, "Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid," induced me recently to enter upon a formal discussion of the author's careful and very valuable measures of the Pyramid. At first, the work did not proceed very satisfactorily, but ultimately the results I obtained impressed upon my mind a strong conviction that the data which had formed the basis of the design for the Pyramid were the magnitudes and distances of the sun, earth, and moon.

The adoption of this hypothesis evidently implied that the architect of the pyramid possessed a knowledge of astronomical data, which it has been hitherto commonly supposed could not possibly have existed among men in the early age of the world when the pyramid was built, and that, therefore, by a careful discussion and analysis of the pyramid measures, these data, so far at least, as the sun, earth, and moon are concerned, might possibly be determined with an accuracy equal to, if not exceeding that of the results of modern science. The hypothesis implied the adoption and employment by the architect of a scale by which to reduce the results of the combinations of astronomical data to magnitudes suitable for the design and construction of the pyramid.

It is unnecessary to enter here into the details of the steps by which I proceeded in the investigation and found ultimately that a scale one-thousandth part greater than the English mile, and consisting, in fact, of 63,360 Pyramid, instead of English, inches, would bring the distances and the diameters of the sun, earth, and moon into strict harmony with Prof. Smyth's Pyramid measures. Nor is it necessary to state the difficulties which arose in consequence of finding that scarcely any two astronomical works agreed in giving precisely the same values for the diameters and distances of the sun, earth and moon, and which rendered it necessary to attempt the solution of the following problem:

Given approximate values of the diameters and distances of the sun, earth and moon, (in the case of the sun very rudely approximate), to find the values which, in simple and easily understood combination, will give, with strict exactness, the various pyramid measures and numbers, the scale for the reduction being one pyramid inch for a pyramid mile of 63,360 pyramid inches.

For some time I was unable to form the requisite number of suitable equations for the complete solution of this problem without introducing assumptions to which objections might fairly be made, but ultimately I succeeded in making up the number without the aid of any assumption, and the final solution gave the following values for the diameters of the sun, earth, and moon,

	Pyramid miles.
Sun	852,982.0
Earth	7,917.7
Moon	2,159.2

The connection between these results and the pyramid measures is shown as follows: the quantity represented by the Greek letter pi being as all pyramid readers and students will know, the ratio of the circumference of a circle to its diameter.

1. The diameter of the sun multiplied by the diameter of the earth, and the product divided by the diameter of the moon, gives 1,00,000 times pi. In this remarkable and interesting result we see at once why the quantity pi enters so largely into pyramid relations and formulæ.

2. The square root of the diameter of the sun, multiplied by the square of pi equals 9,131,055—the length of one side of the base of the great pyramid.

3. The square root of the diameter of the sun multiplied by twice pi will equal 5813.010, the height of the pyramid.

4. The diameter of the sun multiplied by the square of pi, pi, and the square root of pi, and the product divided by 25,000 equals 1881.5893, the length of the Grand Gallery.

5. Twice the square root of the sun's diameter multiplied by pi and the square root of pi, and the product divided by 25, equals 412.13160, length of the King's Chamber.

6. The square root of the sun's diameter multiplied by pi and the square root of pi, and the product divided by 100, equals 5.161646, or the number which has been described as the key to the dimensions of the King's Chamber, and of the great pyramid generally.

The simple character of these formulæ, and the exact agreement of the results with the pyramid measures, leave no doubt, I think, that the diameters of the sun, earth, and moon were the principal data employed in planning the pyramid. The distances, however, are so related to the diameters that I have been able to form expressions in which the distances enter into factors, and which yield precisely the same results.

So far as I am aware it has not been known or even suspected, in modern times, that a measure corresponding to our English mile existed in the remote age when the pyramid was built, but the above results appear to leave no doubt that such a measure did then exist and was used by the architect of the pyramid.

This fact is one of considerable importance and interest, as it strongly supports the view that the British are directly descended from the people who built the pyramid, and afterward built Jerusalem.

SCRANTON, Pa., Nov. 6, 1881.

Editor Restitution:

Since my last writing I visited a place in Susquehannah County, Pa., called Elkdale, gave a few lectures on the gospel of the kingdom to houses well filled with anxious listeners. Two become obedient to the faith and thus become members of the household of faith.

This closes my labors in Pennsylvania, and while I bid adieu to the dear ones among whom I have labored the past season, I can but express my thankfulness for the many pleasant and we hope profitable seasons we have had together. To honor God by thus advocating his precious truths, and becoming the humble instrument in his hands of saving some has been the grand object of our work.

While I bid farewell to the faithful my prayer lingers at a throne of grace in their behalf, that they may be true to their God, true to each other, live near the throne of grace, drawing fresh supplies from the fountain head, living epistles known and read of all men. These things are of vast importance to every child of God, and especially as we near the haven of eternal rest. Let us be more consecrated to God, watching every avenue of life; be careful what we say, and what we do, that all may be done to the glory of God. And thus being the true children of God what a hope we have. Wonderful indeed are the great and precious promises held out for our encouragement. Life from the dead, kings and priests unto God.

With such glorious prospects as these who can refrain from crying out with the apostle, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and again, Come Lord Jesus, come quickly.

VARIETIES.

Ralph, who was just seven, ran to his mother exclaiming, "Mamma, Eva McCall says 'I are,' instead of 'I is.' She doesn't know much 'bout 'rithmetic, does she?"

On one occasion when Sir Walter Scott was in Ireland he came to a gate which he could not open. At that moment a shoeless lad came up and opened it for him. He wished to make him a present, intending to give him sixpence; he found he had only a shilling. "Here, my boy," said he, "is a shilling, and remember that you owe me sixpence." "Och," said the lad, "may your honor live till I pay you!" How could any one have paid a more delicate compliment? It simply wished him immortality.

Having removed from Pennsylvania to Carthage, Mo., friends will correspond with me at that place. Shall be glad to fill any appointment where possible.

PASSING AWAY.

MRS. DIBBLE SIMPSON.

Passing away, passing away.
The sweet summer roses are passing away;
Their beauty is wasted, their fragrance is fled,
And withering they lie in their damp lowly bed.
The fair, dewy morning in their splendor will rise,
The pale stars glow soft in evening's clear skies,
The cooing dove fall and the musical rain,
But those roses will blossom no, never again!

Passing away, passing away!
Bright hopes of my youth—how they're passing away.
Like the beautiful visions that gladden my eyes,
By day time and night time, as sunlight the skies,
Oh hope may come back to my sorrowful heart,
Bright dreams from their heaven-silent chambers may start,
But those of my youth I may wooe them in vain,
For they ne'er will return to their early home again!

Passing away, passing away!
Friends I have loved—how they're passing away!
I have watched them go down in that cold, solemn tide,
While the pale silent watchers kept close by their side!
I've caught the dull dip of his dread, muffled oar,
As he bore them away to that echoless shore,
And my heart cries in vain in its desolate pain,
But they ne'er will return to bless me again.

Passing away, passing away!
Yet I know of a land where it is no decay
Where the balmy air's filled with the richest perfume,
From sweet, fragrant flowers, all fadeless in bloom,
Where the soul never grieves as it does here below,
O'er fair vanished dreams, o'er hope's fitful glow,
Where linked fast forever is love's golden chain,
And parting words chill us, oh, never again!

The Messenger.

THE DELUGE AND ITS EVIDENCES.

GEO. B. FINDLAY.

It is the prevailing opinion of our day that there are on the earth no existing evidences of the Deluge—that the disturbances on the earth's surface caused by that catastrophe must have long since disappeared. The origin of this opinion may be stated in the words of Dr. E. Hitchcock, recorded in his "Religion of Geology," some thirty years ago, namely:

"Among well-informed geologists, at least, the opinion is almost universal, that there are no facts in their science which can be clearly referred to the Noachian deluge; that is, no traces in nature of that event."

Abundant remains of marine life, discovered in far inland and widely-separated districts, were at one time indiscriminately regarded as so many evidences of the Deluge. But these remains are now all accounted for, equally without discrimination, by the science of Palæontology. Such an influence has science exercised over the public mind, that it has quietly adopted the conclusion expressed by Dr. Hitchcock, "that there is nothing in the Mosaic account of the Deluge which would necessarily lead us to expect permanent marks of such a catastrophe within or upon the earth."

So strong and unanimous has been the evidence of universal tradition respecting the facts of the Deluge, as recorded in Genesis, that students of Scripture at the present time have not, as a rule, been disturbed by the absence of scientific support. They have turned their attention rather to the apparently greater problem of the age and formation of the Earth's crust and the abode of Man in a remote past—geologists having read the history of past ages in the light of "causes now in action," and what they regard as the natural "laws of uniformity." In this respect, however, students of Scripture would appear to have done themselves injustice, for several reasons. It would really require strong proof to show that such a fearful cataclysm as the Deluge (whether local or general) would leave no traces, after the lapse of a few thousand years. On the other hand the theories of geologists have hitherto been so speculative and shifting, that they are not as yet fully entitled to the respect due to established facts.

It is therefore with deep interest that Bible students will peruse a series of papers entitled "The Cause of the Mammoth's Extinction," from the pen of Mr. Henry Howorth, F. S. A., appearing in the Geological Magazine. The following extract from the September issue, is sufficient to explain the writer's motive and purpose:

"It is the fate of views which have been pressed fanatically on other than merely scientific grounds, that they not only cause science to stiffen her upper lip, but that they react in a mischievous way by making scientific men shrink from, if they do not repudiate, perfectly legitimate modes of argument. I classes of evidence which have been perverted to merely polemical purposes. Because the universal deluge was once insisted upon by the partizans of theology, and was as stoutly opposed by science as being utterly at issue with the evidence, therefore any form of diluvial movement on a large scale, in comparatively recent times, aroused the suspicion and antagonism of those who were afraid the cloven foot might at any moment be thrust forward. Again, because theology quoted as infallible, certain documents containing early traditions of the semetic race, and endeavored to parry the conclusions of logic by an appeal to what transcends logic, therefore it became the fashion to treat this kind of evidence as entirely illegitimate, to evade conclusions derived from the fact that, in widely-separated areas, a common tradition of a common catastrophe of some kind had survived the disintegrating influences of time, and to argue as if this was utterly worthless evidence, and to be thrust aside entirely in favor of inspirited testimony. As a good friend of mine, well known to your readers, said to me, 'If I cleave a boulder and find a fish, with every detail preserved, in its midst, I call that evidence.' The other, he strongly implied, is mere dreaming. It is time a more judicial attitude was adopted towards this kind of evidence, and we purpose quoting it in what follows.'

In setting forth the results of well-known researches over large areas in Northern Asia, Mr. Howorth does not attempt to disturb the established ideas of geologists that the numberless fossil shells and bones found in the superficial deposits of inland and other countries, could not have been the work of any temporary flood—what is now dry land being, at some prehistoric period, ancient sea beds presenting, with little variation the ordinary relics of natural waste and decay. He confines his researches to those irregular deposits of an exceptional character, which geologists have thought it necessary to explain away in accordance with preconceived theories, which leave no room whatever for the operation of extraordinary agencies, especially such as are beyond human experience. That the Mammoth was extinguished by some very sudden and extensive cataclysm of a remarkable nature, is undeniable. The absurdity of some theories hitherto advanced to account for this destruction will readily appear.

A catena of Mammoth carcases, in an excellent state of preservation, have been found in a frozen condition buried several feet underground, from the Obi to Behring's Straits. Remains have also been found in hecatombs, and otherwise in such unnatural positions as a violent death would lead us to expect. They have also been found in New Siberia, at Cronstadt, and other remote places. If these animals had been killed by cold merely, according to some theories, their bodies would have lain on the surface where they fell, and become long ago the prey of the predatory animals. The remains have not been found in frozen snow but in frozen earth, and with a mixture of various species of animals who do not naturally herd together. A sudden change of climate alone could hardly have destroyed the bears and hyenas which are found linked in a common fate with mammoths and rhinoceroses. It has frequently been observed that the bones and other remains of elephants and rhinoceroses are very scarce, and difficult to find. At the approach of death they seek the seclusion of retired, out-of-the-way spots. But in Siberia there are evidences of vast herds having perished together. And it is significant that the remains have generally been found on high ground, thrown together in the wildest confusion. The heterogeneous character of the collection of bones seems to show that the high ground was a place of refuge where the beasts congregated in the presence of a common danger which threatened to annihilate them all.

The theory that many of those animals were suffocated in mud of fresh water deposits and covered by successive layers, is contradicted, not only by the good preservation of the carcases, but also by the fact that the rivers bring down no mud which could have covered them up in this way. More important still, all the bodies have all been found in high hillocks of the tundra, entirely out of reach of the rivers. Another theory—that the animals sank in boggy ground and were thus overwhelmed—is also untenable. They are not found in boggy ground or in ground that could ever have been boggy, but in layers of clay and sand raised in conspicuous hillocks above the surrounding tundras. They have often been found, too, among masses of drifted trees, vegetable remains, and other debris of a flood.

With such testimony before him, the obvious and only possible conclusion Mr. Howorth can arrive at is, that these animals died suddenly by a wide-spread flood of water which swept them all away, together with the clay and sand in which their bodies are found enveloped, and that this catastrophe was immediately followed by a sudden change of climate, which accounts for their preservation. This appears to be the view of the older writers whose minds were unfettered by modern theories. Hugh Miller, in his lectures on "The Noachian Deluge," refers to the opinions of those writers. Their errors regarding the true classification of ordinary fossil remains have led most writers of the present time to ignore such important researches as those considered above. It is interesting and instructive to compare the remarks of Mr. Howorth with those of Hugh Miller, and to observe how the mind of the latter is hampered by the favorite theories of organic remains, and more particularly by his arguments in favor of a strictly local deluge. In concluding his evidence in favor of a sudden and general diluvial movement all over Northern Asia, Mr. Howorth proposes in his next paper to deal with the European problem, where, he is convinced, the evidence points to the same conclusion. I have been able thus far to notice, very briefly, a few of the principal items in an article valuable as bearing an independent testimony to the truth of important Scripture history. If the reader should be sufficiently interested to read Mr. Howorth's instructive contributions for himself, the object of this paper will have been attained.

THE JEWISH PROBLEM.

How comes it that the Jews continue to be the objects of such hatred and outrage as we have recently witnessed in various parts of Europe?

This question has been much discussed by statesmen, scholars, and philosophers. In Germany it has produced a special literature of its own. And now we have the opinions upon it, simultaneously, of two very different courts of inquiry, viz., the despotic Russian Government, and a democratic English professor. We read that "the circular recently issued by the Russian Minister of the Interior appointing local Commissioners to examine and report upon the questions at issue between the people and the Jews, says that the Government recognize the detriment to the Christian population of the economical activity, exclusiveness, and religious fanaticism of the Jews, which are still predominant, in spite of the efforts of twenty years to blend the two populations. It attributes the recent disturbance, as proved in evidence before the tribunals, to exclusively economical causes, arising out of the Jewish monopolization of trade and rights over land, and to unfair advantage the Jews take of the poorer classes. The Minister finally promises protection to the Jews against violence, but says energetic measures must be taken to shield the Christian population from the effects of their injurious activity, which has been the cause of that violence."

And, in the Nineteenth Century, Professor Goldwin Smith tells us that the Jews will continue liable to persecution (justly, he almost seems to say), as long they remain "a relic of tribalism, with tribal mark, tribal separation, and a tribal God," and as long as "the Jew regards his race as superior to humanity, and looks forward to triumph over all under the leadership of a Messiah." He also agrees with the Russian Government that the money-making tendencies of the Jews are at the root of much of the jealousy with which they are regarded by their Gentile neighbors, and that "religion is the least part of the matter." His advice is that the Jews should give up their exclusiveness and separatism, and become true citizens of the countries in which they reside. In other words, let them cease to be Jews, submit to be "assimilated and absorbed," and live at peace.

It is not strange, perhaps, to find a blinded and brutal despotism repeating the complaints of the notorious Haman regarding "the diverse customs" of the scattered nation; but it is instructive to note how entirely absent from the mind, even of a nineteenth century professor of political economy, is the idea that the prophetic word or the Divine purposes have any bearing on the question.

Doubtless many Jews have in modern times become so much at ease among the nations as to care little for the faith and hope of their fathers. And perhaps God has allowed the sudden fires of persecution to break out, to stir them up, and prevent their thus mistakenly "settling on their lees." But at all events politicians of every shade would do well to learn that neither toleration nor persecution, enticement or coercion, will ever be allowed to thwart the Divine purpose to keep the Jews distinct from the Gentiles, and plant them in their own land again in His proper time; however much latter-day teachers like Mr. Goldwin Smith may sneer at the "sacred cows" of "the chosen people," and the contents of their "sacred books," which have so "shocked" the delicate "moral sense of Bishop Colenso," and the great apostle of Agnosticism in America."

MORMON DESPOTISM.

C. C. GOODWIN.

The first colony that went to Utah was composed of only a few hundred people; now the Church claims that it rules some one hundred thousand followers in the Territory.

The first comers had a large percentage of Americans, who were drawn into the toils before the full enormities of the institution were divulged, but of those who have connected themselves with the Mormon church, during the past thirty years, quite nine-tenths have been from Europe and from the very lowest classes of European society. The immigration has increased from a few hundreds annually to a few thousands. Last year more than three thousand came, and this year a heavy increase over that number is expected. The children of school age, as returned by the Mormon authorities, number 40,000. Those too young to attend school, together with those above school age and still under the age of twenty-five years, must number quite 30,000 more.

It is clear that the Mormon kingdom in Utah is composed of foreigners and the children of foreigners. It is necessarily so. It is an institution so absolutely un-American in all its requirements that it would die of its own infamies within twenty years except for the yearly infusion of fresh serf blood from abroad. Few Americans could ever be made to bear the unquestioned and unquestioning obedience which is exacted from this people. The government is an absolute despotism. Every ward in the city, every small precinct in the country, is under the control of a bishop. To him the people have to submit all their affairs, temporal as well as spiritual. His advice amounts to a command which must be obeyed. The bishops report to the elders, the elders to the seventies, the seventies to the high priests, the high priests to the presidents of the states, they to the patriarchs, they to the twelve apostles, and they to the president and his high counsellors.

Down the same scale the orders are sent.

These leaders are the same as God to the blinded thousands of Utah. At the last October conference the burden of the harangues to the people was to impress upon them that the chiefs, being daily and regularly inspired by God, could make no mistake, could do no wrong.

The discourse of Elder Orson Pratt is full of this business, and he did not fail to warn all who doubted that they would be damned. At the same conference another elder explained that the people must obey their leaders in financial as well as spiritual affairs, even as the people did in the days of Moses.

Through such a system it is easy to see how an ignorant and fanatical people are held under absolute control by the heads of the organization. In Brigham Young's time he was a more absolute ruler than was ever the Czar of Russia. Since his death the president, John Taylor, and his first counsellor, George Q. Cannon, make the controlling power. Both are Englishmen.

A favorite expression of Brigham Young's used to be, "We follow the forms of a Republic, but this is a Kingdom."

It is a kingdom, or rather a despotism, so all-embracing that intelligent Americans at a distance do not appear to believe the truth about it when it is told.

Brevities.

Last year's returns show that the number of persons killed throughout India by wild beasts or snakes has gradually increased from 19,273 in 1878 to 21,950 in 1880. The largest number of deaths occurred in Bengal, where 10,064 persons died from snake bites and 359 were killed by tigers.

The telegraph wire in India is stretched between the summits of two hill—each hill being 1,200 feet high—across the Kistnah river. The span of wire is over 6,000 feet in length, and is the longest in the world. The only engineering appliances used in stretching this cable was a common windlass.

There is in Roumelia a valley known as the Kezanlik, entirely given up to rose culture. During the flowering season it is from the top of the hills on either side one mass of flowers. So saturated is the air with the perfume that it clings to the hair and the clothes, and the sweat remains for days on the latter. The essence sells wholesale in Paris at 1,500 and 2,000 francs the kilo, and is retailed at 5,000 francs and over.

There is a tradition that the first foot which pressed the snow-clad rock of Plymouth, Mass., was that of May Chilton, a fair young maiden; and the last survivor of those heroic pioneers was Mary Allerton, who lived to see the planting of twelve out of the thirteen colonies which formed the nucleus of the United States.

Rev. Mr. Seguin, the converted French-Canadian priest who carries on missionary work in the French language—by teaching school and preaching—at 405 Second avenue, has written a pamphlet upon the question, "Was the Apostle Peter ever at Rome?" This question he answers in the negative from a convincing array of testimony. The circulation of this pamphlet by employers and others among French Roman Catholics would open their eyes to the delusion under which they have been laboring, that Peter was the first Pope of Rome; a delusion on which the whole power of the Bishop of Rome outside of his own Diocese rests. The money paid for this pamphlet will also afford needed help for the mission. The price is 10 cents, or a dozen for one dollar.

The famous spring of boiling water in the middle basin of Hell's Half Acre in the Yellowstone region, has lately become still more wonderful as a geyser. Four or five times every twenty-four hours it discharges a great column of water, freighted with stones and obscured by a dense volume of steam. The hollow formation for hundreds of yards around the orifice trembles under the upheaval, and the water is thrown to a height of a hundred feet.

Queen Victoria on October 25 completed a reign of 44 years and 128 days, which is just the length of time that Queen Elizabeth sat on the throne, that Queen reigning from Nov. 17, 1558, to March 24, 1603. Consequently she has reigned longer than any other English Queen Regnant, and longer than any English King, with the exception of George III., who reigned 60 years (1760–1820); Henry III., who reigned 56 years (1216–1272); and Edward III., 50 years (1327–1377).

OUR LATE PRESIDENT.

One of the "boys in blue," who kept watch at the Capitol during one of the nights on which the body lay in state, told me that the most touching of all the scenes that fell under his eye was, that about two o'clock in the morning, after the doors had been closed, fifty or sixty men, ragged and uncouth, white and black, were noticed standing with uncovered heads on the steps of the building. When asked what they wanted, they said with subdued voice, that they wanted to see the President, that they were brick-burners and could come no other time. The doors were opened, and as they walked by and looked upon what was left, showed the keen appreciation of their loss.

THE BLOOD AND THE BRAIN.

The announcement, some time since, that Dr. Mosso, of Turin, had measured the consumption of blood by the brain in its diverse mental acts, excited much interest in medical circles, and the various investigations to which it has given rise have been of peculiar interest. Briefly explained, the arm of the subject to be thus operated upon is inclosed in a vessel tightly, the empty space being completely filled with water; if blood flows out of the arm to the brain, the vessel will hold more water, or, if the flow of blood is from the brain, water will flow out of the vessel—so that, by a very simple apparatus, the means are afforded for registering the demand of the brain for blood for any purpose, and the relative amount of mental power required by different persons to work out the same problem.

THE STARS OF NOVEMBER'S SKY.

November is rich in material for planetary study. Mercury leads the list with an inferior conjunction, a transit and a western elongation. Neptune follows Saturn in reaching opposition. Jupiter follows Neptune in arriving at the goal, donning the most superb array for the occasion. The great luminary himself contributes his share to the festive activity of his family in an annular eclipse. The moon pays her respects to every planet in turn. The grand line of planets clustering beyond us and on the same side of the sun remains unbroken, three of the outer planets, Saturn, Neptune and Jupiter, arriving at opposition within thirteen days of each other. The moonless night of mid-November will be glorious with star-lit beauty. Saturn, Jupiter and Mars will reign as lords of the ascendant, and around them will be grouped some of the brightest stars and constellations that grace the firmament, those twinkling mysteries that fill the soul with emotions of wonder and awe, while it tries to grasp the boundlessness of space and the all-pervading power that holds in harmony the shining suns that people the blue vault of heaven.

OBITUARY.

DIED—At Prairieville, Mich., Sept. 11, 1851, Sister Amelia Brainard, aged 75 years.

Sister Brainard and her husband embraced the blessed hope of the near coming of the Lord over twenty years ago, and were baptized by the writer, thus shadowing forth their faith in the resurrection of Jesus and of their own resurrection at the last day—of this evil age.

Brother Brainard died about eighteen years ago, and we trust sleeps in Jesus. They were very zealous in doing what they could to have the gospel of the kingdom proclaimed to those around them.

I was called to preach a funeral discourse at the time of Brother Brainard's death to a large assembly of friends and neighbors. By request of Sister Brainard I was sent for to speak the words of eternal life to the people who assembled in the Methodist church and gave good attention to the promise of Christ: John xi. 25, 26—"He that believeth on me though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." This hope of living an endless life in the kingdom of God, to begin at the resurrection of the just, became to our sister an anchor to the soul sure and stedfast, in her long sickness and subsequent death.

E. HOYT.

DIED—At Pebulo, Col., Aug. 18, 1881, Thomas K. Gower, son of Z. and Polly Gower, aged 20 years.

Brother Gower moved with his father from Kansas, in 1875, was baptized by his father, in 1878, moved to Colorado in 1880, where he waits the appearing of the Life-Giver.

Brother Gower leaves a mother, two brothers, seven sisters, and a loving companion, with many warm friends to mourn; but we are comforted by these precious words: And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me write, Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.

God will redeem his soul from the power of the grave, which has been the hope of the saints of all ages. Only a few more rushing winds and blasting reins and we will be able to realize the vision of John which he saw in the isle of Patmos as recorded in Rev. xv. 2–4: "And I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire; and them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his work, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God; and they sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb.

T. T. DAVAL.

Fell asleep in Jesus, her elder brother, at Feathill, Ont., Oct. 28, 1881; Sister Catherine Ball, wife of Brother Benjamin Ball, in the 82d year of her age.

Sister Ball was a native of England, came to Canada about fifty-one years ago. She and her husband embraced the personal coming of Christ to reign on the earth, under the labors of Wm. Miller and his coadjutors.

Having taken her stand upon an open Bible, she never closed it by saying she had learned all the truth; but continued to grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth. Therefore she had been enabled to lay hold on the glorious future, the work to be accomplished under the reign of Jesus and his co-rulers.

For thirty years she had not seen a day that she could say she was well. Hence she was deprived of the privilege much of the time of meeting with the lovers of the gospel, and visiting such. But this she endured with true Christian patience, for with her, godliness, with contentment, was great gain.

In her death Brother Ball has lost a good wife, children an excellent mother, the church of God a valuable member, the community a kind neighbor.

Her funeral was largely attended by all classes, more than could get into our chapel, who listened with deep interest to a discourse delivered by the writer, predicated upon Job xiv. 23–27, a text chosen by her years previous to her death. Then we retired to Fonthill cemetery, where we laid Sister Ball down in the cold grave to rest until the resurrection.

Thus one after another of the old veterans are laid aside to rest in the dust, and soon we shall all rest with our Sister, if this age lasts much longer; but not without hope of living again when Jesus our Life-Giver shall come.

Editor Restitution:

I thought I would write a short article for the paper, giving an account of our travels since Sept. 27, at which time I left home and met father near Michigan City.

We then went to Three Oaks, Mich., where brother Kinnie met us and took us to his home, where we remained almost two weeks. The weather was inclement, and not having a good place to hold meeting we did not have good success, but the people of that community are interested.

The next point was near St. Joe, in brother Merrin's neighborhood. On our way there we stopped one night with brother Andrews, near New Troy a held meeting.

We commenced our meeting on Wednesday night in brother Merwin's neighborhood and remained over Sunday; we then went to brother Andrews, where we had meeting on Monday night. The following night we held a temperance meeting in Three Oaks, and on Wednesday, Oct. 19, we went to LaPaz, Ind., and held meetings just a week. Our meetings at that place were well attended, and I think some were very much interested. One brother put on Christ by baptism—making five in all that father immersed, four of them while at the Argos Conference.

Oct. 27, we went to Macy, Ind., where we held good meetings, until over Sunday. Held temperance meeting Saturday night; had a crowded house.

Went next to brother J. F. Wagoner's, and had a temperance meeting. On Tuesday afternoon we started home but did not reach our destination until Wednesday morning on account of missing the train at Logansport.

Father went away again on Friday, and intends to be gone until after the first Sunday in December, and so the good work goes on, but there cannot be much done for the people need livening up. These are perilous times, and people are not studying as they really should.

Your sister waiting the appearing of the Lord and Master, when I hope to meet all the brethren and sisters.

"I WILL NEVER LEAVE THEE, NOR FORSAKE THEE."—Heb. xiii. 5.

W. I. CROCKETT.

Fear not, I am with thee o'an now and forever,
My arms are around thee to comfort and save;
Wherever thou goest no power can sever,
My love that is stronger than death and the grave.

Though they are encompassed with evil, and sorrow
Doth lay on thy heart an anpitying hand:
Fear not! I will bring thee to light on the morrow,
When I send thee a King and a glorious land.

Never faint, toil on for the wealth of thy calling,
I will watch and provide for the wants of the way!
Be true. While around thee like autumn leaves falling
The proud in their glory, are swept to decay.

'Tis but a while, a little while waiting
For the star that shall lighten the gloomiest skies:
'Tis but a while, and a peaceful resting
Thy breast, and the earth, shall gladden thine eyes.

The strife may be dark but the morning is sure,
Be strong, for the glamour of sin is allaying,
And the prize that I offer thou must win to secure.

BAPTISM AS A HEATHEN RITE.

Ueber die Wassertaufe als germanischen Heidenthum. Von Konrad Maurer. Separatabdruck aus den Abhandlungen der K. Bayer. Akademie der Wissenschaften I cl. xv. B. III. Abth. München. 81 pp. quarto.

In these pages, Dr. Konrad Maurer gives us an exhaustive monograph on infant baptism as practiced among the heathen Teutons, an important historical fact which has not before been properly treated. To be sure, Rudolph von Sydow, in his "Darstellung des Erbrechts nach den Grundsatzen des Sachsenspiegels," called attention to the fact that, according to ancient Scandinavian laws, the right of inheritance on the part of children depended on their having received baptism; and Jacob Grimm, in his "Deutsche Rechtsalterthumer," p. 467 (ed. of 1828), showed that in the old Norse heathendom the father was permitted to expose his own child only before it had been sprinkled with water. But no one has heretofore taken the pains to collect all the references to infant baptism, and investigate not only how extensively it was practiced among our forefathers, and what its real significance was, but also how far it was the result of or modified by Greek, Roman, and Christian influences. Maurer has now done this, and he has done it with that marvellous learning and acumen for which he is justly celebrated. In the work before us, we find a careful sifting of every passage referring to this subject not only in the old Icelandic and Norwegian, but also in the Swedish, Danish, South-German, and Anglo-Saxon historical documents.

In the old Norse Sagas, the usual term by which baptism is designated is "at ausa barn vatni"—that is, "to sprinkle the child with water." This expression occurs several times in the Elder Edda (thus, in the Lay of Rig, stanzas 7, 21, 34, and in Havamal, 158), and countless times in the Sagas; Maurer gives a large number of instances. It is also to be noted that, in the old Scandinavian Christian records baptism is exclusively designated by the word "skirn" (cleansing), from the verb "at skira," meaning to purify. But the points of similarity between the heathen and Christian rite are very striking. The heathen baptism was performed in connection with the naming of the child. Furthermore, a peculiar bond was established between the person baptizing and the one baptized—a relation corresponding to that of god-father and god-mother among Christians. Finally, it was customary to give presents corresponding precisely to the actual Pathenschencke among the Germans. The recorded instances of infant baptism among the old Scandinavian heathen are numerous and striking. Maurer has made a careful study of the legal importance of the baptismal rite, and shows that children who were to live were immediately after their birth exhibited first to the mother and then to the father. Thereupon they were placed in the arms or on the lap of the father to receive a name and be sprinkled with water. Children, on the other hand, who were not to be brought up, were neither shown to the parents nor sprinkled with water, but were straightway exposed or slain. So sacred was held the rite of baptism that it secured the child's life even when the ceremony had been performed by an improper person, and was not, consequently, strictly legal—an excessive regard for form for which the old Teutons were noted, and which still to a considerable degree characterizes their descendants.

A large portion of Maurer's monograph is devoted to showing how the ceremonies connected with heathen baptism were adopted by the Christian Church, and in tracing to a heathen source the rights and privileges secured to children by baptism in the Church. The author suggests that the laying at the breast was a recognition of the child on the mother's part, and that the granting of the rite of baptism was a recognition of the child on the part of the father, and that this was the chief significance of the latter ceremony; although it would seem from Havamal, in the Elder Edda, that spiritual blessings also were secured to the infant by the sprinkling of holy water. Baptism made the child an heir both among the heathen and among the old Teutonic Christians, and the fact that among both it had so many things in common—that it took place soon after the birth of the child, and was connected with the naming of it that there were god-fathers and god mothers, and that presents were given—makes the question an exceedingly interesting one.

But the author goes further, and proves from ancient laws of the Germans, Visigoths, and Anglo-Saxons that the rite of baptism is to be performed within the ninth day after the birth of the child; and here he calls attention to the ancient Roman custom of giving the name to a female infant on the eighth and to a male infant on the ninth day after birth, and quotes Roman law to show that this naming-day was of legal importance to the child. A similar custom is also found among the ancient Greeks, where the seventh day after the birth of the child was celebrated with cleansing, gifts, sacrifices, banqueting, and other ceremonies. Maurer suggests that this seventh day of cleansing among the heathen Greeks was of the same legal value to the child as the day of sprinkling with water among the ancient Teutons, and that it determined whether the child should live or be exposed. Roman law establishes the fact that the eighth day after birth for girls and the ninth for boys was a dies lustricus—that is, a day on which a religious rite (lustratio) for infants took place, and on which names were given to them, whence it is also called solemnitas nominalium. The day was observed by bringing the infants to the temple, by banquets, etc., (see on this point Marquardt "Das Privatleben der Romer," i., pp. 81, 82). We find, therefore, among the old Greeks and, what is of vastly more importance, in the old Roman laws, a day set apart for infants on which they get their names, and this names, and this naming connected with the observation of certain ceremonies. What the precise nature of these rites was, we are not told; but, inasmuch as the Roman documents designate them by the term lustratio, there can scarcely be room for doubt that it must have been a symbolic cleansing by means of water. And since the dies lustricus confessedly secured legal rights to the infant, the question lies near at hand whether the old Teutonic heathen borrowed the baptismal right from the ancient Romans, or whether baptism was an original institution among the Aryans before they became divided into Teutons, Romans, etc. There can be no doubt, on the one hand, that the dies lustricus of the Romans obtained among the Christians in fixing the day for baptism, especially since it corresponded so nearly with the Mosaic day for circumcision; and, on the other hand, that just as many of the old Teutonic feasts were turned into Christian festivals, so the form of the Teutonic baptism was largely adopted by the Christians in Northern Europe.

We will add that the author inclines to the opinion that the rite of sprinkling infants with water was introduced among the heathen Teutons as a consequence of their intercourse with Christian peoples—in other words, that the Christian ceremony was adopted by the heathen. We believe, however, that the facts are susceptible of another explanation. As Anton Edzardi and before him Mannhardt have suggested, there were among the old Teutons a number of sacred fountains and a wide-spread fountain cultus. Water was regarded as a healing agency, and played a conspicuous part in religious ceremonies of which many seem to cling to the holy water of the Christian Church. A person's fate and character were determined by the sacred norns who presided over births. The person's name was supposed to be an expression or omen of his character. And when we consider the intimate connection of the norns with the fountain of Urd (the norn of the past), the conclusion seems reasonable, that the sprinkling of infants when they received their names had reference to the holy fountains, and that the heathen form of Baptism was adopted by the Christian Church; for surely there is no intimation in the Bible that baptism was ever applied to infants, nor do we find a word in the New Testament connecting the giving of the name to a person with baptism.

POSSIBILITIES OF HISTORY.

The discussion of "what might have happened" is always an exceedingly fascinating one for the student of history, and this fascination is heightened by the common practice of historical writers making individuals or occasions pivotal instead of great movements.

For example, most writers on the history of this century seem to believe and certainly teach that Napoleon I.'s personality was the pivot upon which all European history revolved for nearly a score of years. Therefore, they hold out that if a bullet had cut short Napoleon's career in Italy, or while serving as a Sous Lieutenant, the epoch of 1792–1815 would have had a very different phase.

But those who teach this read history badly. Napoleon's career was not due to his remarkable abilities but to a great popular movement which he headed, as a foam crest does a wave, but to which he could give no direction or control.

At the close of the 18th century all Europe was groaning—as Ireland is to-day—under the extortions of an infinitely vicious and grasping aristocracy. The man who produced the fruits of the earth was allowed only so much of them as would barely support his life, while the rest was taken to pamper the luxury and vice of the merciless landholders. The French Revolution was an uprising of the starving people, and the French armies were welcomed by the plundered and oppressed masses all over Europe as "Liberators."

This made victory easy, and success attended the French flag wherever it was carried. Napoleon floated on the top of the tide, as any other first class military man would have done with the same opportunity. When the movement spent its force he fell. So that, if he had been killed in the first engagement in which he participated, the chances are enormous that the French conquest of Europe would eventually have run about the course it did.

We have had many historic potentialities in this country that strike the reader forcibly.

The first and most important of these relates to the supplanting of the French by the English race in this country. Everything favored the creation of a great French Empire in the Mississippi and St. Lawrence valleys. The French were in possession, and held the whole length of those rivers with strong forts and rapidly growing cities.

A large emigration poured in from France, which in the St. Lawrences valley was of a class superior to that of the settlers on the South Atlantic seaboard.

The foundations of a future empire were well and strongly laid at Cape Breton, Quebec, Montreal, Detroit, St. Louis and New Orleans; apparently much better than they had been or could be at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Charleston. Yet the whole fabric toppled into the dust, and the relatively insignificant English colonies rose to the domination of the continent.

If one, familiar with the history of the world, knowing what a great nation was to arise here, could have been given a map of America before a white man had settled upon it, he would have said immediately that the first settlement would be made on the lower part of the Mississippi, and the country would develop from that initial point, as Europe developed from Venice and Rome.

Another fruitful theme of speculation is as to the civilization that the Indians would have developed had they been left alone for a century or two longer. The Iroquois had acquired the leading place among the Indians of the country, and had reached that stage when people begin to develop the arts of peace. Possibly, if the discovery of America had been postponed a century or more, the Iroquois Indians would have evolved a civilization as unique as that of Japan and China.

Prof. Sayce writes to the Athenæum that he has discovered the name of Nebuchadnezzar in the second column of the long inscription lately discovered on the bank of the Dog River, an account of which, sent me from Beirut by Rev. Dr. Jessup, was recently published in the Observer. Nebuchadnezzar's name is followed by the title he bears in the Inda House inscription: rubanarda—"exalted prince."

Monitory.

Shall You Be One.

BISHOP RYLE.

Reader, the Bible says that few will be saved.

"Straight is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it."

Now shall you be one? Shall you be saved?

I do entreat you to remember that salvation is the one thing needful. Health, and riches, and titles are not needful things. A man may gain eternal life without them.

But what shall the man do who dies not saved?

Oh, that you would see that you must have salvation now, in this present life, and lay hold upon it for your soul. Oh, that you would see that, saved or not saved is the grand question in religion. Sects or parties, opinions and creeds, all these are trifling questions in comparison.

Reader, if you are not one of the few already, strive to be one without delay. I know not who and what you are, but I say boldly, come to Christ and you shall be saved. The gate that leads to life may be strait, but it was wide enough to admit Manasseh and Saul of Tarsus, and why not you? The way that leads to life may be narrow, but it is marked by the footsteps of thousands of sinners like yourself. They all have found it a good way. Jesus Christ invites you. Oh, reader, strive to enter in without delay.

Reader, if you are doubtful whether you are one of the few, make sure work at once, and be doubtful no more. Leave no stone unturned in order to ascertain your own spiritual condition. Be not content with vague hopes and trusts. Rest not on warm feelings and temporary desires after God. Give diligence to make your calling and election sure. Oh, give me leave to say, that if you are content to live on, uncertain about salvation you will live the maddest life in the world.

Reader, remember. Few will be saved. Jesus says so in the Bible.

Shall you be one?

What It Costs.

DR. RICHARD NEWTON.

A gentleman was walking in Regent's Park, in London, and he met a man whose only home was in the poor-house. He had come out to take the air, and excited the gentleman's interested attention.

"Well, my friend," said the gentleman, getting into conversation, "it is a pity that a man like you should be situated where you are. Now may I ask how old you are?"

The man said he was eighty years of age.

"Had you any trade before you became penniless?"

"Yes, I was a carpenter."

"Did you use intoxicating drink?"

"No, oh, no, I only took my beer; never anything stronger; nothing but my beer."

"How much did your beer come to a day?"

"Oh, a sixpence a day, I suppose."

"For how long a time?"

"Well, I suppose for sixty years."

The gentleman had taken out his note-book, and he continued figuring with his pencil while he went on talking with the man.

"Now, let me tell you," said he, as he finished his calculations, "how much that beer cost you, my man. You can go over the figures yourself."

And the gentleman demonstrated that the money, a sixpence a day for sixty years, expended in beer, would, if it had been saved and placed at interest, have yielded him nearly eight hundred dollars a year, or an income of fifteen dollars per week for self-support.

"Let me tell you how much a gallon of whisky cost," said a judge after trying a case. "One gallon of whisky made two men murderers; it made two wives widows, and made eight children orphans."

Oh! it's a costly thing.

GET AT THE ROOT OF THINGS.

The gold mines of Scripture are not in the top soil, you must open a shaft; the precious diamonds of experience are not picked up in the roadway, their secret places are for down. Get down into the vitality, the solidity, the verity, the divinity of the word of God, and seek to possess with it the inward work of the Spirit.

Just as soon as any conviction of truth becomes central and vital, there comes the desire to utter it. Sacrifice is gladness, service is joy, when such an idea becomes a commanding power.

—BY WILEY JONES.—

OPINIONS OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy in most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for cost and perusal in the important information that it will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 16, 1878.

"It evinces a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scripture, and uniform courtesy toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York. Nov. 20, 1881.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested greatly, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are second to none in importance to us. * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and convincing way, should buy this book."—The Rural Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 31, 1879.

"We read it diligently again and again. * * It is perspicuous of excellence and doctrinal truths to the Book of books."—D. M. L., Mo.

"I do not know that I have ever seen from the pen of any modern writer, a plainer exhibit of the gospel of the kingdom and at the same time one better suited to general instruction on that subject, than that which brother Jones gives us in his book, 'The Gospel of the Kingdom, advocated in a series of Ten Discourses.'"—R. —BY H. V. REED.—

BEING AN EXPOSITION OF REV. III. 21.

This is a clear and forcible argument showing the distinction between the throne of the Father and the throne of Christ; the title of Jesus to the throne of David, and the manner whereby exalted men may become fellow-heirs with him, and co-partners in the government of the world.

The Restitution.

"THE RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS WHICH GOD HATH SPOKEN BY THE MOUTH OF ALL HIS HOLY PROPHETS SINCE THE WORLD BEGAN."

VOL. XXX. Read PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, NOVEMBER 23, 1881. NO. 44.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of Kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

J. P. WESTHEIR.

Let it be kept in mind that between the close of the sounding of the sixth trumpet, and the commencement of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, there is a short DELAY called quickly—also it has the name of, VOICE of the seventh angel. It may likewise be called the day of God's PREPARATION. It is a period of truce between two great contending powers. It is the eve of a terrible conflict, such as has never taken place; the conflict in which the world's diadem is to be the prize of the victor. It must, of necessity, be a period of intense activity: one of great excitement; rival interests producing continued strife; a running to and fro; a great increase of general intelligence. Such activity of brain and muscle must give to that short period very distinctive characteristics. We have already shown that the nations appointed by Jehovah to be the executors of the judgment on the little horn went too far, by allowing the witnesses to be slain. We have asked, Who are the witnesses? and in answer have entered upon the investigation of the first six or eight chapters of Zechariah, since some of the same symbols are used by both prophets.

Near the close of Zech. 1, we have the record of another vision:

"Then lifted I up mine eyes, and saw, and behold four horns. And I said unto the angel that talked with me (Angelus interpres—Gabriel), What (be) these? And he answered me, These (are) the horns which have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem. And the Lord showed four carpenters. Then said I, What come these to do? And he spake, saying, These (are) the horns which have scattered Judah, so that no man did lift up his head: but these are come to fray them, to cast out the horns of the Gentiles, which lifted up (their) horn over the land of Judah to scatter it." Verses 18–21.

1. The Four Horns and Four Smiths.—A horn is a symbol of power. The four horns denote the enemies of the Jews, surrounding them, north, south, east and west; the Assyrians, Babylonians, and other tribes, such as the Egyptians, Idumians, Moabites, Ammonites, and other nations that opposed their (the Jews) return. The Jews were scattered to the four winds where they found deadly enemies. The horns, therefore, symbolize the surrounding enemies of the Jews.

2. The Carpenters or Smiths.—Carpenters if the horns were wood; smiths if they were iron. The same explanation of the number four suits the smiths. They denote all the agents employed by Jehovah to overcome these national enemies of the Jews.

This is evident from Zech. vi. 1–8. These are come to break them in pieces and cast them (the Gentiles) out, so that Jerusalem and the temple can be built, and the nation restored. Such is evidently the import of this vision. How far into the future from these days is not stated.

The Angel with the Measuring Line.—"I lifted up mine eyes again, and looked, and behold a man with a measuring line in his hand. Then said I, Whither goest thou? And he said unto me, To measure Jerusalem, to see what is the breadth thereof, and what (is) the length thereof. And, behold, the angel that talked with me (Gabriel) went forth, and another angel (Raphael, perhaps) went out to meet him, and said (Michael said) unto him (he had received the message and order from Michael), Run, (thou Gabriel) speak to this young man, (Zechariah) saying, Jerusalem shall be inhabited, (as) towns without walls for the multitude of men and cattle therein: For I, saith the Lord, (the giver of the message) will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her. Ho, ho, (come forth) and flee from the land of the north, saith the Lord: for I have spread you abroad as the four winds of heaven saith the Lord. Deliver thyself, O Zion, that dwellest (with) the daughter of Babylon. For thus saith the Lord of hosts; After the glory hath he sent me unto the nations which spoiled you: for he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye. For, behold, I will shake my hand upon them, and they shall be a spoil to the hands of their servants: and ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me. Sing and rejoice, O daughter of Zion: for, lo, I come, and I will dwell in the midst of thee, saith the Lord. And many nations shall be joined to the Lord in that day, and shall be my people: and I will dwell in the midst of thee, and thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto thee. And the Lord shall inherit Judah his portion in the holy land, and shall choose Jerusalem again. Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord: for he is raised up out of his holy habitation." Chap. ii 1–13.

This message, with its surroundings, is of great interest; as to its author (Jehovah), its officiary—Michael, Gabriel, and another messenger; and the people for whom it was given. Zechariah, standing with Gabriel, sees, at some distance, Michael, with a measuring line, moving toward the city of Jerusalem, now without walls, or a temple, and with only a few inhabitants—weighed down with poverty and disappointment. Zechariah wishes to know what is to be measured; Gabriel starts to get the information from Michael, the prince of the Jews. Michael, anticipating his errand, sends Raphael with the message from God to Gabriel to be immediately communicated to Zechariah.

This message contains the future history, near and remote, of the Jews. It contains an outline of God's future purpose towards the Jewish nation, and its Gentile adversaries. Many figures, symbols and types, are hereafter revealed to the prophets, in ecstacies and dreams; but they are simply designed to illustrate the comprehensive message. Let this message be kept in view in all our investigations of Jewish history, and the future of human, national destiny.

It contains three chapters, or parts:

1. The future of Jerusalem. Verses 4, 5.

2. God's love for the Jews. (Apple of his eye). Verses 6–10.

3. God's purpose to dwell with that people. Verses 10–13.

Examine these parts; investigate all their elements; and the future of Israel will shine forth with exceeding brightness, so as to eclipse all systems of Gentile domination. Illustrations of this message begin in the third chapter and terminate in the closing visions of John in the Isle of Patmos. It must not be forgotten that the visions of Zechariah and John were given by the same Divine being, and that each prophet saw the same remote landscape. They both see the consummation. With this message before us, let us examine some of Zechariah's figures.

"And he (the Lord) showed me Joshua the high priest standing before the angel of the Lord (Michael), and Satan standing at his right hand to resist him (Joshua). And the Lord said unto Satan, (Michael said unto Satan—Jude 9), The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan; even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem rebuke thee: (is) not this a brand plucked out of the fire? (A brand—Jewish body, or nation—fire—captivity in Babylon). Now Joshua was clothed with filthy garments, and stood before the angel (Michael). And (the Lord) answered and spake unto those that stood before him, saying, Take away the filthy garments from him (Joshua). And to him (Joshua) he (the Lord) said, Behold, I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment. And I said, Let them set a fair mitre upon his head. So they set a fair mitre upon his head, and clothed him with garments. And the angel of the Lord (Michael) stood by. And the angel of the Lord (Michael) protested unto Joshua, saying, Thus saith the Lord of hosts; If thou wilt walk in my ways, and if thou wilt keep my charge, then thou shalt also judge my house, and shalt also keep my courts, and I will give thee places to walk among these that stand by. Hear now, O Joshua the high priest, thou, and thy fellows (assistant priests) that sit before (about) thee: for they (are) men wondered at (typical men): for, behold, I will bring forth my servant the BRANCH (anti-typical priest king). For behold the stone (Christ) that I have laid before Joshua; upon one stone (Christ) (shall be) seven eyes: behold, I will engrave the graving thereof, saith the Lord of hosts, and I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day. In that day, saith the Lord of hosts, shall ye call (to) every man under the vine, and under the fig-tree." Zech. iii.

This vision belongs to the same night with those previously seen.

The Lord directs the prophet's attention to a noted contest, then in progress:—the conflict is between Joshua (type of the Jewish church national as the body of Moses) and Satan. Joshua, in humble, filthy garments, is officiating in the service, then being re-established, near to Michael, the prince of the Jewish nation, and superintending their interests, when their adversary approaches in the right rear of Joshua, and commences his lying accusations against the Jews, Joshua's people. He opposed their re-establishment. Michael, being insulted at his wicked boldness, interferes; and addressing Satan, says, Jehovah (Messiah) rebuke thee; hath not Jehovah pledged the return and prosperity of this people—the body of Moses—a brand plucked out of the Babylonian fire—the apple of his eye—the seed of Abraham? Flee to thy prison thou adversary of all good, and thou archfoe of man.

Joshua is evidently a type of the returning Jewish nation as well as its high priest; his garments represented the character of the Jews for whom he was officiating. Whatever was done to Joshua was to be done to the Jews. His iniquities were taken away, and he was clothed with clean, beautiful garments. The prophet is so full of ecstacy, that, forgetting his position, he begins to issue his commands: Place upon him (Joshua) a clean turban; put on [illegible] him; and it was all done, Michael himself looking on, and, perhaps, repeating the orders of the prophet. Zechariah wishes the high priest to have an out and out new suit; and his prayer is granted.

Joshua is now promised, on condition of fidelity to his work as the illustrious type of his people as a holy nation, if thou shalt judge my house and guard my courts; if thou wilt walk in my ways, and keep my commandments, I will give you my angels as your body guard, and as your perpetuated guides. Yet hear, O Joshua, high priest, and chief priests, surrounding thee, ye are types, in the typical remnant nation, out of literal Babylon, of the anti-typical remnant nation brought out of Mystic Babylon, under the Branch, or Sprout, Jesus the Messiah.

Christ is then promised under the symbol of a stone. It has seven eyes, all intelligence and oversight. It is the eye stone, the top corner stone, the absent, rejected stone of the Christian pyramid builders; one to be laid in Zion. The land, God's sanctuary, is to be cleansed, and Eden beauty smiles on all its hills and along all its valleys and over all its plains. Its mountains and vales are to be crowned with an industrious population—on opposite slopes, sitting in the quiet shades of their vines and fig-trees, shall hold conversations of their happy times, and praise the wisdom of their king, and the righteousness of their officers. Time, to the prophet, is annihilated; and he is transported to the happy scenes of the last day. Thrice happy should we be also, if the scenes of those days would so occupy our minds, as would allow us to look on this world only through an inverted telescope.

"Never mistake perspiration for inspiration," said an old minister in his charge to a young minister just being ordained.

A PROPOSITION.

Editor Restitution:

I have a proposition to present to the brethren, which I think ought to be carefully considered, and action taken on it at once. It is this:

There should be a fund established and sustained, for the purpose of sending some of the preaching brethren to communities where there are but few or none of the faith, and they have not the means to defray the expenses by themselves, and especially where there is some one or more who desire baptism, and cannot have it done because they cannot go where there is a preacher or attend a meeting.

The need of such a fund for such a purpose will become apparent in a case in point here in Dakota.

It will be remembered that some months since, Mrs. J. C. Vose, of Green Island, Neb., requested through THE RESTITUTION, that some preacher might come that way, that she might be immersed. Through Mrs. S. R. Wince and myself a meeting was arranged to take place here, to be conducted by Brother T. J. Whitsitt, of Newell, Iowa, on Oct. 7, and continue over Sunday, at which time she was to meet with us and be immersed. On account of sickness at the last moment she was unable to attend; consequently her most ardent wish remains unfulfilled.

What then must be done? Some preaching brother must come out here and either pay his own expenses—and as far as my acquaintance goes very few are able to do this—or some other parties must pay them, for her case must not be left thus.

Although through the kindly assistance of Sister Wince in a pecuniary way, we helped to defray the expenses of Brother Whitsitt here before, we do not feel that we are able to do much more at present, and when all the expense of such a meeting, for it costs money to travel on cars, is met by a few it is too much of a tax.

I presume there are a number of such cases, that would come to light if they know there was any help for them.

Now such a state of things should not exist. They should be a common cause in which all should be interested if they believe they have the truth on their side.

Now a fund can very easily be raised and kept up in this way:—Let every subscriber to THE RESTITUTION send ten cents to some one appointed treasurer, and the amount is raised at once. Many of the brethren whom I know could give dollars where others could not give cents. Then those who want preaching and cannot pay the expenses notify the treasurer, who will then supply the minister who may be called upon to go, with the necessary funds, and the work is done and the gospel accomplishes that for which it is sent.

We as a people are far behind in such matters, and I fear the Lord will find us sleeping when he returns if there is not a waking up, and that slothful servant condemned.

Let us hear from the brethren in regard to this matter. Let us be up and doing, and trying to help others to hear and obey the good news, and so help ourselves.

Yours for the Truth.

ALONZO HANSON.

Elk Point, D. T.

"THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD, I SHALL NOT WANT."

W. L. CROCKETT.

What a happy assurance! We are led by the One who is tender, and merciful, and true. The Good Shepherd. He who laid down his life for the sheep. We cannot go astray if we confide in him. If we take him by the hand, and say as little children, "Where thou leadest I will follow."

If we are led over stony paths, and our feet are torn and bleeding, he whom we follow did suffer more. If we walk amid clouds and darkness, let us not despair; we shall be comforted with light.

The world is full of false leaders. Let us not be deceived; the Lord alone can lead us aright. Yea even when we walk through the valley of the shadow of death. Who can do us harm? The arms that are stronger than death are around us, the voice of the appreciative Savior encourages us, and while with one hand he points the way, the other lifts us up, and tenderly leads us on.

We are so weak. We can but cling to him. He is our strength. He is our life. We need fear no evil; his rod and his staff they comfort us.

Gracious Shepherd, tender Savior,
We will lay our care on thee;
Thou will comfort and preserve us,
Till these lingering shadows flee.

A NEW SONG.

CHARLES BOARDMAN.

And they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders, and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth.

O sing unto the Lord a new song for he hath done marvellous things, his right hand and holy arm hath gotten him the victory.

The Lord hath made known his salvation, his righteousness hath he openly showed in the sight of the heathen.

He hath remembered his mercy towards the house of Israel; all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.

Make a joyful noise unto all the earth, make a loud noise, and rejoice and sing praise.

Sing unto the Lord with the harp and the voice of a psalm.

With trumpets and sound of cornet make a joyful noise before the Lord the King. Let the sea roar and the fulness thereof, the world and they that dwell therein.

Let the floods clap their hands: let the hills be joyful together before the Lord; for he cometh to judge the earth, with righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with equity.

And I heard the number of them that were sealed; and there were sealed a hundred and forty and four thousand of all the tribes of the children of Israel.

These were redeemed from among men being the first fruits unto God and to the Lamb. Amen.

GOLDEN THREADS.

Questions.

Oh, what can little hands do
To please the King of heaven?
The little hands some work may try
To help the poor in misery—
Such grace to mine be given.

Oh, what can little lips do
To please the King of heaven?
The little lips can praise and pray,
And gentle words of kindness say—
Such grace to mine be given.

Oh, what can little eyes do
To please the King of heaven?
The little eyes can upward look,
Can learn to read God's holy book—
Such grace to mine be given.

Oh, what can little hearts do
To please the King of heaven?
The hearts can to his statutes bend,
Can love and trust their heavenly Friend—
Such grace to mine be given.

Though small is all that we can do
To please the King of heaven,
When hearts and hands and lips unite
To serve the Savior with delight,
They are most precious in God's sight.
Such grace to mine be given.

Are You Safe?

Two little girls were playing with their dolls in a corner of the nursery, and singing as they played—

Safe in the arms of Jesus,
Safe on his gentle breast,
There by his love o'ershaded,
Sweetly my soul shall rest.

Mother was busy writing, only stopping now and then to listen to the little ones' talk, unobserved by her.

"Sister, how do you know you are safe?" asked Nellie, the younger of the two.

"Because I am holding Jesus with both hands—tight!" promptly replied sister.

"Ah! that's not safe," said the other child. "Suppose Satan came along, and cut your two hands off!"

Little sister looked very troubled for a few moments, dropped poor dolly, and thought deeply. Suddenly her face shone with joy, and she cried out, "Oh! I forgot! I forgot! Jesus is holding me with his two hands, and Satan can't cut his hands off; so I am safe!"

Yes, my dear young friends, that is the secret. If you want to be happy, you must not be thinking about yourself, and your "feeling safe," but rest in the happy knowledge that Jesus has got you safe.

The Lord Will Provide.

A mother one morning gave her two little ones books and toys to amuse them with, while she went up stairs to attend to something. A half-hour passed quietly away, when one of the little ones went to the foot of the stairs, and in a timid voice called out, "Mamma, are you there?"

"Yes, darling."

"All right," said the child, and the play went on. After a little time the voice again cried, "Mamma, are you there?"

"Yes, darling."

"All right," said the child again, and once more went on with her playing.

And this is just the way we should feel toward Jesus. He has gone to the right hand of God. He has left us down in this lower room of the world to be occupied here for awhile. But to keep us from fear or care, he speaks to us from his book, as that mother spoke to her little ones. He says to us: "Fear not; I am with thee. Jehovah-Jireh—the Lord will provide."

Pinky.

The boy marched straight up to the counter.

"Well, my little man," said the merchant complacently,—he had just risen from a gloriously good dinner—what will you have to-day?"

"Oh, please, sir, mayn't I do some work for you?"

"What, sir?"

"Why, your toes. Your mother couldn't keep you in shoes if they were out."

"She can't keep me in shoes anyhow, sir," and the voice hesitated.

The man took pains to look over the counter. It was too much for him; he couldn't see the toes. Then he went all the way round.

"I thought I should need a microscope," he said gravely, "but I reckon if I get close enough I can see what you look like."

"I'm older than I'm big, sir," was the neat rejoinder. "Folks say I'm small of my age."

"You see my mother hasn't anybody but me, and this morning I saw her crying because she could not find five cents in her pocket-book, and she thinks the boy that took the ashes stole it—and—I—haven't had—any—any breakfast!" The voice again hesitated, and tears came to the eyes.

"I reckon I can help you to a breakfast, my little fellow," said the man, feeling in his vest pocket. "Will that quarter do?"

The boy shook his head. "Mother wouldn't let me beg, sir," was his simple reply.

"Humph! where's your father?"

"We never heard of him, sir, after he went away. He was lost in the steamer City of Boston."

"Ah! you don't say! That's bad. But you are a plucky little fellow anyhow. Let me see," and he pondered, puckering up his mouth and looking straight down into the boy's eyes, which were looking straight up into his.

"Saunders," he asked, addressing a clerk who was rolling up and writing on some parcels, "is Cash No. 4 still sick?"

"Dead, sir; died last night," was the reply.

"Ah! I'm sorry to hear that. Well, here's a youngster that can take his place."

Mr. Saunders looked up slowly; then he put his pen behind his left ear; his glance traveled curiously from Tommy to Mr. Towers.

"Oh, I understand," said the latter; "yes, he is small—very small indeed—but I like his pluck. What did No. 4 get?"

"Three dollars, sir," said the still astonished clerk.

"Put this boy down four. There, youngster, give him your name, and run home and tell your mother you've got a place at four dollars a week. Come back on Monday, and I'll tell you what to do. Here's a dollar in advance; I'll take it out of your first week. Can you remember?"

"Work, sir—work all the time?"

"As long as you deserve it, my little man."

Tommy shot out of that shop. If ever broken stairs that had a twist through a whole flight, croaked and trembled under the weight of a small boy,—or perhaps, as might be better stated, laughed and chuckled on account of a small boy's good luck—those in that old tenement house enjoyed themselves thoroughly that morning.

"I've got it mother! I'm took! I'm a cash boy! Don't you know when they take the parcels, the clerks call Cash? Well, I'm that! Four dollars a week! and the man said I had real pluck—courage, you know. And here's a dollar for breakfast. And don't you never cry again; for I'm man of the house now."

The house was only a little ten by fifteen room; but how those blue eyes did magnify it! At first the mother was confounded: then she looked faint; and then she looked—well, it passes my power to tell how she did look as she caught the boy in her arms, hugged and kissed him, the tears streaming down her cheeks; but they were tears of thankfulness.

Christ's Soldiers.

S. ROXANA WIKOFF.

Do you want to be among those, dear children, that you may wear a crown of glory by and by? Then come, and enlist now. I know many of you who are old enough and who know enough to become soldiers of Jesus. You have heard what the reward is to be for fighting the battles of truth; you know that a life that will never end, a crown that will never be taken away, and a place in a kingdom that will endure forever, will be given to every faithful soldier.

You know too, what the conditions of service are, and what steps must be taken before you can be counted in the ranks and be invested with the armor of God. You want to have the things that God has promised to his children and think that you have them; but are you sure, while you stand outside and refuse to come?

Remember your years are slipping away; and yet you are not Christians. If you are not satisfied as to your knowledge, why don't you learn more? You are eager enough to get the lessons well that belong to your school-life; why not as eager to learn the lessons that will save you?

Your young companions die out of Christ, and you may die; you have no promise of living beyond to-day. Learn now the wisdom that will give you life. Come into Christ now. Learn to obey orders now.

SUFFERING AND SINGING.

The most blessed men who have ever lived have been the sharpest sufferers. The most blessed One was the Man of Sorrows. It was when he was in the depths that the joy of David's heart overflowed in song. Paul and Silas, beaten, bleeding, bound, all night long sang praises. Suffering is nothing if it is not in the soul. If the soul is free and glad there will be no more plaints of misery. Sorrow there will be, sobs of pain, but they will be tuned, as they break forth, into songs.—J. Baldwin Brown.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Nov. 23, 1881.

SOME deferred articles will find a place in our next.

THIS year is made remarkable for the number of comets that have made their appearance. The seventh is now visible to astronomers.

THIS number is the fourth for the current month. Our next will be published Dec. 7. On Friday of this week the Board will meet to arrange for the publication of THE RESTITUTION for the coming year. The results will be duly reported.

WILL all our friends try to increase our list of subscribers for the coming year. We hope to report that the paper is no longer burdened with indebtedness. Still it will require some sacrifice on the part of our patrons to carry the paper through till more names are placed on our list. We will be more specific in our notice after the Board meets.

THE trial of Guiteau for the murder of President Garfield is now in progress at Washington. The defense is built on the slender foundation of insanity. Previous declarations, made by the assassin himself, are sufficient proof that his insanity, when he committed the horrible deed, was very much like that of an incensed rattlesnake when it fastens its poisonous fangs into the victim of its rage. Since then, and at the present, the role of mental aberration has not been very adroitly played. Such reptiles, at least, better be caged.

THE following card brings us news that one more of the Household of Faith has fallen asleep. Under the nom de plume of "Christadelphian" Brother R. C. Minor has written several articles for THE RESTITUTION.

Dear Sir:—At ten minutes to two o'clock, Nov. 9, 1881, "Christadelphian" fell asleep in Christ, and will await the second coming of Christ to be exalted in glory.

Yours Truly,
GEO. W. MINOR.

THE DECADES.

The first year of each of the decades—the sixties, the seventies, and the eighties—has been marked with important events. In 1861 the war of the Rebellion broke out, and after four years of internecine strife, the assassination of President Lincoln closed the bloody chapter of history. In 1871 the great fires in Chicago, Boston, and elsewhere marked the opening year of the second decade. The year 1881 has been filled with startling events, such as earthquakes, tempests, fires, floods, and the assassination of the rulers of two of the greatest countries in the world, and thus opens the third decade in most fateful style. The end is not yet.

THE PESTILENCE.

Are the forebodings of the prognosticators of fearful pestilences in connection with planetary influences to be realized? Is there to be another visitation of the angel of death scourging the nations with this frightful disease that wastes alike in the darkness and at noonday? The shadow of doom falls athwart the world, as the reminder of the coming of the time of trouble such as never has been.

"Earth, what a trial lies before thee,
None like it in the shadowy past;
Of all the woes that ever bore thee
—Even though the briefest—is the last."

CHOLERA AT MECCA.

Within the last few weeks there have been vague reports from Arabia of the presence of cholera in Mecca. These have now assumed a tangible shape, and there can be no doubt that a cholerate epidemic is raging in the vicinity of the Prophet's tomb.

A telegram from Alexandria sets down the mortality in Mecca from cholera at 55 on the 3d inst., 214 on the 4th, and 214 on the succeeding day, making a total of nearly 500 in three days.

As Turkish figures seldom err on the side of exaggeration in matters which concern the reputation of Turkish authorities, it may be reasonably assumed that the actual mortality has been greater than the death-rate reported from Jeddah. The dirt of Mecca mocks the maxim which puts cleanliness next to godliness. Hundreds of thousands of Mahometan pilgrims crowd into it annually from all parts of the Islamite world—from the remote steppes of the Kirghiz to the almost unknown corners of the Empire of Morocco. These zealots as a rule are poor and half civilized persons who, provided they can gaze upon the shrines dedicated to Mahomet, are contented with filthy food and villainous accommodations in streets which reek in the hot sunshine with masses of indescribable garbage. The appearance of disease in Mecca in regular intervals is therefore a matter of course. Pilgrims dying there die happy, as death in the vicinity of the tomb of the Prophet insures them a glorious journey across the razor-bridge of "Al Sirat" into the luxurious realms of Paradise.

But the rest of the world has a direct interest in seeing the Turkish authorities compelled to reform the sanitary condition of their sacred cities. Cholera is a traveling and invading course. On several occasions during the last half century it has set out from Hindostan, and after wandering fitfully through Central Asia, and Persia, has suddenly burst forth in Europe and crossed the Atlantic to America. One of the most extraordinary illustrations of its occasional virulence and lightning-like rapidity of movement occurred in northwest India four years ago.

A train left Cawnpore for Lucknow (a comparatively short journey) full of Hindoos. When it arrived at its destination it was found to be full of people who had died or were dying from an attack of cholera which had burst forth in one compartment of the train and spread instantaneously to all the other compartments.

The Turkish authorities appear to have got the idea that the Mecca epidemic must be confined to Mecca, for they show signs of a disposition to prevent caravans of pilgrims from entering the Arabian town and district of El Wadj. They ought, however, to be required by Europe to take active as well as passive measures to prevent the epidemic from travelingon a radius beyond the limits of Mecca, for cholera, like a stone thrown in water, makes ever widening circles if it is not very energetically encountered at the outset.

THE FIRST PUBLIC THANKSGIVING.

In 1608 the Pilgrim Church, exiled from England, went to Holland, and remained there till 1620, when it sent off the Mayflower colony to New England.

After the first harvest in 1621 the Pilgrims were filled with gratitude on account of the abundance of food and Gov. Bradford sent four men out hunting to bring in supplies for a general and common thanksgiving, that like the Hebrews, at the feast of tabernacles at "the ingathering at the end of the year" they "might in a more special manner rejoice together."

This was the first celebration of the great New England festival of Thanksgiving, now annually held in almost every State and Territory in the month of November.

The historian says of this first celebration—"Great quantities of wild turkies and deer were gathered at Plymouth, and for three days the Pilgrims indulged in rejoicing, firing of guns and feasting—entertaining at the same time, King Massasoit and ninety of his dusky followers, who contributed five deer to the banquets. Seven substantial houses had been built during the summer; the inhabitants were in good health; a few emigrants from England had come in a second ship, and there were happy homes in the wilderness the ensuing winter. Among the new comers was the Rev. Robert Cushman, one of the founders of the colony, who, in December, 1621, preached the first sermon in New England."

SWIFT RETRIBUTION.

In a late number we gave notice of these singular visitations among our news items. The fearful doom of the reviler of an over-ruling Providence, as more largely noted below, should cause every blasphemer of God to hesitate when tempted to treat the glorious and fearful name of the Lord our God with profane contempt. Wickedness has become so bold and unblushingly shameful; that we are by no means surprised that some vile imputdents scoffers are made examples of by our long-suffering and adorable God. God is not to be mocked with impunity. Though doom may linger for awhile it is none the less sure. Final destruction can only be averted by sincere repentance, and pardon through the Savior.

TWO REMARKABLE ALLEGED EVENTS.

The singular cases, involving the action of superhuman agencies or the result of a combination of circumstances have been reported to the Chicago Times correspondent at Little Rock, Ark., and are vouched for by one of the most reputable ministers of Crittendon county.

Robert Nelson, aged 70, had been terribly exercised over the long-continued drouth, and one day last week became very angry and began cursing the Lord for permitting such an infliction. While thus engaged he suddenly fell backward to the earth, having been stricken with paralysis. He has not spoken since, and it is not likely he ever will.

While this scene was in progress a similar event was transpiring in Union County. Three young men were sitting on their horses in the road discussing the probabilities of rain from a cloud which just then was rising in the west. The younger of the group, named John Freeman, referred to the drouth and remarked that a God who would allow his people to suffer so couldn't amount to much. As he was speaking the boys were encircled by lightning and the speaker severely stunned, though his companions were unscathed. Recovering, he renewed the subject, bitterly reviling the Supreme Power. Instantly a bolt of lightning flashed from the cloud overhead, and the young man fell dead in his tracks. Nearly every bone in his body was mashed to jelly, his boots were torn from his feet, and the clothing from his lower extremities. The body presented a horrible appearance, being a blackened and mangled mess of humanity.

His companions were stunned and thrown on the ground, but not seriously injured. The funeral of the unfortunate young man occurred the next day and attracted a large crowd, the larger portion of them were drawn thither by the rumor of the strange events preceding the death of the deceased.

When the body was deposited in the grave and the loose earth had been thrown in until the aperture was filled, and while the friends of the dead man yet lingered in the cemetery, a bolt of lightning descended from a cloud directly over the burial place and struck the grave, throwing the dirt as if a plow had passed lengthwise through it. No one was injured, but those present scattered, almost paralyzed with terror.

The incident is attracting a great deal of attention, ministers and religious people generally holding that the young man was the victim of the wrath of an offended God, while others assert that both the cases referred to were simply wonderful coincidences, having no connection with causes either physical or supernatural. — Boston Journal of Nov. 8, 1881.

THE JEWS.

The following defense of the Jewish people is from the pen of Disraeli. Although they have been the objects of the severest persecutions in the past, they still survive a distinct nation, and their numbers to-day perhaps equal the population that possessed Palestine in the palmiest days of its history. The burning bush, as seen all aflame by Moses and still unconsumed, was nothing less than a most expressive symbol of the history of this wonderful people. God has been preserving them for a grand design in the accomplishment of his wonderful plans:

"The Saxon, the Slav, and the Celt have adopted most of the laws and many of the customs of these Arabian tribes, all their literature, and all their religion. They are therefore indebted to them for much that regulates, much that charms, and much that solaces existence. The tolling multitude rest every seventh day by virtue of a Jewish law; they are perpetually reading, "for their example," the records of Jewish history, and singing the odes and elegies of Jewish poets; and they daily acknowledge on their knees, with reverent gratitude, that the only medium of communication between the Creator and themselves is the Jewish race. Yet they treat that race as the vilest of generations. . . . Had it not been for the Jews of Palestine the good tidings of our Lord would have been unknown forever to the Northern and Western races. The first preachers of the gospel were Jews and none else; the historians of the gospel were Jews, and none else. No one has ever been permitted to write under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit except a Jew. For nearly a century no one believed in the good tidings except Jews. They nursed the sacred flame of which they were the consecrated and hereditary depositaries. And when the time was ripe to diffuse the truth among the ethnics, it was not a Senator of Rome nor a philosopher of Athens who was personally appointed by our Lord for that office, but a Jew of Tarsus, who founded the seven churches of Asia. And that greater church, great even amid its terrible corruptions, that has avenged the victory of Titus by subjugating the capital of the Cæsars, and has changed every one of the Olympian temples into altars of the God of Sinai and of Calvary, was founded by another Jew, a Jew of Galilee. . . . This peculiarity, however, attends the Jews under the most unfavorable circumstances: the other degraded races wear out and disappear; the Jew remains, as determined, as expert, as persevering, as full of resources and resolution as ever. Viewed in this light, the degradation of the Jewish race is alone a striking evidence of its excellence, for none but one of the great races could have survived the trials which it has endured. . . . Obdurate, malignant, odious, and revolting as the lowest Jew appears to us, he is rarely demoralized. Beneath his own roof his heart opens to the influence of his beautiful Arabian traditions. All his ceremonies, his customs, and his festivals are still to celebrate the bounty of Nature and the favor of Jehovah. The patriarchal feeling lingers about his hearth. A man, however fallen, who loves his home is not wholly lost. The trumpets of Sinai still sound in the Hebrew's ear, and a Jew is never seen upon the scaffold unless it be at an auto-da-fe. . . . The sufferings of the Jews, however, have been infinitely more prolonged and varied than those of the Athenians. The Greek nevertheless appears exhausted. The creative genius of Israel, on the contrary, never shone so bright; and when the Russian, the Frenchman, and the Anglo-Saxon, amid applauding theatres or the choral voices at solemn temples, yield themselves to the full spell of a Mozart or a Mendelsohon, it seems difficult to comprehend how these races can reconcile it to their hearts to persecute a Jew. . . . The world has by this time discovered that it is impossible to destroy the Jews. The attempt to extirpate them has been made under the most favorable auspices, and on the largest scale; the most considerable means that man could command have been pertinaciously applied to this object for the longest period of recorded time. Egyptian Pharaohs, Assyrian Kings, Roman Emperors, Scandinavian Crusaders, Gothic Princes, and Holy Inquisitors have alike devoted their energies to the fulfillment of this common purpose. Expatriation, exile, captivity, confiscation, torture on the most ingenious and massacre on the most extensive scale; a curious system of degrading customs and debasing laws which would have broken the heart of any other people has been tried, and in vain. The Jews, after all this havoc, are probably more numerous at this date than they were during the reign of Solomon the Wise, are found in all lands, and, unfortunately, prospering in most. All which proves that it is in vain for man to attempt to battle the inexorable law of Nature, which has decreed that a superior race shall never be destroyed or absorbed by an inferior."

DEDICATION.

The New Meeting House built by the Church of God (Millennarian), in North Township, Marshall County, Ind.—about six miles north of Plymouth, and on the Michigan Road—will be set apart as a house of Divine Worship on Sunday, Dec. 4, 1881, at 10:30 a. m. A preliminary meeting will convene on Friday evening, at 7:30 p. m., at which time the appointment for Saturday will be arranged. Some ministers from abroad are expected to assist in preaching the word. A respectful invitation is hereby extended to our brethren, and to the community generally to attend.

BY ORDER OF THE COMMITTEE.

HADDONFIELD, N. J.

Editor Restitution:

THE RESTITUTION still comes laden with the current news of the day, and presages things near to come.

Your eastern items of news interest us greatly and confirms our credence in the soon coming of the King in his beauty, and may we not look for restitution to commence then?

The first fruits from among men, who are to be co-rulers with Christ, must inaugurate a new era, eventful of changes soon to unfold.

The resurrection was a hard doctrine to the Jews. Paul before Agrippa asked, Why should it be thought a thing incredible, that God should raise the dead?

To my mind its the summum bonum of our hope. No other pleadings of any translation prior, seems to fill the bill. We must be born of the Spirit when this mortal puts on immortality and death is swallowed up of life. This prerogation belongs to Christ and obtained by simple faith having no reliance on self-righteousness compared to filthy rags. The Lord keep us from every false way I pray. Fraternally,

R. WILLARD, SR.

DOUGLASS, KAN.

Editor Restitution:

We have succeeded at last in collecting together here, eight miles east of Douglass, a little band of ten of the Abrahamic faith, organized by Joel M. Haworth, of Plymouth, Kan. We are watching, waiting and expecting the soon coming of the Lord to set up his kingdom on the earth.

I was formerly a missionary Baptist, but thank God that he sent Brother M. M. Miner into this neighborhood, and through his influence and reading THE RESTITUTION and the word of God, the scales of immortal soulism have fallen from my eyes and I can see the light of the true gospel. I was so blinded by the so-called orthodoxy that it took me about four years to get my eyes open to see the truth.

Owing to failing health I expect to make my home in Ohio, therefore I request you to change my address to Forest, O.

Your Brother in Christ.

A. C. MINER.

HASKINS, O.

Editor Restitution:

As I am here alone in this part of the sin-cursed earth, and beset on all hands by those who profess great godliness, under the delusive teachings of implied doctrines mixed with spiritisms, this state of things forces me to search the word which never fails to confound their notions, but in my weakness I find a great help in the searchings of others of large capabilities. By this means the strong are a great help to the weak in these last days of Babylon of faiths and hopes. Many think it strange that the world is in this apostate condition, but they do not know why it is so, nor do they find the remedy. But they are ready to cry out issues or Bible crazy to those that try to show them the words of life, the only means whereby we can have everlasting life. But this real or literal life does not suit their phantom theory of unreal existence in a spirit land away from earth.

Yours in the hope that he that shall come will come, and will not tarry.

J. A. WILSON.

GLASCO, KAN.

Editor Restitution:

Brotherly love is one of the distinguishing traits of the Christian's excellence. As a duty it may be inferred from our common relationship and mutual dependency as creatures, from our equal liability to evil and capability of good and from members of the same family and heirs to the same inheritance.

Brotherly love is enforced both by the precept and example of God. If God so loved us we ought also to love one another. Our Savior says, a new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another.

Brotherly love is kind and long-suffering; it is so in and of itself; it is founded upon the true idea of our relations to each other and to our Heavenly Father. It is a native feeling heightened and improved by Christian intercourse and divine grace; it easily relents when injured, it is in sympathy with everything human; it is backward to inflict a wound, is mild and merciful in spirit, unaffected and affable in behavior, ever showing kindness toward friends, courtesy and hospitality to strangers, and forbearance and forgiveness to enemies.

Yours in Sisterly Love.

Exegetical.

Journal of Prophecy.
Heb. xi. 39, 40.

The apostle has completed his enumeration of the long line of worthies who were well spoken of on account of their faith. It was their faith that marked them out before man and God. Much good could not be affirmed of them in many respects—but this could be said, "They believed." They were formed out of no better clay than others: They possessed natures not less defiled. But still, "they believed." It was their believing that brought them nigh to God at first: it was their believing that brought them continually nigh. It was simply as believers that God recognised them; and it was simply as believers that they walked with God. Theirs was a believing life from first to last. And such is the life of every saint. Such is to be the church's life until the Lord come. She has everything in promise, nothing in possession. She has a kingdom in reversion, but not an inch of ground in actual enjoyment now. Nor is one age or section of the church better than another in this respect: all are the same: all have the same hope—but not one has received the inheritance. That inheritance is equally a future thing to all; all are to receive it together; not one before the other. This is, in substance, the apostle's statement in the passage before us, which has been so often discussed, but little understood:

"All these (ancient believers), though they received a good report on account of their faith, yet were not put in possession of the thing promised." They neither received the inheritance at the time they were here, nor have they received it since. It is still one of the "good things to come."

Then follows a clause which ought either to be read as a parenthesis, or placed at the end of the verse. Let us treat it as a parenthesis, and omit it until we have connected the last clause of the verse with the 39th. The whole would run thus: "These all, though they received a good report on account of their faith, yet did not receive the thing promised, in order that they, without us, should not be perfected." That is to say, the actual possession of the inheritance (or thing promised) has not been given; it has been deferred (till the Lord come), in order that no age or section of the church should be perfectly blest and glorified without all the rest; for all must be raised together; all must be caught up together; all must be crowned together.

What, then, is the meaning of the parenthesis? Its meaning is as follows: The apostle had spoken of the promise, or thing promised; and having mentioned this, he adds parenthetically, by way of explanation, "For God has indeed some better thing in view for us, no less than for them." That is to say, "The inheritance is for us, as well as for them; the promise was indeed made to them, but it includes us also." The "better thing" is not to be taken as meaning some better thing for us than what they possessed. No. But as referring to something better than any had yet received; something which eye had not seen, nor ear heard: something more glorious than had ever been enjoyed by any saint, or any portion of the church, from the beginning.

That "better thing" is the inheritance—the kingdom. This inheritance belongs to us who live in these latter days, no less than to those in earlier times. It is an inheritance which God himself has prepared. It is an inheritance which becomes ours, in title and right, the moment that we believe—but which shall be enjoyed by none until the Lord come.

Hence it is to the day of the Lord that we look as to the day of our common re-entrance into Eden—the day when, as one vast multitude out of every nation, we shall together enter in through the gates into the city—the day of our common triumph; for it is to be one crowning, one triumph, one entrance for the whole church from the beginning: they are not crowned alone, or in fragments, or insections—but in one glorious hour they receive their everlasting crowns, and take their seats in simultaneous gladness upon the long-expected throne.

News Items.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 15.—A severe shock of earthquake was felt to-day in the city of San Jose. The oscillations were from north to south. A heavy rain-storm prevailed at the time. The shock was severe enough to upset a pile of sacked wheat at the railroad depot, and caused great excitement.

LAND-SLIDE AT ELM.

GENEVA, Nov. 16.—The complete annihilation of the village of Elm, in the Canton of Glarus, appears only a question of time and bad weather. The summit of the peak, nearest the village is moving.

CHOLERA SPREADING.

ALEXANDRIA, Nov. 16.—The Sanitary Commission is informed that 800 persons died of cholera in Mecca on the 6th instant. The epidemic has broken out at Djiddah.

SEVERE STORM.

LONDON, Nov. 22.—A severe gale in England, Scotland and the Southeast of Ireland, last evening, unroofed houses and damaged shipping. Part of the Caledonia Railway was washed away.

ARABS RETREATING.

TUNIS, Nov. 22.—Ali Ben Amar has escaped three columns of French troops and is retreating south.

Great destruction and damage have resulted from a freshet along the Sangamon river in Central Illinois. The overflow covers an extensive area of farming country, and is now subsiding. The losses aggregate from $250,000 to $300,000. A disastrous freshet is also reported along the Wabash river.

THE SEVENTH COMET OF THE YEAR.

Director Swift, of the Warner Astronomical Observatory, Rochester, N. Y., at 11 o'clock p. m., of the 16th inst. discovered a faint, round, telliless comet in the constellation Cassiopeia, which has a Right Ascension of 1 hour 50 minutes and a Declination north of 71 degrees with a motion slowly westward. This is the seventh comet which has been discovered since the first of May last, four of which meeting the conditions of the fund, have received the Warner Prize of $200, Prof. Swift procuring the first and last award. Inasmuch as the comet of 1812 is expected in the quarter in which this one appeared, Prof. Swift is not sure at present that the stranger may not be the familiar comet which was discovered by Pons. In 1878 Director Swift, at Denver, claimed to have discovered an intra Mercurial planet. In May, 1882, he will visit Egypt, under the munificent provision of Mr. H. H. Warner, to observe the Total Eclipse, at which time he hopes to verify his intra Mercurial planet discovery. Mr. H. H. Warner's generous patronage of science has given astronomical study a wonderful impulse during the past twelve months, and the country is to be congratulated on having so broad minded a man so "substantially" devoted to the upholding of her intellectual as well as physical interests.

Childhood often holds a truth with its feeble fingers, which the grasp of manhood cannot retain, which it is the pride of utmost age to recover.—John Ruskin.

Most of the beatitudes which infinite compassion pronounced have the sorrow of earth for their subject, but the joys of heaven for their completion.—H. More.

The mind always influences physical health. To be perfectly healthy, one must be morally pure and good. Consciousness of sin always deprecates the strength of bodily functions.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN GREEK AND ENGLISH!

—REVISED—

THE EMPHATIC DIAGLOTT

—BY BENJAMIN WILSON.—

Contains the Original Greek text of the New Testament, with an interlinear word-for-word English translation, based on the renderings of eminent critics, and on the various readings of the various Manuscripts, together with illustrative and explanatory foot notes, and a copious selection of references.

The different renderings of various passages in the New Testament are the foundations on which most of the sects of Christians have been built up: with this work each reader may judge for himself whether the words there literally translated are so arranged in the common version as to express the exact meaning of the New Testament writers.

New improved edition on larger paper. 864 pages, cloth $4.00, Library binding $5.00.

THRENODY.

J. G. HOLLAND.

Oh, sweet are the scents and songs of spring,
And brave are the summer flowers;
And chill are the autumn winds, that bring
The winter's lingering hours.
And the world goes round and round,
And the sun shake into the west
And whether I'm on or under the ground,
The world cares little for me.

The hawk sails over the sunny hill;
The brook trolls on the glade;
But the friends I have lost lie cold and still
Where their stricken forms were laid.
And the world goes round and round,
And the sun slides into the sea;
And whether I'm on or under the ground
The world cares little for me.

O life, why art thou so bright and brave!
O breath, why art thou so sweet!
O friends, how can ye forget so soon
The loved ones who lie at your feet!
But the world goes round and round,
And the sun drops into the sea:
And whether I'm on or under the ground,
The world cares little for me.

The ways of men are busy and bright;
The eye of woman is kind:
It is sweet for the eyes to behold the light.
But the dying and dead are blind.
And the world goes round and round,
And the sun falls into the sea,
And whether I'm on or under the ground,
The world cares little for me.

But if life awake, and will never cease
On the future's distant shore,
And the rose of love and the lily of peace
Shall bloom there forevermore,
Let the world go round and round,
And the sun sink into the sea!
For whether I'm on or under the ground,
Oh, what will it matter to me?

BROTHER HOYT'S ANSWER.

A. W. BUTTON.

In THE RESTITUTION for Oct. 5, an answer was attempted to the question: "What new heavens and new earth are we looking for?" and in the issue of Oct. 26, with a reference to the answer Brother Hoyt says:

"If the question is put to me, as one of the readers of the paper, my answer is quite different."

Now as there is no objection to fair and honorable criticism, nor to the liberty of differing, is it worth while to disturb the equanimity and satisfaction of a well-balanced adverse critic? Why not let the matter pass into forgetfulness in silence?

As I have decided otherwise, I must first express my astonishment at the confused observations I find.

For instance: "The new heavens and earth are as literal as the old spoken of in the same connection, and they are the same that God created in the beginning." See second paragraph in Brother Hoyt's answer.

What does he mean? Are the new heavens and earth the same that God created in the beginning? What harmony is there between that statement and the following? viz: "Shall we spiritualize the habitable earth to come, Heb. 1, and cast away the hope of the new earth—heavenly country—the foundation of all we hope for?"

New heavens and earth created in the beginning; and yet, the hope of the new earth!

I conclude Brother Hoyt means that the same old heavens and earth that God created 6000 years ago, will be so reclaimed from bad conditions, that they will be called new, (as in many respects our western continent has been recovered from its dominion by savages, and its former state to present civilization), and in which righteousness will exist, far above and beyond anything found in the world's present highly reputed improvement in civilised goodness.

If that is his meaning as his language imports or seems to, I heartily agree. Many chiefs had to be killed, many tribes depleted and conquered, many towns of savages and villages had to be burned, and the power of the tribes and their confederacies completely broken, before the renewal of our continent could be gained. A small outline of the great conquest to come, of Gentile powers, o'er the new heavens and earth can be made to bloom and fruit in full righteousness, and thus become new. A regeneration as great as the beauties of May brought from the somber wastes of February over the earth.

Apparently alluding to the earth in connection with the Noahic deluge, the Psalmist says of God, "Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be moved forever. Thou coverest it with the deep as with a garment; the waters stood above the mountains." Psa. civ. 5, 6.

The flood did not unbalance the foundations, and it shall not be moved forever. This settles the question of permanency.

Brother Hoyt quotes from Heb. i. 10; "And thou Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth," etc., and follows with this comment, viz: "The same heavens and the same earth that God laid the foundation of in the beginning, are to perish, be folded up, but not so that they will not be changed. The change will result in new heavens and earth wherein dwelleth righteousness."

Are you sure of your ground? quite sure they are the same that God created in the beginning? Look again. The quotations of Psa. xlv. cii. by Paul, Heb. i. 8–12, are specially applied by him to Christ, as "But unto the Son he saith: Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever."

The Psalmist prophetically anticipates "rest on his throne during the millennial age, at the close of which a change is to take place, as Paul affirms in 1 Cor. xv. 24–28. The Son must deliver up the kingdom to God the Father. Will Christ now give up his throne, for which he has been anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows—his co-rulers? No! "Thy throne is forever and ever," for he has loved righteousness and hated iniquity. "And thou Lord (Christ) in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth" —the new earth.

In what beginning? "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God," as Mark dates the work of Christ. And this is an important date often referred to by the apostolic writers. As, "the word ye had from the beginning," "ye have known him that is from the beginning," "that which we had from the beginning," and a great many more references to the same date.

The Son will not be enthroned till he shall sit on the Holy Hill of Zion. But in the beginning, when he began to preach the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, he laid the foundation of the new heavens and earth. When these new constructions shall have been consummated according to the foundation already laid, and have existed till all enemies are subdued, they will have served their purpose—will wax old—will as a worn old garment, perish, "as a vesture shalt thou (the Son) fold them up, and they shall be changed; but thou art the same, and thy years fail not." So much above angels is the Son, according to Paul's application of the prophetic Psalms.

The kingdom as Paul says, Heb. xii. 28, "cannot be moved," as Gentile kingdoms, when the heavens and earth of all nations are shaken, ver. 26, 27, but its order can be changed from a yet new state, when all things shall be subdued unto him. Then shall the Son be subject unto the Father. See 1 Cor. xv. 28; "then shall he be changed, but thou remainest."

As this prophetic address is to Christ and of his work, and contemplates his enthronement and reign till the time of change; the Trinitarian idea will not do here, that Christ is the original creator of the material and substantial heavens and earth, that God created in the beginning.

Neither will it do for us to overrun and suppress the voice of prophets and apostles. God planted the heavens of Israel's commonwealth, and laid the foundations of an Israelitish earth, that he might have a Zion of which to say, "Thou art my people," after he led the people out of Egypt. See Isa. li. 16.

If this testimony of Isaiah is true, the statement of Brother Hoyt must be erroneous, viz: "The heavens and earth are never used in the Bible as figures to represent something else."

On the veracity of John it may be stated again as in my former article, there was in his day a Roman Pagan heaven and earth. A symbolic woman in distress; a dragon drawing a third part of the political stars to the earth. Rev. xii. 1-4. Gentiles in Paul's time had heavenly places, in which he made known the gospel. Eph. iii. 9, 10. Paul and Christians wrestled against Pagan religious wickedness in high (heavenly) places.

So the apostles and prophets teach the ruling powers existent over countries by men, calling these the heavens and the earth. And if any man speak let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister let him do it as of the ability that God giveth, in the instruction of his word.

I have no more that I wish to say on this subject at present, only to wish the brotherhood joy in the word of truth.

Let us serve God in the sunshine, while he makes the sun shine. We shall then serve him all the better in the dark when he sends the darkness. It is sure to come. Only let our light be God's light, and our darkness God's darkness, and we shall be safe at home when the great nightfall comes.—F. W. Faber.

Sententious.

Those are the most honorable who are most useful.

What has been unjustly gained cannot be justly kept.

Kindness is stowed away in the heart like rose leaves in a drawer, to sweeten every object around.

Every reform has had to fight against obstacles, but the fiercer the conflict the grander the victory won.

Every effect has its cause, and every man must reap as he sows. To thrive or suffer is his actual deserts.

The grandest results may be accomplished by the repetition of small duties with tireless perseverance.

Here is a good question for a man to ask himself as he reviews his past life:—"Have I written in the snow?"

The Bible is another book when read through one's tears.—L. H. Weyland.

Let thought be thrilled with sympathy, right from it and tune to give,
And tell your colors with heart's blood, to make the canvass live.

Such is the constitution of things that unwillingness to goodness may ripen into eternal voluntary opposition to it.

Dare to change your mind, confess your error, and alter your conduct, whenever you are convicted you are wrong.

To indulge anger is to admit Satan as a guest; but to indulge malice, is to close the door upon him as an inmate; in the one he finds a transient lodging, in the other a permanent home.

All errors spring up in the neighborhood of some truth; they grow round about, and for the most part derive their strength from such contiguity.

Life, like a fountain rich and free,
Springs from the presence of the Lord;
And in thy light our souls shall see
The blessings promised in thy word.

Death does not destroy, but catches, crystallizes, and makes permanent the character of a good man, leaving it a priceless bequest to society.

Without earnestness no man is ever great, or does really great things. He may be the cleverest man; he may be brilliant, entertaining, popular, but he will want weight. No soul-moving picture was ever painted that had not in its depths a shadow.

Past deliverances do not secure us from future trials; but they should strengthen our confidence and reliance on God.

The best will is our Father's will,
And we may rest there calm and still:
Oh! make it hour by hour thine own,
And wish for nought but that alone
Which pleaseth God.

Life is a book of which we have but one edition. Let each day's actions, as they add their pages to the indestructible volume, be such as we shall be willing to have an assembled world to read.

Satan is wickedness personified; all his children wear his likeness. Christ is virtue personified; all his children are being conformed to him.

Though the doctrines of our faith may be left in partial obscurity, and there are great spaces of shadow even in revelation, the duties of the right life are the illuminated texts of Scripture.

Judge not; the workings of his brain
And of his heart thou canst not see:
What looks to thy dim eyes a stain,
In God's pure light may only be
A scar, brought from some well-won field,
Where thou would'st only faint and yield.

Many a noble tree has been killed by a clinging vine, and many a strong man has been degraded and destroyed by some unholy affection, some ungoverned passion, some ungodly lust.

It is not of so much consequence to be thought an honest man as to be one. Such as do not mind the approbation of other people, but only aim at deserving it, take the surest way to obtain it.

O thou High-and Lofty One!
Dwelling in eternal light;
What is man, that from thy throne
Thou should'st bend on him thy sight;
That for worms so vile as I,
Christ, the Lord of Life, should die?

One never knows a man till he has refused him something, and studied the effects of the refusal; one never knows himself till he has denied himself. The altar of sacrifice is the touchstone of character. The cross compels a choice for or against the Christ.—O. P. Gifford.

ON THE BOOK.

"I recollect," says Spurgeon, "an anecdote of James Smith. He visited one of his members who was dying. He said to her, 'You are ailing.' 'Yes,' said she. 'Do you feel sinking?' She replied, 'What did you say, Mr. Smith?' He asked her whether she was sinking. She said, 'No! my dear minister! never ask such a question of a child of God. Did you ever know a sinner to sink through the Rock? If I was standing on sand I might sink, but I am on the Rock of Ages!'"

THAT PICTURE.

T. REMINGTON.

A New York pastor said to me, yesterday, substantially as follows:

Some years ago, in a certain town in Michigan, a young gentleman and a young lady, in settling the subject of matrimony, agreed that, as they belonged to different denominations—he a Presbyterian, she a Baptist—each one governed by principle, that, after marriage, the subject of baptism should never be discussed in the family. In the years that followed, God gave to them several children; the eldest, a boy. When he was about seven years of age, he, with two or three others, was taken by the mother to the Baptist Sunday School.

About this time The Young Reaper was introduced into the school by the superintendent, and each family requested to take a copy. But The Young Reaper had a picture representing a baptismal scene at the top of the first page. This the conscientious Baptist mother could not take without first consulting her husband. Showing him a copy, he agreed it might be taken for the children, provided The Day Spring, a Presbyterian Sabbath School paper, which also has on it a picture representing the duty of baptism as taught by them, be also taken for them.

Accordingly, next Sunday, after meeting, both papers were handed to the children. Not a word was said; no explanation given. The pictures captivated the children.

The pictures in The Reaper heading were first examined; the one representing the Sunday School class admired, as was also the boy with the sheaf of wheat; all was plain except the crooked thing he held in his hand.

The children appealed to the parents for explanation; but in vain. So they proceeded to look and interpret for themselves the baptismal scene on the corner of the page.

The inquiry again was raised, after admiring it all: "What is that man in the water going to do to that lady by his side?"

The little boy said: "I know."

"What is it?" was the hasty inquiry.

"Why, he is going to put her under the water and baptize her."

The other pictures were read with glee and delight.

They laid down The Reaper, and looked at all the pictures in The Day Spring, one of which, at the top of the page, intensely interested them. The lady with the little baby in her arms, having on a long white dress they admired; the table, bowl of water, and the man before the table, whose hand had apparently taken something from the bowl, and was about to do something more; here the question rose from two or three at once:

"What is that man going to do to that baby?"

All seemed puzzled, when the seven year old boy came again to their help. "I know what; he is going to feed the baby grapes" — mistaking the big drops of water falling down for luscious grapes.

The parents were silent for a time; then the husband observed to the wife, "If they can't make a picture that the children can understand, don't tell them."

Those children were converted and united with the Baptist Church, years ago. As the parents and children are yet living, the pastor wished no names given; but the fact remains.

Pictures are a great teacher of children. How important they teach truth!

PATHETIC.

"A Long Journey."

We never may count the pained and trodden hearts under the feet of the world's great caravan. Now and then a stray bit of human sentiment like the following stops the rough travel for an instant, and then the crowd sweeps on. The Detroit Post and Tribune tells this simple story of a little coffin and its only mourner:

When one of the trains to this city came in at midnight a few nights ago, an old man was found sleeping in one of the seats.

"I say, old man!" yelled the conductor, "git out of this; do you hear? This is Detroit. If you've got any friends, they'll be looking for you."

"Where's Gracie?"

"Who?" asked the conductor recovering his official voice.

"Little Gracie—grandpa's little pet! I brought her with me. Is she there?"

"I guess he is not wide awake yet," said the curious passenger. "Suppose you help him to his feet."

Conductors are experts in helping people to their feet, and this one was no exception to the rule. He took the old man by the coat collar and stood him up, but he sank down the next moment limp and motionless. Just then a depot hand came in.

"The baggage-master wants to know what you're going to do with that little dead box over there. He don't want anything of that kind left over, and there's no direction on it but 'Gracie'"—

"That's her!" said the old man, and he stood up feebly. "Take me there. We're going a long journey—Gracie and me; a long, long journey, but it don't seem as if I knew the way right clear."

They took him into the depot and laid him on one of the benches and put his carpet bag under his head, but still he fretted for his "little Gracie—his pet," and at last they consoled him by telling him she was resting, was asleep, and must not be disturbed.

The little "box," with Gracie written upon it in lead pencil, was safe enough with the other "freight," and the old man slept peacefully at last. Some kind soul threw a rug over him near morning, and asked him what train he was waiting for, but all the answer he made was a feeble "Thank'ee; call me at sunrise. We're going a long journey, Gracie and me."

He was called at sunrise by a voice that none may refuse, and when a flood of rosy light shone into the dreary room he was up and away—gone on his long journey. Only the worn out body was there, and yesterday it was laid with "little Gracie" in the strangers' lot at Mount Elliott, unknown, yet possibly in as "sure hope of a gracious resurrection" as if marked by thirty feet of monumental clay.

THE CREATOR.

Certain classes of scientists love to descant upon the age of the world, and fancy that by removing the period of creation millions of years back into eternity they weaken our faith in a personal Creator, and in his supervising care. But they greatly mistake. No matter how many myriads of ages may have elapsed, or through how many convulsions the world may have passed, the truth still stands.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." More than this, he upholdeth "all things by the word of his power."

There must be a power present in the movement of all machinery—there must be a living force guiding the movements of the universe. The act of creation, though sublime and glorious, is little more glorious than that of preserving and perpetuating. If from untold myriads of years this universe has existed, God's plans are older still, and the stability of nature's laws but demonstrate that God is the same yesterday that he is to-day, and that he will be the same forever.

What power is there in that word that upholdeth all things?

Could a jeweller produce a watch capable of keeping time for a hundred years without erring a second, of what priceless value would it be, and how greatly we should admire the skill of the artist! What shall we say, then, of him who holds the machinery of unnumbered worlds for untold ages in perfect harmony?

Nor has one item ever been lost. Science shows us that forms perpetually change, but substances endure. Nothing perishes. In this sense it is true that not a jot or tittle of his word shall ever fail.—Bishop Simpson at the Ecumenical.

Brevities.

Preparations for rebuilding Solomon's Temple are said by newspaper correspondents to be in progress. They report that the Turkish Sultan has issued imperative orders to the Turkish Governor at Jerusalem to commence at once the work of clearing the site of Solomon's Temple, desecrated for so many centuries by the Moslem religion. This is stated to be a direct result of the representations made by the reigning Imperial Austrian family. The aims of the pilgrims are in future to be applied to the clearing of the ground upon Mount Moriah, and this may be taken as an indication of the earnest intentions of the Sublime Porte in the matter. This circumstance, when taken in connection with the marvellous exodus of Jews into Spain and other places adjacent to the Great Sea, notably Turkey, where upward of 60,000 Israelites recently found refuge from serious persecution, may, with solid grounds, be accepted by all students of prophecy as an evidence that the "time to favor Zion, yea, the set time is come."

Although the coronation of Czar Alexander I. will not take place until [illegible] preparations the most important ceremony have already been commenced is the ancient capital of Muscovy. A court official of high rank has arrived in Moscow from St. Petersburg with instructions to examine and report upon the condition of the antique accessories which play a mute but significant part in Russian coronation ceremonials. Among these relics is the ivory throne, seated upon which the Byzantine Emperors were wont to receive the homage of their vassals. Sophia Palmologa, a descendant of the Eastern Cæsars, who espoused the Russian Grand Duke Basil Ivanovitch, contrived to gain possession of her ancestors' throne in the year 1472, and brought it with her from Constantinople to Russia. The carvings on its panels represent the labors of Orpheus, and exhibit remarkable finish of execution. This unique throne was last used a quarter of a century ago by Alexander Nicolaiewitch, the late Czar, at his coronation in Moscow.

Kairouan, the holy city of Tunis, which the French recently occupied, has its ramparts concealed by Indian fig-trees, which are enormously large. A long corridor gives access to a second enclosure. All is silent in the city, and nothing is heard but the murmur of prayers and the melancholy voices of the muezzins on their minarets. In the middle of the town is erected the large mosque of Djamel-Keber, in the form of a fortress. It was Mohammed's barber who sanctified the place, and his remains repose within the mosque, together with several hairs of the Prophet's beard, venerable relics for the Mussulmans. This African Mecca has never borne a foreign yoke except for thirty years. It was taken by Roger of Sicily, whose helmet and cross-bow are kept hung up in a chapel of the Djama-el-Keber. Kerouan was the seat of learning, and in its mosques, which contain many manuscripts, the Ulemas studied their doctrines. The French will search among the libraries for Greek and Latin works of antiquity.

Some centuries ago a Hindoo sage founded a sect which now reckons among its members some of the wealthiest residents of the great towns. The descendants of the sage are held in great reverence, being esteemed as something far more than human. Unfortunately, there is nothing in the lives of these men to make them worthy of the honor which they claim. Their pursuits are often disreputable. A few months ago one was charged with having been concerned in a mail robbery in a small native State of the Bombay Presidency. He was convicted, and sentenced by the British political officer to imprisonment. Forthwith panic spread through Bombay, and for a whole day the shops in the native quarter were closed. The feeling was not one of horror that a being half divined had committed so ignoble a crime, but of superstitious concern that his divine personality should be put in prison. The agitation was generally among Hindoos of every sect and caste. The result was that Government did review the case; but the punishment has been on appeal increased from two years to five. For it is a curious feature in recent Anglo-Indian jurisprudence that a sentence appealed from may be enhanced by the appellate court.

MIGRATION OF BIRDS.

The vexed questions regarding the migrations of birds and whether they fly by night and at great elevations have been elucidated by Mr. W. E. D. Scott, in the "Bulletin" of the Nutall Ornithological Club for April. While with some friends, looking through the 2½-inch equatorial at Princeton, N. J., at the moon, his attention was arrested by numbers of small birds, more or less plainly seen, passing across the field of observation. Most of the birds were the smaller land birds, among which were plainly recognized warblers, finches, woodpeckers and blackbirds, the relative numbers being in the order of kinds given. With rare exceptions the birds were seen to be flying from north-east to south-east. It was found with the aid of Professor C. A. Young, that the birds flew at the great elevation of nearly 10,000 feet, and that the average number of birds passing through the field of observation per minute was four and a half. In commenting on these facts, Mr. J. A. Allen remarks that Mr. Scott's novel and important observations definitely establish several points in relation to the migration of birds that have heretofore rested almost wholly on conjecture and probability. "We have first the fact that the nearest birds seen through the telescope must have been at least one mile above the earth, and may have ranged in elevation from one to four miles. It has been held that birds when migrating may fly at a sufficient height to be [illegible] mountain features of the landscape as a constellation, the principal water-sources, and mountain chains over a wide area."

COVERED WITH GOLD.

It is a curious fact that Russia, one of the poorest of civilized countries, makes a greater parade of wealth in one respect than any other State. The domes of all the great churches in St. Petersburg, Moscow, and other large towns, are plated with gold nearly one-quarter of an inch thick. The new church of the Savior, dedicated and opened in Moscow last August, represents a value of fully $15,000,000. The Isaac Cathedral in St. Petersburg may be safely credited with twice that amount. So strong, however, is the old Solav belief in the inviolable sanctity of "holy places," that, during seasons of wide-spread and bitter distress, no attempt has ever been made to plunder the gold thus temptingly exposed. Indeed, one of the finest churches in St. Petersburg, the Kazan Cathedral, owes its massive shrine to a voluntary offering of the plunder taken by the Cossacks in 1812.

Zion's Herald.

The Turks are dying out as a people, and nothing in the country is more common than to meet half-depopulated cities and villages. The last war was so fatal to the Mohammedan population that a dead and heavy despair had taken possession of them, notwithstanding the enthusiasm with which they entered the contest. Every intelligent Turk now sees the beginning of the end, and that Turkish rule in Europe must soon cease, while the ruling classes are trying to make the most of what is yet left. God speed the departure of the unwelcome intruder!

VARIETIES.

"Due unto others," is as far as many men reach with the golden rule.

"Where do people go who deceive their fellow-men?" asked a Sunday School teacher of a pupil. "To Europe," was the reply.

A Connecticut pastor declined an addition of $100 to his salary for the reason, among others, that the hardest part of his labors heretofore had been the collection of his salary, and it would kill him to try to collect $100 more.

If a miserly old millionaire wants to get a reputation for liberality and philanthrophy, let him offer to give $100,000 to a $50,000 town for the erection of a charitable institution, provided an equal amount be raised by the citizens. The citizens might not be able to raise $100,000 if they sold all their possessions in the world, but the millionaire gets a reputation for liberality all the same, and it doesn't cost him a cent.—Norristown Herald.

"Passengers in this 'bus will do well to look out for their pocket-books," said a London policeman at the door of a crowded omnibus; "there are two members of the 'swell-mob' in here." "If that's the case," said a nervous man in white choker, who looked like a clergyman; "I will get out, I cannot risk my reputation in such company." "And I," said a respectable-looking old gentleman, with gold-headed cane and spectacles; "have too much money about me to stand the chances of being robbed." And so both alighted. Then the policeman said, "Drive on; they're both got out."

Doctrine is the framework of life; it is the skeleton of truth, to be clothed and rounded out by the living grace of a holy life.

LINES ADDRESSED TO BELMONT'S MUMMY.

JAMES MONTGOMERY.

And thou hast walked about! how strange a story!
Thou, Belzoni saw'st them thousand years ago!
When the mesmerizers was in all its glory;
And time had not begun to overthrow
Those Temples, Palaces, and Piles, stupendous,
Of which the very ruins are tremendous.

Speak! for thou long enough hast acted dummy;
Thou hast a tongue; come let me hear its tone:
Thou art standing on thy legs above ground mummy,
Ravishing the glimpses of the moon;
Not like thin ghosts, or disembodied creatures,
But with thy bones and flesh; thy limbs, thy features.

Tell us, for doubtless thou can'st recollect,
To whom should we assign the Sphynx's fame?
Was Cheops or Cephrenes Architect
Of either Pyramid which bears his name?
Is Pompey's Pillar really a misnomer?
Had Thebes a hundred gates, as sung by Homer?

Still silent, incommunicative elf!
Art' aware to secrecy? then keep thy vows;
But, pry'thee, tell us something of thyself,
Reveal the secrets of thy prison-house:
Since thou so long with death hast sojourned
What hast thou seen—what strange adventures numbered?

Then could'st develope, if that withered tongue
Might tell us what those sightless orbs have seen:
How the world looked when it was fresh and young;
Even the great deluge has left it green.
Or was it then so old it st history's pages
Contained no record of its earliest ages!

Since first thy form was in this box extended,
We have, above ground, seen some strange mutations!
The Roman empire has begun and ended—
New worlds have risen; we have lost old nations;
And countless kings have into dust been humbled,
While not a fragment of thy flesh has crumbled.

Say, did'st thou hear the mother o'er thy head,
When the great Persian conqueror, Cambyses,
March'd armies o'er thy tomb with thundering tread,
And overthrew Osiris, Orus, Apis, Isis!
And shook the very pyramids with fear and wonder,
When the great gigantic Memnon fell asunder.

I need not ask thee if that hand, when armed,
Has any Roman soldier mauled and knuckled?
For then wert dead, and buried, and embalmed,
Ere Romulus, or Remus had been suckled:
Antiquity appears to have begun
Long after thy primeval race was run.

Perhaps that very hand, now pitch'd flat,
Has bob-a- nobb'd with Pharaoh glass to glass;
Or dropt an half-penny into Homer's hat;
Or doff thine own to let Queen Dido pass;
Or held, by Solomon's special invitation,
A torch at the great Temple's solemn dedication.

Perhaps thou wert a Mason, and forbidden,
By oath, to tell the mysteries of thy trade:
Then say, what secret melody was hidden
In Memnon's statue, which at sunrise played:
Perhaps thou wert a Priest; if so, my struggles
Are vain—for priestcraft never owns its juggles.

If the tomb's secrets may not be confess'd,
The nature of the private life unfold:
A heart has throb'd beneath that leathern breast,
And tears adown those dusty cheeks have roll'd;
Have children climb'd those knees, and kiss'd that face?
What was thy name and station, age and race?

Statue of flesh! immortal of the dead!
Imperishable type of human essence!
Posthumous man! who quitt'st thy narrow bed
And standest undismayed within our presence.
Thou wilt hear nothing till the judgment morning,
When the great trump shall thrill thee with its warning.

Why should this worthless tegument endure,
If its undying guest be lost forever?
O, let us keep the soul embalmed and pure
In living virtue; that when death shall sever
Alike corruption may the flesh consume,
The immortal spirit in the skies may bloom.

(We thus change this last verse.—Ed.)
Why should this worthless tegument endure,
If the deposited life be lost forever?
O, let us keep the soul embalmed and pure
In living virtue; that when death shall sever—
Although corruption may our flesh consume,
In Christ's blest image we may rise and bloom.

THE LESSON OF THE ASSASSINATION.

NUMBER TWO.

A. B. MAGRUDER.

When thy judgments are in the earth the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness. Isa. xxvi.

The Lord hath a controversy with the nations. It is the day of the Lord's vengeance. Isa. xxxiv. 8.

The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath. He shall judge among the heathen (nations). * * * He shall wound the heads over many countries. Psa. cx.

Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure. Psa. ii.

We may be sure, that it was not without good reason and just cause that the Lord God of heaven and earth refused to grant the prayer of almost the whole civilized world for the recovery of the late President Garfield.

It becomes us to remember that though he is slow to wrath and plenteous in mercy, he is also just and will not spare the guilty. One of our own poets has said—

"A God all mercy, is a God unjust."

The President of the United States is a Representative man. The chosen head of fifty millions of people who are the "offspring" of God in whom they "live and move and have their being. The position of a President is unlike and above those of other men. He reflects before Almighty God the virtues and the vices of the people he represents. Even his elevation to place and power is not accidental—not the result always of his merit—of his deservings or deficiencies, for it is written, "Promotion cometh neither from the east nor from the west nor from the south, for God is the Judge; he putteth down one and setteth upon another." "He ruleth in the kingdom of men and giveth it to whom he will and setteth up over it the basest of men."

We are not therefore to suppose that the government and affairs of nations are unnoticed or indifferent to him, though alas, that is we fear the common conclusion of our countrymen as a people. The history of Nebuchadnezzar, of Cyrus, of Alexander the Great, and the Cæsars of the old world, and of Charlemagne, Charles the Fifth, Peter of Russia, the Pope of Rome, Washington, Napoleon, Lincoln and Garfield of modern times all attest this truth. God works by means to accomplish his purposes he uses the instrumentality of men who may be adopted or endowed by their genius and qualities for this end. So long as they are useful and fit for his ends they are employed in his service. When this is accomplished or they prove themselves unfit for the work they are set aside or superseded by others better adapted for the exegencies in which they may be called to act.

Who can doubt that Napoleon was raised up in the providence of God as the scourge and destroyer of the nations who had incurred the righteous displeasure of God?

Rightly comprehending his position and career the Emperor Napoleon truly interpreted them in saying, "I am immortal until my mission is accomplished." Then, I am no more than any common man and any casualty will end my life.

It is difficult to persuade or convince any people that they are sinners before God and that suffering and calamity are sent upon them in token of the Divine displeasure and it is not less remarkable (such is the infirmity of our fallen nature) that in proportion as we offend against God and disregard his statutes and commandments we are apt vainly to flatter ourselves that we are the chosen objects of his regard and blessing. At the very time that the house of Israel, intoxicated by prosperity, imagined themselves the favorites of the Almighty, Isaiah testifies of them "That the whole head is sick and the whole heart faint. From the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness in them, but wounds and bruises and putrifying sores; they have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment."

And the prophet Jeremiah testifies against them to the same effect, saying, "Shall I not visit for these things saith the Lord. Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? A wonderful and horrible thing is done in the land. The prophets prophesy falsely and the priests bear rule by their means and my people love to have it so."

Is there no analogy between this picture of ancient Israel's guilt and the sad and signal lapse and apostacy of this nation of the United States from the simplicity and purity of the original faith and practice of Christianity as revealed to us plainly in the Word of God in the possession and free use of which we boast and to which therefore we have to admit we are justly responsible? We shall see.

I have just read the proclamation of President Arthur appointing a day for National Thanksgiving and Prayer to Almighty God for "his goodness so manifest in our history and our lives and offering earnest prayers that his bounties may continue to us and to our children."

Thanksgiving to God "by them who believe and know the truth" is always a proper duty and a gracious act and none will deny that even when his scourge is upon us, we have many blessings left to us to be grateful for. The Patriarch Job declared, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." But there are times like the present when the notable marks of God's righteous displeasure are seen throughout our land and the visible presence of his recent angry judgments on us as a people, should make us mingle confession of sins, and humiliation, fasting and prayer with our humble thanksgiving that "his mercy endureth forever."

Surely we cannot as a people honestly ignore the scourges and calamities which have fallen upon the people and Government of the United States during the present year—visitations which can be referred alone to the hand of God. The intense and long continued severity of the past winter—the devastation wrought by the spring floods—the summer droughts and the consequently shortened crops of the cereals so necessary to the subsistence of man and beast—the failure of the cotton and other crops and the present scarcity and consequent high prices of provisions and the increased expenses of living—the recent destructive effects of fire in Michigan; in the fearful losses of life and property and the wasting destruction of land and houses and stock in the floods of the North-western States of the Union—the wholesale frauds and defalcations and embezzlements of municipal and monied corporations, to untold amounts, of high and trusted officers of the General and State governments and the shameful lust for official power and place, and the insane love of office and its emoluments, and the disgraceful means of bribery and corruption employed to obtain or retain official place. The toleration by the United States Government of the monster crime of polygamous Mormonism in our land in open defiance of public law and decency—an offense within the special jurisdiction of the National Government—"which the authorities, though clothed by law with ample authority, have failed to suppress," not to mention the spirit of irreligion; there, and atheism, so rife in the land, all show a sad and notable degeneracy in the personal and political character of our people which has provoked and justifies these mere beginnings of the righteous displeasure of God, and indicate the near and rapid approach of the day of reckoning with the nation and their rulers which the Holy Scriptures so plainly declare. Can we wonder that the time is come when one of our head-texts is now to have its fulfillment, viz:

That "the Lord at the right hand of the Almighty shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath. He shall judge among the nations. He shall wound the heads over many countries. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath and vex them in his sore displeasure."

The attentive reader of current history will remember in illustration of these texts, that within the compass of the two last decades of our history not less than five kings or heads of the people have been stricken down by the hand of violence. Besides the two American Presidents, Lincoln and Garfield, the Ameer of Afghanistan, the Sultan of Turkey and the Czar of Russia, all representative men, have fallen as monuments of the Divine displeasure, and who shall say that this is the end of the lesson which "the nations" are called upon to learn?

(To be Continued.)

PRAYER.

MARY S. NORDYKE.

Prayer was never meant to be substituted for labor. An easy way of throwing our responsibilities upon God.

Is God influenced by prayer?

I think he is. Hear his own words: Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will hear thee; ask and ye shall receive.

Prayer is not a set speech to our Father it is direct converse with God. Jesus says, Knock and it shall be opened to you.

But while we are praying one way with our lips, let us be careful that we do not pray in the opposite direction with our actions. The principle of praying one way and living in the opposite way is fatal to salvation.

What right has a man to pray, "Lead me not into temptation," when he has a ticket to the theatre in his pocket?

What right has a man to ask for pardon when he has met an enemy on the street without speaking to him?

How can a man expect mercy from God when he has been wringing the last dollar from the thin clad widow who rents her garret from him?

How can a young lady pray to her Savior, and expect his smiles, when she is trifling with the affections of another, or is setting her whole soul on frivolities?

Prayer is like a haven to a shipwrecked man, it is an anchor to our weary soul. O blessed prayer, thou art the unwearied conqueror of human woes. The man who can pray truly, though languishing in poverty, is richer than the proudest monarch of nations.

What a privilege we mortals have of going to our Father in prayer, and of asking him for what we need, and with the assurance that if we ask in faith, not doubting, we shall receive, if we ask according to his will.

Oh, it is sweet to feel when trials come that the great God is our Father, and that we can go to him and tell him all our sorrows, that he has promised to hear and answer our prayers. Oh, if we would only make it a rule to go to our Father every night and morning, and asking him to help us to resist evil, and help us to overcome in whatever may be before us of trials and temptations, darkness and dangers, and that he will grant us grace, wisdom and strength, that we may so live that we may ever feel that we may have a right to the precious privilege of calling the great God our Father.

Yours in hope of immortality and eternal life.

The Men Who Succeed.

The great difference among men of all callings is energy of character or the want of it. Given the same amount of learning and integrity, and the same opportunities, and energy will make one man a conqueror. The want of it will see the other a failure. Dead-beats are men without force. They had as good a chance as any of their companions. Others went ahead and carried off the prizes, while they were lying by the wayside dispirited and despondent. It takes nerve, vim, perseverence, patient continuance in well-doing to win a great prize, and the young man who goes into a profession without this pluck and force will not earn salt to his porridge. He will drag through life with the help of friends, getting some credit with them for being a well meaning man, in delicate health, and unlucky. The real trouble is he lacks energy. This is just as true of the minister as of the lawyer or physician. Piety is not enough, and piety with much learning is not enough. All the Greek and Hebrew in the world will not qualify a man for usefulness in the ministry. It wants push, stamina, vigor, courage, resolution, will, determination—in one word, energy. If the youth knows a little Greek, he knows what en arche means, and without it Dr. Parr's knowledge of Greek will not help him to usefulness or success in the pulpit.

"Made Perfect."

We see a great many "just men," men that are justified through the Blood of the Atonement; men that are upright in their dealings; men that may, humanly speaking, be called "just;" men that we feel will be saved; but, yet, men that are not "perfect." Perhaps, the interval separating them from perfectness is broad and deep; perhaps, it is to human eye almost imperceptible; but it is there. Even if the world does not see the faults, they are visible to the intimate associate; or if hidden from the eye of friendship, yet they are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do. And they are painfully evident to the person himself, who shudders often when he hears his partial friends ascribe to him faultlessness.

But, in the spiritual world, the spirits of all the "just men" will be "made perfect," each fault will be eradicated, each defect supplied, each imperfection replaced by a new and appropriate grace. Sometimes it happens even in this life that the place where the character was most defective becomes under the action of the Divine Spirit, the place where the power of the New Creation most plainly and gloriously appears. Dr. Judson, who had been in youth devoured by ambition, so repressed this spirit that he purposely destroyed, so far as was in his power, all the papers that could contribute to his posthumous fame. Henry Martyn, who was once high-spirited and passionate, became eminent for the most forgiving meekness.

And, if this result be achieved here, will it not more eminently appear there?

We often say of this or that man: "A grand man; a noble man; but ——." "David was really a fine man; but ——."

Hereafter, the spirits of just men will know no buts. They will be perfect, with no defect, with no excess, with no blemish. Nor will they be faultless alone, but perfect absolutely, endowed with every grace of character, every moral beauty. How wonderful that world will be!

Prayer Forbidden.

Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter. Deut. iii. 26.

We are sometimes very anxious for what God is not willing to bestow. He will supply all our wants, but he will not grant all our wishes. He will give us that which is good, though he deny us that which is gratifying. Moses was very desirous of entering into the promised land; but the Lord had determined to correct his sin; he had prayed, and had been denied; he is inclined to preserve; but the Lord says:

"Speak no more unto me of this matter."

Even Moses cannot prevail. Yes, he is forbidden to pray on the subject. So may we on some points. Elijah prayed that he might die; David prayed for the life of his child; yet both were denied. So if we pray for health, wealth, ease, or shining gifts, the Lord may deny and yet be faithful to his word. He never promised to answer carnal prayers, or to give what would do us harm. Therefore, when we ask for anything not positively promised, it should always be in submission to the will of God. He always wills our good, and his love rules over our destiny.

But though the Lord may refuse us some things, and even forbid us to pray for them, yet he has promised us enough to satisfy us if rightly employed. Let it, therefore, suffice thee, believer, to live upon the promises of thy God; for in them is enough.

Are you sick?

He saith, "I will make all thy bed in thy sickness."

He will perform the part of a kind and attentive nurse; soothing thy soul while thy body suffers, and supporting thee under thy burden of affliction.

Are you poor?

He says, "I am thy portion."

The wealth of Deity is thine. God is the portion of thine inheritance, and of thy cup he maintaineth thy lot.

Are you weak?

He says, "I am your strength." "I will strengthen thee."

And he will be as good as his word. He will give strength equal to the day.

Are you tempted?

He will with the temptation make a way for your escape. Look to him and your refuge is certain. Trust in him and deliverance is sure.

Are you friendless?

He says, "I have called you friends."

And he will perform that part of a friend. He will counsel, relieve, and comfort you in every trouble and distress; and will never fail you or forsake you.

Are you bereaved?

He asks, "Am I not better to thee than ten children, or husbands or wives, or whatever you have lost?"

He can fill every relation, and more than make up for every loss.

Are you aged?

He says, "Even to your old age I am he; and even to your hoar hairs will I carry you: I have made, and I will bear; even I will carry, and will deliver you. Let it suffice thee, I have promised and I will perform. If I deny what you ask, I will give you something better. I will make all things work for thy good; therefore be not anxious, complaining, desponding, or foreboding."

Thus you see there is enough promised—enough to support us, comfort us, and carry us safe home: and if we have all we want, ought we not to be satisfied, though we do not have all we wish?

The Bible is the directory to prayer: it tells us what to pray for, how to pray, and what to expect from the Lord. No one ever had all he desired in this world, and yet every Christian has confessed: "There hath not failed one word of all that our God hath promised."

Let us therefore pray for what our God hath promised; be satisfied with what he is pleased to bestow; remembering that "this is the will of God, even our sanctification." If, therefore, our will runs in the channel of God's will, if we seek our sanctification principally, we shall never be disappointed, nor hear him say, "Speak no more unto me of this matter."

"Help my infirmities, I pray,
My ignorance remove;
O smile my darkness into day,
And fill me with thy love."

OPINIONS OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy in most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for cost and perusal in the important information that it will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 24, 1879.

"It evinces a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scripture, and uniform courtesy toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York, Nov. 29, 1880.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested merely, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are second to none in importance to us. * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and convincing way, should buy this book."—The Royal Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 17, 1879.

"I have read it diligently again and again, * * It is next in point of excellence and doctrinal truths to the Book of books."—D. M. L., Mo.

"If so not know that I have ever seen from the pen of any modern writer, a plainer exhibit of the gospel of the kingdom and all the same. Few one better suited to general instruction on that subject, than that which brother Jones gives us in his book, 'The Gospel of the Kingdom, advocated in a series of Ten Discourses.'"—R. K. B., Va.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1882.

The SUN for 1882 will make its fifteenth annual revolution under the present management, shining, as always, for all, big and little, mean and gracious, contented and unhappy, Republican and Democratic, favored and unfavored, intelligent and obscure. The SUN's light is for mankind and unmodified of every sort; but its genial warmth is for the good, while it pours hot discomfort on the blister-ng backs of the persistently wicked.

The SUN of 1882 was a newspaper of a new kind. It discarded many of the forms, and a multitude of the superfluous words and phrases of ancient journalism. It undertook to report in a fresh, succinct, unconventional way all the news of the world, omitting no event of human interest, and commenting upon affairs with the fearlessness of absolute independence. The success of this experiment was the success of the SUN. It effected a permanent change in the style of American newspapers. Every important journal established in this country in the dozen years past has been modelled after the SUN. Every important journal already existing has been modified and bettered by the force of the SUN's example.

The SUN of 1882 will be the same outspoken, truth-telling, and interesting newspaper.

By a liberal use of the means which an abundant prosperity affords, we shall make it better than ever before.

We shall print all the news, putting it into readable shape, and measuring its importance, not by the traditional yardstick, but by its real interest to the people. Business from Printing House Square is not the first consideration with the SUN. Whenever anything happens worth reporting, we get the particulars, whether it happens in Brooklyn or in Bokhara.

In politics we have decided opinions; and express them in language that can be understood. We say what we think about men and events. That habit is the only secret of the SUN's political course.

The Weekly SUN gathers into eight pages the best matter of the seven daily issues. An Agricultural Department of unequalled merit, full market reports, and a liberal proportion of literary, scientific, and domestic intelligence complete the Weekly SUN, and make it the best newspaper for the farmer's household that was ever printed.

Who does not know and read and like the Sunday SUN, each number of which is a cyclopedia of interesting literature, with the best poetry of the day, pros every line worth reading, news, humor—matter enough to fill a good-sized book, and infinitely more varied and entertaining than any book, big or little?

If our idea of what a newspaper should be pleases you, send for the SUN.

Our terms are as follows:

For the daily SUN, a four-page sheet of twenty-eight columns, the price by mail, post paid, is 55 cents a month, or $6.50 a year; or including the Sunday paper, an eight page sheet of fifty-six columns, the price is 65 cents a month, or $7.70 a year, post paid.

The Sunday edition of the SUN is also furnished separately at $1.20 a year post paid.

The price of the Weekly SUN, eight-pages, fifty-six columns, is $1 a year post paid. For clubs of ten sending $10 one will send an extra copy free.

The YOUTHS' EXAMINER

C. H. JONES, Publisher, Chicago, Ill.

MONTHLY. . . EIGHT PAGES.

SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS PER YEAR.

Give your children meat for reading matter, then they will be satisfied and not be anxious to read trash. The publisher of "The Youths' Examiner" will use every endeavor to make for the children and youth an interesting paper—not one they will partially read from a sense of duty,—but something they will read because they are interested.

EVERY NUMBER ILLUSTRATED

And printed on heavy book paper, and gotten up in an artistic manner. The following is placed at the head of the Editorial columns:

The Youths' Examiner will be devoted to the instruction of our children, in those branches that will not only enlarge their intellectual faculties but strengthen and build up their moral and religious natures. Its exposition of Bible truths will be based upon what is known as the literal view of the prophecies. The mortal nature of man, the reign of Christ and his saints on the earth, etc., etc. The doctrine of the atonement, and life only through Christ will be plainly set forth, and every effort be made to bring these great Bible truths before them in a language both simple and truthful. Many lessons in science and other important branches will from time to time be given, accompanied with suitable illustrations.

It contains some stories, but only those that contain practical truth and information.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a sequel to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief of the Gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life as essential for final salvation.

Its Proximity. The Delay. Quickly. Voice of the Seventh Trumpet. Events of this Space. Seven Special Agents. Period of Judgment, National and Ecclesiastical. Two Witnesses. Who Are They? Investigation Continued in Zechariah iv. The Lamp-Stands, What? The Olive Branches, Who?

No. 93.

J. P. WEETHER.

No period in the world's history is more remarkable than the one now under investigation, known by the names of "Delay," "Quickly," and "The Voice of the Seventh Angel." These terms have been explained. The seven extraordinary agents, viz: the three angels, the three unclean spirits, and the "Voice of the seventh angel," have been named, but whose histories are reserved for future explanation. One of the great events of this judgment period, as we understand, is the death, exposure, resurrection, and ascension of the two witnesses. Before considering these events, it is necessary to identify the two witnesses.

Who are they?

John was told their mystical names: "The two olive trees (branches—Zech. iv. 3, 11, 15), and the two lampstands standing before the God of the earth."

They have two names:—lamp-stands, and olive branches. Lamp-stands are churches:

"The seven candlesticks (lampstands) which thou sawest are seven churches."

A church is to moral light what a lamp-stand is to physical light: it carries the light that it may radiate and be distinctly seen.

But what are the two olive branches?

For their interpretation we shall find them explained in some other part of the Bible, since they must have been known by John, as the name was given to the prophet for the explanation of the witnesses. If John did not know the olive branches he might have said:

"The lamp-stands are churches; this you once explained; but what are the olive branches?"

That question was once asked by Zechariah and answered; and John must have been familiar with that definition. The key to the interpretation is, therefore, in Zech. iv. We have examined Zechariah to this chapter as introductory to what follows:

"And the angel (Gabriel) that talketh with me came again, and waked me, as a man that is waked out of n sleep, and said unto me, What seest thou? And I said, I have looked, and behold a candlestick (lamp-stand) all (of) gold, with a bowl upon the top of it, and his seven lamps thereon, and seven pipes to the seven lamps, which (are) upon the top thereof. And two olive (branches) by it, the one upon the right (side) of the bowl, and the other upon the left (side) thereof. So I answered and said to the angel (Gabriel) that talked with me, saying, What (are) these, my lord? Then the angel that talked with me answered and said unto me, Knowest thou not what these be? And I said, No, my lord. Then he answered and spake unto me, saying, This (is) the word of the Lord (what follows) unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts. Who (art) thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel (thou shalt become) a plain: and he (Zerubbabel) shall bring forth the head-stone (thereof with) shoutings, (crying), Grace, grace be unto it. Moreover the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house; his hands shall finish it; and thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me (Gabriel) unto you. For who hath despised the day of small things? for they shall rejoice, and shall see the plummet in the hand of Zerrubabel (with) those seven; they (are) the eyes of the Lord, which run to and fro through the whole earth. Then answered I, and said unto him, What (are) these two olive trees upon the right (side) of the lamp stand and upon the left (side) thereof? And I answered again, and said unto him, What (be these) two olive branches which through the two golden pipes empty the golden (oil) out of themselves? And he (Hebrew) answered me and said, Knowest thou not what these (be)? And I said, No, my lord. Then said he, These (are) the two anointed ones (sons of oil), that stand by the Lord of the whole earth." Zech. iv. 1-14.

This view was given by Jehovah to Zechariah to awaken in the despondending Jews a lively hope of the completion of the temple, and of the future glory of their nation. Every vision extends downward to the distant ages, when, under their Messiah as priest-king, they should become a holy and an exceedingly prosperous commonwealth.

Two terms are explained by the angel, which were before unknown to the prophet, namely:

1. The lamp-stand.

2. The two olive branches.

Let us review the angel's answers to the two questions, asked by Zechariah:

What is the lamp-stand, with its fixtures?

What are these two olive branches? Who are typified by them?

At first they appear to be two olives—two olive trees—whose golden oil is flowing from two presses through golden pipes into the golden bowl, thence through another set of golden pipes to the lamps, by which the temple was illuminated (for it was a night scene). Upon a closer view, he discovered that they were two branches out of one trunk. The Jewish kingdom was a national church—originally a Theocracy. Their symbol was a single olive tree—"a good olive tree." Rom. xi. 24.

1. The Lamp-Bearer with its Fixtures.—Zechariah's first view takes in the entire vision—the lamp-bearer, and the olive tree, with its two branches. The prophet is puzzled with its complexity. Gabriel, discovering his embarrassment, begins to analyze the vision by solving each element of the two sets of objects. The solution of the first question belongs principally to the lamp-bearer and fixtures.

He touches the prophet that the rebuilding of the temple, commenced by Zerubbabel some years before, will be finished by the same visible agent (Zerubbabel), but that the visible human agents are powerless, unless aided by the invisible Jehovah; that man might construct the illuminating apparatus—the lamp-bearer, bowl, lamp and tubes; he might gather the fruit, bruise it in a mortar, press out the oil, and by tubes, convey it to the lamps, but the production of light was God's agency. The types taught the prophet that the re-establishment of the Jewish Theocracy was the work of the Divine hand, operating through, and guiding a visible human agency; and that to that end he had appointed, and would continue two orders of agents. Priests and civil rulers, as visible workers, while he, standing behind the priesthood and the throne would direct, and impart his Divine power.

Such appears to be the idea conveyed to Zechariah by the mystic lamp-bearer, with its fixtures, and the olive tree and its two branches.

In explanation of the two olive branches, with their fruit, press, oil, and oil tubes, the angel says, These the two anointed ones (children of oil), that stand by the Lord of the whole earth. As if God (by Gabriel his servant) had said, Zechariah, tell these despondding people to take courage. I shall remain faithful to my promises. Your sorrows are not to be perpetual (seventy years only). I shall restore from captivity a remnant; out of which I shall arect my nation. The temple, commenced, shall be finished; Jerusalem, now desolate, shall be restored, and rebuilt; and the nation; through many generations, shall prosper. This work I will surely accomplish, through two orders of officers typified by Joshua the high-priest, and Zerubbabel the prince.

We should keep in view the following propositions, which the Bible fully sustains:

"1. The Jewish nation was a Theocracy—a politico-ecclesiastical establishment. God raised up, sustained, and ruled that people through two orders of officiary:—(1.) the priesthood; (2.) civil governors, of which Joshua and Zerubbabel are in Zech. iv. presented as the illustrious types.

The Jewish nation was the body of Moses, over which Michael, the archangel, disputed with Satan (compare Zech. iii. 2, with Jude 9); so-called because they were governed by the laws given him by Jehovah. It was also the good olive tree with its two branches from which flowed the golden oil; or two orders of officers, sons of oil, anointed as guides and rulers of the nation. Rom. xi. 24.

For a similar reason the Christian ecclesia (congregation) is the body of Christ (Eph. i. 23; Col. i. 24), having Christ as its Law Giver, High Priest and Governor, and whose interests, spiritual and temporal, are under the management of two classes of officers—ministers of the word, and ministers of tables: or elders and deacons. We are a royal priesthood since we carry the name of our royal high-priest. I Peter ii. 9. This is our official position, in the church of God's temple, by virtue of our faith in the efficacy of the royal high-priesthood of his beloved Son. We are simply joint heirs with Christ to that royal inheritance which Jesus purchased by his own obedience, and by the shedding of his own blood.

We are in possession of that inheritance and its honors by faith; the time hastens when our faith will mingle with the ocean of full fruition. This vision of Zechariah, now under review, is not limited to the return and building up of a remnant nation from seventy years' captivity in Babylon, only as a type. It brings to view an antitype, that covers the most distant future. Such were all of these far-reaching, typical lessons. The lamp-bearers, and the olive tree are not limited to the Jewish times. They reach downward to the removal of the natural branches, and the grafting in of the wild olive branches; the grafting in again of the same olive branches, and the establishment of the temple service under Christ, the royal high-priest. That Gabriel had these distant times in view will appear from Zech. vi. 9-15. As this prophecy, in its types, point to the days when the fulness of the Gentiles comes in, it will now be in place to consider the imagery of that prediction.

The prophet receives from Jehovah, by his interpreting angel (perhaps), the following instructions:

"Take of (them of) the captivity (even) of Heldai, of Tobijah, and of Jedaiah, which are come from Babylon, and come thou the same day, and go into the house of Josiah the son of Zephaniah; then take silver and gold, and make crowns (a diadem of many crowns), and set (them—it) upon the head of Joshua the son of Josedech, the high-priest; and speak unto him, saying, Behold the man whose name (is) the BRANCH; and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord: Even he shall build the temple of the Lord; and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and he shall be a priest upon his throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both. And the crowns shall be to Helem, and to Tobijah, and to Jedaiah, and to Hen the son of Zephaniah, for a memorial in the temple of the Lord. And they (that are) far off shall come and build in the temple of the Lord, and ye shall know that the Lord of hosts hath sent me unto you. And (this) shall come to pass, if ye will diligently obey the voice of the Lord your God."

The instructions to the prophet are in the form of a command:

"Take of the captivity:"—"Take silver and gold:"—"Make crowns:"—"Set upon the head of Joshua."

It is not stated that this was done by Zechariah; nor is such a record necessary, since it is stated by Divine authority what such acts should typify. It may be affirmed in truth, that this ranks among the most important of typical prophecies, since, under the type of the Branch, is shown the introduction of the Gentile into the true sanctuary. Let us analyze its elements.

The Captives.—What office do they fill in this typical representation?

Historic Facts.—At this time, the building of the temple had been in progress about five months. The Jews, still abiding in Babylonia, had been sending pecuniary aid to their brethren who were occupied in rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem.

TO JOEL A. SIMONDS.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 7, 1881.

Respected Brother:

Please allow me your attention to the central doctrine and tendency of your article in THE RESTITUTION of Oct. 5th.

Our aim as Christians, is to get out "the word of the Lord." Its "entrance giveth light." Our great High Priest prayed, "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth!" John xvii. 17. (We both intend to please God and enjoy an "abundant entrance;" now it is becoming for us to aid each other as far as possible.) On this ground we are set apart to God and his service by "the truth," and the main point is determined and forever settled to the believer. It is not left to be argued out by us on the line of human wisdom, but the wisdom of God—the logos, made flesh—the truth personified—the Judge of quick and dead has said, "Before God, and for our instruction in righteousness—thy word is truth!" Amen.

It follows from these premises, that all that applies to Abraham and his seed has, or will become, reality, as absolutely as if it had already transpired. There can be no abasement as to the Abrahamic blessing. Rom. iv. 17; Gal. iii. 23-29; Eph. v. 32. St. Paul speaks of "Christ and the church."

But all of Israel are not Israel. Neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children; but in Isaac shall thy seed be called. Rom. ix. 1-8. However, "Ishmael, Zimram and Jokshan, Medan and Midian, Ishbak and Shua," had their place and portion from Abraham. Thus, "the word of truth" notices Isaac, the heir of special promise; and also every other of Abraham's eight zonal Both parts are alike true, or false.

But, Bro. S., you seem to argue one-sided and all along the one line of Isaac, etc.

Again, for brevity. Take the dispensational parables of the gospel age. "The harvest" disposes of both "wheat and tares!" You have the wheat as if without tares. The gospel net gathers of every kind; and when ashore, "the good" are saved; but "the bad are cast away." "The just and unjust" are surely there; though ignored by this labored argument.

Thus, "A man called his own servants and delivereth unto them his goods. After a long time the lord of those servants cometh and reckoneth with them." (Observe, the reckoning was only with "those servants.") "The good and faithful" are commended, rewarded, and officially honored.

All right, Bro. S., so far as with "Abraham and his seed." Gal. iii. 24-29.

But then, is it not all wrong to deny (adroitly and as if "aside") "the wicked and slothful," and his doom? Matt. xxv. 14-30.

If I see, you ignore the very principle of moral government, that embraces all ages, and the gospel age, especially; "for unto whomsoever much is given, much is required." Luke xii. 42-48. We all around us have manifold more than Mother Eve or Israel, and are responsible for it.

Nay more, "This is the condemnation that light is come and men loved darkness, and will not come to the light." John iii. 16-21. In chap. v. 17-29, the Judge proclaims their judgment, and the resurrection to it, "They that have done good unto the resurrection of life—they that have done evil unto the resurrection of condemnation." (Judgment—same word as chap. iii. 19.)

On this line there will be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust. Acts xxiv. 14, 15.

Hence we read, "God knoweth how to deliver the godly—and to reserve the unjust to the day of judgment to be punished." "The day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." 2 Peter ii. 9; iii. 7.

On this range of all truth pertaining to moral government over the just and unjust. We read of "the second death"—four times over. They all belong to "those things that must be hereafter." Rev. iv. 1.

The climax. Adam, for a trifle lost his Eden dominion. Korah and company sunk in earthquake and fire for a little play of service to God, with "strange fire." The prophet delivered his miraculous message to Jeroboam; but for listening to an unauthorized prophet was slain by a lion. Kings xiii. And the Jews with faith in God and his general promise to Abraham did "die in their sins." John viii. 21-24. A departure from God has proved fatal, so far. "Let us then, brethren, take heed lest there be in us an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God." He says, "My counsel (not argument) shall stand and I will do all my pleasure." Isa. xlvi. 8-10. And his counsel is given as to "both the just and the unjust." Amen.

With regret for the occasion to write thus, I remain in Christian love yours for truth.

J. B. COOK.

Selections.

The Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times.

SOME OF THE SIGNS OF THE LAST TIMES.

DIONYSIUS.

The doctrine of another and better dispensation for the world, and consequently of "the last times" of this present disposition, is a necessary part of both Hebrew and Christian theology, if, for the moment, we may consider those as in any degree separate or distinct systems. It is also a very ancient doctrine indeed, for, on the authority of St. Jude, Enoch, the seventh in line of descent from Adam, prophesied to the reckless sons of wickedness that a day of judgment awaited them in "the last time." Jude 10, 14, 18.

Daniel the prophet speaks to us, in several places, of "the time of the end," and "the end of the days." Micah and the other prophets also proclaim the coming of "the last days," days of deliverance to the people of God, yet of awful condemnation to those who have rejected him. Several important chapters and prophecies of the New Testament are especially devoted to a consideration of "the last times," which indeed is a very cardinal element of the Christian's creed, and one to be more than ever remembered by him in periods of great discouragement and trial, such as those through which the Church is now passing. If the Christian man did not believe that the Judge of all the earth could not do otherwise than right, he would despair of any good, and lose his hope altogether.

There are many tremendous tokens of evil around us, and the long-suffering of God is, alas, being misinterpreted by a great multitude of people. Losing sight of man's free agency, such folk appear to think that if God had existence, he would by arbitrary interference, put a stop to the all-prevailing wickedness. St. Peter says they "wilfully forget" the history of the flood, and, while indulging in all sorts of lusts, mock at their own fears, and at the fears of others, saying, "Where is the promise of his coming? for, from the day that the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as from the beginning of the creation." 2 Peter iii. 4.

But this very attitude of the men of the last days is itself one of the "signs of the times," since it was predicted 2,600 before; and all these abounding evils and abounding signs, which seem to confirm the wicked in their wickedness, confirm the righteous in their faith. In one sense, the godly are patient with the patience of God, not willing that any should perish. In another sense they are eager for the world's restitution, and so cry, "Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

EASTERN PROBLEMS.

Turning our eyes toward the eastern horizon, many tokens of the fast-approaching crisis of the end meet our gaze. We see signs in the "political heavens" above, and on the "subjective earth" beneath; blood and fire and vapor of smoke. Conspicuously prominent in those eastern heavens is a "great dragon" power; not, as of old, the "great red dragon" of Rome, awaiting the advent of the God-man with the intention of devouring him (Rev. xii. 3), but the "great green dragon" of "Ros, Meshech and Tubal" (Ezekiel xxxvii. and xxxviii.; Rev. xvi. 13, 14; xx. 2, 8), the claimant of eastern Rome's dominion, making itself ready to dispute with the saints of God for the possession of that kingdom which is so soon to be set up in the land of Israel.

The new Cæsar (Czar) has spoken his word. There is to be no retrogression in Russian schemes of ambition. The Sclave crusade is to be preached and pursued more actively than ever. Ignatieff, the statesman charged with stimulating the Sclavic outbreak in Bulgaria, which resulted in the last Russo-Turkish war, is placed at the head of affairs, and an active propaganda of Panslavonianism is almost certain to follow his promotion. Indeed, a new pamphlet with that very object in view has been already announced by advertisement in the Russian paper, the Golos, in May last, as follows:

"The glorious history of Tsargrad (Constantinople), with an account of the many prophecies concerning it, including one declaring that the time will come when Moscs and Medina will fall into ruins, and that this shall be brought about by a Christian Tsar named Alexander III."

Here is, indeed, "a sign of the times," not only for the people who are looking for the coming of their Lord, but, likewise, for certain statesmen, who are entrusted with the care of mighty interests in those regions.

THE OCCUPATION OF THE "HOLY PLACES."

Another sign in the eastern sky, of no little significance, is the joint, though jealous, occupation of the Holy Places at Jerusalem by the Frank, the Sclave, and the Moslem powers. Each one of these lays claim to the dominion of old Rome, and if either of the capital cities of Rome or Constantinople had formed the bone of contention, the jealousy would have seemed only natural; but why should they contend for supremacy at Jerusalem? No answer can be given to this question apart from the explanations afforded by the Apocalypse of St. John, and which point to Palestine as the seat of the next great empire. The two last Sclavo-Turkish wars have in their results furnished wonderful indications of this "Kingdom of the Stone" being close at hand.

At the conclusion of the Crimean war, the chief, if not the solitary result obtained was, by some mysterious providence, the emancipation of Palestine and the circumjacent regions. Those Holy Lands were, by a special firman, then declared free to colonization, and placed under the joint protection of the Great Powers. The termination of the more recent conflict was also signalized by another stage being accomplished in the redemption of that land which is destined to become the centre of Christ's kingdom, and the joy, once more, of the whole earth. This time a British Protectorate over the extensive and important peninsula of Asia Minor was established, with the island of Cyprus as its point, of rest, as a check to the threatened further advances of Russia in that direction.

THE LIMITS OF THE HOLY TERRITORY.

When God called Abraham, and assigned to him the fatherhood of a great and mighty seed, he allocated a region of the earth's surface for their ultimate occupation. The limits of the holy territory were accurately defined, and two great rivers designated as its principal boundaries. "To thee and to thy seed will I give this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates." Gen. xv. 18. Such was the promise, and is it not a striking sign of the times that the two natural boundaries so indicated should have come so suddenly into prominence in our days and after a sleep of centuries of neglect and indifference? A practical discernment of the wants of a time close at hand has prompted our engineers to single out the river of Egypt and the river of Mesopotamia as the two natural highways par excellence for that extended intercourse between the far East and the far West which is now seen to be inevitable. The land between these two highways is the Land of Promise—the inheritance of the saints. Surely in all these facts one must discern great "signs of the times."

But the acquisition by Britain of predominant influence over these two highways, and this, too, under the guidance of a Christian Prime Minister, yet of Hebrew origin and of Hebrew sympathies (so representing in himself, as it were, both the literal and spiritual Israel), is certainly the greatest sign of all these lately displayed in the Eastern sky. Nevertheless, it is a sign which was evidently not discerned at the time by a multitude of Englishmen, who, it is to be hoped, are growing wiser as the events on which the late Lord Beaconsfield based his policy become more and more developed. The Moslem power is visibly decaying. The mystic river Euphrates is becoming dry in its own bed. A successor to the Moslem inheritance must be found. Some of the sons of Britain seem to favor the ambitious claims of the kings from the North, while others, more discerning, would preserve the future for those "kings from the East," or sun rising, who, by the decrees of heaven, are one day to enter into possession.

THE ENERGY OF EVIL.

Many prophecies in the Divine Book attribute phenomenal events of the last days to the quickened action of the "Evil One," manifested through human instrumentalities. In that chief of prophecies, 2 Thess. ii., the "man of sin," in the days preceding our Lord's second coming, is declared to be the direct offspring of "the energy of Satan." In another prophecy, addressed to the peoples of the Roman world, the figurative "earth and sea," they are warned to expect woes, for that the devil would operate specifically upon them, having great wrath, because of there being but a short time left in the which to carry on his evil work. Rev. xii. 12. Further, the state of confederation, which would represent in the aggregate the evils of man's great rebellion and apostacy, is represented as ascending "out of the bottomless pit" (Rev. xi. 7; xvii. 8), and its government, or chief, as possessing "the power, the throne, and the great authority of the Dragon, or Satan." Rev. xiii. 2.

A vast enterprise of mischief, both individual and collective, is plainly indicated in these several declarations. Can I possibly err in saying that the active operation of Satan on the modern world has not only been privately felt, but publicly admitted by many great thinkers and writers for some time past? The proofs are abundant that we live in and no wonder, seeing how completely godliness has given place to licentiousness, whether of belief or of conduct. Satan never had such opportunities for action, at least, since the flood; for without God, what possible defence remains to man against his approaches? Let Carlyle give an answer to this question, for I have found one in his writings exceedingly appropriate:

"The five unexhausted senses will remain, the sixth insatiable sense (of vanity); the whole demoniac nature of man will remain, hurled forth to rage blindly, without rule or rein, savage itself, yet with all the tools and weapons of civilization, a spectacle new in history."

As the Divine restraints of religion and of heaven's laws are one by one removed, the powers of darkness break forth afresh, and occupy our land with every species of noxious evil. Vice is not only existing, it is rampant. Men are not content with committing wrong, but they must advertise and propagate it. Commenting on some of the more flagrant outrages our time, the Times, in a leading article, thus acknowledged in a manner the fulfillment of the Divine predictions:

"It looks like the reappearance of the mighty powers of wickedness that ravaged the earth, decimated its population, and threw back civilization itself at some former epochs."

Surely the Church may, with united voice and desire, pray that line of the Lord's prayer, as given in the Revised Version, "Deliver us from the evil one."

(To be Continued.)

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Dec. 7, 1881.

We have received a tract on Christian Baptism written by Brother H. V. Reed. It advocates baptism in the single name of Jesus Christ. We have several communications on this subject. As a great deal has been submitted to our readers on baptism during the past year, we defer these for a time.

Please only send stamps for fractions of a dollar. Also be careful to prepay all letters. We have had to send postage to Washington three times quite lately to obtain letters from the Dead letter Office. Small pieces of silver can be sent, but do not put them loosely in the wrapper; inclose them in something extra, for wrappers often get broken in the mails.

On the subject of The New Heaven and the New Earth, lately discussed at some length, we are in accordance with that class of our brethren who hold that the change will vastly affect the physical condition of our planet, as well as its political and moral state. We can draw no other conclusion from the Scriptures generally than that a fiery ordeal precedes the regeneracis of our earthly globe. At the same time we do not adopt the idea that this orb will become a molten mass.

The Directors made but little change in the management of THE RESTITUTION for the coming year. Its editorial responsibility is assigned to us for 1882. It will be our object to do our best for the subscribers and for the cause of truth. None can feel more sensibly than ourself that some one far better qualified for the important position ought to have the editorial charge. We ask the forbearance of our brethren and especially their prayers for the divine assistance.

The new Meeting House in North Township, Marshall Co., Ind., was dedicated to the worship of God on Sunday, Dec. 4, according to previous notice. The little church there have labored under disadvantage for some time for the want of a place to meet and hold forth the gospel of the grace of God. They have now a comfortable and commodious house in which to proclaim salvation through our dear Redeemer. Three persons were baptized on Sunday. Large congregations were in attendance at the different meetings, and all passed off very pleasantly.

WINTER.

The autumnal glories all have passed away.
The forest leaves no more its beetle red
Give glowing tokens of their brief decay,
But scattered lie, or rustle to the tread,
Like whispered warnings from the mouldering dead.
The naked trees stretch out their arms all day,
And each bald summ lifts its reverend head
As if for some new covering to pray.
—Mrs. E. C. Kinney.

The sun has gone to gild the heavens that overarch the chambers of the South, and to gladden, green, and beautify with floral loveliness the lands of another hemisphere. The birds of summer have taken flight from the leafless sprays, through which the north-wind moans its requiem over departed glories, to sing their blithesome songs amid flowering groves that bloom beneath the tropical skies. As change the seasons so changes human life. With many of us the spring-time of youth, the summer of mature years, and the sere witherings of autumn, have given place to the winter of existence. As change our lives so change the eras and dispensations of human history. The holy groves of Paradise, the holy faces of Palestine, and the Holy Spirit's Pentecostal effusions are all in the past, and the cold cheerless winter of earth's history has set in. But we wait the time—

"When the skies shall ever lighten,
Lighten never more to blacken;
When the flowers shall never brighten,
Brighten never more to fade."

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

The course of history has had all along the ages its "irrepressible conflicts." This happily coined phrase is only a laconic expression of the great truth enunciated by the Prophet almost 2500 years ago that "The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men." Dan. iv. 25. The time has about come for Immanuel's land to be delivered from Islam's rule, and events are shaping for the speedy accomplishment of God's predetermined purposes. We subjoin these two extracts from the Prophetic Times to show the tendency of movements in the East:

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.

The separation of Armenia from Turkey, and its formation into an independent State, is declared by the Russian General Skilikoff, to be near at hand. Skilkoff is likely to know, because Russia has for many years devoted her energies to stirring up discontent in Turkey, treasonously hoping to discredit that power in Europe, and so profit by her fall. The Armenians, many of whom are very intelligent, constitute 70,000 of the 120,000 inhabitants of Tiflis, and they make it the headquarters of their agitation for Armenian freedom. M. Ararauil, a millionaire, devotes himself to promoting the movement by publications, and his party are now seeking to obtain practical self-government for Armenia under Russian protection. They affirm that Europe must before long resound with the noise of the Armenian question. We know from prophecy that the solution of the problem will be the separation of Syria, along with Armenia, from Turkey, and their establishment as an independent kingdom.

COLONIZATION OF PALESTINE TO THE JEWS.

This is assuming a new feature. Dr. Gordon, editor of Havazzelet, a Hebrew weekly of large circulation among his co-religionists, has written some enthusiastic and exciting editorials on the subject, which are exerting quite an influence in its favor. No definite plan has yet been formed for its accomplishment, but should it be favorably regarded by leading European Jews, which is not unlikely, plan and means will not be wanting to give it effect. Russian Jews driven by persecution from that land may be easily induced to turn their faces toward Palestine, which is already becoming an asylum for the free. With the aid and protection sought for and likely to be secured they would find it a more congenial home than any other land under the sun. And they would be speedily followed by thousands from all parts of the world, which would soon ensure their restoration to nationality again. An event which forms one main topic of prophecy and is certain of fulfillment in a very short time.

INFIDELITY.

We take the following communication from Messiah's Herald. As a prominent sign of the last days—"Evil men and seducers are waxing worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." As it was in Noah's time—when "the earth was corrupt before God, and filled with violence"—so our Savior has said its moral state would be at his coming. The sinful condition of mankind in our days is a most fearful counterpart of the prophetic word. A depraved world hails with delight the harangues of the apostles of infidelity. "But, beloved, remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; how that they told you there should be mockers in the last time, that should walk after their own ungodly lusts."

CHRISTIANS, TO THE RESCUE!

DWIGHT SPENCER.

Infidelity is rapidly gaining ground in the West. To be convinced of this, one only needs to spend a few months west of the Rocky Mountains. What a scrambling for wealth and pleasure! All fear of God and all thought of a future have been flung to the winds. Mines and mining, theatres and dances, dresses and balls,—these are the general topics of conversation. All are eager for excitement, and whether it be found in the dramshop, the gambling saloon, or the low playhouse, does not matter. The coarser the play the better it will draw; the more impious the book the greater the number of its readers. Profanity is the rule rather than the exception, and in many instances the women swear worse than the men.

The few Christians, finding themselves powerless to oppose this tide of sin and iniquity, often fall in and float along with the current. Vital piety—old-fashioned, prayer-meeting religion—is hardly known. The vigorous, self-supporting churches west of the Rocky Mountains would hardly exceed two or three score. There are towns of five hundred people without a single church goer; and entire territories, numbering a hundred thousand inhabitants, where not one in a hundred statedly visits the house of God. In the great mining camps, and in many of the towns, six runs loose six days in the week, and holds high carnival on Sunday.

The reason for this state of things is not hard to find. The wonderful facilities for accumulating wealth which the West has afforded, have given the people the means for the gratification of their appetites and passions. Multitudes, who at home were kept temperate and chaste, either by poverty or social ties, coming here and finding relief from the one and freedom from the other, give way to their naturally evil tendencies, and follow the leading of unbridled appetite and lust. And when men become impure in life and beastly in practice, they dare want a God looking around, nor a future terrifying them with its retributions. Men first become bad and then infidels; they never say, "no God," till they have made themselves fools. A man with a red and scabby face came blustering up to me the other day, and with a drunken laugh said: "I understand that they have left 'hell' out of the Revised Testament."

This accounts for Ingersoll's great popularity in the West. His lectures, next to the cheap novel, are more widely read than anything else. Ingersoll is simply a product of the times. Some men would be great if born in any age, others owe their greatness to the age that produces them. The demand of the age was for a man who could amuse; and lo, Ingersoll! Frisky and frivolous, witty and wicked he was just the man for an easy-living, irreverent age. The people were bent on sinning, and he was just the man to make them believe that they could do it without running any risk. Men buy his books and attend his lectures for the same reason that a house-breaker employs a talented and witty lawyer: they want to get clear. Take the dishonest, the drunken, and the unchaste out of the ranks of his admirers, and there would not be any left. Every seducer, every Nihilist, and every bloody handed assassin is ready to throw up his hat for Ingersoll.

I know that the picture is a dark one, but it is not too dark. I have been over the ground, and know where of I write, and the picture, dark as it is, is one that American Christians need to look at. If we would retain our hold upon the East, we must save the West. We cannot have a Christian East and an Infidel West. Infidelity is vigilant and active; it is bent upon conquest. No half-hearted efforts will answer. The church must gird herself for a mighty struggle. We have for a long time been preaching self-denial, and practicing self-indulgence. We have well-nigh lost the meaning of the word sacrifice.

Last year the Mormon church with its hundred and forty thousand members, men, women, and children, contributed more for missionary work than was contributed by the whole Baptist church. When I think of this it makes me blush with shame. The Mormons might well send missionaries to us to preach to us the duty of giving. Five hundred new missionaries are needed to fully occupy this field. Shall they be forthcoming? Shall the West be saved?

VIENNA, Dec. 1.—A shock of earthquake occurred at Agram on Wednesday, which was the severest that has been experienced since the great catastrophe in November, 1880.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Nov. 29.—Australian papers report a heavy storm about Oct. 20. The steamer Brisbane was totally wrecked on the reef off Port Darwin. The steamer Balclutha, from Melbourne to Sydney, is supposed to have foundered. The schooner School Boy was wrecked near Jervis Bay, and all were lost.

About forty persons injured in the late gale are being treated in the London hospitals. It is feared that some of the cases will prove fatal. Fifty barges were sunk in the Thames. Extensive floods are reported in the Upper Thames Valley.

The Calf Rock Lighthouse, ten miles from Bantry Bay, was washed away in the recent gale which swept the Irish coast and a large part of England and Scotland. Several men are reported to have lost their lives.

The French have warned foreigners in Tunis to withdraw their movable property from the country districts, otherwise such property will be destroyed in the raids which the approaching French columns from Kairwand Gabes may make on the property of insurgent Arabs.

Advices received at Constantinople state that the cholera, probably disseminated by returning pilgrims, has appeared in Burum, Kabeilah and Chehr. A disease, which is supposed to be the plague, has broken out in the Wilze district of Lazistan, in Asia Minor. Five deaths therefrom have occurred in ten days. A cordon has been established, and doctors have been sent.

Latest advices from Mecca, in Arabia, report the rapid increase of cholera in that region. This is of special interest to Europe and America, for the reason that the epidemic of Asiatic cholera which periodically visits these countries always starts in Arabia and moves thence westward.

THE FUTURE OF ISLAM.

The Mussulman peasantry, especially of the Ottoman Empire, are miserable, and they know that they are so, and they look in vain to their religon to protect them, as in former days, against their rulers. They find that all their world now is corrupt—that the law is broken daily by those who should enforce the law; that the illegalities of those who ruined them are constantly condoned by a conniving lady of the Ulema; that for all practical purposes of justice and mercy religion has abdicated its claim to direct and govern. They have learned, too, by their intercourse with strangers, and in the towns by the newspapers which they now eagerly read that this has not been always so, and that servitude is not the natural state of man or acquiescence in evil the true position of religion, and they see in all they suffer an outrage inflicted on the better law of Islam. I was much struck by hearing the Egyptian peasantry last year attribute the lighter taxes they were then enjoying to the fact that the reigning Khedive was a man who feared God." At the same time the learned classes are shocked and alarmed at the political decline of Islam and the still greater dangers which stare her in the face, and they attribute them to the unchecked wickedness and corruption with which the long rule of Constantinople has pervaded every class of society, even beyond its own territorial borders. They complain now that they have been led astray, and believe that the vengeance of heaven will overtake them if they do not amend their ways. In all this, I say, there is something of the spirit which once goaded Christians into an examination of the bases on which their belief rested, and of the true nature of the law which tolerated such great corruption.

Conference Report.

The Severance Conference met Oct. 9, and opened by Bro. Adams speaking from Acts viii. 35, urging the necessity of yet preaching Jesus.

Saturday morning was spent in singing, prayer, exhortation, etc. Saturday night "Our Hope" by Bro. Glover.

Sunday morning Bro. Adams spoke on the Object of Christ's Second Coming, followed by Bro. Pierson, in which he portrayed how Jesus the Lamb of God, will take away the sin of the world.

Sunday night Bro. Pierson spoke on the goodness of God in offering us terms of reconciliation, followed by Bro. Adams. In conclusion he read Bro. G. M. Myers' letter of greeting and salutation to the brethren in Kansas.

Before separating the ordinance of the Lord's House was attended to, we sang an hymn, and went out.

The visitors were, Sister Carrie Williams and husband from St. Joseph, Mo., Brother Adams of Jefferson Co., Sister Richards of Graham Co., Brethren Buckle and Goodrich of Atchison Co., and Bro. and Sister Pierson of White Cloud.

Audience good considering Sister Smith buried her darling little boy Dallas, two days before the meeting, and Bertie lay dangerously sick; and Brother Buckle's sister-in-law lay at the point of death, hindering his family entirely, and him part of the time. In addition an aged and much respected lady, mother Hopkins, formerly of Indiana, died suddenly of heart disease, the first night of meeting. Her daughter and son-in law, who were on their way home from Europe were telegraphed for many times before their whereabouts could be ascertained. Extra efforts were put forth to preserve the body till the arrival of her daughter, creating considerable sympathy in the community.

Now while the dark wave of death is passing over both the infant and old age, who would not desire the coming of the Just One, of whom it is said, he carries in his girdle the keys of death and hell. He will not judge after the hearing of his ears, or of the sight of his eyes, but in righteousness shall he judge. He will break the oppressor, and hear the poor when he crieth. Behold I make all things new; there shall be no more crying, no more pain, no more sorrow, no more death. Oh, what a glorious future awaits the overcomers!

Those who could and did attend the meeting, will be able to make one more days' journey towards the kingdom, safe from the allurements of this world.

Yours in hope.

Editor Restitution:

The new hymn book has now arrived, and after giving it an overhauling I must say I am highly pleased, and I feel very confident that it must fill a long-felt want, one that has pained us for years. Yet the book is not entirely free from objections. Neither does it come forth in plan just as I would have it. But the objections I regard as of little consequence, and the book as good as any one or two men could arrange. Some few of my favorites are left out, but I hope we may yet have some additions in some new edition, so that the final outcome will be a book every way commended by the brotherhood. And I do hope this little book will find a hearty welcome among all our friends. And as an evidence of our appreciation and true worth of the little book, we sold four copies yesterday—being the first day after we received it—and made but little effort at that. Why should it not meet with general favor when it comes, so neat, and so cheap to us, that it really seems like an old friend. We bespeak it many friends.

Editor Restitution:

It has been some time since I wrote to you. When last I wrote I was totally deaf, but have recovered a little which is a great deal to me. While I have been unable to hear I could still see to read and study the word.

I have heard a great many preach, and have read several writers on the Rich Man and Lazarus, and the inward man and outward man, and I am scarcely satisfied with the views of any of them. For instance, on the Rich Man they say this portrays the final end of the wicked, and that Lazarus portrays the final end of the righteous. I think this smacks a great deal of the immortal soulism. I would like to ask one question, Is there anything in the divine record that says the rich man was a wicked man, or that the poor man was a righteous man? This rich man wore purple and fine linen. For what purpose were these vestures worn? Do they designate or mark a wicked man? I think not. Purple, if I do not mistake, in olden days was worn only by those having kingly power, thus being rich in this world's goods.

Now to the point in question. What does the fine linen designate in the wearer? Does it not mark a priestly office? Why was the fine linen chosen for the rich man? Was it not that he might minister to God in the priest's office? And is it one of God's high priests that all the Orthodox, and some I fear that are not styled Orthodox, are going to get into that great lake of fire and brimstone that they talk so much about?

But enough of this for the present. What is there that says that the poor man was a righteous man previous to his being taken to Abraham's bosom? If he was, what was the need of his being taken to Abraham's bosom? I merely give these questions to some of the brethren to look into the matter and give me an explanation of some of them.

I was engaged in a written discussion of about six months, with an Orthodox minister, and these thoughts came to my mind, and caused me to ask myself what lesson did the Savior intend to teach the Jews in the case of the Rich Man and Lazarus? I have my views all written out and thought I would offer them for publication, but as I differ from some of our best writers on the subject, I thought they might consider me egotistical. I think Christ intended to teach a very important lesson in his expression of the Rich Man and Lazarus, and that is the death of the Jewish nation, their burial as a nation and their resurrection to a national life. The bishops Bible says the Rich Man was buried in hell, and lifting up his eyes saw Lazarus, etc. Now those people that went to this unseen state as a nation, all had their eyes and could see, were perfect. None died a temporal death. If they died a national death at the destruction of Jerusalem, and were scattered amongst the Gentile nations, they must be raised to national life that they may again wear the purple and fine linen.

But I have written more than I intended on this, as I am isolated from any of our people. I moved away from where we had a congregation of about forty members. There is but one who believes the truth within 30 miles of me. My children have made my living for several years. I lost my health and hearing in the U. S. army, was surgeon; I am getting some better, and will pay up for THE RESTITUTION soon.

On Dec. 27, 1881, I enter into a public discussion with a Seventh Day Adventist. I would like some of the preaching brethren to come if possible.

Question: Does the Scriptures teach that the seventh day of the week is the Sabbath of the Lord, and is binding on all Christians.

Wm. Snow affirms, and O. C. Denslow denies.

The discussion commences on Tuesday, Dec. 27, at 10 o'clock a. m., in Greencastle, Mo., and continues three days. Can brethren Prosser, Callaway and Davis attend?

Yours in hope of the kingdom.

Editor Restitution:

Enclosed find $2. Please apply $1.50 on subscription to THE RESTITUTION, and fifty cents to the fund for sending brethren to administer baptism to applicants who live remote from any church organization. Much good could be done through an effort of this kind. Let a fund be raised through contributions from the friends of truth, as a brother has suggested; and, I would suggest, that the editor of THE RESTITUTION receive and disburse the fund, as applications for such service would most likely be made to him. Now, brethren, if an amount can be raised in this way equal to the amount paid annually by the brethren for tobacco, it will be sufficient. I believe that the amount will enable an efficient laborer to devote at least six months' time to preaching the gospel that inculcates holiness of life and purity of body and mind, for if we cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit it will not leave a stain of tobacco or even a smell of beer about us. O! ye that expect to associate with the pure and holy in the ages to come, do not neglect the cleansing of yourselves from the physical and mental polutions that will keep you out of the kingdom. Now to all who have so urgently solicited my labors let me say, I am trying hard to get in a condition to again take the field as a laborer in the Master's vineyard, and with the earnest hope that I may not leave it until the race is ended or the Master calls.

Yours in hope.

Editor Restitution:

I bless God that I am still having my eyesight enough to read our much beloved paper. I am too old and feeble to attend church, and the weekly visits of THE RESTITUTION cheer me in my path as I walk down to the grave. Yet I enjoy the blessed hope that supports and gives consolation which all the world cannot give. O it is blessed to live by faith on the Son of God, and while we pass along in pain and affliction here, Jesus knows it all, and feels for us. O what a loving Savior we have. I have given all into his hands, and I feel the offering too small for all he has done for me. It seems that mankind is having but little faith in God's word, or they would heed its warning; and the day of the Lord will come on them as a thief. I see more and more the need of prayer and watchfulness; dangers on every side; no safety but in living for Christ. O may you, my brother, be ready to meet him in that glorious day, and have an abundant entrance into the kingdom.

I send you one dollar for my subscription another six months, and also ten cents in stamps for the new proposition I read in last week's paper; would be happy to send more if I could, but my prayer shall be to God that he may give hearts to support the paper that have abundance of this world's goods. It rests my old, weary limbs, to sit down and read the dear letters from those of like faith. May you have health and patience to perform the task of editor, and may the grace of God sustain and comfort your heart to the end. I send my respects to all the household of faith; and may we meet in that fair Eden home in the prayer of your unworthy sister in Christ.

THE GRACE OF GOD.

The grace of God in the heart of man is a tender plant in a strange, unkindly soil; and therefore cannot well prosper and grow without much care and pains, and that of a skilful hand, which hath the power of cherishing it. —Leighton.

What are another's faults to me?
I've not a culture's skill
To pick at every daw I see,
And make it wilder still.
It is enough for me to know
I've follies of my own,
And on my heart the cave bestow,
And let my friends alone.

Enough to know that we can grasp if we cannot fathom, the Deity; just as a child can grasp its parent's immeasurable love, and in the knowledge that he is loved, find rest and peace, and that is simple faith.

As the rose tree is composed of the sweetest flowers, and sharpest thorns; as the heavens are sometimes fair and sometimes overcast, alternately tempestuous and serene; so is the life of man intermingled with hopes and fears, with joys and sorrows, with pleasures and pains.

It is not the encountering of difficulties and dangers in obedience to the promptings of the inward spiritual life which constitutes tempting of God and providence, but the acting without faith, proceeding on our own errands with no precious conviction of duty, and no prayer for aid and direction.—Livingstone.

PROPHECY.

That miracles of power were ever performed can be proved, at a distant period, only by witnesses, against whose testimony cavils may be raised, or causes for doubt advanced; but the man who reads a prophecy and perceives the corresponding event, is himself the witness of the miracle; he sees that thus it is, and that thus by human means it could not possibly have been. . . . So admirably has this sort of evidence been contrived by the wisdom of God, that, in proportion as the lapse of ages might seem to weaken the argument derived from miracles long since performed, that very lapse seems only to strengthen the argument derived from the completion of prophecy.—Bishop Horne.

The ancient Romans would not suffer the figure or the name of Mors to be cut on medals or seals; but they died, nevertheless, as die other men. One may shut his eyes when falling down a precipice, but, if he were stone-blind, it would not hinder his being dashed to pieces. Queen Elizabeth of England, imperious in rebellion at some pitiless and unflattering effects of light, commanded the artist to paint her portrait without shadows; he complied, but the picture appeared without features. Life must be painted with death beside it.—Charles S. Robinson.

When a man grows desperate for pleasure, that which ordinarily would be a weak temptation becomes to him very strong. In Esau, appetite was stronger than duty or honor. He thought lightly of his place in the family, and was in little real sympathy with his people; and this he did, what was not really of a moment, but of a habit of mind and a state of heart he had been cherishing for years. Men come by different and gradual stages to commit great crimes. Small sins open the way for the greater that are to follow. Let sin be resisted at the threshold, and thus the way is blocked up against the commission of great sins afterward.—C. D. W. Bridgeman.

THE LIVING PRESENT.

Friends, let no slight nor pleasant spring
That babbles up in life's dry sands,
And yet be careful what good thing
We touch with sacrilegious hands.

Your blessings should be sought—not claimed—
Cherished, not watched with jealous eye;
Love is too precious to be banned,
Make with a reverence sleep and bird.

In all that lives exists the power
To avenge the invasion of its right;
We cannot bruise and break our flower,
And have our flower cities and bright.

Let us think less of what appears—
More of what is; for this, behold I.
It is the evidence for which we
That makes us live, or makes us die.

Trust heaven [illegible] power to prove
As I know [illegible] we call they seem;
Not dark [illegible] some glorious,
And hope [illegible] ope, and dream and stream.

Some days must needs be full of pain,
Yet must we use them as we may;
Talk less about the years to come—
Live, love, and labor more to-day.

TO OBEY IS BETTER THAN SACRIFICE.

NEWELL BOND.

What has been written of late upon divorce, or a violation of the marriage contract, giving human law precedence over the positive law of Christ and his holy angels, meets with my full approbation. How men and women can, with the Bible before them, and their eyes open, expect to enter the kingdom of God, in violation of Christ's and St. Paul's positive teaching, is more than I can understand, human law to the contrary notwithstanding.

We will begin at the foundation, the evidence will appear as we progress. Scripture teaching is plain and conclusive, as to the manner of becoming a Christian there is but the one way taught in the New Testament—the gospel, the good news of the kingdom of God must be preached, heard and believed and obeyed. When this is done intelligently, being buried with Christ in baptism into death, like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, so shall we walk in newness of life before him.

The question, Whose are we, or to whom do we belong? by what law are we to be governed? There is but one answer, viz., To Christ. Yet how shamefully is his law, precept and example ignored; and human law and Gentile custom practiced in its stead!

Let us illustrate; how would it look for a foreigner to become an adopted citizen of the United States subscribe to the Constitution, take the oath of allegiance to be true to the U. S. Government, but instead of obeying our laws he should continue in the practice of the Hottentot, or some other heathen nation. This would be no more absurd or inconsistent than for the man or woman who is a baptized believer of the gospel, to put away his wife, or a woman her husband, and be married to another, save for the case of fornication. This is the plain and positive law of Christ; it cannot be set aside, and the one who does it cannot enter the kingdom of God.

Some will say this is censorious judging. Not a bit of it. Are we under the law of Moses or under the gospel? The law and teachings of Christ take precedence, and must be fully observed and lived out by every member of the body, or we endanger our eternal life. We cannot plead ignorance; the word is plain and clear. We have a keen live conscience; we cannot plead, The woman then gave: to be with me, she gave me and I did eat; or that you agreed to the transaction, therefore I am not amenable to the law of Christ; and it is also the Gentile practice. Lowering the standard of Divine truth is the fatal rock, or the prime moving cause of the apostasy from pure Bible truth as held and practiced by the Church of God in the early days of christianity, when men loved not their lives unto death; who would burn at the stake, or be thrown to wild beasts rather than give up an iota of God's precious saving truth. How changed now! A man, yea a minister, a believer of the precious truths we cherish and hold so dear, can put away his wife because they do not agree, likely the one to blame as much as the other, and then wash his hands, Pilate like, in innocency, and marry another. Yea and plead human law and Gentile practice. If this was the only evil that afflicted the Church of God, we would spread the mantle of charity over the imperfections of poor fallen humanity; but, alas, it is not. Did you hear that poor man say of a brother in the faith, after he had dug in the ditch up to his hips in mud and water, from early morn till sunset, he offered me fifty cents for my day's work, but finally gave me seventy-five cents, and then "jewed" me two and a-half cents in making change.

Do you wonder that infidelity prevails and the love of many waxes cold? We might add more, but forbear; yet how true the enigma of the wise man: Dead flies in the apothecary's ointment sendeth forth a stinking savor. So with a little folly to him that is in reputation for wisdom and honor. Do we wonder that truth is fallen in the streets and equity cannot enter? Do we wonder at Paul's solemn charge to his son Timothy, that some shall depart from the faith, etc. Do we doubt this to be a covetous age, a money loving age; in a word, do we doubt the literal fulfillment of Christ's own words in this our day, as it was in the days of Noah and Lot, so shall it be when the Son of Man is revealed. "Behold I come as a thief: blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.

THE GREAT MULTITUDE OUT OF ALL NATIONS.

CHARLES BOARDMAN.

After these things, I saw and behold a great multitude which no man could number out of every nation and of all tribes and people and tongues, stood before the throne and before the Lamb arrayed in white robes and palms in their hands. This great company do not sing as it were a new song. But they cry with a great voice, saying, Salvation unto our God and unto the Lamb, etc. The 144,000 were out of one nation. These are they which come out of the great tribulation. When the prophet says, O sing unto the Lord a new song, it will be done at the right time. When he says, Comfort ye, comfort ye my people; speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem; it will be done at the right time, in the darkest hour, when Jesus was dead on the cross, a rich man with a new tomb came to the front. He went boldly to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus. When Jesus rode into Jerusalem the people shouted and the children sang Hosanna in the highest. If these should hold their peace the very stones would cry out. What prophecy calls for will be done, and done in the right time. Glory to God in the highest for what he has done, for what he has promised to do for our lost race. Amen.

Editor Restitution:

This is my first attempt to write a piece for publication. I am the only one here of our faith; there are no brethren nearer than fifty miles, but THE RESTITUTION is a great help to me; I would rather read it than any paper I have ever read. I love to hear from my dear brethren and sisters.

I am a poor man with a large family, eleven in number, and it keeps me a digging to live, as I am the only one that can plow. My subscription was out September 1st, but the good word still comes to me. I do not want to be without THE RESTITUTION if I can possibly pay for it; but I am in debt so much now that I can not get out this year. The severe drouth in these parts will cause hard times with me this year.

I was baptized in 1873 by Bro. Levi Skeels, in Big Creek, Edgar county, Illinois, south-west of Paris. A few months afterwards I moved into this land where I now dwell. I have been trying to preach for seven years to the people in my weak way and stammering manner. Last winter I went to Frederiektown (fifty miles) to see the brethren, where I found them strong in the faith. I preached and exhorted as often as the weather would permit. I organized the brethren, eight in number; Bro. John Miller was appointed their elder. Since then they sent me credentials to preach the gospel of the kingdom of God.

Bro. Joshua Bailey, a good old brother, had THE RESTITUTION sent to me for six months, and it keeps coming; I do not know who is paying for it. I will pay for it myself if possible I do not want to be without it. If I had some small tracts to give to the people I think it would do good work, but I am not able to get them.

Well, brethren in Christ, since I have been reading these good papers I have abstained from the use of tobacco. I had chewed and smoked for twenty-three years. On the 4th of last March I took my last chew of the weed; I feel better now than when I used tobacco. Tobacco is a poison, and yet some men will use it, and pay their hard earnings for tobacco, when they know it brings them to an untimely grave. But thanks be to the Lord for his goodness and his grace; he has helped me to be clean. I am looking for the soon coming of the Lord; for he that will come, will come and not tarry. Brethren, let us all be ready, for he tells us to be ready. Let us keep our garments white, and let our heads lack no ointment. Let us keep ourselves pure; let us be like a city which is set upon a hill, so the world can always see us. We must let our light shine before men that the world may see our good works, and glorify our Father which is in heaven.

Will some kind brother tell me through THE RESTITUTION how to organize a church, as I have seen some quibbling as to how it should be done? I wish one of our preaching brethren could come here and help me; I think we could soon have a church built up here and it will not take much to convert some of those Disciples so-called as there are plenty of them here. I give them THE RESTITUTION to read when I am through with them.

May the Lord bless and save his people is my prayer.

Yours in hope.

JOHN REIDER.

Exegetical.

[illegible] will strike a blow on the dry ground, and the water will flow out of it, and the people will drink. And it will come to pass in that day, that a great trumpet will be blown, and the lost ones in the land of Assyria come, and the outcasts in the land of Egypt, and shall worship the Lord before Jehovah on the holy mountain in Jerusalem. Isa. xxvii. 12, 13.

I regard every exposition of verse 12 which supposes it to refer to the return of the captives as altogether false. The Euphrates and the brook of Egypt, i. e., the Wady-el-Arish were the northeastern and southwestern boundaries of the land of Israel, according to the original promise—Gen. xv. 18; 1 Kings viii. 65—and it is not stated that Jehovah will beat on the outside of these boundaries, but within them. Hence Gesenius is upon a more correct track, when he explains it as meaning that "the Kingdom will be peopled again in its greatest promised extent, and that as rapidly and numerously as if men had fallen like olives from the trees." No doubt the word Chabat is applied to the beating down of olives in Deut. xxiv. 20; but this figure is inapplicable here, as olives must already exist before they can be knocked down, whereas the land of Israel is to be thought of as desolate. What one expects is, that Jehovah will cause the dead to live within the whole broad expanse of the promised land according to the promise in chap. xxvi. 19, 21. And the figure answers this expectation most clearly and most gloriously.

Chabat was the word commonly applied to the knocking out of fruit with husks, which were too tender and valuable to be threshed. Such fruits, as the prophet himself affirms in chap. xxviii. 27, were knocked out carefully with a stick, and would have been injured by the violence of ordinary threshing. And the great field of the dead that stretched from the Euphrates to the Rhinocolura, resembled a floor covered over with such tender, costly fruit. There true Israelites and apostate Israelites lay mixed together. But Jehovah would separate them. He would institute a beating, so that the true members of the church would come to the light of day, being separated from the false like grains sifted from their husks. "Thy dead will live;" it is to this that the prophet returns. And this view is supported by the word Shibboleth, which combines in itself the meanings of flood—Psa. lxix. 3, 16—and "ear"—of corn. This word gives a fine dilogy—compare the dilogy in chap. xix. 18 and Hab. ii 2. From the "ear" of the Euphrates down to the peninsula of Sinai, Jehovah would knock—a great heap of ears, the grains of which were to be gathered together "one by one," i. e. singly—in the most careful manner possible; Greek, καθ' εἷς, κατ' ενα.

To this risen church there would be added the still living diaspora,—dispersion,—gathered together by the signal of God—compare chap. xvill. 3; lx. 13. Asshur and Egypt are named as lands of banishment. They represent all the lands of exile, as in chap. xix. 23-25—compare chap. xi. 11. The two names are emblematical, and therefore are to be used as proofs that the prophecy is within the range of Isaiah's horizon. Nor is there any necessity for this. It is just as certain that the cycle of prophecy in chap. xxiv.—xxvii. belongs to Isaiah, and not to any other prophet, as it is that there are not two men to be found in the world with faces exactly alike.—From Delitzsch on the Prophecies of Isaiah.

Having removed from Pennsylvania to Carthage, Mo., friends will correspond with me at that place. Shall be glad to fill any appointment where possible.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A POSITIVE RELIGION.

The church of the present day needs members of clear and settled religious opinions and decided convictions, and needs men in the pulpit who are not "halting between two opinions," "not tossed to and fro, and carried about by every wind of doctrine." There is a liberality in both pulpit and pews, which is really a lack of piety, a lack of interest in religion, a failure to perceive and feel that a true faith is the "one thing needful," and is often a base and cowardly surrender of vital truths for the sake of obtaining the favor of men who to justify themselves in ungodliness and sin, oppose and reject the essential doctrines of the Word of God.

AN ANNIVERSARY PEACE MEETING.

A rather singular and interesting meeting was held last Sunday evening in Dr. Collyer's church, on the anniversary of the death of Lucretia Mott, in the exercises of which the "Universal Peace Union," recently revived under the leadership of Miss Sarah E. Fuller, participated. Dr. Collyer made the opening address, and he was followed by Mr. Alfred E. Love, the president of the National Peace Association; Miss Fuller, the president of the Universal Peace Union, and a young lady who recited an original poem in honor of peace and Lucretia Mott. One would suppose that the peace and good-will that inspire all our Christmas poems, orations and celebrations would excite enthusiasm, but it does not. Men and women talk of peace and rest as something desirable, but it is always in the future. They never appear to find the conditions right for it in the present; and it is because the elements of warfare are not only all around them, but in their own hearts. It is when we are nearing the grave that we really desire peace. War, however, as a means of settling difficulties is a relic of barbarism, and ought to be condemned and discredited by the practical, scientific and industrial spirit of the nineteenth century. The idea of setting people to work to cut each other to pieces who never saw each other, and who often do not even know what they are fighting for, is an outrage upon common sense. It does not, and cannot, decide questions from the point of view of right, but only from that of force, which is the argument of brutes and savages.

A recent manifesto from Mr. O. B. Frothingham, in the Evening Post, has excited a good deal of comment among his former disciples or adherents, among whom the most diverse opinions are expressed as to what it means. Some say it means nothing—that it does not indicate any change in his opinions, others that it simply means that he has returned to the bosom of the orthodox church, and will be followed by a public alliance with the church from which he seceded. What he said did not amount to this. It was in effect an avowal of his own distrust of his own teachings, and an admission that the Church of the Savior was built upon more solid foundations than any he had been able to lay for himself. This yearning (for that is what it seems like) for a faith of some kind or other cannot surprise those who were acquainted with the extremely vague and misty character of Mr. Frothingham's speculations. Convictions he had none; but his strength lay in his broad views, his liberable culture and fine intellectual art and taste. Professor Adler has succeeded where Mr. Frothingham failed, because he has strong convictions and sets people to work to carry them out. Mr. Frothingham saw too much and doubted too much, and, therefore, could not do anything, and could not inspire others to do anything. He will find more happiness in devoting himself to literature.

BURDENED LIVES.

Rich men are not to be envied, for they are objects of malign influences from all the baser portion of mankind, and life is made a torture instead of a pleasure to them. Who would care to have had the enormous fortune of A. T. Stewart, the burden of which killed what overwork and the pressure of tremendous anxieties had left of him? Who would want to be Jay Gould, whose life is threatened by unsuccessful stock operators, and who carries his own fortunes and those of thousands of others on the click of the telephone and the story which figures tell on a bit of tape? Mr. Vanderbilt is treated in the same way to constant threats if he does not give a fortune to one or put another in the way of making one; and as for letters, each rich man and woman in New York, and every one who is supposed to be rich, could build a new paper Babel with them. There is a cause for misery and for what money will do. Newspapers foster and feed this craving by the current exaggerations in regard to persons and society, and weak headed and hard hearted individuals see no reason why they should not share in the good which is enjoyed by others, thoughtless of the ability to honestly earn it for themselves. At least one of the rich widows in New York City are kept as hard at work as if they had to earn their daily bread answering letters, looking into reported cases of need, and distributing their resources as far as they obtain possession of them. In both cases there are a number of relatives to be cared for and dependants who have in some way or other generally through having been helped before established a claim. If these persons could all be paid so much and got rid of, there would be some prospect of relief, but to give them a sum of money, no matter how large, would be of no use; it would be absorbed, appropriated, wasted, gotten rid of, and the regular pensions required as before. The only way, therefore, is to keep accounts, and dole out month by month, or quarter by quarter, the sum assigned to each one. There cannot be much satisfaction in this, of course, for no gratitude is felt or expressed on the other side. Each one considers that their share ought to be larger, and have no scruples in saying so or asking for extra advances on any occasion which demands extra expenditure. What habit of dependence destroys self-respect; but no claim, if preferred by a relative, no matter how unworthy, can be denied, for a howl in the newspapers or a venomous paragraph would spread more poison than the faithful record of a lifetime could neutralize.

Washington Post.

THE RECEPTION OF SIMON WOLF AT CAIRO.

NEW YORK, Nov. 22.—A correspondent of the Evening Post, writing from Cairo, Egypt, under date of October 28, gives the following interesting account of the reception of the Hon. Simon Wolf, of Washington, United States Consul-General to Egypt, by the Khedive:

Last Saturday I was present at a ceremony that recalled what many an Arab or Turk would call the good old days of infidel persecution. I refer to the Khedive's formal reception of Mr. Simon Wolf, the newly appointed Diplomatic Agent and Consul-General of the United States.

At the close of the thirteenth century the Mameluke Sultan Muhammed Melek el Nasser ibn Kelaoon, the then ruler of Egypt, decreed that any Christian or Jew who was seen riding a horse or mule, wearing a white turban, or bearing a scimitar or other weapon, might be lawfully plundered and killed; that Christians and Jews should ride neither horses nor mules, but only donkeys, and with their faces to the animal's tail. Jews were detested by the Moslems far more than the Christians, and were regarded as so unclean that their blood would defile the sword. For this reason they were never beheaded, but hanged.

The decree of Melek el Nasser was not repealed until the accession of Mehemet Ali in 1801, who added force to its revocation by instituting the custom of presenting a handsomely caparisoned Arab stallion and a Damascus scimitar to every duly accredited diplomatic representative of a Christian power. As the trappings of the steed were often studded with precious stones, the American Government forbade its representatives to accept such costly gifts, with the exception of the scimitar, which was supposed to symbolize sufficiently the emancipation of Christians. All the representatives of other powers accept the horse and trappings also, and the ceremony of presentation is still rigidly observed, and takes place in the presence of the Khedive and full court in gala array. Last Saturday there was special significance attached to the ceremony, from the fact that the present Consul-General of the United States, Mr. Simon Wolf, is the first diplomatic envoy in Egypt who has happened to be of the Jewish religion since the days of the Pharaohs—since perhaps Moses, who was certainly a duly accredited agent to the court of King Menophtah of the XIX. Dynasty, who reigned, according to Brugsch, 1300 years before Christ.

In the action of the United States Government in confiding the Egyptian mission to a prominent American citizen of the Jewish religion has called forth the warmest approbation from one and all, including the Khedive, who thus sees and appreciates an example of religious liberty, and who, as his Highness himself stated in a recent conversation, now makes the United States his model in matters of conscience and toleration. The following is a translation of the address delivered by the Khedive upon the occasion of Mr. Wolf's reception, at the close of which a salute of twenty-one guns were fired from the Citadel:

"I attach all the more consideration to the signature on your letters of credence, inasmuch as it is that of an eminent man who fell a victim to a deplorable attempt at the very time when he was giving the most manifest proofs of an ardent devotion to his country. I can appreciate your feelings in recording this painful event, which has caused great emotion throughout the world—an emotion in which my country has joined, united as it is to yours in the bonds of a long and sincere friendship. It is, therefore, with true sympathy that I reply to your words, as well as to the good wishes you have been good enough to express in the name of the United States, and it will be with zeal that I will second your efforts to develop, under the presidency of the new President of the Republic, the cordial relations established between Egypt and the great American nation, which, young as it may be, has, some time ago, taken its place in the first rank of the most advanced in the paths of progress and civilization.

OBITUARY.

DIED—At Chicago, Ill., Nov. 19, 1881, Ethel May St. Clair, only daughter of William D. and Elizabeth St. Clair, aged three years and six months.

"Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Psa. xxx. 5.

About fifty people attended the services at their residence—421 W. Washington St.—on Sunday afternoon. Bro. Thos. Wilson preached the discourse, based mainly on Rom. v. 18, 19, showing that the remedy provided in Christ, was even greater than the curse.

Lift up those eyes my darling child and smile one more on me;
Oh, my beautiful, thy kissing eye I still would see;
Upon thy lovely face I still do weep the bitter, bitter tear;
O, come, dear May, and let thy thrilling voice my senses cheer.

Yes, papa and mamma, mine eye and smile then yet shall see.
For I "shall come again from the land of the enemy."
"Refrain (thou) thy voice from weeping and thine eyes from tears."
For Jesus, the "resurrection and the life," even now appears.

WM. H. WILSON.

DIED—Near Highland Station, Kan., Nov. 2, 1881, of diphtheria, Dallas, son of William and Emma Smith, aged three years.

Thus the dreadful enemy has laid claim on one more little darling. Comforting words were spoken by Brother Lott Clover. He showed clearly that though our little ones are torn from us by the fall of Adam, they will be restored to us again by the return of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. When we gazed upon that lovely and sweet face, and heard the sad sobs of dear father and mother, we thought what a blessed hope to know that the trumpet will soon sound, and our dear dead ones will be raised to glory and immortality.

Yes, he sleeps, but not forever,
There will be a glorious dawn;
He'll be raised to live forever,
On the Resurrection Morn.

M. V.

DIED—At her home in Marmont, Marshall Co., Ind., after a long and painful illness, of Consumption, Dorcas L., wife of Robert Barnhill and daughter of Samuel and Ann Medburn, aged 29 years.

"Asleep in Jesus, O how sweet,
To be for such a slumber meet!
In holy confidence to rest,
In hope of being ever blessed."

The GOSPEL of the KINGDOM

advocated in a series of Ten Discourses

—BY WILEY JONES.—

OPINIONS OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy in most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for cost and perusal in the important information that it will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 24, 1879.

"It reflects a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scripture, and uniform courtesy toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York, Nov. 29, 1881.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested merely, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are second to none in importance to us. * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and convincing way, should buy this book."—The Israel Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 17, 1879.

"I have read it diligently again and again, * * It is next in point of excellence and doctrinal truths to the Book of books."—P. M. L., Mo.

"I do not know that I have ever seen from the pen of any modern writer, a plainer exhibit of the gospel of the kingdom and at the same time one better suited to general instruction on that subject, than that which brother Jones gives us in his book, "The Gospel of the Kingdom, advocated in a series of Ten Discourses."—E. K. H., Va.

It is elegantly bound in cloth, and printed in clear type on good paper, 278 pages. To obtain this book send $1.00 to Poetry.

GETHSEMANE.

ELLA WHEELER.

In golden youth, when seems the earth
A summer land for singing mirth,
When souls are glad and hearts are light,
And not a shadow lurks in sight,
We do not know it, but there lies
Somewhere veiled under evening skies,
A garden all must sometime see,
Gethsemane, Gethsemane,
Somewhere for our Gethsemane.

With joyous steps we go our ways,
Love lends a halo to the days,
Light sorrows call like clouds, afar,
We laugh and say how strong we are.
We hurry on, and hurrying, go
Close to the border land of woe
That waits for you and waits for me;
Gethsemane, Gethsemane,
Forever waits Gethsemane.

Down shadowed lanes, across strange streams
Bridged over by our broken dreams,
Behind the misty cape of years,
Close to the great salt fount of tears,
The garden lies; arise as you may
You cannot miss it in your way
All paths that have been or shall be,
Pass somewhere through Gethsemane!

All there who journey, soon or late
Must pass within the garden's gate;
Must kneel alone in darkness there
And battle with some fierce despair,
God pity those who cannot say—
"Not mine, but thine," who only pray,
"Let this cup pass," and cannot rise
The purpose in Gethsemane.
Gethsemane, Gethsemane,
God help us through Gethsemane.

THE AMERICAN VERSION.

O. R. L. CROZIER.

I have not felt very enthusiastic over the Anglo-American Revision. As a version it is greatly superior to the King James; and I gratefully acknowledge the careful and arduous labors of the revisers. It is unfortunate that their freedom, and, perhaps, their fidelity, were restrained by the Canterbury rules, printed in their Preface. It was unworthy to require them to defer the version of 1611, the very thing they were to correct; better have made the translation of William Tyndale the criterion, as it was confessedly the basis of the King James and all other versions of that period, but infinitely better still to have required them to make the best translation possible with all the helps of the present time.

The English revisers were two to one of the American; so they ruled out the too faithful thinking of American Christian scholarship, but consented to put their rejected suggestions in an appendix to the Anglo-American Version.

The American version is the same as the Anglo-American except that the American preferences are incorporated into the text and the purely English are put in the appendix. The American Preface by the editor, Roswell D. Hitchcock, of Union Theological Seminary, New York, should be carefully read. Its golden thought is: "The most faithful renderings will finally be pronounced the best."

So we have the Anglican Revised New Testament, published in 1880, and the American, published in 1881; the former, however, not as the English alone would have made it, nor the latter as the Americans alone would have made—both are spoiled by compromise; and Mr. Hitchcock says, "Probably this revision will not be accepted just as it is, in either form," and seems to hint that a still more faithful revision is contemplated, so that, to use his words, "we who speak the noblest of living languages may soon have the Book of books in a form very nearly perfect."

May be that "perfect will be long delayed, and when it comes will yet be imperfect. Mr. Hitchcock says: "No book was ever translated perfectly;" and, "The very Word of God, from which there is no appeal, is in Hebrew and Greek."

Translations are of the nature of commentaries: they are opinions expressed in one language of what was said in another. The Hebrew and Greek becoming dead languages soon after the Divine word was spoken in them, the expression of truth is fixed in those languages, an unvarying standard of appeal.

The discussions of the last fifty years bear some fruit in the Anglican Revision, and more in the American. Public religious opinion has compelled and tolerates a more faithful expression of the Word of the Lord.

THE CERTAINTY OF FAITH.

S. ROXANA WING.

The faith of the Bible is not an ideal faith. It grasps substance. "It is the evidence of things not seen." It lays hold of the immutable promise of God: the promise that was confirmed by an oath. It does not say, "I do not care where the place is that God has prepared for me: be it Jupiter or Saturn or Mars, Jesus, when he comes, will take me there," but it lays hold of the hope set before it, making of it an anchor that is sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the vail. Abraham was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance. That land was promised to him and to his seed for an everlasting possession, and the faithful and obedient ones grasp it by hope because of the word—"If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to promise."

An ideal faith may rest upon an ideal land, but the faith of God's children is in a country that their fathers have seen, that their feet have pressed and the Savior redeemed.

In the regeneris of earth, they expect to be kings and priests unto God, and to reign over the nations with Christ.

When the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of their Lord, they have full assurance of sharing in his glory.

When the tares are gathered out of the world, they as the children of the kingdom, are to shine as the sun in that same world out of which the children of the wicked one have been gathered. It is out of his kingdom at the time of the harvest that the offending things are taken.

The whole creation groans now, but it will cease to groan by and by. The curse is now upon the earth, but the time is coming when it shall be no more. Then the earth shall yield her increase and God, even our God, shall bless us.

"The nations shall be glad and sing for joy, for the Lord shall judge the people righteously and govern the nations upon the earth."

COLLATED SCRIPTURE.

T. FINN.

Speak thou the things which become sound doctrine. In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works: in doctrine shewing incorruptness, gravity, sincerity. Sound speech, that cannot be condemned. For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, and righteously, and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ: who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. Set your affections on things above, and not on things on the earth. For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory. Mortify, therefore, your members which are on the earth, fornication, uncleanness, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry; for which things the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience. Let your speech be always with grace, that ye may know how you ought to answer every man. Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another; if any have a complaint against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye. And let the peace of God rule in your hearts. Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly, in all wisdom, teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord. And whatsoever ye do, in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father by him. Let nothing be done through strife or vain glory, but in lowliness of mind; let each esteem others better than themselves. Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus. Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to edify profitably, that it may minister grace to the hearers. If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him; but let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it until he receives the early and latter rain. Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned; behold the Judge standeth before the door.

HEALDSBURG, Cal.

Editor Restitution:

I feel disposed to write a few lines for you to dispose of as to you seems best. The report of our Conference at Woodland, Cal., made by the Secretary, Bro. A. E. Hiddleson, has been published; and in addition I wish to say, the meetings were very well attended by the residents of the town and vicinity, as also by brethren and sisters of Yolo county. From what I could learn, much of the prejudice heretofore existing is that violently against us is gone; and many who attended our meetings for the first time were anxious to hear more. One of the papers of Woodland gave a voluntary notice of the meeting, telling its readers we were a "peculiar people having a peculiar creed," etc. In one discourse I endeavored to show that Christians are required "to be a peculiar people, zealous of good works," and that the Bible—our creed, is a peculiar book. Five ministers came to hear what strange things we believe. One old church member said we had no right to come to their town to preach our views, as the members of the several churches were satisfied with the preaching of their ministers, and had no desire to hear any thing new.

During the Conference, by request I went to Sacramento City and baptized two believers in the things of the kingdom and the name of Jesus Christ. I trust the influence from that meeting will be found in behalf of the truth. I have recently been in Lake county, about fifty miles north of here. Preached some in Kelseyville to fair audiences. Some said, "These things are reasonable, and are proven true by the Bible; but what difference does it make if we do not believe just as the Bible says?" And they go away to follow their own inclinations. Many cannot be led to see that to be a disciple of Christ they must not only believe the record God has given of his Son, but they must obey from the heart the form of doctrine delivered unto them, therein; that they must reduce the precepts to practice in their daily lives. A hall was engaged for me to speak in at Lakeport; and when the time came the audience did not; or at least but a very small one. The news had gone there that I was preaching such strange things, and their actions proved they were determined they would not hear. I made one more appointment, and by request preached upon the Sabbath question—When, to whom, and why given; also, that it is out by statute of limitation. This subject brought out a fair congregation, who gave good attention.

This closed my efforts in that place. I do not believe that very much can be accomplished where people have no disposition to hear or investigate for themselves.

While men and women are willing to allow others to read and understand for them, and only move at the bidding of their teachers, I do not know how to reach them. In some places the members are getting ahead of their preachers—by staying at home—claiming they are tired of hearing the old story of going to heaven and hell when you die—and then comes the contribution box, to gather money for the preacher, and to send to enlighten the heathen in foreign lands. Some have reached the conclusion that it will be better to enlighten the people of our own country first—then look after the welfare of others. I think covetousness is exhibited in many instances so clearly that there need be no guessing at it.

Very many love to go into popular churches, and gain notoriety with the aristocracy. I have been told that we ought to build a fine house—have a good choir, organ, etc., then we could get good audiences, and good pay. That may all do very well for the present to eulogize people, and be careful to not say anything about little immoral practices and tell them they can do as they please through the week, if they will put on a long face on Sunday—and contribute freely to the cause, they will come out all right. I desire it distinctly understood that I do not want any money for that kind of work. And if people will not hear me because I speak or write of things which Christ and his apostles have said Christians must not do, that is their privilege now. I think we ought to labor now in the manner directed and trust to him who has promised for the reward to be given at the resurrection of the just. I believe this will pay better in the end, than to get all the pay now—and that in dollars and cents.

If we are persecuted for adhering to the teachings of the word, and do not shun to declare the whole counsel of God—and live under the directions given in sincerity, we need have no fears as to the final result.

I am resolved to live with reference to the recompense of reward, whatever the consequences may be for doing so now.

As ever in hope.

Call Home the Children.

HELENA M. HUNT.

The world's long night is closing fast
In dark woe, doubt and sin.
Dear Father, o'er the day be past
Call all the children in!
So long they left their shelter here
To wander far and wide,
Have they found friends on life's rough road,
Friends true, and brave, and tried?

Have they found help in hours of need
Have they found rest from care?
Or have they vainly sighed for home
And longed for shelter there?
O God! Thou knowest—and our hearts
On thee can rest secure.
No earthly love is like thy love,
No earthly friend so sure.

We leave the children in thine arms
Two by two to bless,
O help them, guide them by thy power
Through life's dark wilderness.
The world's dark night is closing fast.
Soon will the day-dawn come:
Father, bring every wanderer back
Call all the children home.

WHAT WE OWE TO POOR CHILDREN.

The world owes some of its richest treasures to those who were deemed unfortunate in youth, and who looked to others at that unsheltered period for pity, protection and help. Our country was discovered by Columbus. He was a hard-worked boy, and often knew the need of sufficient food. We owe our freedom of religion, which has made our institutions what they are, to Luther. The reformer once sung ballads in the street to procure the means of an education. Our advances in science started with Franklin; yet the inventor ate his penny roll in the city of Philadelphia when a lad, and knew what it was to feel all alone in the world. We owe the beginning of our cotton mills to Sir Richard Arkwright. He was the youngest of a poor family of thirteen children, and his father was a barber. The curse of slavery was removed from our land by the pen-stroke of Abraham Lincoln. He ate the bread of hardship in childhood, and went as poorly clad as the humblest child in the streets of any country village to-day. President Garfield was once a poor, hard-working boy. The great missionary of the century is Dr. Livingstone. He learned Latin from a book on his loom while at work, and he once said proudly on completing his education, "I never had a dollar that I did not earn." Professor Heyne, one of the greatest scholars that Germany or the world ever produced, was a penniless child. "Want," said he, "was the companion of my childhood. I well remember my mother's distress when without food for her children I have seen her on a Saturday evening, weeping and wringing her hands as she returned home, having been unable to sell the goods that my father had made." A kind family helped him in his distress at school, and in so doing honored themselves and their country in a way of which they did not dream. Some forty years ago, there lived in one of the country towns of New York a slender little factory girl. She speaks of her early recollections of "noise and filth, bleeding hands, sore feet, and a very sad heart." She says, "I used often to rise at two o'clock in the morning, and do the washing for the family." She found friends. That girl was Emily Chubbuck Judson.

He who protects, assists, educates friendless children, makes the best contribution to the future that human resource can find. He builds himself a monument, not in marble, but in influence. Lips will call him blessed when the moss is filling the letters of his cenotaph. He lives for ends that do not terminate in himself.—Hezekiah Butterworth, in Childhood's Appeal.

A TIMELY LESSON.

FANNIE L. FANCHER.

A little ragged woeful-looking child came in one morn at our back door, begging for food.

"Please, ma'm, me 'nd the childera' a-starvin',—only a piece of bread," said he.

"Have you no father or mother, child?" asked I.

"Yes'm," and a look of shame mantled his hollow cheeks.

"Don't they work and earn money?"

"Yes'm,—little,—but they most allus spends it 'fore they gets home, at the 'Horn of Plenty,' on the corner."

Immediately my heart became adamant. The miserable drunken brutes: I'll not feed their children. Upon second thought, I remembered there was a very stale loaf of bread in the cupboard—scarcely fit for toast. I hastily rolled it up in a newspaper and gave it to him, very glad to get rid of it. He grabbed it eagerly, with a clutch that reminded one of the grasp of the drowning when they would fain save themselves.

Little Nellie, our seven-year-old darling, had been a silent spectator, but after the boy went away, she came up to me with inquiry depicted upon her spiritual countenance, saying:

"Mamma, if Jesus Christ had come, and said he was starving to death, would you have given him that awful dry loaf of bread?"

"Why, child," said I, "why do you ask such a question?"

"Why, when we give to the poor ought we not to imagine we are really giving to Jesus himself? Did he not say so when here upon earth? When papa gives me money for caramels or candy, I'd rather give it to Him, or the poor, barefooted children on the street, which I thought was just the same thing. Ain't I right, mamma?"

"Yes, Nellie," answered I, kissing her sweet, perplexed face; "I'll remember your lesson next time. Yes, indeed, Nellie, we whom the Lord hath blessed in our store would soon relieve suffering humanity if we gave our alms as if really giving to the blessed Redeemer."

"Nothing we have is too good for him.—Isn't, mamma?" said she, thoughtfully, as if thinking of that very dry loaf of bread.

"No, my precious child," replied I, clasping her to my heart, and thinking, "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings has thou ordained strength."

Now that a hard winter is near at hand, and there are so many suffering all about us, let us one and all remember Nellie's timely lesson, giving our alms as if to him who said:

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Children's Laughter.

There are no sounds so sweet to a mother's ear, except, perhaps the first lisping of an infant's prayer. Children's laughter! How dull is the home wherein its music once so joyfully echoed, but now is heard no more. How still is the house where the little ones are all fast asleep, their pattering feet are silent. How easily the fun of a child bubbles forth. Take even those poor, prematurely aged little ones, bred in the gutter, cramped in unearthly homes, and ill-used it may be, by drunken parents, and you will find that the child nature is not crushed entirely out. They are children still, although they look so haggard and wan. Try to excite their mirthfulness, and are long a laugh rings out so wild and free as if there was no such thing as sorrow in the world. Let the little ones laugh, then; too soon, alas! they will find cause enough to weep. Do not try to silence them, but let their gleefulness ring out in gladsome appeal, reminding us of the days when we, too, could laugh without a sigh.

Dear Children:

Do you want me to write to you again?

I hope you have all been trying to be very good since last I addressed you. If you have, how happy you must be; how happy you have made your parents and friends; and most and best of all, how pleasing you have been in God's sight, and in the eyes of our dear loving Savior who when he was here on earth took little children in his arms and blessed them. He is the same loving Jesus to-day that he was more than eighteen hundred years ago.

Do you not love to think that he is soon coming back to earth again?

Yes, he surely is. This is the very happiest thought I have, that he is coming, and coming soon.

He will not come this time as he did at first. Then he came as a "Man of sorrows." When he comes again, it will be as a great and glorious King, to reign in truth and righteousness over the whole earth.

The Bible tells us that to them that look for him he will appear without sin, unto salvation. This means that he will save and bless eternally those who are looking for him. Surely you would all like to live forever on this earth, when all sin will be taken away and it will be as beautiful as the Garden of Eden, where our first parents were. Do not say you are too young. If you are not too young to understand what your parents and teachers tell you to do, you are not too young to do what the Lord Jesus tells you to do. If your papa should tell you that he was going away off to some far away country, where he would receive title and legal deeds to large, fine estates, and that he would surely come back again, and share with you his fine property, if when he came back he found you doing right, would you not wish to know what he thought would be doing right?

Of course you would want to know just exactly what he meant, or what he wanted you to do.

If any of your friends told you that your papa had left a book with all directions for you, telling you how you must think and feel and do, so that you might please him, would you not want to get hold of that book?

Yes, I am sure you would. You would be willing to sell your prettiest toy, whether it be a hand-sled or a doll, and buy one of those books, if they could be bought, so as to know all of what papa wanted you to do in order that he might think you worthy to have a part of his fine estates. I think you can understand this. Then let me tell you that this is just what our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ has done. He has gone away to heaven, to his Father God. His disciples saw him go up from the Mount of Olives, and the angels told them that he would come again just as they saw him go away, and that was in his glorified, immortal body, which God raised from the tomb.

For forty days after Jesus was raised from the dead, he was with his disciples, teaching them about his everlasting kingdom which he was coming back to establish on this earth. Now these disciples have written down the words which Jesus taught them, and these are found in the New Testament (the Old Testament gives the history of the creation, the deluge, the calling out of the the nations of the earth, God's chosen people, etc., and many prophecies of Christ's first and second coming). In the New Testament you will find it is told us, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." And again when one of these disciples is preaching to a great multitude of people and they become anxious to know what they should do to be saved, or have a part in Christ's kingdom, he tells them to "repent and be baptized for the remission of their sins." And when Christ was sending out his disciples to preach the gospel, he said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved."

Now, dear children, you cannot believe a thing of which you know nothing.

First, then, you must know.

Second, you must believe; and then you must obey.

Not only must we obey him by believing in his gospel and being buried with him in baptism, but we must think of him and love him every day, and measure our lives by the "golden rule" which he left us; that is, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them."

I want to say much more, but fear I might weary you. If my life and health are spared I will write to you again.

Yours in the faith of the gospel.

A new law with regard to the cemeteries in France, which was passed by the Senate after encountering serious opposition, is about to be put in force by the French Government. Hitherto, as is well known, French cemeteries have been divided into as many sections as there were religious communities in the surrounding district, so that persons of different religious belief should not be buried together. By the new law this distinction is abolished, and the available ground in each case will be open to all alike, irrespective of religious creed.

Cholera, which now prevails in Egypt, and which the authorities are endeavoring to check by enforcing strict quarantine restrictions, can only be adequately met by insisting upon rules of health which are always violated by the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. The water from the holiest well, for example, has been tested and proved to be the vilest sort of sewage; and yet this deadly stuff is carefully taken by the pilgrims and used in cases of sickness where the constitution is too enfeebled to resist disease-breeding germs.

At the late Archæological Congress, held at Tiflis, Professor Samokvasoff gave an account of his discoveries in the graves near Pyatigorsk. He excavated about 100 places of interest belonging to the stone, bronze and iron periods. In the larger graves bronze implements were found with stone ones. As there were in these graves, besides the bones of sheep, several split human bones not belonging to skeletons, he inferred that during the bronze period the people in that part of the Caucasus were man-eaters.

MORE EARTHQUAKES.

Capt. Mallett, of the bark Cherokee, of Liverpool, which arrived here on Saturday, Nov. 12, had an unusually interesting story to tell. Besides encountering severe gales in his voyage, he says, he and his crew felt the effect of an earthquake at sea. At about 8 o'clock in the afternoon on Aug. 6, when they were nearly in the middle of the Atlantic, and about in the latitude of the northern part of Newfoundland, two severe shocks made the bark tremble from stem to stern. The shocks were between five and ten seconds apart. Capt. Mallett says that in his long experience as a seaman this is the first time he has ever felt an earthquake shock at sea, but he has been informed that such shocks have been felt by vessels in the South Atlantic near the equator. Dispatches from Chios say that the earthquake shocks in that island have been renewed within a few days, and that one village seems to be sinking. The inhabitants are deserting their houses in alarm.

SIX HUNDRED VICTIMS OF WHISKY.

The Corwin landed on St. Lawrence Island, having orders to investigate the wholesale starvation of the natives. At the first village at which they landed all were dead; so, also, at the second, where fifty-four dead bodies were counted, nearly all full-grown males. At another place one hundred and fifty persons—men, women, and children—were dead. At the next settlement twelve dead bodies were found and at the following thirty were found. All the inhabitants on the north side of the island, where whisky traders sold liquor, are dead—not one escaping. The general starvation occurred two years ago last winter. Since then the presence of the Corwin in the Arctic has broken up this inhuman whisky trading. The empty whisky kegs were seen strewn all about. The total number of dead bodies found on St. Lawrence Island was over six hundred. The survivors say that white traders from Honolulu sold whisky which the natives bought and got drunk, remaining so during the season for laying in their winter supply of walrus and seal. Photographs of these groups of dead bodies, as they yet lie about, frozen stiff, were taken.

SIGNIFICANT.

About three hundred years ago, a body of Romish priests made a great fire in Earl streas, London, and burned every Bible that could be found, and then congratulated themselves that at last the Bible was destroyed. To-day, on the very spot where this fire was built, stands the great building of the British and Foreign Bible Society, where the Bible is printed in one hundred and seventy different languages; and it may also be said that an additional copy comes from the press at every tick of the clock.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1882.

The Sun for 1882 will make its fifteenth annual revolution under the present management, shining, as always, for all, big and little, mean and gracious, contented and unhappy, Republican and Democratic, depraved and virtuous, intelligent and obtuse. The Sun's light is for mankind and womankind of every sort; but its genial warmth is for the good, while it pours hot discomfort on the blistering backs of the persistently wicked.

The Sun of 1882 was a newspaper of a new kind. It discarded many of the forms, and a multitude of the superfluous words and phrases of ancient journalism. It undertook to report in a fresh, succinct, unconventional way all the news of the world, omitting no event of human interest, and commenting upon affairs with the fearlessness of Absolute Independence. The success of this experiment was the success of the Sun. It effected a permanent change in the style of American newspapers. Every important journal established in this country in the dozen years past has been modelled after the Sun. Every important journal already existing has been modified and bettered by the force of the Sun's example.

The Sun of 1882 will be the same outspoken, truth-telling, and interesting newspaper.

By a liberal use of the means which an abundant prosperity affords, we shall make it better than ever before.

We shall print all the news, putting it into readable shape, and measuring its importance, not by the traditional yardstick, but by its real interest to the people. Distance from Printing House Square is not the first consideration with the Sun. Whenever anything happens worth reporting, we get the particulars, whether it happens in Brooklyn or in Bokhara.

In politics we have decided opinions, and express them in language that can be understood. We say what we think about men and events. That habit is the only secret of the Sun's political course.

The Weekly Sun gathers into eight pages the best matter of the seven daily issues. An Agricultural Department of unequalled merit, full market reports, and a liberal proportion of literary, scientific, and domestic intelligence complete the Weekly Sun, and make it the best newspaper for the farmer's household that was ever printed.

Who does not know and read and like the Sunday Sun, each number of which is a Cyclopedia of interesting literature, with the best poetry of the day, prose every line worth reading, news, humor—matter enough to fill a good-sized book, and infinitely more varied and entertaining than any book, big or little?

If our idea of what a newspaper should be pleases you, send for the Sun.

Our terms are as follows:

For the daily Sun, a four-page sheet of twenty-eight columns, the price by mail, post paid, is 55 cents a month, or $6.50 a year; or including the Sunday paper, an eight page sheet of fifty-six columns, the price is 65 cents a month, or $7.70 a year, post paid.

The Sunday edition of the Sun is also furnished separately at $1.20 a year post paid.

The price of the Weekly Sun, eight pages, fifty-six columns, is $1 a year post paid. For clubs of ten sending $10 we will send an extra copy free.

VOL. XXX. PLYMOUTH, INDIANA, DECEMBER 14, 1881. NO. 46.

THE RESTITUTION.

TERMS—TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR, Payable in advance. Three and Six Months at the same rate.

Address all Letters and Communications to THE RESTITUTION, Plymouth, Indiana.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:

THE RESTITUTION advocates the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." As a means to this end, the establishment of the Kingdom of God on the earth, with the Christ as King of kings, and the immortal saints as joint heirs with him in the government of the nations; the restoration of Israel; the literal resurrection of the dead; the immortalization of the righteous, and the final destruction of the wicked; eternal life only through Christ, and many other kindred truths. Also a hearty belief in the gospel, repentance, and immersion as prerequisites to the forgiveness of sins, and a holy life necessary for final salvation.

SOME OF THE SIGNS OF THE LAST TIMES.

DIONYSIUS.

THE DAYS OF NOAH.

Two of the evangelists record a prophecy of our Lord and Master himself, that one of the great signs of the "end of the days" would be a return of the times of Noah. Matt. xxiv. 37, 39; Luke xvii. 26, 27.

Have we then any existing evidence of the fulfillment of this prophecy in our own day? Are the times of Noah being repeated in this end of the nineteenth century?

The question is startling from its directness, and the answer to be given will be equally startling for its exactness. As will be seen at a glance, and while institute the comparison, the days of Noah were like the days in which we live; and can it therefore be ...sumption for those who recognize ...alize the analogy, to regard our ...as the last times and the very ...f the coming of the Son of ...

...gisteristic of the times ...lence of a prac... theism; and ... to that ... Eli... ...de... ...ia ... law ... Shalom... ...human soci... ...given laws for the ...reservation of soci... ...and that man cannot sup... ...efficiency. Only one last and ...rary expedient then remains— ...application of force. This is ex...ly what was tried in the days of Noah. Religion then set aside, and with it the divine restraints: men fell back on their own will. That will, not being unanimous, but quite the contrary, conflicting and diverse, men soon took to violating one another's liberty. The earth was filled with violence, not only physical violence, although that would follow, but moral violence; man in his thoughts and deeds working mischief to his fellow man, and bringing on the necessary retaliation, until the world was itself in a state of shipwreck and ruin.

The aspect of things in the British House of Commons is but an illustration of what is in front of us as a necessary result of our virtual atheism. The weak, to save themselves from the mere imposition of the will of the stronger, resort to the privileges of the House to defend themselves. The Nihilist who cannot hope to cope with a regiment of dragoons, resorts to the aid of dynamite, wherewith to defend what he calls his liberty. With no common standard of right and wrong to which authorities can appeal, what else remains but violence, and as a consequence of violence, the same results as happened in the days of Noah—a mighty shipwreck?

But our times resemble the times of Noah in one other respect, that is, in the utter indifference to all signs and to all warnings. A surprise is again in store for the worldly and the wicked, who despise the long-suffering of God, and who discern not the signs of the times, for "the day of the Lord will come as a thief." 2 Peter iii. 10.

MYSTIC DATES AND NUMBERS.

There are several dates and periods mentioned in the prophetic Scriptures. That they are in a sense mystic, and so in keeping with the rest of the hieroglyphical writings of which they form a part, admits of no doubt; but they must have been inserted for the purpose of being understood at least by some persons, at some period. Many conjectures have indeed been hazarded from time to time as to the proper application of these mystic figures; but beyond the establishment of what is termed the "year for a day," or year-day principle of interpretation, no further progress in their reasonable decipherment had been made until quite lately. One of the first mystic periods is mentioned in Dan. vii 25, viz. "a time and times, and the dividing of time," which is equivalent to three and a half days, each of 360 days: or 1260 days, that is, "year-days." A second mystic period is given in Dan. viii. 14, viz., "two thousand and three hundred days." In the last chapter of Daniel two other periods occur in the 11th and 12th verses, as 1290 days and 1335 days.

Some of these dates are repeated in the Apocalypse of St. John, as in chap. xi., "a thousand two hundred and three score days" (1260) verse 6; "a time and times and half a time" (verse 14); chap. xiii., "forty and two months," the equivalent of 1260 days, taking 30 days to each month. Verse 5.

All these dates seem to be consistently compounded of solar months, each of 30 days, and years of 12 such months. Thus 42 months multiplied by 30 equals 1260; one time added to two times added to half a time or year, equals 42 months. Such was the real ...mit of our knowledge until the discovery of M. de Cheseaux, a Swiss, who, in dealing with these apocalyptic ...ates, found them to be actual astronomical periods or cycles. These ...d cycles, M. de Cheseaux has ...elf defined as "periods which bring ...harmony different celestial revolu... ...ontaining a definite number of ...ch without remainder or fraction."

He furnishes an illustration of some interest: "315 years, a soli-lunar cycle, a quarter of 1260 years; i. e., after 205 days six hours, sun and moon ...e into conjunction, and in 406,205 ...ys 7 hours 28 minutes the sun has returned to its exact point on the ecliptic, a period of 1260 years, within an hour or two—from 2300 years (Dan. viii. 14), a cyclical period, deduct 1260 years, which leaves 1040, a cycle at once solar-lunar and diurnal, or terrestrial, of the most perfect accuracy."

I can only, by means of a few hypothetical or suggestive examples show the probable intention of their employment; that is, to mark the duration of historic periods or cycles during which certain orders of ideas work out to a conclusion their good or evil effects.

"The schools of heathen philosophy were closed by the edict of the Emperor Justinian, A. D. 529."—Professor Jebb.

This period, plus 1260 years, brings us to 1789, the date when the French revolution did, in effect, reopen the schools of Greco-Pagan teaching. Justinian constituted the Pope of Rome head of the churches A. D. 533, which, plus 1260 years, brings us to 1793, a year of vast significance in revolutionary annals, "the Reign of Terror." In 622 the Koran was published, and the Solave tribe penetrated into Russia and Poland, both memorable events affecting the history of the Roman empire and the Christian church; adding to this date 1260, brings us to 1882, and confessedly both the Solave and Mahometan peoples are hastening to a crisis of no little magnitude.

I will now conclude my necessarily brief collection of outside witnessing by quoting two paragraphs—one from a foreign, and the other from an English journal. The former is from an article in Le Temoignage, a Lutheran organ, and runs:

"Evidently a total separation of tendencies is at hand. Never was the Antichristian mind so deeply cunning, so decided, and so systematic as to-day. It is manifest that we are advancing toward a time when the so-called Christian world will separate into two camps, the Christian and Antichristian."

The following paragraph is furnished by a leading article in the Times of the 25th of December, 1875:

"The jealousies and divergences of two continents, indeed of all the world, the accumulated chickadee of two thousand years—all are seen in imminent collision as they never were seen before. There never was a time when the cup of iniquities was full to be fuller, or the cup of wrath so ready to be poured out."

All Things Beautiful.

JOHN KEBLE.

All things bright and beautiful,
All creatures great and small,
All things wise and wonderful,
The Lord God made them all.

Each little flower that opens,
Each little bird that sings—
He made their glowing colors,
He made their tiny wings.

The purple-headed mountain,
The river running by,
The morning, and the sunset,
That lighteth up the sky.

The tall trees in the greenwood,
The pleasant summer sun,
The ripened fruits in the garden,
He made them one by one.

He gave us eyes to see them,
And lips that we might tell,
How great is God Almighty,
Who hath made all things well.

The Pet Lamb.

Far away in India, a bad man once wanted a fine sheep which belonged to another person. He went before the judge, and got other bad men to help him say the sheep was his. The true owner came, too, and brought the sheep, and his friends came with him and told the judge that they knew the sheep belonged to him. How could the judge decide? He did not know the men, and how could he tell which was telling the truth?

But he did know how the sheep are taught in those Eastern countries; so he said: "Let the two men go into those two rooms—one on the right side and the other on the left side—and let the one on the left call the sheep. But the poor sheep did not "know the voice of a stranger," and did not stir. The true owner heard the sound, and did not wait to be told what the judge meant. He gave a kind of "chuck," and the sheep bounded to him at once.

"The sheep knows his voice," said the judge; "let him take it away, for it is his."

If we are the lambs of the Good Shepherd, Jesus Christ, we will know his kind call and obey it.

Girls' Manners.

If our little girls greet their brothers and sisters, and perhaps even their parents boisterously, instead of "Good morning!" they cry, "Halloo, papa!" "Halloo, mamma!" and playmates in the streets in the same rough manner, who will be surprised if this style follows them as they grow up and appear as young ladies?

Referring to this unlady-like manner and mode of address, a gentleman writes that, passing two pretty, well-dressed, stylish-looking young ladies in the street, he was surprised to hear one meet the other with "Halloo, Sid!" and the other respond, "Halloo, Tude!" to her friend's greeting, and he remarks it was just what two lounging young men might have said, or stable-boys for that matter. It might not have been so much out of the way for the latter, but I confess it sounded very odd and offensive in what I supposed to be two well bred young ladies; as much as if had heard two beautiful gay and rose-colored birds begin to swear. It was so unnatural and out of place.

It may be the "style" for young girls or ladies to greet each other with a "Halloo!" but I can't like it or get used to it. These things may seem but a trifle, but they make all the difference between nice things and very uncommon things.

Simple Faith.

Johnny Hall was a poor boy. His mother worked hard for their daily bread. "Please give me something to eat, for I am very hungry," he said one evening.

His mother let the work that she was doing fall upon her knees, and drew Johnny toward her. As she kissed him the tears fell fast on his face, while she said, "Johnny, my dear, I have not a penny in the world. There is not a morsel of bread in the house, and I cannot give you any supper to-night."

Johnny didn't cry when he heard this. He was but a little fellow, but he had learned the lesson of trust in God's promises. He had great faith in the words of Jesus when he said, "Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name he will give it you."

"Never mind, mother, I shall soon be asleep, and then I shan't feel hungry. But you must sit here and sew, hungry and cold. Poor mother!" he said, as he threw his arms about her neck, and kissed her many times to comfort her.

Then he knelt down at his mother's knee to say his prayers after her. They said "Our Father," till they came to the petition "Give us this day our daily bread." The way in which his mother said these words made Johnny's heart ache. He stopped and looked at her, and repeated them with tears in his eyes—"Give us this day our daily bread." When he got through he looked up at his mother, and said, "Now mother, don't be afraid! We will never be hungry any more. God is our Father. He has promised to hear us, and I am sure he will."

Then he went to bed. Before midnight he woke up, while his mother was still at work, and asked if the bread had come yet. She said, "No; but I am sure it will come."

In the morning, before Johnny was awake, a gentleman called who wanted his mother to come to his house and take charge of his two motherless children. She agreed to go. He left some money with her. She went out at once to buy some things for breakfast, and when little Johnny awoke the bread was there, and all that he needed.

Johnny is a man now, but he has never wanted bread from that day; and whenever he was afraid, since then, he has remembered God's promises, and trusted in him.

Let us remember the three Ps.—the Presence, the Power and the Promises of God; and this will help us to learn the lesson of trust. And in all our times of danger and of trial let us try to follow the example of David, when he said, "What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee."

Five Cents.

"Well, my boy," said John's employer, holding out his hand to receive the change, "did you get what I sent you for?"

"Yes, sir," said John, "and here is the change, but I don't understand it. The lemons cost twenty-eight cents, and there ought to be twenty-two cents in change, and there are only seventeen."

"Perhaps I made a mistake when I gave you the money?"

"No, sir; I counted it over in the hall to be sure it was all right."

"Then perhaps the clerk made a mistake in giving you the change?"

But John shook his head. "No sir; I counted that too. Father says we must always count our change before we leave a store."

"Then how in the world do you account for the missing five cents? How do you expect me to believe such a queer story?"

John's cheeks were red, but his voice was firm. "I don't account for it sir; I can't. All that I know is that it is so."

"Well, it is worth a good deal in this world to be sure of that. How do you account for the five cent piece that is hiding just inside your coat-sleeve?"

John looked down quickly, and caught the gleaming bit with a little cry of pleasure. "Here you are," he said. "Now it is all right. I could not imagine what had become of that five cent piece. I knew I had it when I left the store."

"There are two or three little things that I know now," Mr. Brown said, with a satisfied air. "I know that you have been told to count your money in coming and going, and to tell the exact truth whether it sounds well or not—three important things in an errand-boy. I think I will try you, young man, without looking any further at present."

At this John's face looked redder than ever. He looked up and began, but finally said, in a low voice, "I think I ought to tell you that I wanted the place so badly I almost made up my mind to say nothing about the change, if you didn't ask me."

"Exactly," said Mr. Brown, "and if you had done it, you would have lost the situation; that's all. I need a boy around me who can be honest over five cents, whether he is asked questions or not."

Military Ants of the Amazon.

The Nineteenth Century has the following:

The most astonishing insects, if not the most astonishing animals, in the world, are the so-called "foraging," or, as they might more appropriately be called, the military ants of the Amazon. They belong to several species of the same genus, and have been carefully watched by Bates, Belt, and other naturalists. The following facts must therefore be regarded as fully established.

Eciton legionis moves in enormous armies, and everything that these insects do is done with the most perfect instinct of military organization. The army marches in the form of a rather broad and regular column, hundreds of yards in length. The object of the march is to capture and plunder other insects, etc., for food, and as the well organized host advances its devastating legions set all other terrestrial life at defiance.

From the main column there are sent out smaller lateral columns, the composing individuals of which play the part of scouts—branching off in various directions, and searching about with the utmost activity for insects, grubs, etc., over every log and under every fallen leaf. If prey is found in sufficiently small quantities for them to manage alone, it is immediately seized and carried to the main column: but if the amount is too large for the scouts themselves to deal with, messengers are sent back to the main column, whence there is immediately despatched a detachment large enough to cope with the requirements. Insects or other prey, which when killed, are too large for single ants to carry, are torn in pieces, and the pieces conveyed back to the main army by different individuals.

Many insects in trying to escape run up bushes and shrubs, where they are pursued from twig to twig by their remorseless enemies, till on arriving at some terminal ramification they must either submit to immediate capture by their pursuers, or drop down amid the murderous hosts below.

As already stated, all the spoils that are taken by the scouts, or by the detachments sent out in answer to their demands for assistance, are immediately taken back to the main army or column by two smaller columns of carriers, which are constantly running in two double rows (one of each being laden and the other not) on either side of the main column.

On either side of the main column there are constantly running up and down a few individuals of smaller size, lighter color, and having larger heads than the other ants. These appear to perform the duties of officers, for they never leave their stations, and while actively running up and down the outsides of the column they seem intent only on maintaining order in the march, stopping every now and then to touch some member of the rank and file with their antennæ, as if giving directions.

When the scouts discover a wasp's nest in a tree, a strong force is sent out from the main army, the nest is pulled to pieces, and all the larvæ in the nest is carried by the carrier columns to the rear of the army, while the wasps fly around defenseless against the invading multitudes. Or, if the nest of any other species of ant is found, a similarly strong force is sent out, or even the whole army may be deflected toward it, when with the utmost energy the innumerable insects set to work to sink shafts and dig mines till the nest is rifled of its contents. In these mining expeditions these ants work with an extraordinary display of organized co-operation; for those low down in the shafts do not lose time by carrying up the earth which they excavate, but pass on the pellets to those above, and the ants on the surface, when they receive the pellets, carry them only far enough to insure that they shall not roll back again into the shaft, and, after having deposited them at a safe distance, immediately hurry back for more.

These ants have no fixed nest themselves, but live, as it were, on a perpetual campaign. At night, however, they call a halt, and pitch a camp. For this purpose they usually select a piece of broken ground, in the interstices of which they temporarily store their plunder.

ORTHODOX RELIGION,

"Having their eare turned from the truth unto fables."

The following paper was offered for publication to the Washington Post, but declined. It was, I suppose, too strong meat for Orthodox digestion, though, as the reader may see, it was planted firmly on the word of God. As it may open the eyes of some honest enquirers, less scary than the Post, if you can find a corner for it in THE RESTITUTION, it may be of use, and hence I send it.

Faithfully Yours,
A. B. MAGRUDER.

Is It the Last of Earth?

In the Post of the 27th inst., you had an editorial paragraph, referring to the obsequies of the late President, with the words:—"The Last of Earth."

The phrase was first applied to death, as far as the writer knows, by the late ex-President John Quincy Adams who, falling from a stroke of apoplexy in the rotunda of the Capitol uttered the words: "And this is the last of earth! I am content."

As you seem to have accepted, in common with nearly all modern journalists, the conclusion embodied in the phrase, as true and descriptive of the drama of creation and the real solution of the problem of human destiny, will you permit at least one of the human family in his own behalf and in behalf of all others whom it may concern, with the Bible in his hand, to enter his modest but firm protest against a dogma so distressing to man and so distrustful and dishonoring to God's word.

Scarcely any man was more learned, farther advanced in the philosophy and science of his day than John Quincy Adams, yet had he been called upon to find proof or satisfactory authority for the dark and disheartening doctrine that the death of every man ends all or makes the grave "the last of earth," all his intellectual resources and acquisitions would have proved unequal to the task.

As a people who claim to be Christians and earnest believers in the Bible as the word of God and the guide and foundation of religious faith, and with that book before us, how can we presume to say "Death is the last of earth?" Do we not read there, in a hundred places, that the resurrection and judgment of the dead are events which follow death and have not yet occurred, and that this living again, by the resurrection, is of necessity to be on the earth, is indeed expressly so declared?

On that hypothesis how can the following statements of Scriptures be true and meet with fulfilment: "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." "The hour is coming in which all that are in their graves (not in heaven or hell) shall hear his voice and come forth." "There shall be a resurrection both of the just and the unjust." Job says, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand in the latter day upon the earth." "And hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth, much more the wicked and sinner."

This is the Bible doctrine of human destiny and flatly contradicts the Orthodox and popular theory that men go to judgment and reward or punishment at death, which conclusion involves the obvious absurdity that men are to be rewarded or punished first, and tried, judged and sentenced afterward! What should we think of a human law which acquits or condemns before trial or judgment? Is the divine law less wise and reasonable? Death as the last of earth might naturally be the conclusion of unenlightened Pagans like Socrates, Plato, etc., but for Christians with the Bible before them, such vain philosophy is a reproach and a shame unto them.

When Paul preached the gospel at Athens to the Stoics and Epicureans, believers in the immortal soul theory they charged "him as a setter forth of strange gods because he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection." They declared his doctrine to be new. It was the resurrection through Jesus that made the doctrine new and strange to them. If he had preached to them future life on the immortal soul theory, the going to heaven or hell at death, could they have called his doctrine new, seeing that that was their belief? Now as then, it is the resurrection and future life by means of the resurrection, that makes the doctrine in our day both strange and new.

"He that is of God heareth God's words."

ONE OF THE PEOPLE.

Editor Restitution:

May God speed the time when peace and harmony will prevail among the brotherhood. For one moment look at the condition of our leading men, such as J. M. Stephenson, J. A. Simonds, A. B. Magruder, C. M. Myers, and others. I ask to what conclusion will the honest reader come? One advocates the non-resurrection of the wicked, one a resurrection of the just only, and one a general resurrection of all the human species. Some want these topics discussed in our paper. Some want each to write his views in a book and have it circulated among the brethren. Now I ask, Why should their differences of opinion be written in a book, or why should they be so bitterly discussed in our paper? Are these views essential to salvation? With me it is not. Will the heathen be raised? or will the wicked be raised? but, Will I be raised from the dead?

Dear brethren, I remember a great many years ago, when I first embraced the truth as it is in Jesus, a writer in our paper by the name of Campbell, wrote an article on the non-resurrection of the wicked, claiming that those that believed on the resurrection of the wicked were as far from the truth as they that believed in the immortality of the soul. One of the above named men wrote a lengthy article holding forth the doctrine of the resurrection of the just only, and not of the unjust.

I then believed that through the disobedience of our first parents death came upon all men—righteous, wicked and heathen—that all lay in death without an arm to save or an eye to pity until God sends his Son to save the world from sin. I then understood that through the resurrection of Christ the world was, or would be, redeemed from death; that is, from the first death. What shall I believe now? After seeing these men change their views, would it not be well for me to say, What must I do to be saved?

Dear brethren, these are deep questions, and it is well enough to study them, but they should not cause us to quarrel about them. O dear brethren, we should all work to be united, to speak the same thing, to be of one mind, to build each other up. We should remember—

Dangers beset our pathway round,
While passing o'er enchanted ground,
And fierce temptations oft arise,
And darkest clouds obscure the skies.
In vain I hope for kind relief,
Till in the ears I tell my grief,
And cry, submissive to thy will,
I love thee Lord, I love thee still.

ABRAHAM PONTIUS.

It is harder to live day by day for Christ than once to die for him; and what the church needs is not so much an apostle, or a preacher, or a martyr, as a multitude of humble Christians who day by day, by the quiet action of their lives, show the example set by Christ to his followers.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CHAPLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Dec. 14, 1881.

CONGRESSMAN S. S. COX has been recently making a tour in eastern lands. We give in this number a somewhat lengthy communication written by him for a New York journal which was kindly sent us by Brother T. Newman. It depicts the Jerusalem of to-day in a very graphic manner, and it will therefore, as we trust he will be welcomed by all our readers.

As some of our brethren hold what are known as the futurist views concerning the prophecies Revelations in particular—we give an article in this week's paper on that side of the question. We may be permitted in all kindness to say, however, that while we believe that some fearful acts of the great drama delineated in the Book of Revelations are still in the future, we are very far from accepting a statement like this which we copy from an exchange: "This age in which we live was scarcely noticed in prophecy; its initial and terminal events alone meriting the Seer's attention." It is a strange statement to us, at least, that the Heavenly Bridegroom regarded as unworthy of any notice the horrible sufferings of his Bride for 1800 years.

THE Association, through their Directors, has assigned the place of editor to us for the coming year. It is a place we never sought, and a place we have no desire to retain after some one more competent will undertake the responsibility. In order to pay indebtedness, we have served in this position for a compensation so meagre as to leave no room to envy us our place on this score. The first year was gratuitous and the allowance for the four years since has only a little more than paid our rent and wood expenses. We have been glad to serve the cause in this way without any complaint. We are making no complaint with regard to ourself now. We have to say to our brethren that all the indebtedness is now cancelled except something for books, which will be settled at the close of the year. To pay this indebtedness has been a heavy draft on our means, and we have our brethren to thank for the relief that they have so kindly sent for this purpose. We desire nothing but the low nominal pay accorded us for the year to come, and would serve one year more gratuitously if we could. Our list has been slowly increasing, but we have hardly a list yet to fully rely upon for all expenses. Now will all our brethren renew for the coming year, and also, when able, send out some extra papers, or send in something to make the paper their missionary to some extent. We will do, as we have been doing for years past, pay for some few copies for the benefit of others. We will do our best to make the paper worthy of the continued support of our kind friends and patrons. If all will bear with us for one more year, and extend the needed aid, we hope the paper will be in a condition to pass into the hands of some one far more competent to fill the editor's place acceptably, and we will gladly write our valedictory. This we hope to be permitted to do, if we live, in one year from the close of the present month. Our ambition has been to see the paper out of debt, and with a self-sustaining list. So, dear brethren, we go on for one more year trusting in God. While aiding the cause pray for us. It will help us far more than a fault-finding missile or a hypercritical complaint. May we all be more deeply imbued with the Spirit of Christ, and be found of him at last without spot and blameless.

We have been receiving requests from the the Agent of the Department of the Interior to furnish statistics with regard to the churches and brethren of the Abrahamic Faith. We have sent some information, and the names of some brethren in different States with whom the agents of the Census Office will correspond. We now copy a suggestion from the office in the language of its agent:—

"Perhaps a notice in the paper would be an advantage. The idea of the government is to secure a census of the peace people, and, to this end, we want every church to be represented in a list, with some name to correspond with. The various churches could advise me per postal card of their residence."

(Signed) HOWARD MILLER.

Now if some one of our brethren in every church throughout all the States will take a postal card and give the number in membership, in each particular church to which such brother might belong, something like a satisfactory result would be obtained. Address in full: Dr. Henry Randall Waite, Special Agent Census Office, Lewisburgh, Union County, Pennsylvania. Care of Howard Miller, Esq.

I WILL COME AGAIN.

Once more the Son of God is coming back to this world. He has not left God's dear children to a state of everlasting orphanage. He has not given up this fair province of the heavenly Father's empire to be always a scene of woe, suffering, and death under the endless control of the powers of darkness. What were his very last parting words to his disciples, as he pronounced his benedictions upon them when leaving them on the Mount of Olives, we have not been told. We know that as he stepped upon the bright Shechinah cloud, that was to bear him away to his Father's house above, that "he lifted up his hands and blessed them."

But the white-robed men said, "This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

"Earth, thou grain of sand on the shore of the Universe of God; then Bethlehem, amongst the princely cities of the heavens; thou art and remainest, the favored One amongst ten thousand suns and worlds, the Chosen of God! Thee will he again visit, and then wilt thou prepare a throne for him, as thou gavest him a manger cradle in his radiant glory wilt thou rejoice, as thou didst once drink his blood and his tears, and mourn his death! On thee has the Lord a great work to complete."

Editor Restitution:

I have often noticed that writers, both in the past and at the present time, admit that Jesus was born about four years before the common era. And in the last RESTITUTION I see the writer of the article on the "Star of Bethlehem" has endeavored to show that the star appeared about that time. Now, if that be so, then Luke's statement, that Jesus was about thirty years old when he began (his work) is proven to be false. History says that Tiberius Cæsar began to reign A. D. 14, and Luke says that in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cæsar the command came from God to John in the desert. John being six months older than Jesus, he would then be thirty years old himself—by law he could not commence until he was thirty years old. Num. iv. Now if you add A. D. 14 to the fifteenth of Tiberius Cæsar you have twenty-nine, and John being born six months B. C. would make him thirty, but if you then add four years B. C. for the birth of Jesus you would make Jesus to be about thirty-four years old when he began his work. Either Luke is wrong in the first verse of the third chapter, or in the age of Jesus, or Tiberius Cæsar did not commence his reign when history says he did, or else the writers who say that we have not the correct A. D. are wrong. Now, I am of the opinion (being perfectly satisfied that the gospel according to Luke is inspired) that we have the correct A. D., and that those who try to prove that the star of Bethlehem appeared four years B. C. will have to find some other star.

If I am wrong in any of my deductions, I am open to be shown. I am a disciple in every sense of the word, and I would thank you or any other one to give me light.

Yours in the hope.

JOHN HUDSON.

[The name Pilgrim, or Star of Bethlehem is simply a name given to a star that is supposed to appear periodically at equal, or nearly equal intervals. It is a matter of historical record that bright stars have appeared at certain times, and after shining with brilliant lustre for awhile have disappeared. It is said that the appearance of a new star B. C. 125, prompted Hipparchus to form his catalogue of all the principal stars. In A. D. 389 a star shone out suddenly as bright as the planet Venus. A bright star appeared A. D. 945, A. D. 1264, and A. D. 1572, and according to Chinese records B. C. 4. These are all supposed to be different appearances of one and the same star. If so, its reappearance is due in a few years. The intervals, proximately would be B. C. 4, A. D. 310-312, A. D. 628-630, A. D. 945, A. D. 1262, A. D. 1572-74 and A. D. 1883-1888. Now it is quite possible that it is not one star that has appeared at the dates B. C. 4, A. D. 945, A. D. 1262 and A. D. 1572-74. And again it is possible that one and the same star has appeared thus periodically, and Christ may have been born at the commencement of our commonly received Chronology. Should the looked for star appear some where in the eighties it would amount almost to demonstration that there is a wonderful star that appears and disappears at quite distant intervals, but of course its first appearance about B. C. 4 would not demonstrate that Christ was born four years before the commencement of the vulgar era. This is a difficult question to be settled by other chronological proofs. We gave the article in question as a historical and astronomical curiosity and submit it to all our readers as such. Notwithstanding the opinion of writers quoted in our article a very different star may have been the Star of Bethlehem.—ED.]

GUITEAU.

J. F. GILLETTE.

I have heard what the prophets have said that prophecy fails in my name, saying, I have dreamed, I have dreamed. How long shall this be in the heart of the prophets that prophesy lies? yea, they are prophets of the deceit of their own heart.—Jer. xxiii. 25, 26.

As we journey through life we are expected by our Heavenly Father to be observant of the incidents and objects by which we are surrounded; for as in the physical so in the spiritual world, we learn by experiences and observation as well as by reading. In this respect I thought it might be profitable to consider the very wonderful moral phenomenon whose name heads this article and who has attracted the attention of the whole civilized world.

I suppose that it is generally allowed by thinkers, that notorious characters are more or less directly, the result of certain states of society at the time when they live: that the times produce the men by some law of generation too subtle to be well understood. I think this theory is well supported in the case of the great criminal now being tried in Washington for his life, and I also think that a great many lessons may be learned even from him.

The principal causes that have culminated in the hideous murder of the late president, has been the admixture in this character of erroneous religious (I apologize for the use of the word on the score of popular usage) and unlimited egotism, combined in an ill-balanced mind. To say that Guiteau is an exceptional case is an error; the results in his case are indeed exceptional, but there are many such that never come to the surface so prominently. In fact if the religious errors abroad in the world were not curbed by antagonizing forces of various kinds, such cases would be the rule and not the exception and the time has been when religious murder had the consent of Ecclesiastical power.

To illustrate the danger of false religious teaching, let us take for illustration the popular delusion that good or innocent people are, in the death state, consciously happy in a much superior state of existence. Now if such be the case, it is plain that there are certain states of existence, such as poverty, affliction, or mental distress of various kinds, that would make a change for the better, a consummation devoutedly to be wished, and it is only the under current of intuitive common sense, warring against superstitious error that saves the majority of mankind from destroying themselves and their friends. Yet there are many instances where the religious (!) sentiment does prevail with very appalling results even in our own day. We hear occasionally of mothers destroying their own children in order to better their condition and suicides are quite numerous, the unfortunate victims leaving notes in their pockets and elsewhere, stating that they are gone to the better country, etc. I confess my simplicity in not being able to perceive much lunacy in such a matter, except on the hypothesis that the teachers of such doctrines are afflicted with the disease, which I do not believe.

The mother that "removes" her children to a better abode, or the invalid that removes himself is merely reducing to absurdity the popular doctrine of inherent immortality. And observe the prisoner at the bar! he ever taunts his examiners with their own superstition, he affirms confidently in all his native impudence, that his illustrious victim is "happy in Paradise," and they dare not deny it; so that in fact, according to popular acceptation he deserves the thanks, instead of the execrations of an indignant nation.

Another great but popular error that has shown prominent in this man is his claim to inspiration. This is a very old error, as may be seen by the quotation at the beginning, and we have only to attend some forms of religious worship to see that the prophecy that "prophecy the deceits of their own hearts are not extinct. I hope it will be only necessary to mention some of the scenes of confusion called "the moving of God's spirit" without attempting to describe them in connection with that Great and Holy Being in whom we live, move and have our being and whose law is order. It will be sufficient to say that the men who indulge in religious eccentricities, such as loud shouting or wild gesticulation are "acting out themselves," and not the will of God.

It is hardly worth while, one would think, to stop and argue such a point; such conduct ought only to be seen to be understood; yet the men who practice these things, instead of being ostracised from civilized society, are treated with respect, with veneration, with superstitious awe. They are styled Holy Father and Reverend!

Here again the prisoner at the bar pleads inspiration. He takes his cue from popular errors.

Again we have in him an illustration of another form of religious error too common. The prisoner prides himself on his theology in the old-fashioned pharasaical style, only his conceit carries it to a ludicrous extreme. Conduct or propriety never seemed to trouble him any more than his beard hills. Gentleness and honesty had no part in his religion. Some wild theories were his hobby, and he rode them. The deceits of his own heart he had been taught to regard for the Spirit of God.

At the writing of this it yet remains to be seen if the jury will decide him irresponsible, but one thing is certain, if curious and absurd forms of religious belief are to be considered lunacy additional wings will have to be constructed on the asylums.

Editor Restitution:

I preached to a good audience last Sunday at Geyserville. Subject:—"The birth of the Spirit." I endeavored to show from the Scriptures that the "birth of the Spirit," being "born of God," and "regeneration," mean the resurrection of the righteous dead, or the first resurrection. We must be born again in order to see the kingdom of God. And unless we are born of water and of the Spirit, we cannot enter into the kingdom of God.

At the first resurrection the righteous dead will live and (then) reign with Christ a thousand years, but the rest of the dead will not live again until the thousand years are finished. Conclusion:—

1. The wicked being left in their graves during the thousand years of the reign of Christ and the saints, cannot see nor enter into the kingdom.

2. After the conclusion of the time specified they will live and come into judgment; and all whose names are not written in the Book of Life shall be cast into the lake of fire; which is the second death.

Thus we see, that unfortunate class will fail to see, or enter into the kingdom and will be destroyed before the ushering in of the eternal world.

What a glorious privilege we now have of securing the right to immortality—eternal life, and not only may we see and enter into the kingdom of God; but we may have a position there and assist in the glorious work of subduing the world to bring about the grand consummation so graphically portrayed in the oracles of God.

But in order to success we must be vigilant in the discharge of present duties. May we meet in that great day.

As ever in hope.

Editor Restitution:

I think of going out into the field and proclaim the glorious message of "the return of the Nobleman." "The restitution of all things spoken of." The return of the Jews to the promised land. God's oath and promise to be realized in the near future. Immortality to be put on by those who seek for it. The saints take the kingdom. The song to be sung, "We shall reign on the earth." David's and John's Amen, be realized, "when the whole earth shall be filled with his glory," and "Even so come Lord Jesus, and come quickly." The nations join in the glad refrain, and say, Come, let us go up to worship the Lord of hosts, for out of Mount Zion the law shall go forth, etc. The desert rejoice, and blossom as the rose. The watchmen all see eye to eye. The disciples' prayer ended. Thy kingdom come. Amen is my prayer.

THE PRISONER OF THE VATICAN.

There is an affecting story in the cable dispatches which we print this morning. Two thousand pilgrims, gathered from every part of Italy, had come to Rome, and the Pope sat on his throne in St. Peter's to welcome and address them. There had been some little tumult in the streets as they passed, some shouts and hostile demonstrations, but not unprepared for these they had resolutely ascended the broad steps of the church, had passed up the isles which had witnessed so many historic pageants, and waited for the papal allocution.

Then Leo XIII., rising from his throne, pale and worn, spoke to them as none of his predecessors had spoken before; told them that he was a prisoner in his palace and dared not pass through the town with becoming state; lamented that the Church was overpowered with enemies, and, concluding, threw up his hands to heaven as though he were imploring divine aid.

Truly the condition of the papacy is pitiable. Its foes abound. Democrats are clamoring for its removal from the capital and the abolition of its guarantees. The government stands by, powerless to interfere, secretly hoping, it may be, that the Pope will abandon the Vatican and leave them free to pursue a liberal policy, unhindered by an institution which so many liberals have ceased to respect.

But where can he go? Neither Avignon nor Trent would be allowed to shelter him; neither Emperor William nor the Czar would give him a foothold in their dominions. England might offer him, not without some misgivings, a refuge in Malta, and the old thought of a great Western church in America might recur to him. But it is more probable that he will never willingly leave the seat of so many religious associations, preferring to fight to the last, as he says, for the safety of the Church, the independence of the Supreme Pontiff and the majesty of the Apostolic See.

TEMPERANCE ITEMS.

The students in Oberlin and Girard colleges and the Annapolis naval school are prohibited from the use of tobacco, and the board of visitors at West Point military academy recommend the adoption of a similar rule for that institution. The Boston Traveler is authority for the statement that at Cornell University nearly all the students have signed a pledge of abstinence from tobacco.

Can a nation, already enfeebled and effeminated by smoking, long endure the strain of strong drink? What kind of children will the next generation be? A man with an inflamed stomach, a swollen head, and unsteady nerves may know enough to turn off the gas when he goes to bed, but he will be exceptionally fortunate if his children have sense enough to do anything at all.—N. Y. Herald.

A Very Sad Story.

John B. Gough tells the following: "A minister of the gospel told me one of the most thrilling incidents I ever heard in my life. A member of his congregation came home for the first time in his life intoxicated, and his boy met him upon the door-step, clapping his hands and exclaiming: 'Papa has come home!' He seized the boy by the shoulder, swung him around, staggered and fell into the hall. That minister said to me: 'I spent the night in that house. I went out and bared my brow that the night air might fall upon it and cool it. I walked up and down the hill. There was his child, dead! There was his wife in strong convulsions and he asleep. A man of about thirty years of age asleep, with a dead child in the house, having a blue mark upon the temple where the corner of marble steps came in contact with the head as he swung him round, and a wife upon the brink of the grave! 'Mr. Gough,' said my friend, 'I cursed the drink. He told me that I must remain until he awoke, and I did. When he awoke he pressed his hands over his face and exclaimed: What is the matter? Where am I? Where is my boy?' 'You cannot see him.' 'Stand out of my way, I will see my boy.' To prevent confusion, I took him to the child's bed. As I turned down the sheet and showed him the corpse he uttered a wild shriek. 'Oh, my child!' That minister said further to me: 'One year after that he was brought from a lunatic asylum to lie side by side with his wife in one grave, and I attended the funeral.' The minister of the gospel who told me that is to-day a drunken hostler in a stable in Boston. Now, tell me what you will not do. It will debase, degrade, damn everything that is noble, bright, glorious and God-like in a human being. There is nothing drink will not do that is vile, dastardly, cowardly, sneaking or hellish. Why are we not to fight it until the day of our death?"

PERSECUTED AS A JEWESS.

PARIS, Nov. 28.—The position of Sarah Bernhardt, who is at present starring at Odessa, is anything but enviable. The mob insult her whenever she ventures out, on account of her Jewish origin, and it has been found necessary for ten Cossacks to serve her as a body-guard. Numerous arrests have been made in connection with this curious affair.

The chapters of recent losses of human life are fearful to contemplate. On the night of Dec. 8, a theatre was burned in Vienna, Austria. The following will give some idea of the extent of the frightful calamity:

VIENNA, Dec. 9.—The extent of the calamity has hitherto been much understated. One thousand one hundred and thirty persons are announced at the police bureau as missing, and, assuming that many of these will turn up, it is feared that the total will not be much less than 1,000 persons. It is now probable that there were 600 persons in the fourth gallery.

All the persons in the third row of the parquette perished.

The theatre holds 2,500. Every place was occupied except the parquette and boxes, consequently the total loss may be found to be nearly 1,000.

Three hundred and sixty tick[ets] were issued for the fourth gall[ery] seats for last night's performance. [Of] these people about fifty have b[een] found. They had made their esc[ape] from the inside only to find death [by] suffocation in the passage-way, [which] had no exit. The rest were, up [to] o'clock this afternoon, seen lyin[g] in the fatal gallery, vast barric[ades] human bodies.

About two o'clock the fourth ga[llery] fell in, and the firemen are carry[ing] out lumps of charred bodies wit[h] form, and far beyond the possibili[ty of] recognition. Who these victim[s] will not be known until their re[latives] shall have announced them as [be]ing.

Long lists of the dead and missing [are] appear to-night, filling nearly two pages. Among the missing are three professors and several students of the Fries Military Preparatory School, and among them is young Count Sigmund Fos.

Persons who have seen the dead in the fourth gallery describe the bodies as all lying as they and fallen—forward, backward, upward, bound together in convulsive clinging masses. They were unable to leave the gallery because the doors opened inward.

One of less magnitude but horrible enough, is noted in the dispatch below:

PITTSBURGH, Pa., Dec. 10.—Horrors in Pittsburgh follow close upon the heels of each other. Last evening a terrible explosion occurred in the Keystone Rolling Mills, in the Fourteenth Ward, but this morning comes another, which exceeds in horror anything that has occurred in this vicinity since the terrible destruction of life caused by the railway collision at 28th Street. This morning, between 2 and 3 o'clock, a frame boarding house located on the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie railroad, some seven miles below the city, was set on fire by the explosion of a lamp, and of forty persons known to be sleeping, only twenty-four escaped alive, and even they were more or less burned, and not one of them succeeded in securing their clothes, so rapid was the progress of the flames. The others were literally roasted to death, without the possibility of being rescued.

BERLIN, Dec. 11.—There is great commotion in the offices of the grand staff, owing to the theft of plans and papers of great strategical importance.

ST. PETERSBURG, Dec. 11.—Mrowinski, Tjaleff and Puresow, the police officers who failed to discover the Little Garden street mine, have been declared guilty and sentenced to Archangel for three years.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Dec. 11.—The Minister of Foreign Affairs informed the American Minister that the man who murdered Parsons, the American Missionary, died a year ago.

LONDON, Dec. 11.—The government balloon, in charge of Captain Templer, accompanied by Walter Powell, M. P., for Malmesbury, and Gardner, ascended from Bath, on yesterday, and descended at Bridgeport. The boiler struck heavily, and Gardner and Captain Templer were thrown out and injured. The balloon then rose with Powell, and was seen again to descend at sea. Nothing has since been seen or heard of the balloon or Powell.

BRUSSELS, Dec. 9.—An explosion has occurred in the Cockerell colliery, causing the death of sixty-six persons.

Moral decay in the family is the invariable prelude to public corruption. It is a false distinction which we make between public integrity and private honor. The man whom you cannot admit into your family, whose morals are corrupt, cannot be a pure statesman. Whoever studies history will be profoundly convinced that a nation stands or falls with the sanctity of its domestic ties. Rome mixed with Greece, and learned her morals. The Goth was at her gates; but she fell not till she was corrupted and tainted at the heart. The domestic corruption preceded the political. When there was no longer purity on her hearth-stones, nor integrity in her senate, then, and not till then, her death-bell was rung.—Robertson.

BE TRUE.

W. I. CROCKETT.

"Whatsoever things are true." Phil. iv. 8.

Be true to God and those about you;
His wondrous mercies on thy way;
The sunshine of eternity,
Pours streaming down a life outwardly day.

Be true to him who died for thee,
Who ransomed with his blood the slave;
Be true, the meekliest duties
And all his praises to bless above.

Be true, for life is reality:
To trifle, to make [illegible]
And give it all to God and be.
At last the Conqueror of Death.

REVELATION OF THE ANTICHRIST.

G. I. ROBBS.

An angel descends from heaven having the key of the bottomless abyss and a great chain in his hand.

Let the angel hold the chain! There is war in heaven. The archangel who disputed with Satan about the body of Moses prevails, and Satan is cast into the earth.

Before he tempted Eve, Christ saw him as lightning fall from heaven, since which he is called the "Prince of the power of the air," —the "Dragon," that old serpent, which is the "devil" and "Satan," the same who walked with God amid the stones of fire.

The fifth trumpet sounds, the "star" falls from heaven, and TO HIM was [illegible] the key of the bottomless abyss. [illegible] opens the abyss, the locust host [illegible] forth, and their king Apollyon is [illegible]. The locusts symbolize the [illegible]orses in the vision, the [illegible] darkness and perplex- [illegible] to symbolize [illegible] men and [illegible] love and [illegible] is re- [illegible] is an [illegible] dur- [illegible] months [illegible] tremendu- [illegible]ter half of the [illegible]y the act of taking [illegible] sacrifice in the midst of [illegible]nd placing the abomination [illegible] maketh desolate, by his ownership [illegible]d control of the seven mountains on which the women sitteth, by his slaying the two witnesses, by his sitting in the Temple of God at Jerusalem, by the act of marking his subjects for perdition coteinporaneously with the sealing of God's elect 144,000, by his persecution and slaughter of the saints, by the stroke of an axe, (thus shown to be an event of the future), and by the cotemporaneous event of the fall of Babylon the Great, as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, and yet he reigns! What heaven-darling audacity to deny the future of events which are yet pending before God for execution!

The sixth trumpet sounds—the angels of the Euphrates are loosed, and prepared for an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year, to slay the third part of men.

Satan is now cast down from his aerial domain of six thousand years, and in his great wrath, occupies his seat, and exercises his authority on earth, as commander-in-chief of the armies of the ten kings who make war with the lamb. Woe to the inhabiters of earth and sea! The abomination that maketh desolate stands where it ought not, in the holy place, and by the river Euphrates, in the North country.

Apollyon's host of two hundred millions of cavalry constitute the vanguard of the gathering host who come from a far country, from the end of heaven, even the weapons of his indignation, to lay the land desolate, and engage in the battle of the Great Day of God Almighty.

Apollyon is not yet bound, else there had been no war, no beheading of the servants of God.

The battle of the Great Day rolls on, the controversy between God and man must have an end, and this is the closing scene of earth's irrepressible conflict.

The blood is to the horse-bridles (fetlock), for the space of a thousand six hundred furlongs. The kings of the earth and their armies with Apollyon their king, in the madness of despair, engage in combat with the King of kings, and Lord of lords. The angel holds the chain! The conflict ends, and now the angel who came down with key and chain lays hold on Satan, the "Star" who fell from heaven, and cast the key and bound him for a thousand years.

Now, let us reason together. Apollyon the beast comes from the bottomless abyss, but he could not come from there until the bottomless abyss was opened. The bottomless abyss could not be opened until the Star had fallen from heaven. The Star could not open the abyss until he got the key. He could not get the key until the angel brought it down from heaven. If, therefore, the angel has come down from heaven with the key and chain to bind Satan for a thousand years, and if he has given the key to the Star that falls from heaven, and if the Star that falls from heaven has opened the abyss, and if Apollyon has come forth with his army of two hundred millions, and if that great battle of an hour and a day and a month, and a year has been fought in the North country, by the River Euphrates, the third part of men slain, the blood to the horse-fetlock for the space of a thousand six hundred furlongs; then Papal antichrists and Mahomedan antichrists have fulfilled all prophecy which has reference to the judgment of the Great Day. But if Christ is yet to be revealed, so shall the antichrist be revealed, and although there are antichrists many, yet there is but one who will be honored with the distinction of a personal revelation. Then shall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall destroy with the spirit of his mouth, and by the brightness of his coming.

This revealed antichrist has characteristics which distinguishes him from all other antichrists. He comes with all power, and signs, and lying wonders. His mighty acts, foretold by many of the prophets, have no precedents in the world's history; his blasphemous utterances have no parallel in any language, and that emphatic declaration of inspiration: "He is the antichrist who denieth the Father and the Son," cannot be invalidated by vain assumptions. Why not impute the words and acts of "the antichrist" to all antichrists? Why did John say, "Ye have heard that the antichrist should come," unless to distinguish him from the many antichrists?

The little horn is identical with the beast of Rev. xiii. 1. To this nearly all agree. The Vile Person, the Prince that shall come, the Prince of the covenant, and the King who exalts himself above all Gods, is made identical with the little horn, by the act of taking away the daily sacrifice and placing the abomination that maketh desolate in the holy place, in the midst of the week.

This one week, the seventieth of the seventy, begins by the confirmation of a covenant by and between the Vile Person and many (Jews). His reign of forty and two months begins in the midst of the week, and ends with the end of the week. The week contains two thousand five hundred and fifty-six days. The vision of the daily sacrifice and the abomination that maketh desolate is 2300 days, and those 2300 days are of the latter part of the 2556 days of the one week, and thus all the tremendous scenery of executive judgment, under the forty-two months' reign of the antichrist are limited to the latter half of the one week of Dan. ix. 27.

The ram and the goat symbolized the kings of the Medes, Persians, and Grecians. Alexander's dominions were divided, and out of one of those divisions came forth the little horn, having eyes, mouth, and language. The angel explains that he is a king of fierce countenance, understanding dark sentences."

If the horns of the ram and the goat symbolized the kings of Media, Persia and Grecia, why is the little horn metamorphized into a kingdom dynasty or heirarchy? Some prefer the explanation of the angel. This king of fierce countenance comes out of one of the four divisions of the empire. Grecia was plotted from the list of nations centuries before Christ was born. No little horn had yet come forth, neither could, until the latter time of Grecia, and the latter time of Grecia which began in A. D. 1827, has brought forth no such king. His name is Apollyon, his revelation near to come.

Now, it is a fact that seventy weeks of years were given to the Jews to finish transgression, make an end of sins, and bring in everlasting righteousness, which cannot be accomplished yet:

Until the coming of Christ.

Until the end of the seventieth week.

At the end of sixty-nine of those weeks Messiah was cut off.

One week of the seventy remained. That one week begins by the confirmation of a covenant with the vile person. The vile person is a Roman prince. He came out of one of the four divisions of the Grecian empire, in the latter time of their kingdom. He is prince of the kings of the earth, who make war with the Lamb, after the division of the Roman empire into ten kingdoms answering to the toes of the image.

The vision of the daily sacrifice and the abomination that maketh desolate is 2300 days, and the 2300 days are a part of the 2556 days of the covenant week.

The time, times, and a half, and the forty-two months begin in the midst of the week, and end at the end of the week.

No year-day theory can be made to harmonize with the foregoing facts of revelation.

1. Because no such parties to the covenant named have yet appeared consequently no such covenant has been made.

2. Because the Jews have been without king, prince, ephod, teraphim and sacrifice for many days.

3. Because the prince that shall come, the little horn, has never taken away the daily sacrifice, nor placed the abomination that maketh desolate.

4. Because the event of placing the abomination that maketh desolate in the holy place, is in the midst of the week.

5. Because, from the midst of the week to the resurrection of the dead is but three days.

6. Because such an event could not take place save this side of A. D. 524.

7. Because there is no event named in the world's history that justifies any other interpretation.

8. Because the beast reigns and prospers till the consummation—till Babylon has fallen, fallen, and become a lake of fire.

9. Because the antichrist works miracles, and comes with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, calling down fire from heaven.

10. Because he cannot be revealed until the apostacy is taken out of the way, and then, and not till then, shall that wicked be revealed.

11. Because the gathering of all nations to Jerusalem to battle is an event of his reign of forty and two months, over all kindreds, tongues, and nations.

12. Because at the end of his reign of forty-two months he is cast into the lake of fire, and the false prophet with him, AFTER Babylon has fallen.

If the Papal hierarchy represents the beast and Mahomedans the false prophet, how many will escape the lake of fire.

Now let Jerusalem come into mind, for the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies shall be gathered together there. "Behold! the day of the Lord cometh" "I will gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle." "In that day I will make Jerusalem a burdensome stone for all people; all that burden themselves shall be cut in pieces." "And it shall come to pass in that day that I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem." Assemble yourselves and come, all ye heathen round about, and gather yourselves together round about." Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision, for the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision."

The future gathering of all nations to Jerusalem to battle is an event so clearly set forth by the prophets that no man who believes God can even doubt it.

And now we inquire, Will that gathering of all nations to Jerusalem in which the vanguard of Apollyon numbers two hundred millions, be gathered there without a king? The fact that such a vast array of earth's armies as are gathered there, will have a king over them is beyond the reach of dispute. Of him what prophet hath not spoken! Clearly and distinctly we trace the Vile Person, the Prince that shall come, the Prince of the covenant, the Little Horn, the Idol Shepherd, the Beast, the Man of Sin, the Apollyon, who is The Antichrist, the king who shall exalt himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped. Sitting in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God, with power over all kindreds, tongues and nations, who at his command shall be gathered together at Jerusalem, to make war with the Lamb.

WHAT IS TRUTH AS TO THE "UNJUST"?

Answered—"Thy Word is Truth!"

J. B. Cook.

If they speak not according to this word, there is no light in them. Isa. viii. 20. A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you—him shall ye hear in all things—and every soul that will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed," etc. Acts iii. 22, 26.

Then, I ask, What saith the Scriptures of the end of those who under the gospel and gospel die unjust and will not know God?"

1. "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die—dying thou shalt die. Gen. ii. 17. By one man sin entered into the world and death by sin: and so death hath passed upon all, because all have sinned. Rom. v. 12.

2. Those who disregarded the promise of salvation by "the seed of woman" perished. "The flood came and destroyed them all." Luke xvii. 29.

3. "When they knew God they glorified him not as God, but became vain—fools—and changed the truth of God into a lie! (as) God gave them up." Rom. i.

4. "God suffered all nations to walk in their own way." Acts xiv. 16; xvii. 30, 31. But he called out Abraham and raised up a special people in his posterity by Isaac, to be the depositaries of his word and cast forward "a shadow of good things to come."

5. "The law was given by Moses. It slew the blasphemer, the drunkard and murderous classes without pity, that all Israel might hear, and fear to do no more such wickedness. Ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of the murderer! He shall surely be put to death." Num. xxxv. 31; Deut. xiii. 6-11; xvii. 3; xix. 13.

6. Divine love came, and light shone as "the way of life"—the way "from death to life." John iii. 16-21; v. 24. Therefore, "this is the condemnation, that light has come and men loved darkness rather than light—(such) shall not see life" (the "everlasting life").

Hence we read that "God knoweth how to deliver the godly—and reserve the unjust to the day of judgment to be punished"—cut off—by "the second death." 2 Peter ii. 9; Rev. xx. 5, 6; xx. 12-14; xxi. 8

7. This six-fold trial for "life and death" that has prevailed in the Divine government, and confirmed by his most honored representatives from Adam to Abraham—from Moses in the law, to the Messiah in his gospel, finds its climax and crown in "the age to come."

The sin against the Holy Ghost hath never forgiveness—it shall not be forgiven—neither in this age nor in that which is to come—but is subject to eternal judgment. Matt. xii. 32; Mark iii. 29; Luke xii. 10; John iii. 16-36; Rom. vi. 21-22; Heb. vi. 4; 1 John v. 11, 12; Jude 7-15; Rev. xxi. 8.

Furthermore, we read of at least the primary stage of "the new heavens and new earth—the times of restitution—the thousand years"—that "the sinner an hundred years old shall be accursed." Isa. lxv.

To close, please observe. We can not ignore this all pervading truth of revelation; but by undermining Divine promise, as well. Both stand or fall on the credibility of Divine revelation. "The promise of life" has been forfeited; and the penalty of sin incurred, by wilful, actual unbelief—the recorded "end is death."

All nations have in some way employed the death penalty to prevent or restrain rebellion and wrong. It is so far the principle of the Bible. Deut. xxi. 9-21.

The resurrection of the unjust and their judgment — condemnation to "the second death," and not to perverted to mean preservation for a second probation and the endless life; for "not see life," can not mean "shall see life;" nor a probation for it.

A theoretic restitution of those whom no grace or goodness of God could instruct, nor any earthly society endure (like Korah and company, or the assassins of Jesus) seems simply a reckless disregard of the solemn charge, "Take heed, lest you, yourselves, come short of the promise." Heb. iv. 1.

The denial of this profound truth (however plausible it may seem from general texts in other relations and human sympathy) is but a loosening of the screws, and the unhinging of righteous government in both earth and heaven.

Please reflect, "Where much is given much is required." We are judged as "just or unjust" by the gospel standard. John iii. 19. "Those under law are judged by the law; but those who sin without law, shall also perish without law." Rom. ii. 12. "God's ways are equal—true and righteous altogether." Amen.

We read, "Thou that forsake the law (the word of God) praise the wicked; but such as keep the law contend with them." Prov. xxviii. 5; Psa. x. 3, Rom. i. 32.

Do we not read again, "Will ye save the souls alive that God says should not live? or strengthen the hands of the wicked that he should be confirmed in sin and so not return from his wickedness, by promising him life?" Ezek. xvi. 17-22.

Will the great husbandmen "gather the wheat" and take it to the barn, too? Matt. xiii.

No, no. We do not make void the law through faith. God forbid. Yea we establish the law. Rom. iii. 21-31. But I forbear: and "in the love of the Spirit" pray "Lord increase our faith" so that where God says "no remedy," we may believe him. When Jesus, his blessed Son was not exempt from "the curse of the law" (Gal iii. except on the ground plan by the resurrection, to die no more) how much less can they escape who "hate the light of life," and "take the way of death."

Bible Restitution.

I am not a regular contributor to your columns but I trust a few words from me to the household of faith may not be amiss, and in view of the commonly of errors that is being enacted throughout the world, I trust that by a word of mine some one may be strengthened to continue faithful in the lonely path the Master made, whilst he dwelt among us. I ask the question—

WHAT IS TRUTH?

In all fairness, dear brethren let us reason together. What saith the Scripture? Is it true that the resurrection is past already? A great labor is being performed by some who teach such doctrine, some who should be of the household of faith, but who are treading in the path of the tradition of men. Paul says to Timothy concerning Hymeneus and Philetus, "Their babblings are vain and profane and their word doth eat as a canker, who also do err concerning the truth, and have overthrown the faith of some, by saying the resurrection is past already."

"Is the harvest past? Is the summer over and gone, and we are not saved?"

"I charge you, O ye daughter of Jerusalem, by the roes and by the hinds of the field, that ye stir not up, nor awake my love, till he please." "Behold the Lord cometh."

He himself shall descend from heaven shouting with the voice of the Archangel, and the trump of God, and they which have fallen asleep in Christ shall be raised up from among the dead ones, immortal: then we mortals who have not died but who hold the faith shall be changed into immortals and altogether, be caught up through the regions of the Prince of the powers of the air to meet the Lord.

"Who are they that say, Stand by thyself, come not near to me; for I am holier than thou. * * * Behold it is written before me: I will not keep silence." And again, "Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him and it shall be very tempestuous round about him. He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth beneath, that he may judge his people, saying, Gather my saints together unto me those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice."

When men that claim to be expounders of God's word take such liberties with the Scriptures by wresting and mystifying plain statements of the Lord simply to maintain a favorite theory I cannot go with them. Shall the standard of the gospel be raised or lowered to suit the will of man? Are the declarations of God by his prophets to be changed or relegated to limbo, because they do not fit into a man made creed? We may as well believe the young Jew, who has lately claimed to be the Messiah in Jerusalem, and find in him all the attributes of the Christ of God, without his glory. If there are seats who call themselves Christs' who are looking for the appearance of a man who shall be Christ let them read from Matt. xxiv. 23-28 and follow their leaders if they will. But all Christians who are orthodox in every respect do agree with the apostle Paul.

"We shall not all sleep; but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed;" "and we shall be kings and priests unto God, and we shall reign on the earth." 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52; Rev. v. 10. "Thy word is truth."

Yours in the blessed hope.

Solomon Ray, or Living for Self.

A hard, close man was Solomon Ray,
Who never a penny he gave to pity;
He hoarded and raved,
He pinched and starved,
And the more he gathered the more he craved.

For the hard-earned dollars he labored to win,
He cast him little exercise and pains;
For but little he spended
And all that he saved,
He locked and bolted with iron bars and chains.

Now, as such are the life of Solomon Ray,
The poor died by, and his body [illegible]
He [illegible] grave plain
And a soul within,
Given over to the dollars he labored to gain.

But he died one day, as all men must,
For he [illegible] and death is dust;
And [illegible] were gay,
As they said him away;
And that was the end of Solomon Ray.

And now they're scrambling, who [illegible]
For all of the [illegible] and [illegible]
And his hands were cold,
And his heart turned gold
When mostly to compass, as I am told.

Yet men will choose, and plead and [illegible]
Through all their years they must [illegible]
And their gold some day,
Will melt away,
Like the rotten carcass of Solomon Ray.

And if that was all, I could drop my pen,
And never would speak my lips again.
But sad to say,
There's a judge on day
For all who are acting like Solomon Ray.

For a terrible curse from the great white throne,
To all who live [illegible] for self alone,
Is words shall say,
On that dreadful day,
"Depart forever from me away."

Bring the Flowers.

It is a beautiful thought that the "stars" with which God has garnished the earth have been chosen as the fittest means of attesting the affection of the living for the dead. But, has it occurred to any who thus with lavish fond have shown their sympathy, how strange it is to wait till the closed eye cannot see; till the cold form cannot appreciate, or the deadened senses perceive, this token of the heart's love? How many a tear is dropped over the grave, or sigh winged forth, as the slow procession turns mournfully away from those who in life had no time for sympathy or thought for another's woe? It is well to bring the flowers; but oh! where were the flowers scattered during life?

We sympathize when outward suffering demands this God-given characteristic of the human heart. But where are the flowers scattered on the daily pathway of the little ones of earth? How many a toilsome journey would be brighter and lighter for some gentle hand with a little flower, instead of a hard, closed hand disclosing only a thorn.

Yes, bring the flowers; but why wait till life is ended? It is the living who need them; their freshness and fragrance may cheer many a drooping spirit, or some poor neglected son of immortality.

Yes, scatter these harbingers of God's love now, and let the living know your kind regards. It is no waste to lay the garland on the casket or the tomb; but, oh! wait not for them, and only when they are tenanted, tell of your love. Bring flowers now, and let the richest treasure earth can give—its brightest buds, its sweetest perfume—be freely poured from loving hearts, and soon the funeral train will not be the only place where human sympathy will find room for display.

Sowing Dragon's Teeth.

New England was recently startled by the tidings that a young man—hardly more than a boy—had shot and murdered his aunt, and then lodged a pistol ball in his own brain. Though his apparent healthfulness cast discredit on the latter portion of the story, yet in a few days a marked change occurred, and the murderer suddenly died from the effect of the bullet as was proved by a post mortem examination.

A short time before his death, he most positively denied having had any trouble or cause of quarrel with his aunt, and as his death put off judicial investigation, a strange mystery over hung the case; but from disclosures made by the prisoner, the sheriff is said to have authorized the statement that "the motive of the crime was to satisfy a morbid curiosity, which had been created by long continued vicious habits, and reading sensational, vulgar, criminal literature."

Four days before his death he was asked casually by an attendant if he ever read novels, to which he replied that he did; stating his preference in such a way as to show that a penchant for yellow-covered literature was the ruling passion.

These are only fresh instances of the demoralizing and damning effects of the circulation of the vile trash that is sent through all the land. The world has gone astray after lies. From the pious novels and Sunday School swash that pervert the taste of the young, to readers, and the romantic love-tales that ruin the morals and wreck the lives of giddy girls, down through all the reeking depths of brutal licentious abomination, which stupefy to robbery, outrage, murder, and outlawry, the trail of the serpent is on the literature of the age. And while people are neglecting the circulation of healthful reading matter, this ravenous stuff is going everywhere and carrying death wherever it goes.

Brevities.

M. d'Arsonvill, in the Revue Scientifique, is very sanguine about the future of electricity. He says that it will supersede all the motive powers used by man, and surpass them in every way, and he promises to prove in an early article that, whatever natural force may be employed, it is electricity alone which can store and transport it to any distance in a practical and economical manner.

A marble tablet has been placed in the ladies' waiting-room of the Baltimore and Potomac depot, at Washington, to mark the spot where President Garfield was shot. The tablet is of American statuary marble, and consists of a slab resting upon two corbels, outside of which are two pilasters representing the axe and fasces. Two draped flags form a canopy over the inscription in gold letters: "James Abram Garfield, President of the United States, shot July 2, 1881;" and the whole is surmounted by an eagle with outstretched wings holding in his talons a bundle of arrows and laurel leaves.

The St. Petersburg Novoe Vremga says: "The Chinese intend to fortify extensively the western frontier of Kuldja when they occupy that district next Spring, and to transfer 8,000 families from Kashgaria to replace those who immigrated to Russia. There have been two Musulman revolts in the course of the last four months against the Chinese garrison at Yang-Hissar. Two hundred Chinese were massacred. Four hundred rebels were subsequently beheaded.

Important, if true. It is said, on generally good authority, that the Porte has made (in principle) a grant of land in Syria to be allotted to Jews who wish to emigrate from countries where they are being persecuted. Another paper states that arrangements have been made, also, for this Jewish Colony to be governed by a Prince of their Own Race. We devoutly wish it may be true. The restoration of the people to the land would mark an epoch in history, and enable many a suffering saint to "Lift up" his head, as the "hour of redemption" would be, indeed, nigh.

A severe storm visited the British Islands on Sunday, Nov. 27th, causing many disasters by land and sea. The London Times says: "Fifty barges were sunk in the Thames. There was great damage to property at Brighton, Hastings, Dover, Folkestone, and Ventnor; also to the piers and parades at Southampton, Plymouth, Penzance, and Cardiff. The gale blew with great fury along the eastern coast, and throughout the midlands the damage was immense. Shipping casualties are heavy. Four ships are ashore near Chichester. Large steamers are ashore on the Isle of Wight. There is serious alarm concerning the troopship Orontes, which sailed on Saturday for the Cape." Many of the vessels which had sailed for this country are long overdue, and one or two that have arrived, report the heaviest storms ever experienced by old sailors, and several lives were lost, the victims being washed overboard.

Grave-yard thieves have been at work in Great Britain. A cablegram says: The body of the Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, who died in December, 1880, has been stolen from the Mortuary Chapel of Duncht House, Aberdeen. The footprints of three persons have been discovered near the mouth of the crypt. The Earl died in Florence, and his body was embalmed, transported to Scotland, and interred in the vault beneath the private chapel. After the burial the vault was closed by heavy stone slabs, six feet square, and then covered with earth and planted with flowers. The body snatchers unscrewed the outer casket and chiselled away the ends of the others. The remains of the Earl were dragged out feet foremost. The silver mountings of the coffin were untouched, the object of the violators being evidently ransom. It is conjectured that the robbery of the Earl's body was suggested by reports of the revival of the negotiations for the recovery of the body of Mr. A. T. Stewart, of New York.

BURIAL OF MOSES.

MRS. C. F. ALEXANDER.

By Nebo's lonely mountain, on this side Jordan's wave,
In a vale in the land of Moab
There lies a lonely grave,
And no man knows that sepulchre
And no man saw it e'er,
For the angels of God upturned the sod
And laid the dead man there.

That was the greatest funeral
That earth can ever see,
For the Lord Himself came down to be
And the darkness fell like solemn pall
Over mountain and plain and tree,
When the Lord Himself came down to be
At the burial of the dead.

The pilgrim host—the spring-tide
Of the young life of the free—
Were all there with their mighty leader
Out of the lonely wild,
Forward to the land of promise
Flowing like a living tide,
But when the warrior died,
His commander in the war,
With arms reversed, and muffled drums,
Follows the funeral car.
They show the mourners taken,
And after him lead his charger caparisoned,
While peals the minute gun.

Amid the noble of the land
Men lay the mighty to rest,
And give the hard an honored grave,
With costly marble drest—
In the great minster transept,
Where lights like glories fall,
And the sweet bells rings and the organ sings
Along the emblazoned wall.

This was the bravest warrior
That ever buckled sword,
This the most gifted poet
That ever breathed a word,
And never earth's philosopher
Traced with his golden pen,
On the deathless page truths he left there
As he wrote down for men.

And had he not high honor?
The hillside for his pall,
To lie in state while angels walk,
With stars for tapers tall,
And the dark rock pines, like tossing plumes
Over his bier be wave,
And God's own hand in that lonely land,
To lay him in the grave.

In the deep grave without a name,
Whence his uncoffined clay
Shall break again (most wondrous thought)
Before the Judgment-day,
And stand with glory wrapped around
On the hills he never trod,
And speak of the strife that won our life
With the Incarnate Son of God.

O lonely tomb in Moab's land!
O dark Beth-peor hill!
Speak to these curious hearts of ours,
And teach them to be still.
God hath His mysteries of grace,
Ways that we cannot tell!
And hides the deep like the secret sleep
Of him he loved so well.

THE CITY OF THE JEWS.

The Jerusalem of To-Day---Magnificent View From the Heights, and a Glimpse of the Mount of Olives.

S. S. COX.

JERUSALEM, Oct. 13.

I was courteously permitted by some of the aged Hebrews, in the intervals of their prayers, to look at their old and well-worn volumes. Most of them were the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and were chanted by men of clear, kindly, large eye. The picture of such patriarchs in Israel may be found in every gallery of Europe where art has caught the features of prophecy, and in the Daniel Deronda of George Eliot, where the genius of fiction has hallowed the devotion of ages. But let it not be said—to the honor of the Moslem custodians of the temple—that any public scorn and derision is permitted to insult this congregation in this outer sanctuary. These sad inheritors of the great prophecies and psalms of the great race are undisturbed in their luxury of grief.

After this exhibition, and in the full blaze of history, one cannot help but feel that this is especially the city of the Jews. Christians may fight for and hold its holy places; Moslems may guard from all other eyes the tombs of David and Solomon; the site of the temple on Mount Moriah may be decorated by the mosques of Omar and Aksa; but if ever there was a material object on earth closely allied with a people, it is the city of Jerusalem with the Jews. In all their desolation and wandering, was there ever a race so sensitive as to the city of its heart and devotion? All the resources, native and acquired, of this rare race, including its love of music and domestic devotion, have been called in to summarize and aggrandize the sorrows of its weeping and the tearfulness of its anguish over the fate of Jerusalem and the restlessness of its exiles

EMIGRANTS OF OTHER LANDS.

Imagine, for a moment, the exiled children or emigrants of other lands returning to their ancestral homes, with such patriotic and pious loyalty to the past. An Austrian refugee would not be found weeping about the Cathedral of St. Stephen's in Vienna, or a Norwegian over the tomb or well of St Olaf in Trondhjem: and if an American should be found dropping tears over the bones of Canute in Winchester Minster, or over the relics of the Plantagenets and Tudors in Westminster, the mockery would be as funny as that of the lachrymose Twain over the grave of Adam. There is only one people whose devotion to its old home can be compared with this of the Hebrew to Jerusalem, its temples, valleys and sepulchres. It is that of the Irish to their antique altars and beloved Isle. This unexampled devotion finds its expression in this wailing prayer.

ON THE HEIGHTS.

Finding the preparations for service in the synagogue incomplete, and desirous to get a glimpse of the city, from an elevation before nightfall, we were permitted to ascend to the roof of the synagogue. The picture enhanced the solemn and grand thoughts which are beginning to grow and supplant our first feeble impressions. Although not the best point of observation, yet from it the main features of the city can be defined. To the northwest are seen the domes of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the Church of Queen Helena, and beyond the walls and the Damascus gate are the tombs of the kings, to the north-east. Mount Scopus runs southward into the Mount of Olives, with its church and point of the Ascension on the east Between it and our view is the mosque of Omar, desecrating under its dome, and with its mummery of Mohammedanism, the site of the Great Temple. Scattered trees are about the sides of the Mount of Olives, and minarets aspire from Mount Moriah, where two mosques hide the sacred temple. Turning our eyes downward, to the south are the narrow streets of the Jewish quarter, upon whose roofs we see people preparing booths for the coming Passover; while beyond, in ever-enduring magnificence, is that exposure which first caught our vision here, the mountains of Moab, made enchanting by the dreamy evening lustre, and the attenuated and fairy scarf of distance! Jordan and the Dead Sea are not seen. Bare mountains of "the desert" are seen, intervening between Moab and this side of the Dead Sea. The house of Caiaphas, the Protestant cemeteries, and the tomb of David, a strange incongruous company of localities, are pointed out, just outside the walls. All about us are the walls, battlemented and antique walls, and without them, tombs—tombs in caves, tombs cut in solid rocks, tombs whose stones lie in flat and wretched disorder, on hill and on vale, tombs everywhere! To the south-west is Zion's gate. It seems to be the highest place. It overlooks many ancient and modern tombs, as well as the Montefiore cottages; and to the west the Armenian convent and its few palms, and even looks down into the Valley of Hinnom. The general impression of the city is that of square, whitish houses, with many domes. But what we see is not the ancient city and walls; it is the outer shell of shells. These are but the foundations for the "heaps" of two or three thousand years. To touch the sacred soil, you must do as many engineers and enthusiasts are doing, excavate a hundred feet or more. But where the rocks protrude, and in the great mosque, on the temple's old site, you find solid substance, which has defied the tooth of time and the vandalism of man. Retiring silently from this scene, we content ourselves for the present with a hurried visit to the Holy Sepulchre, Golgotha, and Calvary. The confusion of so many creeds and rites here, celebrating the divine benefactions and sacrifice, with the intricacies of the "places," jars upon the mind and soul. It renders this visit all too brief and unsatisfactory. It requires another and more exhaustive study.

THROUGH NARROW STREETS.

Following our guide through mazes of narrow streets, consciously going over the ground once familiar to prophets and saints, and threading the Jewish quarter, we make our exit from the Zion gate on the south-west, and thence due north, under the shadow of the western wall, gilded with a pensive light, we find rest from our first day's observation.

If at first we were disappointed at the small size and meagre aspect of the city, we are beginning already to wonder and worship. The very air, the very stones, the very dust—and especially the rocks—seem sacred. Here is the sepulchre, not of a nation merely, but of a Savior; not of dead, buried hopes, but of living and risen glories; not of an old and honored dispensation from Jehovah, but of a new and potential Evangel. Recalling some remarks in Congress apropos of the persecutions in Russia and elsewhere, and recalling my own picture, I felt an irresistible impulse to witness it, in spite of the painfulness of the spectacle."

JEWISH RESTORATION.

Perhaps the most serious object around Jerusalem is the "wailing-place" of the Jews. It is at the base of the wall of the temple. For many centuries the Jews have met there, bowed, prayed, to weep, undisturbed, for the fallen glory of their race. They there bedew with their tears the soil, through so many generations moistened with their blood. It is an old custom. With trembling lips and tearful eyes they chant from their Scriptures. "How long, O Lord, how long; how long wilt thou be angry with us forever!" And the wind comes back to them, in their doleful wailing, from the outer world—a world regenerated with the new and strange forces of steam and electricity; a new civilization born of progress and enlightenment, and dashing by their ancient haunts with a chariot more fleet and fiery than that in which their prophet ascended—"Not long, ye wandering ones of Israel. Your day of enfranchisement is nigh." If not in a physical, yet in a spiritual sense comes back the hymn, which new voices are raising the world over and around.

"Rise, royal city; Zion, rise!
Thy King's approach is nigh:
Long has thy night of mourning been
In sorrow's closing sky."

Whether it shall ever come to pass that this remarkable race shall repossess the land of their ancestors: whether the temple shall again arise within the walls of Zion: whether the teachings of their religion and all the elevated thoughts of their poets, prophets, and priests shall be sung even "within thy gates O Jerusalem!" one thing is to be conceded, that in America, under our free institutions, they are permitted unmolested to worship the Jehovah of their fathers! Here at least they have a highway out of Egypt into the promised land! Wherever may be their local habitation, from the summit of Mount Sinai still radiates the eternal lesson cut in stone; from the calcined soil and the sacred mountains of Judea goes forth an effluence to civilize, cheer, and bless. No one can be so darkened in his understanding as not to see the wonderful power of that little land through which the Jordan flows, with a population not larger than one of our own counties, which for two thousand years and more has held the world in thrall by its teachings and by its worship of the invisible Jehovah. Its people have carried the ark of their covenant into many lands and climes; and though bigotry may still be pleased to think that their dispersion as a people is a curse, still from their migrations humanity has been beautified, justice purified, and liberty glorified! Out of their rigid and austere code there springs and flows forever an influence as gentle as the dews that fell upon Hermon, and as potential as the quaking of Sinai, out of whose throes came the great moral law of mankind!

JERUSALEM, Oct. 14.

Since writing you, we have done what we could to "encompass" Jerusalem. Not only have we made excursions to Bethlehem, the birthplace of the Savior, and to Bethany, the place of his ascension, but have seen the "holy places" of his teaching and life, his sufferings and death. Of these I have written elsewhere. But how many delightful intervals of association lie between these lofty themes, in and around Jerusalem. The very streets—rough, dirty, and narrow, and covering the old ways with the accumulation of centuries—are nevertheless regarded as sacred. How can a person of sensibility stop to reckon the number of feet below which he walks as the place where the stations of the passion of the Savior are located? We have passed and repassed the Via Dolorosa and the arch of the Ecce Homo, where Pilate pointed out the Savior to the multitude. In fact, there are two arches where a staircase leads to the "Judgment Hall." Opposite is the alleged place where Christ was scourged. Some say it is the place where the crown of thorns was placed on the Savior's head. What matters it to fix in these mixed streets the actual scene of these agonizing associations? How much more comforting to do as we did, call on the "Sisters of Zion" opposite, and see what the good Sisterhood are doing in following the Master's advice? These places are now as familiar to our eye as home scenes. How can we dispute about the exact sites when we know of a verity that very near if not along this path he bore the Cross, that he met the virgin mother, he wiped the sweat from his brow, he fainted and fell, and at still another place, almost surely fixed he bore our sins upon the tree? Here Turkish soldiers in white attire, much more meek and courteous than those of Roman days who crucified him, saunter with nonchalance; and here money-getting still goes on, and money-changers and venders of doves still ply their trade; here within three jalousies and flowered lattices overhanging the narrow streets Arab women chatter about Christian dogs where once sad-eyed women wept over the humiliation and sacrifice of Jesus. But in spite of all this, and all the skeptic may say, good and devoted people of every rite are here, loving even the supposed footprints of their Savior, and ready to lay down their lives as martyrs of their faith. Here are those Sisters of Zion, teaching the young, and not omitting in their teaching the great transactions upon these hills.

THE POOL OF BETHESDA.

We visit the pool of Bethesda. It is full of benevolent, nay, angelic memories, for did not the angel here go down at a certain season and trouble the water, so that those who were diseased and waited along its five porches for the moving of the water should be made whole? Did not the impotent man here receive from the Savior his cure, for which he was reproached, it being the Sabbath day? Now, how changed! There is no water in the pool, save a little green pond in a corner. As we enter it the air is dusky and full of the cries of boys and men driving donkeys within, loaded with the refuse of the city, and whose basket panniers are full of dirt, to be emptied here, to make room elsewhere for buildings But to our mind it is not, as ever, blessed with the sweet waters of healing. An English engineer offered to the Government to clean it out, connect it with its olden cisterns, and fill it with pure water. The proposal was rejected. This tender shows that these sacred memories are not all dead, nor is the land altogether left desolate. It is said that one of the chief agonies of the Savior was, that "all forsook him and fled." So they did, and it was the bitterest drop in his cup of misery: but now, after two thousand years, his name is in the household of hundreds of millions of the race! Out of this desolation, sacrifice, and crucifixion, there is ascension for these millions, as there was for him! Who can describe the healing and consolation which have emanated from these scenes of suffering and salvation? Now, as then, there is the same deep meaning in the beautiful verse:

"God one, in secret bending low,
A dart in thy breast that the world may not know,
Wrestling, the favor of God to win,
Blessed of pardon for days of sin:
Press on, press on with thy prayerful cry,
Jesus of Nazareth passeth by."

If the streams, woods, grottoes, hills, and mountains of Greece were peopled by imagination, with mind and nymph, dryad and god, illustrating the aspiration of our nature after the spiritual beauty with which we are surrounded, and if these mythic haunts still allure us to arid, dead Greece by the fascinations of fancy, how much more entrancing the caves, pools, graves, mountains, and rocks about Jerusalem, which are instinct with that wondrous benevolence which lived to bless and died to save. There may be no romance in the dry and dead scenery here: Jerusalem, Nazareth, and Bethlehem may not be cities of palaces, like Vienna or Paris; they may have no flowing Propontis or Neva like Constantinople or St. Petersburg, but here there is a history, illumined like a sacred missal, and clasped in the everlasting rocks—for the vindication of which kings and Crusaders have fought, and good men like James, Peter, and Paul have died, and Chrysostom and Jerome have fasted, studied, and prayed. There is yet to be a better epic of "Jerusalem Delivered"—delivered, not from the Saracen or Turk, but delivered from the grossness which envelops it, so that its high estate on earth may correspond with the glory of its spiritual effluences!

A FINAL SURVEY.

Go with me for a final survey of these sacred spots. Around the walls let us go, in the pure air, and out of and aloof from the sores and sorrows of the poor, crippled denizens of the town. Would you see the Tombs of the Kings? Ride over rocks and rivulets, north of the Damascus gate, a mile or less. There, overlooking the head of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, you may go down into immense cisterns or areas, that now hold no water, and enter within the dark caves hewn by human energy thousands of years ago. There you will find not only the vast tombs, almost rivaling the pyramids, if not in solid magnitude, in historic interest and ingenious contrivance. The tomb of Helena, the mother of Constantine, is here located. On going down we perceive that some one has been cleansing the spot, although we are saluted by a sudden whirlwind of dust as we enter the broad, rock-hewn trench. We pass, stooping, under a low archway through a rock seven feet thick, into an excavated area nearly one hundred feet square. The walls are smooth rock. This leads to other chambers. There are evidences of sepulchral elegance, with carved grapes and garlands. On the southern side we go into the tomb itself. The door is small, and the rock has been shattered; but the ingenious arrangement to seal the tomb from lurking rascals would do honor to a Yankee. The door was covered with a heavy round slab running in a groove. This is only movable by a lever. The door looks like the solid rock, and there is another sliding slab at right angles to the one which bolted it. There is also an outer door still, so hung that if pressed from the outside it gave way, but immediately shut back and inclosed the sepulcher. Now it may be understood what is meant when it is said "the stone was rolled away from the sepulchre." Yet how insane and useless all the contrivances of kings or men to preserve their bodies from Time, the Despoiler.

Then we will convoy you through groves of olives, on "stony ground," into Jehoshaphat, and patiently hear you about the city. Many other tombs of prophet, saint, and prince, Zechariah, James, Jehoshaphat, and Absalom, are here on the left, cut in solid rock on the mountain-side while below them, by thousands, awaiting the final summons, are the thousands of buried Jews beneath the rude, dusty graves. Look up to that walled gate on your right. It is the Golden Gate, whose steps have been trodden by the Savior. They are now hidden by the "chaff." A little opulence of fancy and you may see the Man-God—he who was "acquainted with grief"—ascending and descending here—going to and from the porch of the Temple, where he was wont to walk and teach.

OFF FOR THE JORDAN.

Hearken! You hear the bells of the mules and the cries of their drivers; they are off for the Jordan, a stream sacred to your faith. They are bearing the luggage, under Bedouin conduct, of a camping party of archæologists. Above this is the village of Siloam. It is half in the rocks and half in stone huts. The bray of donkeys and the cry of children salute your ear. On the hill, above the tomb of Absalom, a sweet voice is rendering some Arab refrain. It approaches the edge of the cliff, two hundred feet above us. What is she singing or doing? Here is not a pleasant occupation, for she is picking up by feel and measure the chance dirt of the beasts which go that way to Jericho. Our donkey-boy answers her roundelay, and we momentarily forget, in the simple duet, sung from hill to vale, that these Arab children have a language and a music which, born of the Orient, echoed in these caves when the Savior and Apostles, with heavy hearts, wandered over this vale to Mount Olivet.

"What—what is the girl, and what is our boy, Hamed-Ewud, singing?" I ask of our guide. "O! my love is far, far away," he sings; and she responds, "I cannot come to you, my beloved!"

MONUMENTS OF THE PAST.

Are they improvising? What a simple romance, amidst these monuments of the great dead past! The tombs grow denser as we pass down the valley, as the Jews strive in life to locate their tombs as near in death to Mount Moriah as they can. Now we enter the dry brook Kedron. We see Arabs digging in the piles of gravel and rubbish for old pottery. What for? To pulverize, for cement. It makes rare and valuable cement, and thus the ruins of one age become the habitation and support of another. Then we turn down the rocky, meandering Kedron, to the Fountain of the Virgin. It is said that here the Virgin washed the clothes of the Child. Various rubbish is told about the Fountain, and various modes to account for the appearance of the water were given, until some little science was brought to bear upon the phenomenon of its irregular flow. We see many women here washing clothes in a most motherly way, and filling their goatskins for the irrigation of their little gardens below. We retrace our steps, and go up out of the cave into the sombre light of the valley. Tombs of the "Judges" and tombs of "Prophets," old and new, surround our steps. There are tombs on every side. Indeed, we begin to find the place populous with others beside the dead. There are waters flowing here, and some green results appear. Old Arabs in striped mantles appear also with antiques to sell, in the shape of coins in the time of Titus, and pottery in the age of Herod. We buy much doubtfully, for ever so little. Now, we are under the south-east corner of the Temple-plateau. How finely the battlements stand! This is indeed Jerusalem, and fills every expectation! From the village opposite comes the sound of a rude flute and the jabber of multitudes. The hills opposite are terraced and tenanted to their tops. In the valley below are some olives, some cabbages, and a cow! A few catalpa trees and many caves; a few vegetable plots and many donkeys From another point Siloam seems a larger village. We pass a well; there is a bronzed Rachel at it, filling her goatskins with water to irrigate her patch below in the "King's Garden." The lime-rock and soil are very white, and the dust and gravel very thick, and the wonder is that, even with water, anything can grow here. Here we are called on to examine some excavations recently made by a German palæontologist. He had found the old wall of the city, and was proceeding to take out of his inner consciousness the Temple, in all its parts and majesty of proportion, when the good Pasha called a halt on his enterprise.

Announcements.

I have moved from Hudsonville, Mich., to Ann Arbor, Mich., to get my children in schools. If there are any Adventists in this part of the state, I would like to hear from them. Expect to be here several years.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1882.

The Sun for 1882 will make its fifteenth annual revolution under the present management, shining, as always, for all, big and little, mean and gracious, contented and unhappy, Republican and Democratic, depraved and virtuous, intelligent and obtuse. The Sun's light is for unskilled and unmechanical of every sort; but its genial warmth is for the good, while it pours hot discomfort on the blistering backs of the persistently wicked.

The Sun of 1858 was a newspaper of a new kind. It discarded many of the forms, and a multitude of the ang-ellum words and phrases of ancient fame often. It undertook to report in a fresh, succinct, unconventional way all the news of the world, omitting no event of human interest, and communicating upon all subjects with the fearlessness of absolute independence. The success of this experiment was the success of the Sun. It effected a permanent change in the style of American newspapers. Every important journal established in this country in the dozen years past has been modelled after the Sun. Every important journal already existing has been modified and bettered by the force of the Sun's example.

The Sun of 1882 will be the same outspoken truth telling, and interesting newspaper.

By a liberal use of the means which an abundant prosperity affords, we shall make it better than ever before.

We shall print all the news, putting it into readable shape, but neglecting its importance, not be the traditional pound-pick, but by careful selection to present for once from printing House Square in one of the newspapers with the Sun. Whenever anything happens worth reporting, we get the particulars, whether it happens in Brooklyn or in Bokhara.

In politics we have decided opinions; and express them in language that can be understood. We say what we think about men and events. That habit is the only secret of the Sun's political course.

The Weekly Sun gathers into eight pages the best matter of the seven daily issues. An Agricultural Department of unequalled merit, full market reports, and a liberal proportion of literary, scientific, and domestic intelligence complete the Weekly Sun, and make it the best newspaper for the farmer's household that was ever printed.

Who does not want a new and neat and like the Sunday Sun, each number of which is a cyclopedia of interesting literature, with the best poetry of the day, prose every line worth reading, news, humor—matter enough to fill a good-sized book, and broader, more varied and entertaining than any book, big or little!

If our idea of what a newspaper should be pleases you, send for the Sun.

Our terms are as follows:

For the daily Sun, a four-page sheet, price 1 cent a copy, or 50 cents a month, or $6.50 a year.

For the Sunday Sun, an eight page paper, price 7 cents a copy, or $2.00 a year.

For the Weekly Sun, a mammoth sheet containing the best matter of the seven daily issues, price $1 a year, postpaid.

The Sunday Sun and the Weekly Sun will be sent to one address for $2.70 a year, postpaid.

OPINIONS OF THE WORK.

"We have no hesitancy in most warmly commending it to the brotherhood as an instructive and interesting production that will richly repay for cost and perusal in the important information that it will not fail to impart to every reader."—The Restitution, Plymouth, Ind., May 14, 1879.

"It evinces a thoughtful and earnest spirit, deep reverence for the truth of God, very careful study of Holy Scripture, and uniform conformity toward those who differ from him."—The New York Times, New York, Nov. 30, 1881.

"Everything is substantiated by copious quotations from the Scriptures—and to say that we have been interested merely, would not convey the idea. We have been deeply absorbed, for some of the topics are second to none in importance to us. * * * Any one not fully conversant with the subject in all its bearings, and who wishes to see the question presented in a clear and convincing way, should buy this book."—The Rural Messenger, Petersburg, Va., May 11, 1879.

"I have read it diligently again and again, * * * It is most in point of excellence and doctrinal truths to the Book of books."—D. M. L., Mo.

"I do not know that I have ever seen from the pen of any modern writer, a plainer exhibit of the gospel of the kingdom and at the same time one better suited to general instruction on that subject, than that which brother Jones gives us in his book, 'The Gospel of the Kingdom,' advocated in a series of Ten Discourses."—R. J. P. WEETHEE.

Our position in the series of trumpets and woes we have shown by tracing the historic events of six trumpets; the first four belonging to the Western empire (Roman); and the fifth and sixth (two trumpets) being God's executive agents for the overthrow of the Eastern empire. The seventh is universal. Between the close of the sixth trumpet's sounding and that of the [illegible]th is a brief interval, called a "[illegible]Quickly," and "Voice of the [illegible]el." If the events belonging [illegible]ld have transpired in [illegible]rogressing, and if [illegible] the period are [illegible]ll be admitted [illegible] space. It [illegible]ese points. [illegible] period is [illegible]es. Be- [illegible] of their [illegible]re. [illegible]g and [illegible]d heard [illegible]ly two [illegible]per- [illegible] Rev. [illegible]phet [illegible]ds— [illegible] Man." [illegible]re the [illegible]ee with [illegible]. iv. 8, [illegible] the two [illegible]no God [illegible]ohn had [illegible] the lamp- [illegible]n candlesticks [illegible]ou sawest are Rev. i. 20; see [illegible]ses are, therefore, said by [illegible]himself to be lamp-stands; but [illegible] says that the lamp-stands (seven [illegible]is only a number) are churches; therefore, the witnesses are churches.

The answer of the Superintendent of the churches who is also their Lord and Master, must be conclusive. But Christ says that his two witnesses are the two olive trees (branches). This was given in explanation of the witnesses, and must have been [illegible] stood by the prophet; as John was [illegible]quainted with the prophecies of Zechariah, this explanation was sufficiently explicit. That Christ alluded to the writings of that prophet, since the visions in their anti-types and symbols cover the same period, and events. They bring to view the same agents, human and Divine.

With these explanations we carry forward our investigations of Zech. vi. 9–15.

These returned Jews were poor and oppressed by their Gentile neighbors. Those sent from Babylon brought money to aid the workmen. This commission consisted of the following chief persons: Heldai, Tobijah, and Jedaiah, who lodged in the house of Zephaniah's son, Josiah. To those persons the prophet is commanded to go for sufficient gold and silver to make crowns (diadem with many lesser crowns). Only one diadem was necessary. Joshua himself was a type of the priesthood of the BRANCH. The order of the high-priesthood, of which Joshua stands the first in this representation, would not require a [illegible]rown, since Joshua had all that the [illegible]hood required, (he had a mitre [illegible]head, Zech. iii. 5). He sim- [illegible]diadem with many lesser [illegible]ify a royal high priest, [illegible]esthood, that the anti- [illegible] priest-king with many [illegible]—joint-heirs in a

A diadem composed of many lesser crowns was all that was necessary to make the type fit the anti-type. But it is said that the word translated Crowns is plural. The Hebrew is עטרות (a-te-rooth) crowns. Job says," I will bind it around me as crowns.' Job xxxi. 36 This crown is composed of many crowns—a crown of many crowns—a compound crown. It is said of Christ (Rev. xix. 12), epi tes kephales autou diademata—koi epithru kepha lea autou diademata—and upon his head many crowns—not separate crowns, but complex, or rather a crown composed of many lesser crowns; one for every kingdom subdued. The pope has a tripple crown, not three tripple crowns. Three kingdoms subjugated are represented. Joshua, the high-priest, for whom this crown was prepared, had then the full typical dress of the order of high-priests; "They set a fair mitre upon his head, and clothed him with garments. And the angel of the Lord stood by," and said, "Hear now, O Joshua the high-priest, thou and thy fellows that sit before thee: typical men; for, behold, I will bring forth my servant the BRANCH." Zech. iii. 5, 8.

As you are now dressed you typify the great High Priest, the anointed Messiah.

What head dress had the Jewish high-priest?

"And thou shalt make a plate (of) pure fine gold and grave upon it (like) the engravings of a signet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD." Exod. xxviii. 36.

We have the record of the fact of its construction in Exod. xxxix. 30, 31:

"And they made the plate of the holy crown (of) pure gold, and wrote upon it a writing, (like to) the engravings of a signet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD. And they tied unto it a lace of blue, to fasten (it) on high upon the mitre; as the Lord commanded Moses."

This plate, a holy crown of pure gold, belonged to the front of the mitre, which was "always to be upon the Priest's forehead." In Exod. xxix. 6, are these words:

"And thou (Moses) shalt put the mitre upon his (Aaron's) head, and put the holy crown upon the mitre."

That Moses obeyed appears from Lev. viii. 9:

"And he (Moses) put the mitre upon his (Aaron's) head; also upon the mitre, (even) upon his forefront, did he put the golden plate, the holy crown: as the Lord commanded Moses."

It will be seen that the pure gold plate, the holy crown, was an important part of the head dress of the typical high-priest, as ordered by Jehovah and was in the pattern shown to Moses in the Mount, since Moses was commanded to make all things according to that pattern.

Our application of these passages is this: In Zech. iii. 5, 8, Joshua is clothed in the complete priestly dress, and is called, in his priestly garb, a type of the BRANCH as the high-priest. The golden plate—the crown, though not named, must have been on the mitre since it was necessary to complete his dress as a type. Joshua has already been presented to the prophet as a priestly type; it remains that he be seen as a regal type. Till such a time it could not be said, "Behold the man whose name (is) BRANCH."

It is not said that two crowns were made, but crowns. Since "crowns" is plural it is inferred that two crowns were made, a priestly crown, and a regal crown; the word translated crown, when expressing the golden plate on the priest's mitre, is not the same in Hebrew, as in Zech. vi. 11. The original order was to make a thin plate of pure fine gold. It then said he made a plate—a crown of pure fine gold.

Plate is נזר-ציץ—tsits, ne-zer tsitz. Holy crown upon the mitre, נזר קדקדש—kodesh ne-zer. The golden plate, the holy crown, נזר קדקדש kodesh ne-zer. Lev. viii. 9. The Hebrew word for high-priest's crown is ne-zer. The new crown that is put upon the head of Joshua, to fix him to typify the BRANCH (Zech. vi. 12) is called a-ta-rooth. This is not, therefore, a priestly crown, but a regal crown. Joshua must have looked upon this as the type of another, since the crown was promised perpetually to the house of David, and he had just been erected in his priestly dress as the type of Messiah.

From Ezek. xxi. 26, he would learn that the diadem was to pass from the house of David to the Messiah; and from Psa. cx. he had learned that the priesthood of Messiah would be like that of Melchizedek, a royal high-priest, as he in his own proper person and dress was a type of Messiah's priesthood, by the royal diadem, he would represent the Messiah in his two offices of priest and king.

Through the description which follows, Zechariah has a sketch of the birth and future life of the Messiah, and the building and glory of his temple and his dominion.

The duality of the types is the key to a proper interpretation of the imagery of the temple services of the Old and New Testaments—a royal high-priesthood, typical and anti-typical. The lamp-stands and olive trees typify, not only the Institution but its living Officiary.

That we may have a better understanding of the witnesses let us follow this revelation to Zechariah, the last one of the first night vision.

Zechariah sees Joshua dressed and crowned as a priest-king—one throne filled by one person, anointed to exercise all priestly and kingly power, and it is said, "See there a man whose name is Branch; out of his ground shall he spring forth, and build the temple of the Lord." Verse 12. The word Branch צמח —tze-mech, (see Gen. xix. 25; Isa. lxi. 11;) though used here as a proper name, has respect to its etymological import, out of his ground shall he branch out—sprout out—a sprout shall sprout out. He is born in obscurity, and grows up like a tender plant. See Isa. liii.

The whole history of Messiah from his birth to his triumphant reign is here brought to view in the type. His reign as a Royal High-Priest is the principal feature; as his dress, and the declaration: "And he shall build the temple of the Lord," signify. Zechariah is taught to look forward from the feeble efforts then in progress under the type to that glorious establishment under the anti-type. He shall build the temple of the Lord is repeated; and, therefore, of special interest. As it has particular bearing on the interpretation of Rev. xi. we shall inquire what temple is intended which the Branch (Messiah) shall build?

The Temple of the Lord.—Is it any visible structure? What is the central thought of the type, and the anti-type?

Having investigated the subject with considerable care and with some perplexity we are of the opinion that the Bible allows us the following statements:

1. The word temple (Hebrew, היכל—hai-chal; Greek, ναος—naos) is a house, or dwelling-place of the true God; also, of heathen, or false gods. Dwelling-place, is the central thought; whether that be in heaven; on earth; in a wilderness; in a tent; in a body of worshippers, or in a single person. It is called a house, after the name given to the abode of the father with his family. As a father provides some place where he may rear, instruct and abide with his family; so God is represented as taking up his abode with man as his Father. His first temple was the universe; then the earth—in Paradise. His dwelling-place continued with his children (seed of the woman). It was where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob dwelt. Jacob, when a wanderer, slept in that house. Gen. xxxviii. 16, 17. God dwelt with the Hebrews in Egypt; went with them in a cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night; made his abode with Moses, for forty days, on the Mount amidst thunders and lightnings and the sound of a trumpet; gave Moses a pattern of the house (tabernacle) which he proposed to occupy during the wanderings of his family through the terrible wilderness. In that dwelling he took up his abode between the cherubim, in the she chi'-nah (a globe of light with an atmosphere of cloud). This was God's sanctuary; his wilderness temple, where he, through his servants, instructed and disciplined his children.

When they became citizens in the land of promise, the original idea of the tent is amplified into the beautiful temple of Solomon. In its dedication Solomon says, The Lord said that he would dwell in thick darkness. I have surely built thee an house to dwell in a settled place for thee to abide in for ever 1 Kings viii. 12, 13 The word temple, in the Bible, usually means this visible temple, the one built by Zerubbabel, or the same reconstructed, enlarged, and adorned by Herod the Great.

But is such its import in Zech. vi. 12, 13?

2. Let us examine other passages where the primary thought is clothed with other attributes. A temple, as we have seen, is God's dwelling-place, visible or invisible; in the universe or on the earth; if on the earth, it may be visible or invisible. It may be on a mount, on the ocean, in any country where his children may be found, whether in tents visible or buildings, or in the howling wilderness. Wherever God dwells, is a holy temple. House and temple, when applied to God's dwelling-place, are synonymous. The universe is God's house or temple. John xiv. 2.

A visible structure or place is a house or temple, whether composed of water, land, wood, stone, or any inanimate matter or a living organism—if God dwells in it, it is a house, or temple; it may be a person, or a congregation of persons. Jesus, clothed in flesh, was a temple. John ii. 19, 20. God the Father dwelt in him, (he in me, and I in him). Every Christian is a temple. 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17.

NOTES ON THE REVISED VERSION AND ITS MARGINAL READINGS.

NUMBER TWO.

WILEY JONES.

Luke ii. 38. "And spake of him to all them that were looking for the redemption of Jerusalem." This brief sentence gives a bright and beautiful glimpse of the faith and hope of the early believers—they were looking for the redemption of Jerusalem in connection with Messiah's mission; for the Scriptures testify that "when the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory," Psa. cii. 16, and "Zion shall be redeemed with judgment," Isa. i. 27, when "there shall come out of Zion the Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob." Rom. xi. 26. Thenceforth "there shall be no more utter destruction, but Jerusalem shall be safely inhabited, Zech. xiv. 11, for the Lord will return and build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down, and will build again the ruins thereof, and will set it up." Acts xv. 16. "At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of God," Jer. iii. 17, "and the name of the city from that day shall be 'The Lord is there,'" which name, in the Hebrew tongue, is Jehovah-shammah. Ezek. xlviii. 35. "Then the moon shall be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and before his ancients gloriously."

But an apostate Church, forgetting the covenants of promise, and growing weary of that well doing that consists in "taking heed to the sure word of prophecy," 2 Pet. i. 19, has ceased looking for the redemption of Jerusalem, and has come to regard that city as hopelessly desolate and waiting only to be confounded at last in one indiscriminate molten mass of what certain pulpit orators in their mad rhapsodies are pleased to call "the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds."

Acts ii. 38. "Repent ye, and be baptised every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, unto the remission of sins." The force of "unto" in this place may be seen by comparing it with the Revised Version's expression in Matt. xxvi. 28, "This is my blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many unto remission of sins." In both places it plainly has the force of "in order to."

How can any sincere person who is not blinded by denominational prejudice, fail to see this? Primarily, in the great plan of salvation, the blood of Christ is necessary to remission, but secondarily in the same great plan baptism also is necessary. The precious blood of Christ is the foundation of all pardon, and gives efficacy to the act of baptism, as also to faith, repentance, and whatever good we do. The great pardon was procured long ago by the precious blood, and is freely offered to all on conditions of faith and obedience. Now, the baptism of a proper subject is the personal or individual application of that pardon; in other words, the penitent believer of the gospel of the kingdom is "baptized into the death of Christ, Rom. vi. 3, and thus meets with the sin-cleansing efficacy of the precious blood poured out in that death.

To faintly and poorly illustrate this by "earthly things"—the bravery and blood of the revolutionary sires were instrumental in procuring many of the blessings of this free government, but yet an alien, in order to become personally or individually a recipient of those blessings, must comply with certain forms and conditions prescribed in the laws of naturalization. The Old Version's expression, "for the remission of sins," has been often twisted. I once heard a preacher attempt to define it as meaning "because your sins are remitted;" and he said the Greek would bear this construction. I was astonished at his audacity, but probably most of his audience, too indolent to search the Bible for themselves, regarded his allusion to the Greek as a valuable exhibition of true scholarship.

Acts viii. 12. "When they believed Philip preaching good tidings concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women." So then we have an infallible rule—the bright and illustrious example of the early church and the apostolic ministry for including "the good tidings concerning the kingdom of God among the things which must be believed before baptism. Even if there were no other testimonies on the subject this verse alone would settle that matter, on the principle that examples prevail where precepts fail.

What then is the condition of those professors who were immersed or sprinkled before hearing the good tidings of the kingdom? Was theirs a Christian or apostolic baptism, and was it an acceptable way of seeking the Lord? Surely not, for, as David says, they "sought him not after the due order." When David found that in moving the Ark he had not observed "the due order" he did not persist in his error through pride or for consistency's sake, but searched the law in the case, and conformed to it. 1 Chron. xv.

So ought every one to do in regard to the due order of baptism. This chapter of apostolic writing also indicates that although "multitudes," ver. 6, of "men and women" were baptized, no infants were. If after "men and women" the inspired penman had written "and infants," that half of a drop of ink would have saved volumes of controversy, and I, at least, would never say another word against infant baptism, but rather for it. But since the word of God leaves infants unbaptized, we have to stop where that stops; to go beyond that, even a hair-breadth, is to transgress, as the etymology of the word trans-gress implies. No, in all the oldest libraries, on dusty shelves, in dingy corners, among musty and crumbling manuscripts, the industrious infant-sprinkling translators have not succeeded in finding anything to justify them in adding "and infants" after the words "men and women" in Acts viii. 12.

Verse 37 of this 8th chapter is omitted as spurious by the revisers. As the people called Campbellites have been long using this verse as their pre-baptismal confession of faith, I would kindly urge them to now adopt for this purpose verse 12, and require candidates, before baptism, to confess not only the divine Sonship of Christ, but also to confess what the Bible teaches concerning "the kingdom of God."

2 Cor. iv. 4. "The light of the gospel of the glory of Christ." This is a very faithful translation of the Greek τον φωτισμον του ευαγγελιου της δοξης του χριστου It indicates that the gospel relates not only to the sufferings, death, burial, and resurrection, but also to the "glory of Christ."

Such was the gospel preached by the apostles when they spoke of the kingdom. And the prophets likewise testified "the glories," tas doxas, as well as the sufferings.

How can one preach the gospel of the glory of Christ without preaching concerning his coming in his glory to be seated "on the throne of his glory? Mark xxv. 31. Now, to preach of the throne is to preach of the kingdom; for, for a throne implies a kingdom as a key implies a lock.

2 Thess. ii. 2. "Be not quickly shaken from your mind, nor yet to be troubled, either by spirit or by word, or by epistle as from us, as that the day of the Lord is now present." To think the day had come and not brought the Lord with it was enough to shake their faith, and trouble them, just as Hymenæus and Philetus, in saying the resurrection was past, overthrew the faith of some. 2 Tim. ii. 18. The usual teaching of the apostles was that the day of the Lord is at hand, or near, and this announcement was not calculated to "trouble" believers, but to make them rejoice and lift up their heads, for they "love his appearing." Luke xxi. 28; 2 Tim. iv. 8.

In this passage, therefore, the Revised Version agrees with the general teaching of Scripture much better than the Old.

Rev. xxi. 7. "He that overcometh shall inherit these things." The Old Version says, "He that overcometh shall inherit all things; margin, or these things." So the Revisers merely rejected the textual and adopted the marginal reading of the Old Version, in this place. The pronoun "these" evidently refers to "the fountain of the water of life" and the "things made new," in verses 1 to 6, namely, the "new Jerusalem," the "new earth" under its heavenly constitution, etc. Then, in all its fullness, will be realized the promise, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." He that in the beginning was the Author of earth's genesis will in the ending be the Author of its re-genesis. To him be glory through Jesus Christ forever. Amen.

THE CHILDREN'S PAPER.

S. ROXANA WINCE.

I have no little children of my own. My one dear lamb was taken away in infancy. But I can feel for, and work for other little ones. I want the children among us to grow up in the fear of the Lord. I want them to have the knowledge that saves. Better less of science and more of God, if they cannot have both, or if science must absorb all their thoughts and all our means for their improvement.

Brother Jones has taken the burden upon himself of issuing a paper for our children. If we would have it live we must do something now. Children are more interested in something of their own. They will read a paper that comes in their names, when they would not touch a larger paper.

Take hold of the work brethren. If you would all take it even at club rates, for your Sunday Schools, the work would move. Don't say you are too poor. You pay as much for two pounds of coffee, or a bit of ribbon, as the paper costs. The children can work. Let other papers go. Take our own.

A Good and Cheap Kansas Paper.

We are in receipt of the WEEKLY CAPITAL, an eight-page, 48-column weekly paper, published at Topeka, Kansas, the Capital of the State, at One Dollar per year, to any address. It is brim-full of state news, correspondence, crop notes, markets, etc., and is, in every respect, a Journal worth the money asked for it. Those who want to learn about Kansas should send for the CAPITAL. Address,

Topeka Daily Capital Publishing Company, Topeka, Kansas.

Announcements.

I have moved from Hudsonville, Mich., to Ann Arbor, Mich., to get my children in schools. If there are any Adventists in this part of the state, I would like to hear from them. Expect to be here several years.

THE RESTITUTION.

S. A. CRAFLIN, EDITOR.

Plymouth, Indiana, Dec. 21, 1881.

ABSENCE from home on our own part, and a desire on the part of our printers to finish up the paper, compels us to forego writing much editorially. We will however say briefly that it is our hope that all our present subscribers will renew for the coming year. The year now about closing has been remarkable indeed. The year 1882 bids fair to be still more eventful in events that will startle the world. We shall do every thing on our part to keep our readers fully posted on whatever may transpire as indicative of the change of dispensations now evidently so near. Hitherto the Lord hath helped us. Slowly our list has been increasing in number. Some of our brethren are poor, but a little effort only is required to pay for three months at a time. Others can pay for six months without inconvenience. Some still better off can pay for a year and send an extra copy to some friend. Those that refuse to take a paper showing the fulfillment of prophecy will only do themselves the greatest injury.

THERE is some second sense in the following remarks made by an English Bishop on infidelity and fanaticism that we clip from a late number of the Manchester Guardian lately sent us from England by Brother B. Hayes. While the infidel's creed of negations, or belief in all unbelief, utterly severs the human understanding from all the holy light of divine truth, mesmeric fanaticism, to a no less degree, blights the human heart to all the sanctifying and spiritualizing influences of the inspiring spirit of truth. It is truth that enlightens—it is truth that sanctifies and saves.

THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER ON ATHEISM AND MATERIALISM.

Preaching at St. Margaret's Church, Hollinwood, yesterday morning, the Bishop of Manchester said a kind friend had sent him a paper called the Freethinker, the tone of which might be a proper one for Atheism to adopt, but, he said advisedly, anything more horribly profane and blasphemous he never read or saw. It was an attempt to pour ridicule on the Bible in the most ribald, heartless, cruel way that could be conceived. Writers of that class, looking at the things allowed in the time of Moses on account of the hardness of men's hearts but forbidden now, said, "Here's the God the Bishop of Manchester worships." The God of the Bible was the God he worshipped, and if the righteousness of the Sermon on the Mount were practiced the world would be a great deal better than Atheistic teachers were ever likely to make it. He was afraid just now that some of the forms religion was taking among well-meaning and fanatical men were very far from the spirit of sobriety which pervaded the teaching of Christ. He would be sorry to say a word against the methods employed by any who were trying to bring souls to Christ; but when he read of excited meetings, where people cried out in a hysterical way and were found grovelling on the ground, shedding "hatfuls" of tears, it seemed to him nothing like the way in which Christ taught. If they told him the 19th century required something novel and startling, all he said was that he was afraid the effect of this startling excitement passed away almost as rapidly as it was produced. Six or seven years ago when two celebrated American evangelists visited Manchester, there was a great wave of excitement, and people said there was a great conversion. He wanted to know where now were the ten of thousands who rushed to hear those earnest men? He preferred to speak with men and women while reason held the reins firmly over their imaginations and passions. They must not suppose that because a man could say in a church in a season of great excitement "Glory, glory, hallelujah," that he was therefore converted and saved.

THE PUNISHMENT OF SIN.

With the above heading I select the utterance of John Milton, author of "Paradise Lost," in poem, who wrote the following about the year sixteen hundred and fifty:

After sin came death, as the calamity or punishment come upon it. Gen. ii. 17. In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. Rom. v. 12, death entered by sin, vi. 23, the wages of sin is death, vii. 5, the motions of sin did work in our members to bring forth fruit unto death.

Under the head of death, in Scripture, all evils whatever, together with every thing which in its consequences tends to death, must be understood as comprehended, for more bodily death, as it is called, did not follow the sin of Adam on the self same day, as God had threatened.

Hence divines, not inappropriately, reckon up four several degrees of death.

The first, as before said, comprehends all those evils which lead to death, and which, it is agreed, came into the world immediately upon the fall of man, the most important of which I proceed to enumerate. In the first place, guiltiness, which, though in its primary sense it is an imputation made by God to us, yet it is also, as it were, a commencement or prelude of death dwelling in us, by which we are held by a bond and rendered subject to condemnation and punishment. Genesis iii. 7. The eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked.

Lev. v. 2, etc. It shall be hidden from him he also shall be unclean and guilty. Rom. iii. 19. That all the world may become guilty before God. Guiltiness, accordingly, is accompanied by or followed by terrors of conscience. Gen. iii. 8. They heard the voice of God . . . and Adam and his wife hid themselves . . . and he said, I was afraid. Rom viii. 15. Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear. Heb. ii. 15. Who through fear of death were all their life time subject to bondage. ix. 27. A certain fearful looking for of judgment. It is attended (even with the smallest guilt) not only with perfection and fear, whether results a diminution of the majority of the human species, and a conscious degradation of mind. Gen. iii. 7. They knew that they were naked. Hence the whole man becomes polluted. Titus i. 15. Even their mind and conscience is defiled.

Whence arises shame? Gen. iii. 7. They sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons. Rom. vi. 21. What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death.

The second degree of death is called spiritual death, by which is meant the loss of divine grace, and of that innate righteousness, wherein man in the beginning lived unto God. Eph. ii. 1. Who were dead in trespasses and sins. iv. 18. Alienated from the life of God. Col. ii. 13. Dead in your sins. Rev. iii. 1. Thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead. And this took place not only on the very day, but at the very moment of the fall. They who are delivered from it are said to be regenerated, to be created afresh, which is the work of God alone. This death consists, first, in the loss, or at least in the obscuration to a great extent of that right reason which enabled man to discern the chief good, and which was as it were the life of the understanding. Eph. iv. 18. Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them. v. 8. Ye were sometime darkness. John i. 5. The darkness comprehended it not. Rev. vi. 10. They cannot hearken. John viii. 43. Ye cannot hear my word. 1 Cor. ii. 14. The natural man receiveth not the things of the spirit of God. 2 Cor. iii. 5. Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, to think anything of ourselves. iv. 4. The God of this world hath blinded the minds of them that believe not. Col. i. 13. Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness.

It consists, secondly, in that deprivation of righteousness and of liberty to do good, and in that slavish subjection to sin and the devil, which constitutes as it were the death of the will. John viii. 34. Whosoever committeth sin, is the servant of sin. All have committed sin in Adam, therefore all are born servants of sin. Rom. vii. 14. Sold under sin. viii. 3. What the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh. v. 7. It is not subject unto the law of God, neither indeed can be. vi. 16, 17. His servants ye are to whom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, etc. Eph. ii. 2. The spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience.

Sin is its own punishment, and produces, in its own natural consequences the death of spiritual life.

The third degree of death is what is called the death of the body. The death of the body is to be considered in the light of a punishment for sin, no less than the other degrees of death, notwithstanding the contrary opinion entertained by some. Rom. v. 13, 14. Until the law sin was in the world . . . death reigned from Adam to Moses. 1 Cor. xv. 21. Since by man came death; that is to say, temporal as well as eternal death, as is clear from the corresponding member of the sentence, by whom came also the resurrection from the dead. Therefore that bodily death from which we are to rise again, originated in sin, and not in nature; contrary to the opinion of those who maintain that temporal death is the result of natural causes, and that eternal death alone is due to sin. The death of the body is the loss or extinction of life. The common definition, which supposes it to consist in the separation of soul and body, is inadmissible. For what part of man is it that dies when this separation takes place? Is it the soul? This will not be admitted by the supporters of the above definition. Is it then the body? But how can that be said to die, which never had any life of itself?

Therefore the separation of soul and body cannot be called the death of man.

Selections.

The Messenger.

THE HIGH PRIESTHOOD OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST.

CHARLES POUNDSTONE.

For such an High Priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; Who needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself. Heb. vii. 26, 27.

In the matter of redemption we are passive in the hands of him who made it; but active in laying hold of eternal life in him, by faith, taking God at his word, believing what he has said, and expecting what he had promised. "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation. That Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," and this he did once for all in the end of the age who offered up himself. To this the Holy Spirit bears witness, and also by his Divine operation in the exercise of faith, witnesses to our spirits we believing are the children of God. "If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together."

Now, in the house of our pilgrimage we are in the midst of foes, subject to numerous and varied afflictions, temptations within and without, sorrows, bereavements, and death; and often, as a sparrow alone on the house-top, we watch. But, amid all, our eyes are ever towards the Lord; for he it is that plucks our feet out of the net; he it is that keeps us and will preserve us unto his heavenly kingdom; sustaining us in all our tribulations with the one blessed hope even the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ. What a consummation! Our emancipation will then be complete; the whole body of the church will then be glorified; will then partake of the glory which the Son had with the Father before the world was.

All will then be like him, and according to his word, sorrowing and sighing will be no more.

What a glorious future is the prospect of believers; those who, through the grace of God, believe in the perfect sacrifice, by the perfect one; and the perfect work of that atonement finished on the tree of Calvary, and see from hence the higher glories that await them, when he shall come to be glorified in his saints and be admired in all that believe. This was the blessed hope that sustained holy ones of old, for the spirit that was in them testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow. Thus we read Heb. xi. And so also were the martyrs sustained in this dispensation under the most severe trials and persecution, and have fallen asleep in him till he come; and so, all through the times that must be fulfilled, the children of God in this hour suffer and are sustained in all trials and temptations through which they may be called to pass. How vast and comprehensive is the mind of him who so ordains and controls all things, bringing light out of darkness and good out of evil, which in the end will harmonize with the Divine perfections of his works. Whilst darkness now covers the earth and gross darkness the people, in that day it will be that the glory of the Lord will cover the earth and great light the people, for the light will be sevenfold as the light of seven days. Isa. xxx. 26. Then will be fulfilled Isa. xlv. 17, 18.

Now, we read our Lord rebuked his disciples on a memorable occasion for their want of faith in the writings of the prophets that the Christ should suffer; and we know that the Levitical economy was ceremonial in types and shadows only till he should come, and at the time appointed (the fulness of time) all these things were fulfilled in him. Hence, we believe, he is the great High Priest (called of God an High Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec,) even Jesus the Son of God, who is passed into the Heavens, and through whom we have been reconciled to God, and he is ever the merciful and faithful High Priest over the house of God, having an unchangeable priesthood. "We have not an High Priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin. Wherefore he is able to save unto the uttermost all that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. Having, therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which he hath consecrated for us through the veil—that is to say, his flesh—and having an High Priest over the house of God, let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith."

Now, the earnest expectation of every believer is Christ the hope of glory, who, as the forerunner, has entered into that which is within the veil, even Jesus the Son of God made an High Priest. "For Christ is not entered into the holy places with hands, which are the figures of the true: but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." Heb. ix. 24.

In contemplating the infinite in all his glorious perfections and works we stand on holy ground, and being ourselves finite, encompassed with sinful infirmities, and like a shadow that declineth, we could not approach but in a spotless righteousness; we could not stand in the presence of the Eternal and Omnipotent for a moment unless we had a merciful and faithful High Priest in that presence for us. Hence we see him who knew no sin becoming sin for us that we might be made the righteousness of God in him, and that we may draw near and spiritual when he shall judge the world in righteousness.

For it is he come, who was heir of all things, and who for the suffering of death was made a little lower than the angels, that he, by the grace of God, should taste death for every man. Hence we read: "He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever." But for whom did he ask this? Even for as many as the Father had given him to crucify a multitude. He alone was worthy to ask such a costly gift, and he alone was able to obtain it; for it must be by sacrifice, and that even of himself. He shrank not at the undertaking, for the love of God was in his heart, and he delighted to do the will of God. Hence he took upon him our nature, became the despised and rejected of men. He alone was able on the behalf of sinners to render that perfect obedience which none other could render in order to qualify men to live for ever in the sight of God, and enjoy his works in all their greatness and beauty and glory. Thus, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, he became the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him.

Contemplate him we may in his sorrows as the man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, in all his sympathy with human affliction, in all his holy tenderness in healing the sick and raising the dead, (and, to those who believed, his very presence was heaven to their troubled minds); but who can enter into the garden of Gethsemane when every follower forsook him and fled, and when Psa. xxvii. 2 was fulfilled? "When the wicked, even mine enemies, came upon me to eat my flesh, they stumbled and fell;" as it is written in John xviii. 6—"As soon then as he had said unto them, I am he, they went backward and fell to the ground." Who can portray the anguish of his righteous soul in suffering, the just for the unjust; the sweat of blood, and, lastly, laying down his life that he might take it again, that he might destroy him that had the power of death and give life unto the world. Here nature fails; but thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ, for in all this he saw of the travail of his soul, and will be satisfied when all whom he thus redeemed shall partake of his resurrection, shall enter into his joy. "Who for the joy set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the Majesty on high."

Three privileged disciples were once witnesses of his glory, and saw the manifestation of his kingdom on the Holy Mount, and in that exultant and ecstatic joy (though but for a moment) we can quite believe they desired to remain. Not yet. Though to our vision a long period of time has elapsed since then, yet how soon may be fulfilled Isa. xxvi. 19—"Thy dead shall live, my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs; and the earth shall cast out the dead." Then will the children of the resurrection not die any more, but will be as the angels of God in heaven. We conceive that to be that the whole body of the church of the first-born, whose names are written in heaven, will partake then in the resurrection, in immortality in the glory of the blessed One, and will have power to reign with Christ and rule over the nations.

Now, as we believe that our Lord arose from the dead, the Mighty Conqueror, having all power given unto him in heaven and in earth, so we wait for the full realization of Psa. lxviii. 18—"Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive; thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord might dwell among them." This latter clause will be fulfilled when he returns to restore all things; and as he is at the right hand of power until the times of restoration, so we believe the resurrection to be inseparably connected with his second coming in glory; and, therefore, according to his promise, look for new heavens and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness, and where sin and every evil and bitter thing will be destroyed.

Then will the face of the earth be renewed under the sceptre of the Prince of Peace, and earth, the scene of all his sorrows, will then be the scene of his glory, according to Isa. xl. 5—"The glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." But what a day of rejoicing—

And up there no signs that the day of the Lord is nee? What are the rumors that have lately floated on the air? Our Lord has foretold us of these things, which will immediately precede his coming. "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast: for, behold the Lord cometh." Isa. xxvi. 20.

And again—"Yet once more I shake not earth only but also heaven." Also, "the sea of nations with perplexity;" and have we not heard with what eagerness ambassadors have been seeking by any means to stem the tide or stop the current that will inevitably overthrow the wicked, crying peace when there is no peace?

Kings, potentates, and judges of the earth, who devise things not in righteousness, have long had their day—long have they abused the gifts of God and wasted the earth; and now they are beginning to tremble because a portentous crisis is at hand. They are, as it were, upon the brink of a huge precipice, hesitating to precipitate events, fearful of consequences that may ensue to the separate interests involved. For the moment this seems to have been spanned over and succeeded by a calm, and they think they have wisely settled these things; but we know that God will arise for the sighing of the needy, for the oppression of the poor, and for the patient abiding of the meek, and that he will come to reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously, which an unbelieving world, in league with a professedly Christian church, does not believe or expect, nor yet desire.

As surely as God has told us in his Word that he will do these things, so surely will it come to pass, and at the moment appointed he will come, before whom will be gathered all nations and righteously judged according to their works; and then will be the Sabbath rest of peace. "Then will the earth bring forth her increase, and God, our own God, will give us his blessing." And as we see the day fast approaching, how ought we as believers (from the faith that animates us) to seek by brotherly love to manifest whose we are and whom we serve, to be "kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us," and to walk in love as Christ also hath loved us and hath given himself for us, an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savor.

POPERY IN POWER.

That Rome has had a covetous eye on temporal power in our government, no one who understands the deep, dark designs of "the beast," can for a moment doubt. Just how the reins of government were to be seized, has been the thoroughly studied problem by the potentates of this apostate church.

It will be a sad day, if such a day be possible, when Rome rules. The tocsin would sound again from the steeple of some St. Germain, and another St. Bartholomew's day return. Rome is to-day what she was when with one vengeful stroke she sought to annihilate the heretics and their faith. Secretly and stealthily she seeks to steal on her prey, by gradually and unsuspectingly working her way into power, that when once reached in measure to dare the stroke, it might fall with the old-time vengeful ire.

There is occasion for no slight alarm in the asserted fact that already one branch of our governmental affairs is in the hands of the Romish Church to the extent that Rome holds the most authoritive sway. It is affirmed, on what seems good authority, that the War Department of our government is in the hands and under the control of Popery. Mrs. Gen. Sherman is said to be the real center of authority in the War Department; and that she really controls the appointments to such an extent that Secretary Lincoln confesses that he cannot give a thousand dollar appointment; that he is but a figure-head and secretary but to sign his name. Mrs. Sherman is the Vicegerent of the Pope in America securing the appointment of Catholics to places of responsibility and power.

This is rather a critical aim of [illegible] government to become thoroughly Catholicized. It is known that the Pope has conferred upon her husband the highest possible testimonial of the present of the Golden Rose; supposed to be a gift of God's favor; supposed to be accorded to the elect of heaven alone.

If the chief representative of the Pope in this country controls the War Department, in the person of the wife of the general of the army, it is time for us to look to our bearings. We sound this note of alarm that the sword may not come on a people unwarned.

THE OLDEST CITY IN THE WORLD.

Damascus is the oldest city in the world. Tyre and Sidon have crumbled on the shore; Baalbec is a ruin; Palmyra is buried in a desert; Nineveh and Babylon have disappeared from the Tigris and the Euphrates. Damascus remains what it was before the days of Abraham—a centre of trade and travel—an isle of verdure in the deserts—as [illegible] capital," with mortal and sacred associations extending through thirty centuries. It was on the road to Damascus that Saul of Tarsus saw the light above the brightness of the sun; the street which is called Straight, in which it was said "he prayed," still runs through the city.

The caravan comes and goes as it did a thousand years ago, there is still the shriek of the ass and the water-wheel; the merchant of the Euphrates and the Mediterranean still occupy the streets with the multitude of their wares." The city which Mohammed surveyed from a neighboring height and was afraid to enter "because it was given to man to have but one paradise, and for his part he was resolved not to have it in this world," is to-day what Julian called the "Eye of the East," as it was in the time of Isaiah, "the head of Syria." Would we keep alive petty quarrels year after year which a word any day would compose? Would we pass old friends and neighbors on the street without recognition because of some real or fancied slight, some wounding of pride, or ancient grudge? Or would we be so chary of kind words, our commendation, our sympathy, our comfort, when weary hearts all about us are breaking for just such expressions of interest or appreciation as we have in our power to give?

And yet be foolish enough to believe that there is nothing left for us to do, but to assemble ourselves every first day of the week to break bread and congratulate each other on our own salvation. Is it not rather our duty, having been plucked as brands from the burning, to save others, knowing that God is willing that all should come to a knowledge of the truth and be saved, and that they cannot hear without a preacher? We are commanded to go without the camp (church) bearing his reproach.

It has been said "all are not preachers the gospel" but is it really possible that we are individually aspiring to the position of king, priest or ruler of the whole world in the age just at the door and yet confess that we cannot tell the simple story of redemption? Oh shame! Has our fear of men's indifference and vanity, not much or little with the fearless lawlessness that is settling over the land like a cloud of intense darkness threatening destruction.

Is it not a lamentable fact that many of our meetings go to pieces simply because they seek their own peace and happiness and not that of their fellows.

It is foolishness to assemble ourselves and expect others to come and hear, when Christ says they will not come in. We must go to their haunts, the lanes and highways, to the halt, the maimed, the blind, the rejected of mankind, with the water of life, without money and without price.

This can only be done by members of the church realizing the individual responsibility, and will go and do it, for Christ's sake.

Is there not too much fobbing of the hands amongst us, self-possession and assurance, leaving the cultivation of our part of the vineyard to brethren more able than ourselves? This is not working out our own salvation with fear and trembling, offering our bodies living sacrifices, a reasonable service.

Those who have not yet begun to earnestly contend for the faith, do so at once. Leave not your duty in the hands of others; no one can do it as well as yourself. You alone are responsible for the light you have. Let every man be faithful in the community in which he resides, that no man take his reward and crown. The signs of the Master's return are thickening; a little while and he will be one of ourselves. Think of the future glory; the life everlasting; the endless society of a redeemed host, with the angels of God.

Editor Restitution:

I thought it would not be amiss to inform you that times are very close here, if not harder than last year. It will be close struggling for brother Daniel and myself to get through the winter with our large families—he has seven and we have six children to provide for.

The drouth was very severe in this part of Kansas. Corn is hauled from Nebraska, and from eastern counties, and retails at from 90c. to $1.00 per bushel, and other things are in proportion.

I suppose you wonder why we stay in such a country. I will explain and tell you the facts in the matter. Three years ago a great tide of emigration set in for this country on account of the exagerated reports concerning it, and the chance to get free homes on government land.

Our parents and other relatives came here, and we moved also, and secured a portion of "Uncle Sam's Domain." The soil is very good here, and if the seasons were favorable this would be a good place to live; but it seems that drouth is the rule and not the exception. We get some work, and raise a little, but not enough to supply us decently. This is a pretty good country for stock and sheep, for those who can invest.

I expect to "prove up" on my claim and get a deed ... next winter, and then I can ... [illegible]

The Birth of Life.

[illegible]

Perhaps there's walk by the way, not busy,
Where children play, or old men with us,
And, while at work, with labor as their
As I view which the angels in an ecstasy wear,
Will lure you to deadly ...

Then go on the armor of God, my boy,
In the beautiful days of youth;
Put on the helmet and breastplate and shield,
And the sword that is polished and bright,
In the cause of right and truth.

And go forth to the battle of life, my boy,
With the purse of the gospel filled;
And remember life's heaven the highest reward
For the true and the good of heart
For the Kingdom and Crown of God.

One Step at a Time.

George Manning had almost decided to become a Christian. One doubt held him back. "How can I know," he said to himself, "that even if I do begin a religious life, I shall continue faithful, and finally be saved?" He wanted to see the whole way there before taking the first step.

While in this state of indecision and unhappiness, he one evening sought the house of his favorite professor—for he was a college student at the time—and they talked for several hours upon the all-absorbing topic. But the conversation ended without dispelling his fears or bringing him any nearer the point of decision.

When he was about to go home, the professor accompanied him to the door, and observing how dark the night was, prepared a lantern, and handing it to his friend, said, "George, this little light will not show you the whole way to your room, but only one step at a time; but take that step, and you will reach your room in safety."

It proved the word in season. As George walked securely along the path, bright-ned by the little lantern, the truth flashed through his mind, dispelling the last shadow of doubt, "Why can I not trust my Heavenly Father," he said to himself, "even if I can't see my way clear to the end, if he gives me light to take one step, I will trust him; I do trust him."

He could hardly wait till he reached his room to fall on his knees and thank God for the peace and joy that filled his soul.

Early the next morning, the professor was summoned to the door. There he found George Manning. With a beaming face he looked up to his teacher, and, as he handed him the lantern, said significantly, "Doctor, your little lamp lighted me all the way home last night."

Harper's Young People.

Newton's Childhood.

Sir Isaac Newton is the greatest of modern philosophers and mechanics.

When he was born, Dec. 25, 1642, three months after his father's death, he was so small and feeble that no one supposed he would live a day; but the weak infant grew to be a healthy, robust man, who lived until he was 84 years old.

He began to invent or contrive machines and to show his taste for mechanics in early childhood. He inherited some property from his father, and his mother, who had married a second time, sent him to the best schools, and to the University of Cambridge. At school he soon showed his natural genius, he manned himself with little ... and ... tools, and when his companions were at play, spent his time in making machines and toys. He made a wooden clock which he was twelve years old, and the model of a windmill and in his mill he put a mouse, which he called his miller, and which turned the wheels by turning around the cage. He made a water clock four feet high, and a cart with four wheels, not unlike a velocipede, in which he could drive himself by turning a windlass.

His love of mechanics often interrupted his studies at school, and he was sometimes making clocks and carriages when he ought to have been constructing Latin and Greek. His mind was so active that he easily caught up upon with his fellows, and was always fond of every kind of knowledge. He taught the school boys how to make kites, while he made paper lanterns to work them to school dark winter mornings and sometimes at night he would alarm the whole country round by raising his kites in the air with a paper lantern attached to the tail; they would shine like meteors at the distance and the country people, at that time very ignorant, would fancy them to be omens of evil, and celestial lights.

He was never idle for a moment. He loved to draw and sketch; made little tables and sideboards for the children to play with; watched the motion of the sun by means of pegs he had fixed on the wall of the house where he was then living, and marked every hour.

At last, when he was about sixteen his mother placed him in charge of a farm and every Saturday he went with his servant to Grantham market to sell his vegetables. But the affairs of the farm did not prosper; the young philosopher hid himself away in a room in a garret which he had hired, studying mechanics, and inventing a water-wheel on a new model, while the sheep wandered away, and the cattle devoured the corn.

Next he went to Cambridge University, and became a famous scholar. At the age of twenty-four he began his study of the spectrum, as philosophers call that brilliant picture of the colors of the rainbow, which is shown by the sun's rays shining through a three-sided piece of glass, called a prism. It is one of the most beautiful objects in science or nature, and Newton's study of its splendid colors led to his greatest discoveries of optics, or the science of the sight. In our own time the use of the prism and spectrum has shown us of what the sun and moon are composed.

One day, as Newton sat musing in his garden at his retired country home, an apple fell from a tree to the ground. A great idea at once arose in his mind, and he conceived the plan of the universe and of the law of gravitation, as it is called. He was the first to discover that law. He showed that the heavier body always attracts the lighter; that as the apple falls to the earth, so the earth is drawn toward the sun; that all the planets feel the law of gravitation, and that all the universe seems to obey one will.

Newton soon became the most famous of living philosophers. But at the same time he was the most modest of men; he never knew that he had done anything more than others, nor felt that he was any more studious or busy. Yet he never ceased to show, even in late old age, the same love for mechanical pursuits and the study of nature he had shown when a boy. His most famous work, the Principia, proving the law of gravitation and the motion of the planets, appeared in 1687. He made beautiful prisms of glass and other substances, and fine reflecting telescopes, the ... that were yet known. He wrote valuable histories and works. He was always a devout Christian and scholar. He died in 1727, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Thus the puny babe that was scarcely thought worth the care of his nurses, became an active and healthy boy and man, with the clearest mind of his time. He was stout, ruddy, healthy, and never, it is said, lost a tooth. But he preserved his health by avoiding all that was hurtful. He was a philosopher at twelve years old, and the world owes much of its progress to Newton's well-spent childhood.

Nature's Mighty Wonders.

How the Stars Praise God.

RICHARD NEWTON, D. D.

"Praise him, all ye stars of light."—Psalms cxlviii, 3.

We all love to look at the stars. It is a beautiful sight, when the sky is clear, to look out at night and gaze at them. What multitudes there are! How calm and still they seem! How beautifully they shine and sparkle! We never get tired of looking at them. How they set us to thinking! They make us wonder how it is that God, who has so many other worlds to think about, should ever take so much notice of such poor, sinful creatures as we are!

This is just the way it made David think and feel as he kept his father's flock in the fields of Bethlehem more than three thousand years ago. He often used to be put out in the field all night minding sheep. Then he would have a fine opportunity of watching the stars. And in that country the sky seems clearer and the stars appear to shine more brightly than they do with us.

I shall never forget the view of the stars we had one night, while traveling in the Holy Land. We had encamped for the night in a narrow gorge among the mountains of Judaism. The wind was blowing through the gorge all night with great violence. About one o'clock it blew our tent over. We were able to find nothing over our heads but the clear sky. And as I lay in my little couch and looked up I thought it one of the most glorious sights I had ever seen. The sky seemed so black as ebony, and the stars appear d to stand out and sparkle so brilliantly that I could hardly keep from clapping my hands and crying out "Oh, how beautiful!" And then I thought that is just the way in which the stars used to appear to David, as he gazed upon them. No wonder, then that as he looked up to the sky at night he should have used those words that we find written in Psa. viii. "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; what is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" When we have been looking at the sky at night, perhaps there is not one of us who has not often felt inclined to make use of the simple words of the little hymn beginning, "Twinkle, twinkle, little star."

In old times, before telescopes were invented, people used to have strange notions about the stars. They thought some of them were wild animals. There is one set of stars that we see in the sky every night, something in the form of a plow, that people formerly used to represent as a bear, and which they called The Great Bear.

Now we know the stars are worlds. Some of them are very large. When we look at the stars with our naked eyes they look white, like the moon. But if we could look at them through one of the great telescopes which are used by astronomers, or men who study stars, we should find they are of very different colors. Some are red, some yellow, some green, some blue, and some purple. Instead of being all of one color, we would see as many colors among them as there are among the flowers of the garden. This must make the stars look wonderfully beautiful. Even from what he knew about them, David might well say, "Praise him, all ye stars."

The subject we are now to consider is—How the stars praise God.

When we look in the sky on a clear bright night, and see the stars there, the thing that we think about first is the great number of them. They seem to be too many to count; but it is not so. They can be counted. They have been counted. It looks as if there was no end to them; and yet there are only a few thousand that can be seen by the naked eye. But if we take a small telescope, and look at them through that, we shall see a good many more. If we take a larger telescope we shall see more still. And the more powerful the telescope is that we look through, the greater is the number of stars that we shall see. If you go out of doors some fine, bright night, and look up at the sky, you will see, right across the heavens, something that looks very much like a thin, long, narrow cloud. It is called The Milky Way. If we could look at this through a very large telescope, we should find that what looks so much like a cloud to our naked eyes, is really a great multitude of stars. There are as many of them, and they are so far off from us, that when we look at them the light that shines from them seems all to mingle together, so to appear like a bright cloud.

There are millions on millions of stars in that one cloud or company. And then there are a great many other clouds of stars as large as that in other parts of the heavens. Each one of these clouds has, it may be, as many millions on millions of stars in it as there are in the milky way. And when we come to put these all together, oh, what a multitude of bright stars they make!

And when we think of the number of the stars, it should teach us a lesson of trust. I want you to connect these two words together. Whenever you look at the stars, or think how many there are, let their number lead you to trust in God.

The God who can ... so ... many worlds at once, can do anything for his people that he sees will be best for them. It is worth while to trust in such a God. If we only learn to trust God properly, it will make us very happy. And looking at God's works should lead us to trust him.

JEWISH NOTES.

The Jewish citizens of New York have decided to organize a Hebrew emigration society for the United States.

Recently a Jew-hating mob in Odessa, Russia, stoned Sara Bernhardt's carriage as he was driving from the theatre, on the ground that she was of Jewish descent. They also stoned her hotel, and stopped the performances at the theatre.

Jewish exiles from Russia are now arriving in Chicago faster than they can be cared for. During the last six weeks no fewer than 100 families have sought homes and employment there. They come from all parts of the Russian empire, but their common starting point is Brody, a city in Galicia, just across the line from Russia, whither the Jews flock to avoid persecution. The United Hebrew Relief Association hopes to be able to found a number of Jewish agricultural colonies in the West early in the spring.

N. Y. Sun.

Chanucka, which comes this week to gladden the Hebrew hearts, is the annual festival that commemorates the dedication anew of the Temple at Jerusalem after the sacrilege of the Syrian King Antiochus Epiphanes had violated it in 169 B. C. The anti-Semitic rioters of the present day might well adopt this persecuting monarch as their patron saint. He set up his own image in the Temple, sacrificed swine on the altar, made idolatry obligatory, sprinkled the Temple with the water from a kettle of boiled pork, and burned the Hebrew Scriptures. Circumcision was interdicted, and Sabbath keeping made a crime. But a bloodier hatred appeared in his slaughter of thousands upon thousands of Jews, and in his selling many more into slavery. At length the old priest Mattathias and his five sons made a stand against Apollonius, the King's General, and the people flocked to the deserts and formed an army. On the death of Mattathias, Judas, surnamed Maccab (the Hammer), or Judas Maccabeus, succeeded to the command, and his successive victories reconquered Jerusalem. We still see the festival which was established in honor of the cleansing and refitting of the Temple celebrated with the show of lights in Jewish homes, with dancing parties and tableaux, though more than 2,000 years have rolled away since the occurrence of these memorable events.

THE JEWS IN RUSSIA.

Our correspondent forwards us the following:—A new form of outrage has been hit upon by the Jew-hating communities of South Russia. A few days ago a large and fairly heavy box, despatched by goods train, attracted the attention of the traffic superintendent at the Birnula station of the Odessa section of the Southwest Railway. It had been sent off from Poltawa, and was addressed to Odessa. It was opened by order of the official named, and inside was discovered the corpse of an old man, evidently a Jew. Subsequent examination elicited that the name of the unfortunate man was Chaskind, and that he was a native and townsman of Konotop, in the Government of Poltawa. Under the corpse was found a note, on which was written in the Little Russian language:—"If you Jews will not quit the country, living, we shall send you out dead." How the unhappy Hebrew came by his death has yet to be ascertained.

TOBACCO VS. BRAINS.

The physicians of Paris are waging a war on tobacco. They urge that it depletes the vital forces, and claim that the long-lived men of the world are not its slaves. For illustration, they are holding up the experience of such aged anti-tobacconists as Cremieux, Guizot, Thiers, Hugo, St. Hilaire, Gortschak ff, and others. The board of public instruction in Paris years since forbade its use by the pupils in the schools on the ground of depressing and deadening effects. Our own observation with young men associated in study in our family confirms the claim that the use of tobacco blurs the keen sight and quick feeling. Generally the young men who use tobacco cannot keep up with those who eschew it. The statistics on tobacco from Yale College, published in the Yale Courant, are just as we should have expected. The Yale classes are divided into divisions according to scholarship, the first division containing the best and the fourth the poorest scholars. In the first division only twenty-five per cent. use tobacco, in the second forty-eight, in the third seventy, in the lowest eighty-five. Does not this show that tobacco and brains, or the use of brains stand in inverse ratio?

Sir John Lubbock, one of England's scientific men, says that "anthropoid apes" must yield the second place in the order beneath man, for his friends, the "ants" must be placed there. "When we consider the habits of ants," says he, "their social organization, their large communities, elaborate habitations, roadways, their possession of domestic animals, and even in some cases of slaves, it must be admitted that they have a fair claim to rank next to man in the scale of intelligence."
